Senator Roblin: What I am asking my honourable friend is: Seeing that he is living on it, if I might use that expression, seeing that he is bleeding money out of it for other policies than the original one laid down in the Unemployment Insurance—

Senator Perrault: Who is bleeding money out of it?

Senator Roblin: Well, the minister has requisitioned up to $200 million for new initiatives of one kind or another. I am not prepared to complain about that at the moment. Perhaps I will at some time, but I am not prepared to complain about it now. I am prepared to ask the minister, for the umpteenth time, how is he going to finance the deficit? That is the question he has avoided answering. He says, "In due time"; that we are going to have a new budget in September. Will he give me an undertaking that some advance notice will be given to the people concerned, let us say in the budget in September, as to what the fate will be of those people who have to pay this?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin is making a serious allegation that somehow there is a diversion of funds for improper purposes.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Perrault: The initiatives of the minister responsible for unemployment insurance have related directly to the unemployed of this nation and an improvement in their social conditions through employment, and that is a proper use for those funds.

Secondly, I stated quite clearly that there is a possibility that there could be an increase in employee and employer UI payments to make up all or part of that deficit. But that is a possibility, and the opposition will be fully advised. There is no obfuscation on our part.

Senator Roblin: I do not usually like members to modify their adjectives when they apply them to me, because I quite enjoy the range of their imagination; but when my honourable friend accuses me of saying that there is something improper in the sense of its being illegal—

Senator Perrault: That is the inference.

Senator Roblin: Not at all. If that is the inference, then I ask my honourable friend to change his mind, because that is not what I said and it is not what I intended to say.

To get back to the point, I want to find out what changes are going to be made in the unemployment insurance charges to the worker and the employer. If my honourable friend will not answer the question now, then that is all right, I cannot compel him to. I would ask him, when can he answer the question?

Senator Perrault: Very shortly, and I hope that Senator Roblin will retract his use of the word "raided," which has all sorts of shady connotations associated with it, connotations of a misdirection of funds.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—CONFLICTING MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to have an assurance from the Leader of the Government that he will be in a position to answer the question I asked last week and today regarding Bell Canada. I hope that the Leader of the Government will have time to provide that answer before the end of the session and that the question will not die on the Order Paper with the end of the session.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, every effort will be made to provide a reply to that question, which, without any doubt, is a relevant one.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information concerning Lebanon. World reports today have indicated a peacekeeping force and a United Nations or United States initiative. It is premature to speculate what the Canadian government's reaction might be to a multinational force within or outside the United Nations or to Canadian participation in it, if invited. So far Canada has not been requested, either by the UN or any government, to participate in such a force.

We are aware of the proposal that has been made to establish a multinational force to police the evacuation of PLO personnel from Beirut. We do not yet have details about the short time arrangement, but we understand that the United States has indicated a willingness to provide members of that force.

YOUNG OFFENDERS BILL

THIRD READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Neiman for third reading of Bill C-61, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, this bill has been given serious consideration in committee, and we have had several sessions of very interesting debate on the subject. Committee members have had an opportunity to hear the views of senior departmental officials, including Judge Archambeault and Deputy Minister Bissonnette, whose views proved very useful to the committee. We also heard presentations by the minister and also by several provincial ministers who appeared before the Senate committee to submit objections to the bill that had not been dealt with satisfactorily in the other place. Witnesses included representatives of the Governments of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia and Saskatchewan.

These governments do not seem to be entirely happy with the provisions of the bill, and their objections fell mainly into two very distinct categories. There were objections of a social nature, and I am of course referring to the maximum age at which young offenders will be considered as such. Some provinces would have preferred to have a variable maximum age, to be determined by the provinces themselves, instead of having the federal government set a uniform maximum age through legislation.

Personally, I told the committee, and I still think so now, that I felt federal legislation cannot provide for a variable age limit for young offenders. We must have a uniform maximum age and it must be laid down in the legislation. I feel that the principle of uniformity should meet with the approval of the Senate. There were also comments by the provinces regarding federal encroachment on provincial jurisdiction in the administration of justice. I raised this matter myself before the committee in the presence of the Solicitor General, who, through the deputy minister and Judge Archambeault, sent me two Supreme Court rulings on federal jurisdiction as it applies to the young offenders legislation. When one reads these rulings, it seems the courts decided, in no uncertain terms, that the federal government, as far as the application of this legislation was concerned, did not encroach on provincial jurisdiction as it concerned the administration of justice. These objections were raised by the provinces with respect to custodial dispositions and also to the destruction of files and fingerprints. Certain provinces, and rightly so, claimed that these various parts and clauses of the bill came under the prerogative of administration of justice.

In any event, I feel that for some provinces, the matter has yet to be resolved. There is still a feeling, based on certain provisions of this legislation that the federal government is encroaching on provincial jurisdiction.

I think the main objection has been, and it is not a matter of philosophy but of administrative policy, that because of the age difference, the bill will cause the provinces to incur additional costs. Some provinces claim that setting the maximum age at 18 will put an additional financial burden on the provinces, which will be faced with considerable expenditures to meet the objectives of this legislation. I would refer the Senate here to a statement by Minister Sterling, Secretary for Justice of the Province of Ontario, who told us about his basic objections, namely, that the provinces would be faced with additional expenditures as a result of the passage of this bill.

I think we should take note of Ontario's comments that these additional amounts will rise from a present $60 million to $80 million, to meet the requirements of this legislation, including the construction of new buildings and provision for new facilities for young persons, especially for those who are committed to custody by the court. We have the impression that there has been a lack of consultation between the federal and the provincial governments regarding these additional costs. The Ontario Secretary for Justice said the following, in this respect: "The Solicitor General of Canada has indicated that the level of assistance granted the provinces would not be reduced from the present level, in terms of absolute numbers". I do not think that is very reassuring. He went on to say, "In our opinion, our federal partners are acting irresponsibly in passing legislation involving serious financial consequences, without any, or hardly any consideration for making the appropriate financial arrangements".

The same objections voiced by the Province of Ontario were also raised by the Province of British Columbia. At the request of committee members, the Solicitor General appeared again before the Senate committee to provide some clarification regarding the objections presented by the provinces.

I myself asked the minister about this objection relating to financial costs. The minister told us that he had asked the provinces for figures and wanted to see these first before arranging for a meeting between the provinces and the federal government to discuss the additional costs that would be incurred by the provinces as a result of the new legislation.

This statement did not seem to be very reassuring for the provinces. I feel this is just another example of the many cases in which the federal government passes legislation and subsequently decides how it is to be implemented. In the present case, we have solid evidence that the provinces will be incurring substantial additional costs.

In committee, I mentioned the fact that these financial objections were not vital to the philosophy of the bill in question, but the fact remains that in the circumstances, the provinces have a right to be told beforehand by the federal government what kind of financial adjustment the government will provide to the provinces to help them implement this new legislation which we may be about to adopt.

There has been a lack of consultation between the federal government and the provinces. Before this bill is passed, the minister should first tell the provinces, and especially Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia, what amounts they can expect to receive to finance the planning and construction of facilities required as a result of the new legislation.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Senator Asselin: Therefore, honourable senators, with a view to meeting the demands of the provinces concerning the additional costs they will have to incur, I intend to present, on third reading—I refer you to clause 81 of the bill which says that this Act shall come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation—the following amendment: I move, seconded by Senator Donahoe:

That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended by adding in the second line of Clause 81, after the word "proclamation" the words:

but not before an agreement is reached between the Federal Government and the governments of the provinces with respect to the sharing of the additional costs that will be incurred by the provinces as a result of the implementation of this bill.

I feel that if the Senate were to adopt this amendment on third reading, it would be a way of dealing with the main objection raised by the provinces and the Solicitor General could meet the provinces to discuss this point before the legislation becomes effective. I realize that, as promised by the Solicitor General, the legislation will not become effective before 1985, and there is still plenty of time to consider these matters. However, if the amendment I have just proposed is incorporated in the bill, the provinces will at least have the assurance that before the legislation becomes effective, they will have been advised how much the federal government is going to allocate to the provinces to compensate for the additional costs incurred as a result of the new legislation.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Asselin, seconded by Senator Donahoe:

That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended by adding in the second line of Clause 81, after the word "proclamation" the words:

but not before an agreement is reached between the Federal Government and the governments of the provinces with respect to the sharing of the additional costs that will be incurred by the provinces as a result of the implementation of this bill.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

● (1540)

[English]

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I do not propose to impose a long speech upon you; I merely want to make a few observations with respect to the bill before us.

First of all, let me say that I think we have had a fair and detailed exposition of what took place at the committee stage from Senator Asselin. He has quoted from the speeches some of those who appeared before the committee gave, and has not attempted to paint the lily in any way. He has merely indicated that the bill is a difficult bill on which to speak. It is a difficult bill because I do not think that any member of this chamber would not approve of its aims and objects. We are all anxious to see that there be the best and most effective enforcement of the law among the youth of our country, and that that should be done in such a way that they can be rehabilitated and made into useful citizens. I think that those who designed the bill had those motives in mind. Certainly those are the motives that I believe inspired them, and those are the motives which impress me as being motives worthy of approval.

However, it must have been clear from what Senator Asselin had to say that all of the provinces we heard from are concerned with this bill. We heard from several of the larger provinces, and one or two of the smaller ones. In every case, each province was concerned because, in order to obtain what seems to be perfection in federal bureaucratic eyes, they are in a situation in which they are required to make extreme expenditures, expenditures which, at this time in the economy, at this time in the fate of our country, at this time in the affairs of our country, will make it virtually impossible for those claims to be met, as well as meeting all of the other on-going expenses of government, which are of constant trial and concern to those charged with carrying on the governments of the provinces.

I have just two things I wish to say on this bill. The first is that I do not altogether agree with Senator Asselin when he said that there had to be a federal age limit. I am inclined to agree that a federal government, dealing with all the provinces, must have uniformity, and must deal equally with all provinces. There must be an age limit, but I do not agree that the age limit must be that selected by the federal bureaucrats who have prepared this bill.

Ministers of the Government of Nova Scotia corresponded with me and told me that they found that the costs imposed on them as a result of this bill will be excessive. They told me that they would have great difficulty, and that the age limit chosen by the federal government is one which will have the effect of mingling extreme youth with—I was going to say advanced age; it is not advanced age, but the advanced age of youth. They said that they would have mature individuals mingling with fledglings. Perhaps I make my point clearer by using those words. They said that would happen because the age limit chosen by the federal government is the age of 18.

That sounds like a simple acceptable age. However, today we find that maturity is obtained at earlier and earlier ages. I was a member of a government that reduced the voting age. We failed to get credit for that because we did not, in turn, reduce the drinking age, but the succeeding government, headed by a man who is one of the ministers of the Crown in Ottawa, reduced the drinking age and made it possible for the youth of the province to go into taverns and take a drink.

My recollection is that that government lowered the drinking age to 18, and here we are going upward as far as my province is concerned with respect to juveniles. We are going from the age of 16, where we were, to the age of 18, where we never were, and in the field of maturity, responsibility for drinking and voting, we are moving down until the two come together.

I am tempted to tell a story I once heard from an old lawyer who had spent 50 years before the bar. When he was fading, he said that he had observed many things. He said that he had lived to see the top part of a dress go downward and the lower part of a dress go upward. He was speaking of the mini-skirt generation. He said, "Perhaps that's not a bad thing. Perhaps I will live long enough now to see the twain meet."

So, that is what we may do with the age of youth. We may have people who are qualified to drink, to vote, but, for the purpose of—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): The interesting question is what he would have done about it had he lived!

Senator Donahoe: —for the purpose of being punished, for disturbing the community, they may find they are treated as so-called juveniles.

I have one thing to say with respect to the appearance of the minister. The minister appeared before the committee on a couple of occasions, and I was present for a considerable time during one of his appearances. I heard the minister say that he was not a bit impressed by social arguments put forth by the provinces because, in his view, he thought they were far more concerned with the financial arguments. He said that he was not prepared to give much credence to their social arguments because he thought fundamentally they were arguing financially. I took exception to that statement at the committee meeting, and I intend to make public my exception to it now.

I would be the last to deny that there are tremendous important financial obligations imposed upon the provinces as a result of this bill. The senator who moved this bill and the senator who proposed the amendment made that abundantly clear.

All I can say is that we have heard a great deal of talk in this chamber about Conservative provincial governments, and no talk about Liberal provincial governments, because there are none.

Hon. Jack Marshall: And there never will be.

[Senator Donahoe.]

Senator Donahoe: There was some talk about wasting our time listing the provinces that have Conservative governments. If one really wanted to save time, one should have gone through the list of provinces that have Liberal governments. If we were to list those, no time would have been wasted.

In any event, those provinces are there, and the governments of those provinces have a philosophy and a way of looking at public moneys. Those provinces have a feeling of what those entrusted with power must do with respect to the money of those who entrust it to them.

I regret to say that, while there have been increases in recent years in the deficits of the provinces—and we have heard a great deal of talk about that—they have been caused, in my view, by what the federal government has done. If anybody wants to know how to do it, if anybody wants to know the levels to which we can go, if anybody wants to know the programs we can have regardless of their cost, if anybody wants to know how we can run deficits up until they rise in a brief time by billions of dollars, then all he has to do is look to the federal government. When we consider the deficit of this country, which has increased in a few short years of Liberal administration to where it more than equals the sum of all the deficits since 1867, then we know a little bit about deficits and the past masters of them.

I mention that subject for the simple purpose of saying that it is an easy thing for somebody in Ottawa to sit and say that we should amend the juvenile law and that we should have a young offenders law. The fact is that by so doing they are imposing an intolerable burden upon the shoulders of the provinces and are asking them to find millions of dollars, which the provinces do not know how to raise. Those are very good reasons why the results of the bill should be contemplated, understood and agreed upon before it becomes law. For that reason, I second the amendment moved by Senator Asselin for the reasons that I have given. Regardless of who is responsible for the deficits, regardless of whether they are Conservative deficits or Liberal deficits, God knows we have them and God knows they are there.

I agree with the statement made by the Ontario minister who said it is irresponsible for any jurisdiction to impose upon another the obligation of raising vast sums of money without indicating how it can be done or how the burden can be borne. The federal government should tell the provinces what has to be done to make it possible for them to carry the financial burdens they will have to carry if this bill is passed. That should be agreed to and understood before the decision is made that the burden should be imposed. Therefore, I urge all honourable senators to give thought to these arguments. I ask you to forget my partisanship. I am accused of being a partisan.

Senator Asselin: No way!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, no.

Senator Donahoe: Every time I rise to speak, some honourable senator from the opposite side accuses me of being a partisan.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Frith: We would never make such a low, unjust charge.

Senator Donahoe: I will close my remarks by saying that when I was appointed to the Senate I was told by some honourable senators on the other side that in this chamber we are not like the honourable members of the House of Commons. We are not partisan. We have a good fellowship. We discuss things, but we do not discuss them in a partisan way. I made a pledge at that time, which I do not feel that I have ever departed from, that when I participated in debate in this chamber I would be as partisan as those who preceded me. I can say in all honesty that I have done that. I urge you on this occasion to think of the burdens that you will be imposing on the provinces if you insist that this bill—which is good in itself, although it is not without its defects—be imposed upon the provinces without their being given an opportunity to make arrangements to bear the expenses it creates. It is an irresponsible measure, and we in the Senate will be irresponsible if we share in its enactment.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, after that eloquent plea from Senator Donahoe, I will do my best not to be partisan as I reply to the comments that have been made this afternoon.

I thank Senator Asselin for his courtesy in advising me last evening that he intended to propose an amendment to this bill and also for giving me a copy of the amendment before the sitting commenced this afternoon. I thank him also for giving us a very careful review of what happened in committee. As he mentioned, we had, I believe, a total of six meetings. Shortly after the bill was referred to committee, the chairman, Senator Goldenberg sent a telex to the premier of each province asking him if he would like to appear before the committee or to submit a brief. As Senator Asselin mentioned, we received submissions from several of the provinces, although a couple arrived rather late. In fact, one submission arrived after the bill had been reported.

On the whole, briefs and submissions followed much the same format. They were concerned in some instances with the question of the maximum age. There were concerns expressed about some of the administrative procedures, one in particular being with regard to the clauses we now have giving the judges authority to make decisions as to whether juvenile offenders will be kept in open or closed custody. Many of the provinces felt that this was, in fact, taking authority away from provincial administrators who administer the present law.

The committee heard representatives of the Government of British Columbia in the persons of Mr. Bernard Robinson, Commissioner of Corrections, and the Deputy Attorney General, Mr. Richard Vogel. In addition, we heard arguments from the Honourable Norman W. Sterling, Provincial Secretary of Justice, and Mr. Robert McDonald, Deputy Minister of Community and Social Services, representing the Government of Ontario.

We had a thorough canvassing of the concerns and reservations which all the provinces had with respect to the bill. I believe it was reiterated by all of them that they supported the concept of the bill and, as Senator Donahoe just said, we support its aims and objectives.

The reservations with respect to age again were brought up in almost every submission we read or heard. I would remind Senator Donahoe that we did hear that the provinces themselves were invited to try to reach a uniform age because they had agreed that a uniform age was most desirable. The federal government invited them to come to some agreement. As so often happens, they could not agree. The provinces seemed to fall back to the position that whatever age is now in force in the particular province was the ideal age. Therefore, it was left to the federal government, in fact, to make the final decision.

I should also like to mention that we heard other arguments with respect to some of the procedures. It was not necessarily vital to the general approval of the bill, but the concern generally did revolve around the anticipated increase in costs. I will deal with the question of costs and with Senator Asselin's amendment as I proceed, but I should like to mention that I think it is recognized that this is a momentous and different change that we are proposing in dealing with the juvenile justice system. One of the matters that seems clear, particularly in the final session we had with the Solicitor General, was that the provinces and the federal government have not heretofore had a satisfactory way of even assessing how well the present Juvenile Delinquents Act has worked or how the juvenile criminal system has worked. That is because the interpretation of criminal statistics varies widely from province to province. Therefore, we were all very pleased to hear the minister advise that a new system of reporting statistics regarding the juvenile correction system has been instituted under the aegis of Statistics Canada. It is called Juristat.

● (1600)

The Deputy Solicitor General, along with the deputy attorneys general from the provinces, will sit on these committees. They intend to rationalize a method of gathering and analyzing statistics. This will be extremely helpful to all elements of government involved in the administration of justice.

In addition, the Solicitor General advised us that he has authorized a three-year study, which is now under way, of the present juvenile justice system. This has been divided into six regions across Canada, and each region will be assessed independently.

After that study is completed, a further three-year study will be undertaken to assess the impact of the new legislation, which we hope will be implemented shortly. We will then be in a much better position to determine the flaws, as there inevitably will be, in the present legislation and correct any procedural or administrative difficulties that appear over that period.

There is no doubt that the principal problem and objection raised in each of the statements we received related to costs. I think we all recognize that this is a real difficulty. With any new program that is instituted, costs will be involved.

I remind Senator Asselin that this has not been done without consultation. As you know, we were given a very complete set of documents from the Province of British Columbia. That province has obviously been studying this proposed legislation over the last couple of years and has already submitted a detailed analysis of the proposed costs. We asked for similar documents from the Province of Ontario but, as yet, we have not received them.

The Solicitor General did tell us that he has already received preliminary reports from six or seven provinces. Unfortunately, Quebec is not one of the provinces which has submitted any reports. Personally, I feel that is very unfortunate because their age limit is the same as that in the proposed legislation, and it seems to me that that province has followed a very enlightened course of juvenile justice. I believe their testimony and input would be very helpful, and I hope they will reconsider and sit down at the table with the other ministers involved and look at the costs in an effort to determine what the equitable sharing of that burden will be.

I should perhaps mention that all of these will not be additional costs because there are some offsetting savings. For instance, in Ontario, where at the present time the 16- and 17-year-olds are handled in our adult system and undergo the same processes and procedures as other adults, with the same costs involved, transferring them over to the juvenile system will, presumably, effect significant savings. So, it is not simply an outlay of money.

In response to the specific amendment proposed by Senator Asselin, I would only remind him of what has happened in negotiations from time to time with the provinces, especially negotiations regarding money and the sharing of costs. I do not think anyone in the provincial governments or in the federal government wants this legislation to be lost. If we were to adopt the amendment proposed by Senator Asselin, we would place ourselves in the very grave danger of simply consigning this legislation to the ash can, because it is going to be extremely difficult to ensure or to guarantee in any way that all 10 provinces will sit down and agree on a formula. To try to bind the hands of the federal government and to say that it cannot implement this legislation until such an agreement is cut and dried, I think, would simply be intolerable in itself. We all believe that this legislation should be implemented.

The government has been quite flexible. Again, I would remind you that the provinces do have until April 1, 1985 to adopt those provisions regarding the maximum age. It is that particular part of the legislation that is worrying them at this point. They have that flexibility within themselves. The Solicitor General has suggested that he would like to proclaim the bill by April 1983, but when he last appeared before us he seemed most agreeable to deferring it to, at least, October 1983. He said that before any final decision is made he will be in touch with the provinces again to try to determine a date that would be feasible for the implementation of the legislation.

Again, I would remind honourable senators that that does not necessarily include the provision regarding the maximum age. I think there is a safety valve in terms of a period whereby all the provinces and the federal government can sit down and negotiate and try to come to some reasonable decisions as to the sharing of the costs.

For that reason, I simply urge you to reject the proposed amendment. I think it would be absolutely impracticable to try to implement legislation under such conditions. Furthermore, I ask your support for the bill itself. I believe it is a bill in which we all have a great deal of faith and hope for the future of our young people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: Would Senator Neiman accept a question?

Senator Neiman: Yes.

Senator Marshall: Can she reconcile for me the hypocrisy of any government in introducing bills of this kind when, on the one hand, we would appear to be trying to create a better atmosphere for our youngsters and youth, and when, on the other, we hear radio and see and hear television advertisements, which cost millions of dollars, suggesting that they would be better citizens and happier people if they drank alcoholic beverages? How can we expect to positively influence the lives of our youngsters when we allow this kind of tripe to appear on television?

Senator Neiman: I cannot agree with Senator Marshall that this amounts to hypocrisy on the part of this government or, indeed, on the part of any other government. I think Senator Marshall is trying to compare apples with oranges.

We are dealing here with federal jurisdiction and responsibilities in administering the juvenile justice system and with young people who come into conflict with the law.

Liquor laws and liquor advertisements are the responsibility of provincial governments. I might very well agree with the honourable senator, but I would point out that governments do not spend money on the advertisements. Is Senator Marshall suggesting that the federal government should simply pass a law prohibiting any advertising of alcoholic beverages? I point out to him that that is the responsibility of the provinces, and he should ask them to do so.

Senator Marshall: There is nothing we can do about it now. I cannot see why we should blame the provinces for that and absolve the federal government.

Our whole environment affects developing youth. Before we think about bills, what they cost and whose responsibility they are, we should remember that our end purpose in life should be to create a better environment for the youth of our country. We should accept our existing responsibilities before starting to create something new.

Senator Neiman: Perhaps Senator Marshall has noticed that the Department of National Health and Welfare has sponsored advertisements in order to counsel people, and not just young people, about the dangers of excessive alcohol consumption.

Senator Marshall: But the department responsible for physical fitness allows these advertisements to be broadcast on television.

Hon. Charles McElman: It is a provincial responsibility, and we cannot stop it.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I expect to say only a few words on this matter, but I do not want to make any rash promises I cannot keep. Perhaps a prediction would be better than a promise; I do not think I will be very long.

Much of what I would have said has already been put forward very eloquently by my colleagues, Senator Asselin and Senator Donahoe. However, one or two things were mentioned by Senator Neiman that seem to me to call for some comment less generous to the bill than she made. It has been said, and I heard the minister say—although I think he did say he was sorry he had said it—words to the effect that it seemed the key concern of the provinces had to do with money. I thought Senator Neiman was coming pretty close to that assertion herself this afternoon.

I do not believe that to be correct. I believe they are just as much concerned with the social aspects of this bill, and the changes it will bring about in that regard when it becomes the law, as they are about costs—and perhaps even more so.

In any event, it is beyond doubt that the question of costs should be a concern not only of the provinces but of the federal government, the sponsors of this bill. It should be the concern of the Senate as well as the concern of the other place.

While I was not present at all the meetings of the committee to which references have been made, I was present at the meeting a few days ago when the Solicitor General made it clear that there was no serious consideration given by the federal government to the question of costs. As I followed him, the most he could say was that he had been in consultation with the provinces on the subject of costs, but no agreement had been reached. Whether that was because he was not prepared or the provinces were not prepared, I am not sure. In any event, he really did not think the costs were going to be as great as people feared. He made reference, as did Senator Neiman, to the view that if you take young people of 17 or 18 years, or whatever the age may be, who are now being dealt with in the adult offenders program, and transfer them to the program provided for in this bill, and credit the funds from the former program to meet some of the costs of the latter, you have a pretty good offset in costs and, therefore, the provinces will not meet such heavy costs and perhaps will meet only very small costs in the implementation of this program.

I do not really think that that is an answer at all. It seems to me perfectly fair and obvious that, if the federal government wishes to introduce a program which is going to bring substantial costs—or even may bring substantial costs—to the provinces and will force the provinces to accept such proposed legislation, then the federal government has the duty to deal with the question of costs seriously, fairly and reasonably. It should feel the obligation to do so in advance of the burden being imposed on the provinces, which will be the recipients of the burden as well as of the benefits.

So far as I can see, and from what I heard in the committee and what I heard the sponsor of the bill say, there has been no really meaningful consultation by the federal government with the provinces on the subject of costs and the sharing of those costs between the two levels of government.

Regarding the question of transferring some costs incurred at present, but which will not be incurred under the new program, to offset the costs of the new program, Senator Neiman used the expression, "Presumably this will happen." I am sure she would not have used that expression, if there were any certainty in the matter at all. Of course, there is no certainty, because there has really been no effort made to find out whether this will happen, or, if so, to what degree it will happen.

Will the transfer of these older offenders to the new program require any less accommodation for those who are under the adult program? Will they be able to close prisons and correction centres because of this transfer? Will they be able to save any money on the heating and maintenance of the existing buildings because of this transfer? Nobody knows.

It looks to me as though this is just a shot in the dark, this particular assertion, which has not really been investigated at all. I am not even sure that the federal government has bothered to ascertain what the costs per person are to accommodate these older people in the present adult program, or how much it will cost per person to accommodate them in the new program.

As stated very eloquently by my colleague, Senator Donahoe, the Province of Nova Scotia has very substantial reservations, not only about costs but about a number of these things. One of them is whether the release of responsibility of all children up to and including the age of 12 will really work out to the advantage or to the disadvantage of those younger children. Will they be the subject of temptation and even pressure by those who are 13 or 14 to do the things those older children might wish done for their benefit, on the argument that if you are under 12 you do not have the responsibility and do not have to answer for your offences? The province is concerned, too, about the mingling of older young people—those in the 17- and 18-year-old class, or whatever the years may be when the legislation is finally applied—with youngsters of 12, 13 and 14. What kind of effect will there be upon those of such very tender years?

Very often, as anyone knows who goes into the courts, many of our offenders who find themselves in those courts today are people of 17 and 18 years of age. They often have a different outlook upon life and a different sense of responsibility for obeying the law than we would like to inculcate in those who are 12, 13, 14 and 15 years of age. Will the mingling of these older people with those of more tender years have a good or a bad social effect upon those younger people as individuals and upon society as a whole?

Who canvassed these questions? I did not hear any answers—any satisfactory answers, at any rate, or any answers giving any indication that a really thorough consideration had been given to that particular problem.

Senator Neiman, as I understood her, said that her appreciation of the attitude of the government all through this matter was that it was one of flexibility. I am sorry to have to disagree with her on such an important point. It seemed to me that the only thing the government was perhaps flexible about was the date of the proclamation or something connected with the date on which the bill would become effective. They were certainly not flexible about money; they were not flexible about the age limits; they were not flexible about the other social arguments raised by the provinces. And neither was the committee flexible, so far as that goes, because the committee, after hearing those arguments, decided by majority to report the bill without amendment. They did that, in my humble opinion, without proper consideration of the question of the social effect, of the question of costs, of the question of the date of the coming into force of the bill, and without proper consideration of any of these matters. While I actually have the greatest respect for my colleagues on the committee and for the chairman, I do not feel bound to accept their views on any subject, any more than they feel bound to accept mine; but I did not see any evidence of any flexibility on the part of the minister when he appeared before the committee on the day I heard him. I have not noticed any flexibility of the government, I say, towards giving proper attention to any of the representations made by the provinces which came before the committee. In particular, I did not see any evidence of serious and meaningful consultation between the Government of Canada and the provinces on any of these questions, nor on the question of costs either.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question.

Senator Smith: Certainly.

Senator McIlraith: I happened to be very much interested in the predecessor of this bill some years ago. It was not proceeded with.

I understood the honourable senator to say a few moments ago that there was no flexibility on the part of the government in dealing with this bill. I had understood that hundreds or, at least, a very large number of amendments were made in the committee.

Senator Smith: In the other house.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, in the other house. That being so, I am asking him, does he still stand on his argument that there was no flexibility in considering the matter? I should have thought that accepting so many amendments would be an indication of a fairly flexible attitude.

● (1620)

Senator Smith: I suppose I could reasonably say to the honourable gentleman that I would not have made the allegation about flexibility unless I had thought I was being correct. So I have to answer him to the effect that I do not regard the question he has raised as one that is at all contrary to the argument I am making about flexibility and consultation with the provinces. That is what I was talking about. If I did not make that clear, I thank the honourable gentleman for his question, because I want to make it clear. What I am talking about is flexibility vis-à-vis the provinces, and that is the only kind of problem I have mentioned, or intended to mention, anyway.

[Senator Smith.]

It does not take much to make me lose my train of thought, and the honourable senator, with his questions, has just achieved that. However, perhaps I can get back to it again.

I think I was saying that whatever one may think of the merits of the exact wording of the amendment, it intends to accomplish a very commendable and very necessary purpose if the proper relations between the federal and provincial governments are to be maintained. Therefore, whatever imperfections there may be in the amendment, and I do not perceive those mentioned by Senator Neiman, on behalf of my own province and the other provinces, and on my own behalf, I feel that the amendment should be supported, and consequently I ask honourable senators to do so.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just before the motion is put—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How do you know?

Senator Smith: You don't mean "just before", you mean "before".

Senator Frith: "Before". I appreciate that. I said "just before" because I did not want to interrupt senators who may want to speak to the substance of this bill, using the amendment as a reason for doing so.

Honourable senators, there is a serious doubt in my mind as to whether the amendment is in order, for the reason that the amendment proposes:

That this Bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended by adding in the second line of Clause 81, after the word "proclamation" the words:

but not before an agreement is reached between the federal government and the governments of the provinces with respect to the sharing—

I think, honourable senators, that the correctness or procedural acceptability of this amendment is in serious doubt because it does not have an ascertained time when the bill is to come into effect.

I refer honourable senators and His Honour the Speaker to two authorities for that proposition. The first is a recent book, copies of which many of us have received, The Composition of Legislation, First Edition, by Elmer A. Driedger, at one time Deputy Minister of Justice, and also a lecturer on the subject of parliamentary procedure and legislation. He says, at page 134, in chapter XV, on the subject of the operation of statutes, that:

A statute may be expressed to come into force on a future date . . .

An Act may also be expressed to come into force on the happening of a named event, usually a proclamation issued under the Great Seal. The event should be one that is readily ascertainable from official and accessible records. If an Act is expressed to come into force, for example, on a day that an agreement is entered into between two persons, others would not be able to ascertain—except with difficulty—the date on which the statute came into operation.

The other authority I refer to, honourable senators, is a ruling by the Speaker in the other place, given on December 19, 1978, and found in Commons Debates at page 2269. The subject, I believe, was a piece of unemployment insurance legislation. I will not read the whole ruling. The words I wish to quote are as follows:

The difficulty is even greater. As I said yesterday, even if that could be agreed upon—

That is another question, of an agreement. In the case referred to here the condition which he describes as incapable of agreement was a given moment at which all members of the house and all of the people in the country could be certain of the act coming into force. In that case it was the period of 12 months after the national unemployment rate had been at 4 per cent or less.

The time at which that 12 months begins or ends is not fixed and is not described exactly. Therefore, on two counts, the moment cannot be fixed exactly. I have already said I do not want to deprive the honourable member of an imaginative approach to the coming into force of any statute but whatever formula or approach is used, it must lead to a fixed time which is understood by all. On those two counts, therefore, I say the motion fails to do that and so on procedural grounds, I have to set it aside.

Senator Flynn: I do not know if Senator Frith insists on his point of order, but I think that when we say that the bill will come into force by proclamation, we do not know when the government will proclaim it, and it seems to me that this argument is not very strong in itself. But if Senator Frith insists, and should the Chair rule that he is right, I will move another amendment, which will mention five years, unless there has been an agreement previously.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is not really a question of insisting or not insisting; it is a procedural point that I raise for the attention of the Senate. I did not raise it until everybody had had an opportunity to speak, but whether or not that is relevant, there is the point, and the amendment is either in order or it is not.

Senator Flynn: I think you should have done this before.

Senator Smith: On the point of order, honourable senators, I should like to make just one or two observations.

With reference to the work by Mr. Driedger, he is a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of respect, and I would be reluctant to dissent from what I perceive as being any statement of his. I can quite readily accept his statement that an agreement between individuals is not something the date of which can readily be known by the public as a whole. I still feel that the argument of the deputy leader is beside the point, because we are not talking about an agreement between individuals; we are talking about an agreement between governments. We are not talking either about a fixed time which would be determined by that agreement, but about a fixed time which will be determined by the proclamation which follows it. It seems to me that there can be no argument at all, with all respect to the deputy leader, that people will not know what the fixed time is, because it is going to be contained in and proclaimed by the proclamation. It seems to me, with respect, therefore, that that argument is not relevant.

Again, with reference to the ruling of the Speaker, I do not proclaim my high regard for that ruling as I did for Mr. Driedger; but even if I did have a high regard for it, I would have to make the same argument. This relates to a fixed time understood by all, and again I say that what we are talking about is a proclamation, which brings the act into effect. The proclamation will fix the date and the time and will be understood by all, the same as any other proclamation is. So with respect to the deputy leader, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is perfectly in order, and ought to be so declared.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Frith wants me to make a ruling on this, I would like to have some time to look into the problem and give a decision later on. But if you are ready to agree that a vote on the amendment does not mean I consider it is according to the rules, and does not create a precedent, I am ready to accept it on those conditions. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: So it is clear that I do not accept as a precedent the fact that this amendment is accepted at this time, but I do not make any judgment on the point of order raised by the deputy leader.

Senator Flynn: I may offer the deputy leader a suggestion. If the amendment carries, we will authorize him to raise the point of order afterwards.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Donahoe,

That this Bill be not now read a third time but that it be amended by adding in the second line of Clause 81, after the word "proclamation" the words:

but not before an agreement is reached between the Federal Government and the governments of the provinces with respect to the sharing of the additional costs that will be incurred by the provinces as a result of the implementation of this Bill.

All those in favour of the motion in amendment will please say yea.

Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: All those opposed to the motion in amendment will please say nay.

Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion in amendment negatived, on division.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Guy Williams moved the second reading of Bill S-28, establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-28 is not new, particularly in this year of our Constitution newly brought over to Canada. There are senators in this chamber who in 1966 took a principal part in the debate on the subject of celebrating an Indian Day. At that time the Honourable Robert Muir introduced a private members' bill in the other place. Another principal participant at that time was the Honourable Stanley Haidasz. Both are here with us today, and I am sure, in my heart, that they will again participate fully.

As history now tells us, at that time, Mr. Frank Howard, an honourable member in the other place, referred to me as being responsible for the instigation of this bill in 1965-67, which was talked off the floor. The point in question at that time was that a day be set aside for Indian people in Canada to celebrate.

Today I have something different to say, and it is in line with the patriation of the Constitution. This includes the Inuit. As honourable senators know, Senator Adams and I belong to the first group of citizens who were here before the arrival of the forebears of honourable senators in this chamber.

The Prime Minister has said on more than one occasion that every Canadian shall be equal. Equality may have a different meaning for the Indian people, whether they be treaty or non-treaty Indians or Métis or non-status.

Bill S-28 is entirely different from Bill C-78 of 1965-67. At that time it was sought to have only one day to be celebrated by Indians. Many changes have taken place since then. The Indian people have advanced, moving slowly and participating in the Canadian mosaic and society. They have participated in actions of loyalty when this great country was in trouble, such as fighting in the wars. May I at this time pay tribute to the Indian veterans who paid the supreme sacrifice during the wars? They fought and died for their country.

● (1640)

The Indian and Inuit people are making progress, in their own slow way, in adjusting to a society that is entirely different from theirs, just as my colleague and I know that our societies are different from each other's. We native people of Canada have suffered like other native people on different continents. For instance, when settlers first moved into Brazil there were 3 million Indians in that part of South America. Because of disease and other causes there are barely 200,000 Indians left today. From 3 million to 200,000 is quite a drop.

We as Canadians have also suffered from disease and other causes. Yet, we have survived and we are participating in the society in more ways than one.

As in any other democratic country, there are people among us who disagree with their society, though inwardly they are proud to be Canadians and to participate in the Canadian way of life. This has been proved time and time again by the sacrifices made by the Indian people who joined the armed forces during the two world wars. But I need not go into that. I think the history is well known and well accepted. I will say, though, that many of the Indian people who fought for their land and their country were not taken prisoner but were killed because the enemy was unable to decipher their language in the Signal Corps. Such is the nature of war.

Bill S-28 will enhance the unity of the Indian and Inuit peoples of Canada. I am trying to avoid mentioning the Inuit people, because my colleague, Senator Adams, will have the privilege of speaking on their behalf.

I would like to refer to a lament made by a famous Canadian, the late Dan George. He gave the lament at a celebration in honour of the one hundredth birthday of Canada. I think it states the inner turmoil experienced by the Indian as he tries to adjust to a different society. Prior to this debate, this chamber was debating the Young Offenders Bill. In my time here I have had the pleasure of serving on the Subcommittee on Parole in Canada, and I know a little bit about the problems of Indian inmates. In any event, I shall only read part of the lament by Dan George. Some of you may be familiar with it. It reads in part:

My nation was ignored in your history textbooks—they were little more important in the history of Canada than the buffalo that ranged the plains. I was ridiculed in your plays and motion pictures, and when I drank your fire-water, I got drunk—very, very drunk. And I forgot.

Oh Canada, how can I celebrate with you this Centenary, this hundred years? Shall I thank you for the reserves that are left me of my beautiful forests? For the canned fish of my rivers? For the loss of my pride and authority, even among my own people? For the lack of my will to fight back? No! I must not forget what's past and gone.

Oh, God in Heaven! Give me back the courage of the olden Chiefs. Let me wrestle with my surroundings. Let me again, as in the days of old, dominate my environment. Let me humbly accept this new culture and through it rise up and go on.

Oh God! Like the Thunderbird of old I shall rise again out of the sea; I shall grab the instruments of the white man's success—his education, his skills, and with these new tools I shall build my race into the proudest segment of your society. Before I follow the great Chiefs who have gone before us, Oh Canada, I shall see these things come to pass.

I shall see our young braves and our chiefs sitting in the houses of law and government, ruling and being ruled by the knowledge and freedoms of our great land. So shall we shatter the barriers of our isolation. So shall the next hundred years be the greatest in the proud history of our tribes and nations.

The late Dan George did not realize his dream, and I do not think I shall either because we need more time, though we are steadily making progress.

As many of you know, I believe that when this house adjourns for the summer I shall be leaving you. I do not think the house will sit before my birthday, though if it does I shall be thankful. So this is part of my farewell. I do not believe that for my part I could do anything greater than try to make Bill S-28 a reality for my people and my colleague's people. I hope it will go down in history as part of what we all dreamed when the struggle was on to bring the Constitution to Canada.

We have learned well. Many of our people disagreed with the bringing of the Constitution to Canada and wanted to it to stay in England. It was a hopeless situation and, personally, I think it was a waste of time.

● (1650)

The place to get things done by the federal government is in Ottawa.

I plead and ask each and every one of you on both sides of the chamber to vote in favour of this bill.

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I do not have a prepared text to read from, so I shall not keep you too long.

Bill S-28 is to establish Indian-Inuit Week, and Inuit-Indian Day in Canada. My colleague, the Honourable Senator Williams, has attempted to have such a day recognized in Canada on two previous occasions. If my memory serves me correctly, when I was growing up in the North, the only holiday we had during the year was Christmas Day.

There is a strong bond between the Inuit and Indians of this country, as well as between those living in Alaska and Greenland, and I am pleased to see that if this bill is passed we will have our own day on which to celebrate. Canada celebrates its birthday on July 1. The Indians and Inuit of Canada celebrate on that day, but I am sure they would be pleased to have their own day on which to celebrate. They already have Hamlet Days in the communities across the North, but this will give us another reason to celebrate.

I never thought I would live to see the day when a bill such as this would be introduced in the Senate. As I have said, I am more than pleased to support this bill.

My colleague, Senator Williams, mentioned that there were three million Indians in Brazil who suffered from disease and other ailments, and, because of that, there are now only 200,000 Indians.

There are 24,000 Inuits scattered across Canada, without counting our friends in Alaska and Greenland. Though some of us live in Greenland and Alaska, we think of ourselves as being one people.

As I said at the outset, I am pleased to see such a bill being introduced in the Senate, and I hope that it will receive your approval.

On motion of Senator Muir, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 22, 1982 the debate on the motion of Senator Stollery for second reading of Bill C-108, to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I really hesitate to proceed now, but I have said on at least three different occasions that I intend to speak on this bill, so I do not think I should adjourn the debate now.

This bill, which is an extraction from the famous omnibus energy bill, is probably one of the most delicate pieces of legislation taken from that omnibus bill. It may not be as important as the other bills which arose as a result of the omnibus bill, but it deals with a delicate matter.

There are two aspects to this particular bill, one dealing with the so-called corridor through Quebec for electrical power from Newfoundland, and the other dealing with the powers of the National Energy Board being extended to include matters not only relating to electrical power transmission lines but also to oil and gas transmission systems.

Speaking on the aspect of the bill dealing with the so-called corridor, the minister appeared before the committee this morning when we were considering the bill. He explained the situation regarding the corridor through Quebec, a situation which is well known because of the famous dispute going on between Quebec and Newfoundland over a contract entered into some years ago with regard to Churchill Falls electric power which, with the passage of time, has become rather inequitable for Newfoundland. There is no doubt that Quebec has derived excess profits from that, if one wants to describe the exact situation. The Province of Newfoundland has no direct way of changing the contract. It cannot go before the courts unless it asserts that it was signed and executed in error, which is not the case. But, because of a lack of foresight, this has resulted in an inequitable situation for Newfoundland.

The negotiations between the two provinces have not been too fruitful, so finally Newfoundland asked the federal government to amend the National Energy Board Act to give it the authority to deal with a power transmission line in the same way as a pipeline. Thus, Newfoundland could expropriate a corridor through Quebec to ship its power from Churchill Falls to the United States, Ontario or other provinces.

● (1700)

It is on the basis of this principle that the government has inserted in this bill this authority for the National Energy Board. It has to be remembered that a favourable recommendation by the National Energy Board on this issue would require the consent of the Governor in Council, in addition.

[Senator Adams.]

Newfoundland appears to be satisfied with this provision, but Quebec is very unhappy about it. In other words, the federal government is saying that it has to intervene and perhaps act as an arbitrator between the two levels of government. We have to remember that, in fact, this solution of a corridor would be a very difficult one. The minister said, and I think everybody agrees with him, that it is a solution of despair. It would create so much dispute between the two provinces that I doubt that in the end it would prove to be the solution.

It is on that basis that I am very sympathetic to the viewpoint of Newfoundland. I think that some concession should be made by Quebec, but I am not too familiar with the details of the negotiation and I am not here to give advice to one government or the other. I think that the federal government, by intervening in this way at this time, is perhaps not taking the proper course of action, and, from a diplomatic viewpoint, it is in error. It might be a right decision, in principle, to say that a transmission line should be in exactly the same position as a pipeline. That is well and good, but here it is done in a very specific case. It is done in favour of Newfoundland against Quebec, and it is not as though it is establishing legislation in principle for all situations that could compare with this one. For that reason, I believe it is very doubtful that this would really bring about a solution.

Of course, that is not the only remedy that could be looked at by the Province of Newfoundland. I believe it has been proven before the committee of the other place that if they could carry the power from Churchill Falls through the Strait of Belle Isle, through the Province of Newfoundland and through the Cabot Strait, they could possibly reach Nova Scotia and then go to the United States. Apparently, it is now technically feasible to do that, but perhaps it would be much more costly than the other way, the so-called Quebec corridor.

Another point of dispute between the two provinces is the fact that Newfoundland has asked the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland to rule on the legality of provincial legislation which would, in fact, authorize the province to cut off power to Quebec; in another way to nullify in practice the contract between the two provinces. I do not think that this would be done by Newfoundland without having foreseen all the practical consequences of such a move. I suggest it would be equivalent to a declaration of war between the two provinces.

That is the state of things that worries me very much, and that is why I look upon this bill with very little favour. On the one hand, the federal government, through this legislation, is giving something to Newfoundland, but, on the other hand, it really takes away, or suggests that it may take away, from Newfoundland something with regard to oil and gas. I questioned the minister about that this morning.

I refer you to Part VI.1 of the bill, under the heading "Interprovincial Oil and Gas Trade." In this Part "offshore area" is described as:

—Sable Island or any area of land not within a province that belongs to Her Majesty in right of Canada or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources and that is situated in those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada and extending throughout the natural prolongation of the land territory of Canada to the outer edge of the continental margin or to a distance of two hundred nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of Canada is measured, whichever is greater.

Section 87.1(1) reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may by order direct that the Board assume supervision and control of the movement of oil or gas, or both, or any quality or kind thereof (hereinafter in this Part called "designated oil or gas") out of a province or the offshore area or both (hereinafter in this Part called the "designated province or area").

In other words, the act would give authority to the Governor in Council to control the movement of oil and gas which could be discovered on the coast of Newfoundland. The minister said that if the Supreme Court would rule against the viewpoint of the federal government in the Hibernia case, it would not apply. I am not too sure about that. In the reference by the government to the Supreme Court of Canada, Hibernia is defined as an "offshore area." That was made quite clear this morning in committee. It is obvious that this provision would worry the Province of Newfoundland and all those from that province who view the Hibernia field as very promising for the welfare and wealth of that province.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): If the decision of the Supreme Court is not in favour of the federal government, I think this section would not be included because the federal government would not have the necessary legislative authority.

Senator Flynn: Maybe, but it may not be the last word on the question, this reference by the federal government to the Supreme Court of Canada, because you have the reference by the Province of Newfoundland to its own Court of Appeal, which covers the whole offshore area of Newfoundland, including the bays, the three-mile limit, the 12-mile limit and so on. Even if the Supreme Court were to rule that the Hibernia fields are the property of the federal government, it would not necessarily mean that the rest of the immediate coast would not be part of it.

Senator Frith: I was thinking of the reverse.

● (1710)

Senator Flynn: We have already discussed the possibility of confusion between the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and the decision of the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland. I will go into that no further because it may be sub judice. In any event, it is up to the courts to decide, and whatever I say about it would certainly not affect or change the decision.

I point out that this legislation, on the one hand, gives a carrot to the Province of Newfoundland, and, on the other hand, takes away, as much as a bill can, the claims of Newfoundland to the oil and gas resources off its shores.

I read from the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Energy Legislation of the House of Commons, before which the Honourable William W. Marshall, the Minister responsible for Energy, Government of Newfoundland, appeared and was asked by Mr. McGrath the following question, which appears at page 26:24:

—if I as a parliamentarian were to ask you as a distinguished lawyer for some legal advice about a dilemma I have, for example, would I be foreclosing any options I may have, or any arguments I may have, on the offshore jurisdictional question if I were to vote for Bill C-108, and I refer specifically to Clause 87?

I think that is now clause 87(1). Mr. Marshall gave the following reply:

The way the bill is put together, in my opinion, it has a lot of aspects to it, as we all know, so you are damned if you do and you are devilled if you do not. You see one thing in it you want, and you vote for it, but you will also vote for the other. Let me put it to you this way: I cannot conceive in isolation anyone voting for that particular section and still be—I must watch my words here very carefully—an inhabitant of good standing in the good province of Newfoundland, I mean, that is a legislative assumption of jurisdiction over the offshore, and it is the type of thing which in my view leads to the irritants that build up between provinces and the federal government.

In questioning Mr. Marshall later on, at page 26:25, Mr. McGrath asked:

In any event, I do not want to dwell on it, but I am merely trying to point out to you the dilemma that this bill poses to someone who has fought long and hard for the Quebec-corridor concept. I find it grossly unfair. I would go further. I find it grossly unjust that I would be put in a position where I would have to foreclose some of my arguments on the off-shore question; where I would be voting in favour of emasculating the authority of the NEB; giving the Government of Canada the sole right with regard to the pricing of natural gas and oil.

This is another aspect of the question.

Finally, the last excerpt I want to quote, to show the dilemma of the Province of Newfoundland and the good people of that province, is to be found at page 26:26, where Mr. McGrath says:

This bill is almost machiavellian because the government knows how desperately we need the power corridor, yet the price we are being asked to pay may be just too high.

Of course, when Mr. McGrath refers to Machiavelli, that, as it always does, makes me think of Mr. Trudeau, although in this particular case I suppose the "Machiavelli" is Mr. Lalonde, a very good disciple of the Prime Minister.

In any event, to my way of thinking, this bill will create confrontation. Mr. Trudeau is always happy with confrontation, of course, and especially if he can provoke confrontation between the two provinces with which he happens to disagree at the present time, Newfoundland and Quebec—and Quebec more than any other province at any time. He knows that, if he can get them fighting each other it will take some of the pressure off him. There is no doubt that he enjoys confrontation between the federal government and the provinces, but he is especially happy if he can get the provinces fighting among themselves because he has always been a fervent observer of the motto “Divide and conquer!”

Honourable senators, even if this bill in some respects does include good principles, in practice, under the circumstances—those special circumstances with which it tries to deal—it is an extremely dangerous piece of legislation and should be resisted. To my way of thinking, if we refused to adopt this bill, we would be rendering a great service to the litigants, the two provinces in question, and to the federal government as well.

Having said that, honourable senators, so far as I am concerned—and I don't know what others on this side will do—I shall vote against the bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I may add one word to the debate on second reading, on the question of the dilemma, while I understand the position taken by Mr. McGrath, as quoted by Senator Flynn, it seems to me that another dimension of the supposed dilemma is that in the event that the Supreme Court of Canada comes to the conclusion that the federal government does not have legislative jurisdiction over the offshore area, as defined in section 87, as a result of the decision on the question referred to it, section 87 would lose its legislative and constitutional authority, because the court would be deciding that, in fact, the federal government did not have jurisdiction over that area. If, on the other hand, the court makes a decision in favour of the federal government, the government could then, in due course, pass legislation similar to section 87.

So, while the dilemma, as described, certainly appears at first blush to exist, it seems to me that, if one were so persuaded, one could vote for this bill as a Newfoundlander knowing that, in effect, one was voting for that part referred to in section 87 in the context of the eventual legislative authority as determined by the Supreme Court.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on the bill as an interested Newfoundlander. I don't know if you would like me to do that now or if you would prefer me to adjourn the debate and speak on the matter tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable Senator Doody moving the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Frith: Before the debate is adjourned, may I add a word? I realize I am not entitled to another intervention in the debate, but in terms of making our plans I would like to know what the position is. At the moment we are studying the principle of the bill on second reading. I listened carefully and respectfully to the intervention made by Senator Flynn. Will it be the position of the opposition that we ought to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce after second reading, bearing in mind the fact that that committee has now had the subject matter before it for pre-study for some time? I ask that only in terms of planning for committee meetings.

Senator Flynn: The plan, as discussed with the acting chairman of the committee, was that if the bill were given second reading today it would be referred to the committee, and it was arranged that the committee would meet tomorrow morning to deal with it. The committee would not call upon the minister again, because, of course, it has already considered the subject matter of the bill, but it might deal with the bill, if not clause by clause, at least sufficiently to suggest amendments to certain of the clauses in the bill. Of course, the normal procedure would be to refer the bill to committee anyway.

Senator Frith: I agree.

Senator Flynn: I was not aware that Senator Doody wanted to adjourn the debate, but if that is the case, we could consider the bill in committee on Thursday morning.

Senator Doody: Perhaps I could help, honourable senators. What I have to say would only last five or six minutes, if honourable senators are willing to tolerate that at this time of the day.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, before Senator Doody speaks, may I ask the deputy leader or the sponsor a question, because, depending on how that question is answered, I may ask senators to permit me to speak as well?

Does either the sponsor or the deputy leader know whether or not the Province of Nova Scotia has given its consent to this bill? You will see that in clause 87 the definition of “offshore area” means Sable Island, among other things. That, of course, would be a vital matter to Nova Scotia. If the agreement of Nova Scotia to this bill has not been obtained, then I should feel it necessary to put forward, as best I can, some of the reasons why the bill should not pass.

Senator Frith: I do not know what took place in the committee, honourable senators. Perhaps the sponsor or the acting chairman can help us in that respect. I assumed when I read that clause, and I noticed it when Senator Flynn referred to it, that the clause referred to Sable Island only in the context of a section of the British North America Act. I forget the section now.

That is all I can say about that matter. Perhaps someone else can enlighten us on that. But it does seem to me only to be talking about it in the light of that section of the British North America Act which deals with the resources of Sable Island.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, if I may just answer Senator Smith's question, I do not recall a question being asked in committee as to whether or not Nova Scotia had agreed, but there was certainly no indication anywhere that they had taken any objection in any way.

Certainly, none came to the committee, and there was no indication that any objection had been raised elsewhere or that that question had been discussed.

I draw Senator Smith's attention to the fact that "'offshore area' means Sable Island . . ." In the bill it reads:

"'offshore area' means Sable Island or any area of land not within a province that belongs to Her Majesty in right of Canada or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources—

I draw that limitation to Senator Smith's attention. It may have a bearing on his question.

Senator Frith: It is not Sable Island's offshore, but Sable Island itself. I think you are right, Senator McIlraith.

● (1730)

Senator McIlraith: I draw his attention to those limiting words.

Senator Smith: Would the honourable senator be good enough to say that again? I did not quite catch what he said.

Senator McIlraith: It is on page 16 of the bill:

"'offshore area' means Sable Island or any area of land not within a province—

What is the concern? Is it that Sable Island is within the area of Nova Scotia?

Senator Smith: Well, not exclusively, though partly, I suppose, because it obviously tends to deal with Sable Island, whether it is within Nova Scotia or whether it is not.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, but there is an agreement with Nova Scotia.

Senator Smith: I know very well that there is, and I am not sure that this provision is in accordance with that agreement, which is what leads me to ask the question.

Senator McIlraith: I cannot give a definitive answer, but I understand that the question of the definition, insofar as it pertains to Nova Scotia, does not arise, by virtue of the agreement.

I will have to leave the matter there. I am sorry not to be able to be more directly helpful.

Senator Smith: I do not think the honourable gentleman should feel any regret about not being able to answer. I should be in a position where I should not have to ask the question. I therefore do not blame him at all.

Senator Doody: I apologize for rising at this late hour, but I really feel that I should say just one or two words about this particular bill. It is a matter that is of grave concern to the Province of Newfoundland, and, indeed, to the Province of Quebec.

The object of the Newfoundland representations for equal status under the law in terms of the transportation of energy is really consistent with the status of all other provinces in terms of the transmission of oil and gas across provincial boundaries. That, really, has been the nub of the matter for some time. It has been an on-going source of irritation in the provinces, certainly for the past 10 years, and probably longer.

This problem has recently been brought to a head, according to the minister this morning, by an application by the Alberta Power Corporation to deal with an interprovincial or international power transmission line, and the minister says that it really was not put in place to facilitate the requests of the Province of Newfoundland, although there are certainly those of us who might feel that that is not quite accurate, at least in the heart of the matter.

It would indeed be delightful to imagine the two provinces sitting down together, resolving the difficulty and putting a common front forward on the transmission of electrical energy from the waters in Labrador, through the province of Quebec, and into a national grid. Some of us in eastern Canada have had the dream for a long time of harnessing the electrical potential in the province of Quebec and the Labrador section of the province of Newfoundland, of shipping that power west, the surplus south, and building up a security of energy supply in the eastern part of Canada that would have nothing at all to do with the oil and gas situation. It would indeed be a matter of great benefit to the people of eastern Canada if the dependency on oil and gas were removed completely in terms of electrical needs. That has not been the case. That desire has been frustrated by a series of disagreements between the two provinces for quite a long while. I was a party to some of the discussions over the years, and, indeed, my friend and colleague Senator Tremblay was a party to some of those same discussions along the way. It is a great deal more complex—these things usually are—than would appear on the surface.

It would be simple indeed to say that the Government of Quebec should have persuaded Quebec Hydro a long while ago to reopen the Churchill Falls power contract, that it was inequitable for Newfoundland, that it was not a reasonable agreement; but the simple truth of the matter is that it is an agreement, and it is a legal agreement. I have no praise for the people on the Newfoundland side who signed the agreement. At the time it could be said that it looked like a good deal for Newfoundland. Newfoundland was desperately in need—indeed, when has it not been desperately in need?—of some sources of employment or revenue. The terms of the contract were reasonable at that time. Probably the single most objectionable part of that power contract was that it was a 65-year contract with no re-opener, and how anybody could possibly contemplate the ability to look 65 years into the future in terms of anything boggles the mind. That, however, was the agreement that the Government of Newfoundland, or its representatives, signed at that time. There is one small re-opener in it, which is kind of ironic. After 40 years the price drops from 2.5 mills to a lower price, which really is a tribute to the people who negotiated the contract!

The bonds at that time were guaranteed by Quebec Hydro. The sale was made through Quebec Hydro to Quebec Hydro, and generally speaking the bond indenture was written in such a way that if a default in supply of power were to occur for some reason there would be a resultant default in the bond issue, and the customer, Quebec Hydro, would have the authority and power to take over the operation, and so on.

So, by and large, it is a rather rigid document, well written from the Quebec Hydro side, and not quite as well done from the side of the Province of Newfoundland. It would be nice to have that agreement re-opened, and to have a more reasonable price paid for the power to the province of Newfoundland; but the people in the province of Quebec say that that would not be reasonable or sensible from their point of view. They have a contract, valid and reasonable, and they have every intention of seeing that their people get the benefit of it.

That is not the whole problem, however. There are other side issues involved. There is the development of the other water power in that whole vast area that has been held up as a result of this dispute, and that, to me, is the tragedy of the whole situation. Although the Churchill Falls agreement takes the headlines, the five rivers which originate in the province of Quebec and run south to the north shore and into the St. Lawrence River are important. They have been flowing since time immemorial and will continue to flow, because no one can harness them. The headwaters are in Labrador and the rivers run through the province of Quebec into the St. Lawrence. There are thousands of megawatts of electricity just running away day after day, month after month, because there is no resolution of the conflict. As Senator Flynn points out, perhaps the forcing of a power corridor just might prolong that sort of agony a great deal longer. There are rivers in Labrador that run into the Labrador Sea, such as the Eagle and the Lower Churchill, with a power potential equal to that of the Upper Churchill. That is another 5,000 megawatts of power that are running up there unharnessed, and have been from time immemorial also, and will continue to run. There is a tremendous equivalent in terms of barrels of oil—I do not have the figures with me—just running into the ocean because of this sort of squabbling.

To have this sort of matter resolved would certainly be in the best interests of Canada as a whole, and of the people of Newfoundland especially. Whether or not this power corridor will resolve the difficulties remains to be seen. I have some reservations. If the Government of Quebec does not accept it in good faith, then obviously the problem will remain. I find it very difficult to imagine a power corridor going through any province that is not favourably thought of or received by the government of the province through which it is going. I hope that reason will prevail as the situation resolves itself down the way.

The other point on the power corridor that I find fascinating and intriguing—and I still have not received an answer on this, although I asked the minister this morning—is the six months' hoist. The power corridor section of this document does not come into effect until six months after the rest of the bill. The object of that delay has been, I am told, to encourage the two sides to sit down and discuss their differences further, and, hopefully within six months, come to a resolution of the things that have separated them for the past 10 or 15 years. What sort of incentive is in this document to get the Government of Newfoundland to sit down, when they know that in six months' time it is going to be put into effect anyway, to make concessions during the six-month waiting period that they have not found it possible, in all conscience, to make over the past 10 years, escapes me. Perhaps somebody can explain that to me as the debate goes on.

In terms of the old joke, from Newfoundland's point of view that is the good news. But, as Senator Flynn pointed out, from Newfoundland's point of view there is a bad news side to it too. Senator Frith seems to suggest that it may be a cosmetic problem, and that the problem of the offshore jurisdiction is going to be resolved in the courts anyway. Nevertheless, I find it repugnant, after my years of experience and dedication to trying to get some sort of resolution to that offshore problem, to vote for the clauses in this bill which extend to the Governor in Council and the federal government the jurisdiction over, and the right to dispose of and exploit, all the natural resources situated in the submarine areas off the coast of Newfoundland.

I asked the minister in committee today how he could explain the discrepancy in this document and in the national energy bill and the petroleum authorization bill. The same wording is there. They lay claim to all of the adjacent submarine acreage, the continental shelf and the 200-mile nautical limit or the 200-mile economic zone, whichever is the greater.

Nevertheless, in the reference to the Supreme Court they have confined themselves to what they rather unfortunately, unrealistically and untruthfully refer to as "the Hibernia area," which is really an area of 820 square miles, which is far in excess of the Hibernia area. It is the entire potentially productive geological structure off the east coast of Newfoundland that has been laid claim to in the court reference; it is not just Hibernia. I asked the minister today if it was the intention of the Canadian government, as time goes on, if other potentially productive areas are discovered in the offshore, also to lay specific claim to those areas. Is the interest only in the mineral-bearing areas or does the government, somewhere along the line, intend also to take over the whale pasture? The witnesses were somewhat vague on that.

The discussion seemed to centre around the fact that the jurisdiction is more important where the activity is, and "activity" can be loosely translated into potentially commercially profitable areas for the government which has jurisdiction, which, in my estimation, is not really the way that a confederacy should work.

This morning we heard the minister describe the possibility of exerting jurisdiction within the bays of Newfoundland. I find that mind boggling—all the various bays and inlets from headland to headland where for hundreds of years commercial fishing activities have been going on and is now becoming of great commercial importance to the Government of Canada. If there is some commercial activity under the ocean bed, then that is unfortunate. Within the next year or so things might change on the federal scene and it is to be hoped that the thinking might change with it.

I do not propose to delay honourable senators for long. I should like to speak for a few moments on the cable crossing the Straits of what used to be so offensively referred to as the Anglo-Saxon route across the Straits of Labrador to the Island. I find the term "Anglo-Saxon route" somewhat offensive because almost 50 per cent of the population of Newfoundland is Irish. Do not misunderstand me. My colleagues from Quebec will think that I am being sympathetic about them, whereas I am being sympathetic about my own Celtic background. The term "Anglo-Saxon route" has always disturbed me; but what is even more disturbing is the cost and the technical problems associated with this. It does not make sense for a Canadian province to be shipping power down to the United States through that long, laborious, technically difficult, ice-ridden area, at a mill rate that is perhaps two or three times as high as it would be shipping it across our own country.

I could ramble on about the various power options and energy problems on the east coast of Canada. I am one of those who will now be damned if he does and damned if he doesn't; if I am going to endorse Canada's claim to the offshore or bless them for giving us a power corridor perhaps six months from now, if all goes well. We will see what happens. I may become schizoid after tonight.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I do not intend to prolong the debate. It has been suggested, and I believe quite reasonably, that perhaps my question—which obviously cannot be answered here—can be answered in committee tomorrow morning. Therefore, I am prepared to wait until that opportunity occurs before saying anything further.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just for the record, the section of the British North America Act to which I was referring is section 91, subsection 9.

Senator Flynn: But that does not change the wording of the bill.

Senator Frith: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Peter A. Stollery moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FALKLAND ISLANDS—OCCUPATION BY ARGENTINA—MOTION EXPRESSING PLEASURE ON RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT AGREED TO

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C.:

That this House congratulate Prime Minister Thatcher, the Government and the people of the United Kingdom on their resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands that maintains the principle that armed aggression must be resisted, that respect for the United Nations Charter and the rule of law in international affairs be observed and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states, regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate yesterday. Senator Croll and I have discussed the matter and I believe the honourable senator may have a solution.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 23, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, P.C., that the motion be modified to read as follows:—

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I therefore move:

That this House expresses its pleasure on the happy resolution of the conflict in the Falkland Islands and hopes that the respect for the United Nations Charter and the rule of law in international affairs will be observed in the future and force not used to settle territorial disputes between states; regrets the loss of life and injuries on both sides and urges a peaceful settlement of all outstanding issues between the U.K. and Argentina.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ORDER OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 28, 1981:

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the Senate resumed the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Riley, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc, and, in particular, to examine

(a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;

(b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and

(c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

ROBERT FORTIER
Clerk of the Senate

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

During the last 8 months this Committee has held 14 public hearings and numerous in camera meetings.

The Committee has received the cooperation from the Minister of Transport, the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, the former Minister the Hon. Don Mazankowski, Les Benjamin, M.P., and Tom Siddon, M.P.; officials from Transport Canada and the Canadian Transport Commission, Mr. Frank Roberts, Chairman, officials from VIA Rail Canada Inc.; officials from C.N.; officials from C.P.; officials from Transport 2000; Mr. John DeLora, Director, Michigan Passenger Foundation and Mr. G. C. Eglington, Counsel, Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. Many of these witnesses, a list of which is appended to this Interim Report, testified on numerous occasions. This type of study would have been impossible without their testimony and the Committee is very grateful for their assistance.

Particular mention must be made of the assistance provided by Committee personnel namely Mrs. Aline Pritchard and Messrs. Eric W. Innes and André Reny for their help and Mr. Jack Silverstone, Research Officer, Law and Government Division, Library of Parliament all of whom worked diligently and with dedication to carry out the necessary research, to prepare the basis and recommendations of this Interim Report on VIA Rail Passenger Services.

RECOMMENDATIONS

FOREWARD

A. INTRODUCTION

B. LEGISLATIVE, LEGAL AND REGULATORY MATTERS

- (i) Use of Section 64(1) National Transportation Act
- (ii) Residual Obligations of the Existing Operating Railway Companies
- (iii) Confidentiality and the Canadian Transport Commission
- (iv) The Need for Legislation

C. ISSUES RELATING TO ECONOMIC FACTORS AND FINANCIAL PROCEDURES

- (i) The Issue of the 13th and 14 Bills
- (ii) The Canadian Transport Commission's Auditing Process and the Railway Costing System
- (iii) The Cost of Reduced Fare Employee Passes
- (iv) Transfer of Additional Facilities to VIA Rail Canada
- (v) Comparative Analysis of other National Railway Systems
- (vi) The Issue of Comparative Subsidies to other Modes of Transportation

D. OPERATIONAL FACTORS RELATING TO ROUTE CANCELLATIONS AND TO RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE GENERALLY

- (i) Sufficiency of Data
- (ii) Effect of Route Abandonments on Passenger Rail Service Generally
- (iii) The Issue of Commuter Services
- (iv) Implementation and Expansion of LRC Train Services

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. The Committee recommends that a special joint committee of both Houses of Parliament be created for the purpose of analyzing the contemporary and future options for passenger transportation services in Canada for the current and following decade. This study should be comprehensive and include an examination of all modes of passenger transportation. This special joint committee should have as its primary objective the presentation of recommendations that will ensure viable, economical, efficient and convenient passenger services for Canadians in all regions of the country.

2. The Committee recommends that any future decisions on passenger rail service reorganization or rationalization that involve route or service cancellations, abandonments or reductions be preceded by open and representative public hearings so that all parties concerned will have an opportunity to state their views. Furthermore, such hearings should not come to be regarded as mere formalities, but rather should be seen as an integral and indispensable part of the decision-making process. Consequently, the Committee also recommends that s. 64(1) of the National Transportation Act be amended, or its application be restricted by amendments to other sections of the Act to ensure it will not be used to make major reductions in passenger service without proper recourse to the Canadian Transport Commission or to Parliament.

3. The Committee recommends that an enactment providing a clear and all-encompassing legislative framework for VIA Rail Canada Inc., and in consequence for passenger rail service in this country, is an essential requirement. A good deal of delay has already taken place since the initial incorporation of the company. Time now should be regarded as of the essence and the Committee earnestly recommends the introduction of such legislation at the earliest possible date. The Committee recommends that such legislation specify the right of VIA Rail to relevant costing data, and should specify the methods to be employed in order to obtain the necessary information either from the railways directly or through the Canadian Transport Commission. The Committee also recommends that the appropriate officials of VIA Rail be fully consulted in the course of drafting the legislation.

4. The Committee recommends that future contractual agreements between VIA Rail and CP Rail and CN Rail incorporate a fixed charge for each service provided and eliminate post year-end billing except for cases of demonstrable errors or oversights as found and authorized by a CTC audit.

5. The Committee recommends that the CTC audit of charges to VIA Rail be conducted more expeditiously. If necessary in order to shorten the current unacceptably long delays in the CTC's auditing procedure, additional qualified staff should be engaged.

6. The Committee recommends that the Canadian Transport Commission commence forthwith a detailed review of Costing Order R-6313 to determine its suitability given the major charges in passenger rail service in this country since the creation of VIA Rail Canada Inc. The Committee feels that the Order may have to be substantially amended to reflect current conditions. The Committee recommends that avoidable cost structure for the Canadian rail passenger system be adopted through amendment to the existing order or through the issuance of new railway costing order.

7. The Committee recommends that the two major railroad companies, CP Rail and CN Rail, be responsible for an initial contribution figure of two-thirds of the value of free and reduced fare employee travel passes provided by VIA Rail Canada, with the opportunity to reduce this contribution level down to a minimum of one-third of the value on the basis of an on-time passenger train performance incentive arrangement.

8. The Committee therefore recommends that VIA Rail Canada Inc. present a plan for the acquisition of selected passenger railway stations in Canada to the CTC and the Department of Transport. This plan should include VIA's long range goals regarding these facilities including a detailed discussion of the possibility of converting them into integrated transportation centres.

9. The Committee further recommends that prior to the acquisition of any railway stations and associated facilities, or prior to the signing of any firm contractual commitment to purchase such properties by VIA Rail, the terms and conditions of the acquisition, including the purchase price, be examined by independent auditors and evaluators in accordance with current accounting principles, and that their findings be presented for parliamentary scrutiny and discussion.

10. The Committee recommends that the date used as a partial basis for the decision taken in last autumn's route abandonments should be re-examined in great detail in order to determine if all the facts were available and properly interpreted. This examination should be undertaken by the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC and the results of the investigation should be made public at the earliest opportunity. Furthermore, the Committee recommends that, in future, relevant information concerning particular routes that might become the subject of possible abandonment or service reductions be the object of informed public discussion prior to a decision being taken.

11. The Committee recommends that the concerned parties, namely the railways providing the service, the municipalities served, the CTC, the provincial governments and Transport Canada undertake consultations and negotiations prior to any route cancellations to ensure that commuter services will be maintained where necessary, either by VIA Rail, or one of the other operating railways, or another entity should that be deemed desirable. The Committee emphasizes that this should be done prior to the elimination of such routes so as to avoid wholesale inconvenience and economic dislocation as a result of relatively sudden changes in long standing commuter services.

The Committee further recommends that a firm technical definition of commuter services be put forward by Transport Canada without delay. This will aid in ensuring that only routes that are truly commuter services will be transferred to provincial jurisdiction.

12. The Committee recommends that LRC train equipment be introduced in regular service on routes in the Atlantic provinces and in Western Canada as soon as is practicable. This should take place no later than 1984, barring unforeseen technological impediments.

INTERIM REPORT ON PASSENGER RAIL SERVICE PROVIDED TO CANADIANS BY VIA RAIL CANADA INC.

FOREWORD

This interim report is broken down into three major areas which reflect some of the major legislative, economic, and operational factors that were revealed to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications in the course of its proceedings. As in almost all instances where many issues are presented, a report must make an effort at categorizing these elements. Likewise, in almost all instances, a certain degree of arbitrariness is present in such an attempt at categorization. Most of the major areas of discussion in this interim report are inextricably intertwined. The presentation and breakdown according to headings and subheadings reflects the Committee's judgment as to a logical, and coherent presentation of these various issues. The interim report is intended to be an integral and unified document, and the Committee earnestly hopes that no one part of the Report will be employed out of context for the purpose of justifying any one point of view.

As a result of its findings thus far, it has become clear to the Committee that the issue of Canadian rail passenger services is a complex one with profound consequences. It is for this reason that the Committee is presenting, at this time, an interim report only. The Committee believes that further study is necessary, and it will continue its investigation if the current parliamentary session is not prorogued. If the current session is prorogued this summer or autumn, the Committee will ask that it be empowered to continue its study.

A. INTRODUCTION

On November 5, 1981, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications commenced its hearings on the national rail passenger service provided to Canadian by VIA Rail Canada Inc. This series of hearings was instituted pursuant to the order of reference from the Senate of Canada of October 28, 1981 which reads as follows:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be instructed to inquire into and report upon the national rail passenger service provided to Canadians by VIA Rail Canada Inc. and, in particular, to examine

(a) the Federal Government's plans for reorganizing Canada's passenger train services announced by Transport Minister Jean-Luc Pepin on July 27, 1981;

(b) the changes in passenger train services effected by Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, dated August 6, 1981, made pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act; and

(c) the procedure followed by way of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 in varying the Canadian Transport Commission's Orders and Decisions respecting Canada's passenger train services.

While the condition of passenger rail services in this country is of ongoing concern to all Canadian parliamentarians, the action of the Governor in Council in reducing, pursuant to Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 which took effect on 15 November 1981,⁽¹⁾ the passenger rail routes and services provided by VIA Rail Canada by some 20%, provided the initial focus for the Committee's activities. That date came and went, and the reductions in service were implemented, but many underlying issues surrounding the decision, and indeed the whole issue of the provision of railway service to the travelling public in Canada remain outstanding. This Committee heard extensive testimony and received briefs on a wide range of issues related to the topic of passenger rail services. Many of these submissions commented on the above-mentioned decision by the Governor in Council. Various other significant issues also came to light in the course of these hearings that are, in the Committee's view, highly relevant in terms of the immediate and long-range viability, and indeed survivability, of passenger rail service in Canada.

The Report of the Committee will attempt to reflect many of these concerns and will indicate both in the substantive text and in the recommendations, constructive and practical suggestions to ensure that rail passenger services will continue to play an indispensable role in Canadian transportation.

The Committee is of the view that a modern and attractive railway passenger system can and should continue to play an important part in Canada's transportation future. A comfortable railway passenger system which is well utilized by the travelling public can provide an energy-efficient and cost-efficient method of inter-city travel. In the Committee's opinion, passenger rail service is an economical and prudent investment when compared to the very high cost of subsidies needed to underwrite the construction and maintenance of facilities for air and road transportation. Furthermore, the provision of a railway alternative can serve an important function in alleviating congestion on Canada's highways and in its airports, particularly during peak travel periods. The Committee also feels that the Canadian travelling public should be provided with a convenient choice of modes of travel.

This Committee believes that Canadian passenger rail service is undergoing a fundamental change. This process is generally gradual and does not normally cause much public or parliamentary outcry at least until a gap in the evolutionary movement needs filling. This is what occurred after July 27, 1981, when it was announced that $100 million was needed to finance new equipment acquisitions, and that this money was to be found through eliminating about one-fifth of rail passenger services in Canada. This provoked a vigorous public protest.

The Committee regards this type of drastic service cut as an unfortunate ad hoc response that has detrimental long-term ramifications for the passenger rail system in Canada. The Committee believes that this sort of very important decision should not be made as a reflex reaction to a combination of circumstances that are foreseeable and should properly be the subject of well-reasoned, long-term planning.

For all these reasons, the Committee is of the view that a comprehensive study of Canadian passenger transportation services should be undertaken with a view to producing a model for the delivery of such services until the end of this century. The Committee believes that rail passenger service should not be examined in isolation. Therefore, the Committee concludes that a study of the future of passenger transportation in Canada should include an examination of all modes of passenger carriage and their inter-relationships. Indeed, the economics of freight transport also has profound effects upon passenger services, and the study which the Committee believes necessary should be comprehensive in its scope so as to include consideration of all elements that affect passenger carriage, including the freight component. The Committee feels that this type of study is essential and should be undertaken without delay.

The topic of passenger transportation is of concern to all Canadians. The Committee feels that Canadians from all parts of the country should be able to present their views to a body investigating this important field. The Committee is of the opinion that a special joint committee of both Houses of Parliament would be the most appropriate vehicle for carrying out this comprehensive analysis of passenger transportation in Canada. This type of study is essential and should be undertaken without delay.

1. The Committee recommends that a special joint committee of both Houses of Parliament be created for the purpose of analyzing the contemporary and future options for passenger transportation services in Canada for the current and following decade. This study should be comprehensive and include an examination of all modes of passenger transportation. This special joint committee should have as its primary objective the presentation of recommendations that will ensure viable, economical, efficient and convenient passenger services for Canadians in all regions of the country.

B. LEGISLATIVE, LEGAL AND REGULATORY MATTERS

(i) Use of Section 64 (1) National Transportation Act

By the implementation of Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 dated 6 August 1981, effectively one-fifth of the passenger routes served by VIA Rail Canada Inc. were eliminated.⁽¹⁾ These route reductions and abandonments, which were referred to by the Minister as a "rationalization" of passenger rail services, involve the elimination of some heavily travelled and very significant train services. The Minister of Transport, in testimony before this Committee spoke of the reasons for these reductions:

If services were maintained at the present levels, $446 million would be required for operations in 1983-84, leaving only $90 million for capital developments. If things continue as they are now, knowing we are limited in the amount of money we can spend, we will find that we will not be able to assign the money to equipment.

The cuts will reduce operating deficits to $355 million by 1983-84, which will leave $182 million for capital. In other words, you are doubling the capital budget of VIA and, by so doing, allowing it to acquire proper equipment.⁽²⁾

This decision by the Governor in Council to effect substantial reductions in the service offered by the national rail passenger carrier was taken without public hearings or inquiry, and was not examined or adjudicated upon by the Canadian Transport Commission's (CTC) Railway Transport Committee (RTC). Had the Railway Transport Committee been seized of the matter, they would have been under the legal obligation to assess the route reductions in accordance with section 260, and particularly subsection (6) of that section, of the Railway Act.⁽³⁾ This section sets out a number of criteria which the CTC's Railway Transport Committee is obliged to consider when evaluating a request for a route discontinuance.

In assessing an application for discontinuance, section 260 of the Act specifies that the CTC shall consider, in addition to the issue of whether or not the particular route in question remains economically viable, all matters that, in its opinion, are relevant to the "public interest". This includes, inter alia, the existence of alternative transportation services, the probable effect on other passenger train services, and the probable future passenger transportation needs of the area affected by the proposed route cancellation. Thus, it is clear that in such instances the Railway Transport Committee is not, in its examination of an application for a route discontinuance, confined to examining economic criteria alone. In fact, it is incumbent upon the CTC to examine factors relating to the public interest generally. In addition, the Commission can receive representations and hold public hearings on the matter. Public notice of hearings and decisions must be given.

The Governor in Council through Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, effectively bypassed the CTC, and as a result, there was no opportunity for the public to present briefs and testimony prior to the effective implementation of the route cancellations. One can only speculate as to what degree the Governor in Council considered the factors that are set out in section 260 of the Railway Act, or if they were considered at all. Undoubtedly, the Governor in Council takes the position, as explained by the Minister of Transport, that the decision to effect the route reductions in order to free funds for equipment is indeed a measure that it is within the public interest to ensure the long term viability of VIA Rail.

The legal basis upon which the Minister rested his decision is to be found in section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act.⁽⁴⁾ That provision provides for the Governor in Council to vary, at any time, in his discretion and even of his own motion, any order or decision of the CTC. This use of section 64(1) of the National Transportation Act was the subject of litigation in the Federal Court of Canada, Trial Division in three instances arising out of these route cancellations. In these cases, the Federal Court held that the Governor in Council was acting within his proper jurisdiction in the use of section 64. The Committee recognizes that appeals in these judgments have been filed and that the matter remains sub judice and consequently refrains from expressing a definitive opinion.

Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 is actually titled "Order Varying Canadian Transport Commission Orders and Decisions". The Order varied a number of CTC decisions bearing dates from 1976 to early 1981 wherein the RTC had detailed the provision and frequency of passenger train service on various routes. P.C. 1981-2171 substituted the decision of the Governor in Council to eliminate or drastically reduce these specified services.

However, the Committee received testimony to the effect that while the Governor in Council may indeed vary an order of his own motion, he cannot act in such a way as to implement a decision or order which is beyond the scope and power of the CTC itself. The Committee is also of the opinion that Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171 violated the rules of natural justice.⁽⁵⁾

In a similar vein this Committee (i.e. the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications) also feels it relevant to be mindful in its report of the fact that the initial order effecting the route cancellations was strongly attacked as being in contravention of the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act. One of the grounds for this objection was that Order in

⁽⁴⁾ S. 64(1) is reproduced in Appendix III.

⁽⁵⁾ Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Ninth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, dated 12 November 1981, which set out additional legal objections to Order in Council P.C. 1981-2171, are reproduced in Appendix IV.

Council P.C. 1981-2171 which was made on August 6, 1981 was not transmitted for registration to the Clerk of the Privy Council within seven days as is required in the Statutory Instruments Act. Whether the Governor in Council agreed with the assessment that Order P.C. 1981-2171 was a regulation requiring registration is not certain. However, the order was ultimately registered prior to its implementation and came to be known as SOR/81-892. This registration took place on 3 November 1981, nearly three months after the Order was first made.

While this may appear to be no more than an adjustment of legal formality, the Committee is of the view that when there is great controversy in the public mind as well as before the courts as to the legitimacy of an action by the Governor in Council, the strictest adherence to procedural formality regarding the order in question is of considerable importance. When the Governor in Council decrees the elimination of nearly one-fifth of the entire passenger rail service in Canada without resort to the public forum, then the minute adherence to statutory provisions concerning transmittal, recording and publication of the order in question is, it seems to the Committee, to be a minimum requirement.

The stated rationale for proceeding by way of order in council pursuant to section 64(1) was that a speedy decision was necessary and that following the CTC route would involve lengthy public hearings. Furthermore, in the government's opinion, these route discontinuances were essential in order to finance additional modern equipment for VIA Rail, and there must have been a possibility that the CTC would not, in applying the criteria of the Railway Act as discussed above, reach the same conclusion with respect to the route cancellation. This would have put the Minister in a difficult, undesirable, and possibly legally indefensible position of having to instruct the CTC's Railway Transport Committee as to his view of the proper decision. For all of these reasons the route cancellation bypassed the normal CTC channels.

Again without expressing an opinion as to the legal propriety of the use of section 64 in the manner employed by the government, the Committee expresses its deep concern about the possibility of the creation of, in its view, an entirely undesirable precedent for possible further passenger rail cut-backs. Indeed, the Minister of Transport has on several occasions indicated that the actions of last November might not be the last of that nature should situations arise in the future which, in the view of the government, would call for similar action. The Committee is concerned that successive route reductions which bypass the CTC and do not consult the people affected by these route discontinuances could ultimately reduce the passenger rail service network in most parts of Canada to a very limited secondary role. In other words, through the use of section 64, the government could effectively eliminate passenger rail service as it is now known and seek to concentrate its railway resources in one or two geographical regions such as the often-mentioned Quebec-Windsor corridor. The Committee notes that two Canadian provinces are already without passenger rail services: Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland.

The Committee is of the view that this is a trend which is not in the best interests of the people of Canada and that the successive use of Cabinet initiative without reference to the Canadian Transport Commission's Railway Transport Committee would effectively deprive the travelling public of a forum in which to state their side of the case for the maintenance of any particular routes, or indeed an entire network.

2. The Committee recommends that any future decisions on passenger rail service reorganization or rationalization that involve route or service cancellations, abandonments or reductions be preceded by open and representative public hearings so that all parties concerned will have an opportunity to state their views. Furthermore, such hearings should not come to be regarded as mere formalities, but rather should be seen as an integral and indispensable part of the decision-making process. Consequently, the Committee also recommends that s. 64(1) of the National Transportation Act be amended, or its application be restricted by amendments to other sections of the Act to ensure it will not be used to make major reductions in passenger service without proper recourse to the Canadian Transport Commission or to Parliament.

(ii) Residual Obligations of the Existing Operating Railway Companies

Railways have played a primary role in the economic, social and political development of Canada. The Committee believes that this essential role of railways continues today. In simpler times, many railway companies provided passenger services to Canadians on a commercial basis. Through the years, these small railway companies were absorbed by the two giants of the railway industry in Canada today, Canadian Pacific Limited (CP Rail) and Canadian National Railway (CN Rail). Some of these smaller railways were acquired by outright purchase by the larger companies. Still more disappeared through a process of amalgamation and very long-term leasing whereby the current operating railways took over the entire route network and equipment of the smaller companies. These old railway mergers and reorganizations were the subject of federal and provincial enabling legislation. Most of this activity is well recorded in the old statutes, the majority dating back to before the turn of the century.

In several instances, the lessee companies which often undertook leases of railway networks for periods of over 990 years entered into agreements with the smaller lessor railways to provide specified railway passenger services. The agreements were then sanctioned by a provincial or federal legislative enactment. The degree of promised service is in some of the cases very detailed. In fact, in some instances, the actual provision of a certain number of trains per day is set out in the schedule to the enabling statute. This issue was raised before the Federal Court of Canada and continues to be the object of further proceedings in that court's appeal division. Consequently, in keeping with its stated policy, the Committee expresses no opinion on a matter which is now before the courts.

However, the Committee has considered with some interest the possibility of residual obligations of CP Rail or CN Rail where, in the course of taking over smaller railway companies, they have undertaken through contractual obligations to provide specific railway services over a given route. This matter was raised in one of the challenges to the government actions relating to last autumn's Order in Council which effected the approximate one-fifth reduction in VIA Rail services. The Committee recognizes that this submission was rejected in first instance in the Federal Court. However, the Committee notes with interest that the door was left open in the decision of the learned trial judge as to the possibility of pursuing actions in damages by affected parties against the operating railway companies for the withdrawal of services contrary to their validly undertaken contractual obligations.

In this context, the Committee observes that CP Rail and CN Rail were providing passenger rail services in this country long before the creation of VIA Rail Canada Inc. The Committee also notes that it has pursued this line of reasoning with representatives of one of the operating railways, namely Canadian Pacific, but did not find its responses very helpful. The Committee does find itself in agreement with the representatives of CP Rail in their estimation of the serious impact of the two operating railways re-entering the passenger rail service business. No doubt the operating railways, CP Rail and CN Rail, would resist any such notion of a return to the provision of general rail passenger services when they have found the provision of equipment and services to VIA Rail a more satisfactory enterprise.

To reiterate, the Committee is not advocating or counselling that CP Rail and CN Rail should be required to provide services which VIA Rail has discontinued on government instructions. The Committee only notes that a serious legal issue remains outstanding in this area and awaits a final decision by the courts on this matter.

(iii) Confidentiality and the Canadian Transport Commission

In its operation of passenger rail services in Canada, VIA Rail has entered into contractual arrangements with CP Rail and CN Rail for such things as the use of locomotives and power units, for the maintenance of rolling stock and other equipment, for stationary facilities such as railway stations, and for roadbed services such as switching. The amounts of money involved in these contractual arrangements are very considerable indeed and, in fact, constitute the major portion of VIA Rail's annual budget. For 1980, VIA paid approximately $290 million to CN and $66 million to Canadian Pacific. These charges from the operating railways to VIA Rail take the form of monthly statements, adjusted by final post year-end bills. This billing system will be discussed in more detail later in the Report.

In presenting its bills to VIA Rail, the two operating railways have in the past produced essentially undifferentiated, and unitemized statements. This means that charges are not broken down into components. Thus, VIA Rail, as CP and CN's best customer for this type of service, is in a position of having to pay these charges without knowing their constituent elements, and VIA can hardly take its business elsewhere as the roadbeds in this country are operated by the two major transcontinental rail companies.

In the voluminous contractual arrangements between CP Rail, CN Rail and VIA Rail, there are no provisions for the supply or breakdown of detailed costing data. Component charges that go into an operating railway's monthly statement to VIA cannot, on a bilateral basis, be broken down into justifiable components. In other words, if a specific amount is charged for a particular service, VIA Rail management wishes to determine what elements are being attributed to that charge. This information has been generally unavailable to the national passenger carrier. The mechanism available to VIA to obtain this data, which its senior management feels is essential in order to evaluate the service they are obtaining for the substantial amounts of money being paid, is through the Canadian Transport Commission.

The CTC can obtain such costing data. However, the CTC takes the position that based upon section 331 of the Railway Act,⁽¹⁾ this type of information must be treated confidentially. The CTC, in its legal opinion, cannot release this data except in the face of a formal request from VIA. Then sufficient time has to be given to the CTC to make inquiries as to the validity of VIA's need for the data. An opportunity for the operating railways, namely CN Rail and CP Rail, to make their cases as to why such information should not be made available to VIA Rail or to any other entity interested in obtaining it would also have to be provided.

It must be noted the operating railways contend that the release of such data is generally unnecessary for effective management of VIA Rail and that further, the release of this type of information could have detrimental consequences to the railways by providing competitors such as the highway carriers (i.e. buses, and trucking firms) with valuable commercial intelligence which would provide them with an unfair advantage. In the Committee's view, this argument against releasing information to VIA is exaggerated and unreasonable. The Committee doubts whether the provision of the type of data asked for by VIA could work to the detriment of CP Rail or CN Rail. However, if that is a cause of concern to the railways, surely VIA could provide an adequate undertaking to keep pertinent data confidential and for its own use alone.

There was considerable controversy in the testimony presented by senior counsel of the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC and the general counsel for VIA Rail as to the course of events surrounding VIA's initial request for this information. This Committee does not intend to adjudicate on this significant dispute. However, the Committee does note that this argument has benefited no one—certainly not the users of passenger rail services in this country. The Committee believes that the current system, which is largely determined by certain provisions of the Railway Act, work to prevent VIA Rail from obtaining vital costing information. VIA Rail finds itself in the undesirable position of having to embark on an adversarial course of action to obtain data which the Committee feels is needed without the long delays such a procedure entails. The Committee notes with regret that more than two years have passed since VIA Rail first put forward its request for costing data until March of this year when it reformulated its application in a manner presumably more in keeping with the legal requirements as perceived by the CTC. The results of this latest effort to obtain relevant costing information from the CTC remain to be seen.

The Committee feels that the access to this type of information, although not necessarily all the information sought by VIA Rail Canada, is essential for its administrators to assess properly what are substantially unitemized statements of account that are not subject to a management audit and that amount to the major proportion of its annual operating budget. The Committee is aware of the operating railways' reluctance to making certain elements of component costing data available, but it does not favour a general refusal to provide this type of information and hopes that in the future a more cooperative, reasonable and sensitive attitude will prevail. It notes with satisfaction that such a change in attitude has become somewhat evident in recent months, especially on the part of CN Rail.

To a certain extent, this controversy arises out of an interpretation of a section of the Railway Act, which is the determining statute with regard to railway operations, passenger and otherwise, in this country. In the absence of an express and comprehensive statutory basis for railway passenger services, legislative regulation will, by default, fall to an Act that does not necessarily reflect nor respond to the current state of affairs in the passenger rail area. This is especially true of the procedures open to VIA Rail to obtain necessary management information. Under the current system, an adversarial and litigious process is involved in Canada's rail passenger carrier attempts to obtain vital data. The Committee feels that the current system is therefore not adequate.

(iv) The Need for Legislation

VIA Rail Canada Inc. has had an inauspicious legislative beginning. It was incorporated pursuant to the Canada Business Corporations Act (S.C. 1974-75, c. 33 as amended) on 12 January 1977, and was thereafter acquired by the Canadian National Railway Company as a non-comprised subsidiary. In 1977, the entity was deemed to be a railway company pursuant to a $1 Appropriation Act vote.⁽¹⁾ This provision allowed for VIA Rail Canada Inc. to enter into contracts with the other railway companies, subject to the approval of the Minister of Transport, in order to provide passenger rail service. The Minister of Transport was given authority to prescribe regulations concerning the conclusion of contracts with VIA Rail Canada Inc. for the provision of rail passenger services so as to "improve efficiency, effectiveness and economy in rail passenger services in Canada". Then on 1 April 1978, VIA became a crown Corporation by Order in Council.⁽²⁾

The Committee notes with regret this use of an Appropriation Act vote to implement an important policy decision. The creation of a national passenger rail company should have had a proper and complete legislative basis. The Committee heard persuasive evidence as to the important positive effects a sound statutory foundation has had on the Amtrak system in the United States. It may have initially appeared that VIA Rail, being unfettered by complex and restrictive legislation, would be able to operate more freely in its formative stages. Such has not been the case. The rights and duties of the railway, in relation to the regulatory bodies with which it must contend as well as its relations with the other operating railways, and its position with respect to the Minister, are not provided for. The Committee feels that this has worked to the detriment of VIA Rail. The senior management of VIA Rail has, before this Committee, repeatedly urged the enactment of a VIA Rail Canada Act. Apparently, discussions with the Minister on this matter have taken place. However, no timetable for the introduction of such legislation has been set.

3. The Committee recommends that an enactment providing a clear and all-encompassing legislative framework for VIA Rail Canada Inc., and in consequence for passenger rail service in this country, is an essential requirement. A good deal of delay has already taken place since the initial incorporation of the company. Time now should be regarded as of the essence and the Committee earnestly recommends the introduction of such legislation at the earliest possible date. The Committee recommends that such legislation specify the right of VIA Rail to relevant costing data, and should specify the methods to be employed in order to obtain the necessary information either from the railways directly or through the Canadian Transport Commission. The Committee also recommends that the appropriate officials of VIA Rail be fully consulted in the course of drafting the legislation.

C. ISSUES RELATING TO ECONOMIC FACTORS AND FINANCIAL PROCEDURES

The Committee wishes to express its serious reservations as to the wisdom of abandoning viable, high ridership rail services in order to free funds to finance new equipment purchases. The Committee has significant doubts as to whether the amounts expected to become available as a result of the cancellations will be as high as initially anticipated when considering the overall picture. Thus, when about one-fifth of the VIA Rail passenger network is ordered abandoned as it was last November, a very substantial amount of revenue in the form of ticket sales is lost to the company. It must be kept in mind that some of the routes that were cut, especially "The Atlantic", were heavily utilized.

The rail service reductions are designed ultimately to produce a $100 million saving but this saving will not be realized in the first budget year following the cutbacks. The words of Mr. J. F. Roberts, Chairman and President of VIA Rail Canada Inc. in his testimony before this Committee on 3 December 1981, are relevant:

I think the minister said that the changes would be worth about $100 million, and that is quite correct. I think the estimate shows approximately $45 million worth of savings in the first year, that is, 1982, but it escalates each succeeding year, and by 1984 it will be about $100 million.

There are other costs involved in such an abandonment project. A considerable number of jobs were lost which forced VIA Rail employees into early retirement or into job re-allocation, all of which will cost the company a substantial amount of money estimated by VIA to be between $2 and $2.5 million. In addition, a fund of up to $30 million has been set aside, to be administered by Transport Canada, for severance pay, early or accelerated retirement, retraining and relocation for railway employees affected by the passenger train cutbacks. As a further spin-off consequence, there will be, in the Committee's view, certain adverse effects on tourism and recreational travel in the absence of certain traditionally well-travelled train routes that were used for sightseeing and conveying passengers particularly during recreational seasons.

The consequences of such route abandonments will be felt more profoundly among certain groups of Canadians. Trains traditionally have been the mode of travel used for medium and long distances at relatively low cost to the travelling public. Passengers on these trains are trading time for considerable savings. This has been particularly true, and the Committee feels continues to remain true, for persons on fixed incomes such as pensioners, students, and many other groups. Furthermore, certain undoubted hardships will be placed upon other Canadians who are living in geographically disadvantaged areas of the country and who have made use of railway transport in order to provide them with a certain degree of employment mobility, recreational travel, and opportunities to maintain family contacts over long distances.

(i) The Issue of the 13th and 14th Bills

As previously mentioned, VIA Rail receives from the two operating railroads from which it leases services, monthly statements of the charges incurred for these services. The Committee notes with concern and indeed surprise, that these statements have in the past been generally unitemized. An example of a type of charge that is in issue is that of switching. CN Rail does provide a breakdown of such a charge by place and time. However, there is no component data available to VIA Rail to assist it in determining the elements that comprise the charge. Therefore, VIA cannot determine the real value of the service. VIA Rail has confirmed that this problem has been somewhat mitigated in the most recent contract negotiations particularly with CN Rail, and that they are receiving more of the cost breakdowns. This will surely facilitate the implementation of proper management decisions given that these payments exceed more than two-thirds of VIA's entire budget.

However, the one issue that perhaps stands out more than any other in connection with financial procedures and relations between VIA Rail and the two operating railways is the issue of the 13th and 14th bills. As one would logically expect, there are twelve monthly statements presented by the railways to VIA Rail Canada Inc. for payment. However, in addition to these invoices, the contractual arrangements sanctioned by the Canadian Transport Commission provide for the presentation of a 13th bill or yearly statement of adjustment of charges to be paid by VIA Rail to the railways in addition to the expenses settled in the monthly statements. This 13th bill represents an opportunity for CP and CN to recoup any amounts they failed to bill in the monthly statements, either because of incorrect estimates or delays in computing various charges. It is conceivable that this might involve a refund to VIA but, not surprisingly, so far the adjustments have always meant additional charges.

In addition to the 13th bill presented after the fiscal year end, there is also provision for a so-called "14th bill". This invoice represents a final adjustment figure which the operating railways can charge to VIA after their charges have been examined and approved by the CTC. Thus VIA Rail Canada Inc. is in the unenviable position of being faced with unpredictable and substantial charges beyond the already huge amounts paid to the operating railways for services rendered. These additional post year-end invoices have had serious effects upon VIA's ability to plan, and indeed to show profitability, and will continue to do so if the current billing structure is retained.

While the amounts of these 13th and 14th bill charges have not so far been very large in terms of percentage points per annum, this has still amounted to very substantial sums of money. For example, in 1980, the so-called 13th bill or charge from CN was in the neighbourhood of $11.1 million. CP Rail's charges will be approximately $3.1 million. In addition, it came to light in the course of the Committee's hearings, apparently for the first time, that there are going to be 14th bills submitted for 1979 involving a payment of approximately $1.2 million to CP and a little over $2 million to CN Rail.

While these percentages are small portions of VIA Rail's total budget, it has, in the view of the senior management of VIA Rail, and in this the Committee concurs, the effect of creating serious problems for budgeting and planning for that company. No enterprise, be it private, public or quasi-public, can function effectively without being able to control costs to the extent that this is commercially feasible. The presentation of considerable charges in the millions of dollars two and three years after the fact can only have serious detrimental consequences on the company charged with paying them. The Committee feels that the system allowing for 13th and 14th bills is not one which should be looked upon with favour for the future. The development of VIA Rail will not be enhanced by this type of arrangement.

The Committee favours the development of a contractual arrangement between VIA Rail Canada on the one hand and CP and CN Rail on the other in the form of a fixed price, or fixed cost contract. This would mean that VIA Rail Canada would be charged a specified amount for each particular service for which it had contracted. Adjustments beyond the presentation of these billings would not be permitted. This would have two positive effects in the Committee's view. Firstly, it would establish a more reasonable commercial relationship between VIA Rail and the operating railways which would in turn permit more rational and effective financial planning for the national rail passenger carrier. The absence of unanticipated cost adjustments beyond the corporation's fiscal year would greatly enhance its ability to conduct its affairs in a more orderly fashion.

Secondly, such an arrangement would provide a substantial incentive for the operating railways to keep their own costs down. As it stands now, the operating railways have little incentive to reduce costs incurred through inefficiencies or unprofitable procedures in that any losses are effectively passed on to VIA Rail which, for the most part, must make good the increased charges. After all, VIA can hardly take its business elsewhere. Under a fixed cost arrangement, if a particular service could be provided at a cost lower than that set in an operating agreement, the opportunity for increased profit would presumably provide a valuable incentive in reducing railway operating costs throughout the system without entailing higher costs to VIA Rail.

4. The Committee recommends that future contractual agreements between VIA Rail and CP Rail and CN Rail incorporate a fixed charge for each service provided and eliminate post year-end billing except for cases of demonstrable errors or oversights as found and authorized by a CTC audit.

(ii) The Canadian Transport Commission's Auditing Process and the Railway Costing System

The charges made to VIA, including the 13th and 14th bills previously discussed, are the subject of audits by the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission. The Committee has, in the course of its proceedings on the topic of passenger rail service, become acutely concerned with two important problems associated with these CTC audits. The first problem is the question of delays in the conduct of these audits, and the second relates to the nature of the audit itself.

In the first case, the Committee was disappointed to discover that up until this year the CTC scrutiny of charges to VIA Rail Canada by CP Rail and CN Rail were years in arrears. The Committee was informed that the verification of 1978-79 railway charges to VIA were completed only in March 1982. The 1980 charges are scheduled for audit completion by the end of the 1982 calendar year, while the 1981 examination of charges is to be completed by March of 1983. Thus, it is clear that VIA Rail, and for that matter the operating railways, are faced with very substantial, and in the Committee's view, detrimental delays in obtaining the results of the CTC audits. It is true that the delays are being gradually reduced year by year. Furthermore, it was pointed out to the Committee by the CTC that the current delay is substantially shorter than it was prior to the existence of the contractual arrangements with VIA for the provision of rail passenger services. The CTC has as its goal the provision of final audit results approximately 12 months after the fact by 1984.

While the Committee is pleased to see these inordinate delays being shortened, it feels nevertheless that no commercial entity providing service to the public, be it of a private or public nature, should be expected to function with auditing delays of such considerable length. Perhaps the 12-month delay is the best that can be done under the present system; but even that, in the Committee's opinion, is not satisfactory. It must be kept in mind that VIA Rail Canada Inc. is basically a captive customer of CP Rail and CN Rail with the CTC performing an essential regulatory function. Charges made to VIA Rail must be paid in an essentially non-competitive relationship. This magnifies the importance of the CTC audits.

What corporation could explain to its shareholders that audits for tens and indeed hundreds of millions of dollars of expenditures would not be available promptly? This would surely represent an untenable position for any management group. The Committee cannot but conclude that this has a serious detrimental affect upon the ability of VIA Rail's management to conduct proper financial and operational planning. Surely the cost of engaging additional qualified audit personnel to the CTC staff in order to reduce the backlog in audit results would be money well spent in order to ensure that millions of dollars in charges are promptly accounted for.

5. The Committee recommends that the CTC audit of charges to VIA Rail be conducted more expeditiously. If necessary in order to shorten the current unacceptable long delays in the CTC's auditing procedure, additional qualified staff should be engaged.

The second important factor relating to the CTC audits is the character or nature of the audit function. The audit conducted by the CTC may be described as one which is more concerned with whether or not a specific item or charge is of an authorized nature in relation to the costing regulations, rather than whether value is received for the money expended. In other words, the CTC audit consists primarily of determining if the charges made were in line with the costing regulations rather than whether or not they were justifiable given the service provided. Representatives of the CTC indicated to the Committee that there is a breakdown of charges for the various components making up the charge to VIA, but that the scrutiny was not what could be described as a management audit. Rather, it is characterized as a procedural audit.

The auditing aspect of the CTC's function can have important consequences for the cost of rail passenger services. For example, CN Rail's 1980 13th bill was reduced by some $2.4 million on the basis of a CTC preliminary determination that certain charges to VIA were too high with respect to general administration, communication and roadway maintenance costs. Nevertheless, the Committee wishes to draw attention to the fact that the scope of the audit performed by the CTC is too limited to provide necessary information for VIA's management purposes.

Given the lack of detailed costing data made available to VIA either from the railways themselves or through the CTC, VIA is placed in the unenviable position of having to pay substantially uninvestigated charges amounting to millions of dollars. While the Committee recognizes the value of the CTC audit in determining whether or not the charges are in line with the costing regulations, the inability of VIA to determine its "value for money" position is obvious. Again this can only have unfortunate effects upon management's ability to make proper decisions. The Committee recognizes the limitations on the CTC's capability or authority to conduct management type audits in accordance with acceptable management accounting practice. Consequently, this Committee urges the elimination of this problem by the provision of detailed costing data either directly to VIA or through the CTC by the two major railway companies. This supplying of detailed cost data has been sorely lacking in the past, and the Committee hopes that the trend toward a greater degree of provision of information that has apparently become evident over the past several months will continue and expand.

The CTC audits the charges made to VIA to ensure that they are in compliance with its "Railway Costing Regulations"⁽¹⁾ as set out in Order R-6313. This Order, first implemented in 1969, sets out the nature and categories of costs related to railway operations in Canada. Order R-6313 has been studied and revised by the CTC over the years, but the Committee feels that there is need for innovation and improvement in view of the fact that the structure of railway passenger services in this country changed dramatically when CP and CN turned over this function to the new VIA Rail Canada Inc. For this reason, the Committee urges all participants in the regulatory process to make every effort to ensure that the costing order is, from all points of view, appropriate to the new circumstances and that it is applied with an appreciation for the contemporary state of the railway passenger industry. If necessary, changes to the order should be made through a consultative process in order to ensure that VIA Rail is able to provide the services required of it in a commercially efficient fashion.

In this regard, the Committee was impressed by the costing method employed by the Amtrak system in the United States. There, the passenger rail authority (Amtrak) pays to the operating railroads, from whom it leases and purchases services, only what are known as "strictly avoidable costs". Avoidable costs, as set out in the Amtrak legislation, are essentially those costs that the railway can establish as being incurred only because of the operation or service undertaken for Amtrak. It should be noted that the definition excludes all costs that are not incurred as a result of providing the passenger service and the onus is on the operating railway to show that it falls within these terms.

Such avoidable costs do include a variable portion of the common costs, but again they must be those expenditures which would not have been made but for the provision of the passenger rail service. The avoidable costs definitely exclude from their calculation the allocation of any common costs which do not vary as a consequence of providing the service to the passenger rail system, rent, return on investment, and any other costs which the operating railway carrier cannot establish as being necessarily and reasonably incurred as a result of furnishing services to Amtrak.

In Canada, VIA Rail does not benefit from an avoidable cost arrangement. Instead, VIA Rail is billed on "a long-run variable cost" basis which involves payments of a portion of common expenses that are not direct results of provision of services to the passenger carrier. This produces a rather dramatic difference in budget terms. The Amtrak authority expends substantially less of its overall budget on payments to the operating railways from which it obtains services. The proportional amount is less than one-third of Amtrak's budget, while VIA Rail pays out nearly two-thirds of its budget to CP and CN.

It should be noted, however, that in the United States, Amtrak itself has assumed direct responsibility for many services. This is particularly true in its operations in the densely populated northeastern section of its network. VIA Rail Canada does not discharge all of the services for which Amtrak has taken on responsibility. Presumably, were VIA to follow a similar approach, many of the dollars saved through an avoidable cost system would go to financing these services which are now provided by the other two railways in Canada.

On page 49 of a Staff Report of the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC, dated March 31, 1982, and titled "A Comparison of Amtrak and VIA Costing Approaches", the following statement appears:

To summarize this examination of the effects of using US strictly avoidable costing in place of Canadian long-run variable costs, there would appear to be an annual saving to VIA of the order of $9.5 million under Train Operations, $11.3 to $20 million under Maintenance of Way, and $8.5 million under Station Services. In total, the savings to VIA would therefore be in the broad range of $30-$40 million. There is one further adjustment to be made before finalizing this range. As indicated earlier, Amtrak has been paying incentives to the contracting railways at a rate somewhat higher than that paid by VIA. If VIA were to adopt a similar rate of incentive payment to that made by Amtrak, this would increase costs by some $5 million, reducing the range of savings from adopting the US costing methodology to $25-$35 million.

VIA Rail officials think this estimate of annual savings is conservative. They place the figure at between $50 and $55 million per year. Whatever the precise figure, it is clear to the Committee that there would be substantial savings for VIA Rail if a strictly avoidable costing system was implemented in Canada.

6. The Committee recommends that the Canadian Transport Commission commence forthwith a detailed review of Costing Order R-6313 to determine its suitability given the major changes in passenger rail service in this country since the creation of VIA Rail Canada Inc. The Committee feels that the Order may have to be substantially amended to reflect current conditions. The Committee recommends that avoidable cost structure for the Canadian rail passenger system be adopted through amendment to the existing order or through the issuance of new railway costing orders.

(iii) The Cost of Reduced Fare Employee Passes

The issuance of free or reduced fare travel passes by VIA Rail to the employees of CP Rail and CN Rail is a topic upon which the Committee wishes to touch briefly in this Report. It must be noted that the annual value of these passes in the year 1981 amounted to approximately $13 million. Of that amount, VIA was responsible for some $12 million having received approximately $900,000 in compensation from the other railway companies. Under the VIA-CN operating agreement, CN Rail has an opportunity to earn back, as it were, some portion of its contribution to the railway pass fund based upon on-time passenger train performance standards as established by the operating agreement. The Committee certainly favours this type of incentive arrangement in the hope that it will produce the desired maximization of productivity. Nevertheless, the Committee feels that it would be desirable in the future to see both CP and CN contributing a greater proportion of the funds that are required to finance this employee pass program.

The Committee is aware of the fact that employee passes for reduced fare travel are widespread not only in the railway industry but in other modes as well, including bus and air carriers. The third parties concerned with this program, namely the labour unions representing the workers who benefit through the extension of these pass privileges, are an important factor in determining the extent to which these passes will be made available. That forms part of a collective labour agreement which is negotiated between the railway companies and their employees' representatives, and the Committee is certainly not advocating the elimination of the railway pass program. It is undoubtedly an important incentive in encouraging use of railway passenger services. However, as stated previously, the amounts involved are very substantial and it would, in the Committee's view, be totally appropriate to see CP Rail and CN Rail contributing in a more equitable fashion to this arrangement.

The fact that reduced fare travel passes are traditional in the transportation industry does not mean that they are inviolate as the costs of such a program mount. Rather than see a reduction in the extension of such passes, the Committee believes that an increased contribution by the two major railways providing services to VIA would ensure the continuation of this program without producing an undue financial burden on Canada's fledgling national railway passenger carrier.

7. The Committee recommends that the two major railroad companies, CP Rail and CN Rail, be responsible for an initial contribution figure of two-thirds of the value of free and reduced fare employee travel passes provided by VIA Rail Canada, with the opportunity to reduce this contribution level down to a minimum of one-third of the value on the basis of an on-time passenger train performance incentive arrangement.

(iv) Transfer of Additional Facilities to VIA Rail Canada

In the course of the Committee's proceedings, VIA Rail Canada Inc. expressed its desire to acquire certain other facilities associated with railway passenger services in Canada. Most specifically, the company is interested in acquiring facilities in various cities in the form of railway stations from the two major railroads. They wish in this way to cease having to pay substantial leasing charges for use of these stations. These charges, which form a global amount not broken down to show charges for individual stations, comprise part of the monthly and annual billings paid by VIA Rail Canada to CP Rail and CN Rail. VIA Rail, if it were able to acquire these stations, could more easily control costs and could itself gain revenue from leasing concessions and office space in these buildings.

In addition, VIA Rail outlined a concept which the Committee regards as most interesting: that is the development of railway stations into so-called "transportation centres" which would integrate rail service in Canada's cities with other modes of communication and transportation. The Committee believes that this type of innovative planning and use of existing facilities could constitute a major advantage in the future for railway passenger service. It is certainly an interesting idea which merits further exploration and study.

8. The Committee therefore recommends that VIA Rail Canada Inc. present a plan for the acquisition of selected passenger railway stations in Canada to the CTC and the Department of Transport. This plan should include VIA's long range goals regarding these facilities including a detailed discussion of the possibility of converting them into integrated transportation centres.

However, a caveat must be registered. The acquisition of these facilities from the operating railways would undoubtedly involve large capital expenditures. The Committee notes that it has become evident in the course of its proceedings that the current owners of these stations, namely CP Rail and CN Rail are not anxious to negotiate the transfer of these presumably profitable properties. Often these railway stations are situated in prime downtown locations in Canada's major cities and the land itself can be worth a great deal.

However, the Committee hopes that the railway companies would recognize that if they are no longer in the business of providing general passenger services, they should be ready, after appropriate negotiations to determine adequate compensation, to transfer many of these facilities to the national rail passenger carrier. Such compensation should take into account any subsidies that may have been paid over the years for the support of railway stations. Clearly, railway stations are absolutely indispensable elements in providing passenger services. Logic would indicate that such facilities should be under the control of the entity charged with providing that service.

The Committee feels it relevant to draw attention to the fact that when VIA Rail was constituted, it acquired a great deal of equipment in the form of rolling stock from the two operating railroads at that time. Much of the equipment that was acquired at that time was antiquated and continues to require a considerable amount of maintenance and modernization. A great deal of it is ready to be scrapped.

The Committee recognizes that such a program will require substantial funds which may be difficult to underwrite given VIA Rail's present circumstances. While the Committee believes that modernization and innovation in railway passenger carriage is one of the keys to future success, it would not wish to see substantial funds diverted from much needed and heavily used rail passenger services.

9. The Committee further recommends that prior to the acquisition of any railway stations and associated facilities, or prior to the signing of any firm contractual commitment to purchase such properties by VIA Rail, the terms and conditions of the acquisition, including the purchase price, be examined by independent auditors and evaluators in accordance with current accounting principles, and that their findings be presented for parliamentary scrutiny and discussion.

(v) Comparative Analysis of other National Railway Systems

In the course of testimony and proceedings before this Committee, there have been numerous references, comparisons and allusions to the experience of other countries with passenger rail services. Detailed information was presented by various witnesses as to the amount of government subsidies provided to railway passenger transport in a number of European countries and especially to the Amtrak system in the United States. Considerable discussion in the course of the proceedings was centered around new technology in railway passenger trains now available in England, France and Japan.

The Canadian passenger rail system does not operate in a vacuum and taking advantage of information as to technological, organizational and financial structuring of foreign railway systems, must certainly not be overlooked. It can indeed be a profitable experience for foreign analogies to be examined in sufficient detail. On the other hand, superficial comparisons with the Canadian experience are to be avoided. In every country, and this is certainly true in Canada, historical, sociological and geographical factors are most important. In the Canadian case, this particularly includes climatic factors. As well, government structuring and indeed political orientation will have profound effects upon the development of any particular transportation system. Therefore, while direct comparisons can be instructive, caution must be exercised in view of the differences in various national settings.

In almost every instance, these comparisons with foreign countries revealed an apparently higher incidence of government and private sector investment in railway passenger services and the implementation of costly, but effective advanced railway passenger technology. The Committee certainly feels that further study is merited, but cautions against wholesale importation of foreign experiences which may not be entirely applicable to Canada.

For this reason, the Committee refers back to its first recommendation regarding the establishment of a joint parliamentary committee which would be charged with studying, over a period of time, all aspects of passenger transportation policy in this country. Such a study would be deficient if it did not include an analysis of passenger transport systems in other countries. This should include discussions with foreign transportation administrators and technologists concerning their countries' experience with various aspects of administration and development of their passenger transportation systems.

(vi) The Issue of Comparative Subsidies to other Modes of Transportation

The issue of comparative subsidies to other forms of transportation in Canada has come up time and time again in the course of this Committee's proceedings. The arguments have ranged around whether railways are receiving a disproportionate amount of government subsidization when compared with other modes of passenger carriage. It has, on the other hand, been argued that when a true comparison is made, which takes into account all the factors associated with subsidizing a particular mode of transportation, railways are in fact relatively inexpensive when compared with the total amounts of money invested in the air and highway modes.

Particularly relevant to railways is the question of subsidies to bus lines. The conception that buses are essentially not subsidized at all by the federal or provincial governments was questioned during the course of the Committee's proceedings on the basis that buses use heavily subsidized public highways and roads in order to transport passengers. The comparative cost of building, rebuilding, conducting snow and ice removal and generally maintaining these roadways has been unfavourably compared to the cost of railway subsidies.

The roads and highways used by bus services are generally a provincial responsibility, but one must keep in mind the very considerable federal financial assistance in this field. Some examples from the recent and the present include: the "roads to resources" programs, Trans-Canada Highway subsidies, the "Urban Transportation Assistance Program" (UTAP), and the capital assistance program for intercity bus transport in the Atlantic Provinces. These are all multi-million dollar federal aid programs.

Transportation subsidies are not inherently undesirable. They should be regarded as a form of investment in the development of the country. But like any investment, the return must be calculated and must, given all the circumstances, result in a satisfactory yield. This yield need not be calculated in dollars alone. Long-term economic advantages, and social consequences should also be carefully considered. This should be kept in mind by those who have been justifying a reduction in railway subsidies on the basis that railways produce the lowest yield for the subsidy dollar.

Furthermore, the Committee cautions against wholesale superficial comparisons between one mode of transport and the other. Clearly, this type of analysis is most relevant to any discussion on Canadian transportation policy. However, the Committee has not been convinced, one way or the other, as to the strength of the arguments surrounding the real cost of subsidies on either side. For this reason, the Committee again refers back to its first recommendation and expresses its view that this issue of comparative subsidies be included in a long-range study of the future Canadian passenger transportation services.

D. OPERATIONAL FACTORS RELATING TO ROUTE CANCELLATIONS AND TO RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE GENERALLY

(i) Sufficiency of Data

When the 20% reduction in passenger services was announced last autumn, the underlying rationale for this action was the need to make funds available out of VIA Rail's budget for new equipment. Undoubtedly, when selecting routes to be eliminated and services to be reduced, and when assessing the factors relevant to the decision to procure funds in this fashion, various statistical and other data was considered. In the course of its proceedings, the Committee has noted that there have been considerable disagreements as to the interpretation of the data on which decisions were presumably based.

For example, the ability of Transport Canada, the CTC, and the railways to isolate load factors and occupancy rates on particular portions of some of the abandoned routes was subject to question. Indeed, there was considerable discussion as to what the actual use of the terms "load factor", "occupancy rate", and "ridership" actually meant in terms of decision-making. The confusion as to the use of these terms, their applicability, and proper analysis of the data available causes the Committee some disquiet.

The Committee also notes with interest the inconsistency in the evidence as to ridership growth on passenger trains. An expert on American passenger rail service in testimony before this Committee, stated that Amtrak ridership had increased in 1981 despite declines in all other modes of passenger carriage. This appears to be in contrast to the general impression in Canada, as became evident in some of the testimony before the Committee, that passenger train use is steadily and inexorably declining in all developed countries. The Committee believes a careful re-examination of the data is necessary.

The Committee is of the view that when drastic action is taken, such as was implemented last autumn, that involves very substantial service reductions, the operational data available and considered by those in positions of authority, should be impeccable. Once a rail service is abandoned, it is rarely, if ever, reinstated. Consequently, utmost care should be taken in evaluating the available data in deciding what action is to be taken with respect to a particular route or network and every effort should be made to ensure that the data itself is sufficient and reliable.

10. The Committee recommends that the data used as a partial basis for the decision taken in last autumn's route abandonments should be re-examined in great detail in order to determine if all the facts were available and properly interpreted. This examination should be undertaken by the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC and the results of the investigation should be made public at the earliest opportunity. Furthermore, the Committee recommends that, in future, relevant information concerning particular routes that might become the subject of possible abandonment or service reductions be the object of informed public discussion prior to a decision being taken.

(ii) Effect of Route Abandonments on Passenger Rail Service Generally

The elimination of selected routes as a result of the decision by the Governor in Council of last fall, resulted in a substantial number of Canadians being without rail service. In addition and perhaps of equal importance, is the fact that many points within Canada are now accessible by rail only after tedious, inconvenient, and expensive detours. Substantial increases in travel time between points previously served are now a reality for train users.

Undoubtedly, it is the essence of a continued and vital passenger rail service in the future that it be heavily utilized by the travelling public. One of the principal arguments in supporting certain individual route discontinuances was that they were not being used sufficiently by passengers. However, the Committee believes that this is something of an unbalanced equation in that now not only are many routes lost but the routes that do exist may be under-utilized due to the fact that potential passengers would have to incur increased costs and a great deal of lost time in making connections as a result of the remaining routes and schedules. This may result in a loss of revenue for VIA Rail Canada through a reduction in ridership on certain trains, which could in turn provide a rationale for further cutbacks. This, in the view of the Committee, would be a truly disastrous trend for rail passenger services.

This type of problem is further exacerbated by a deterioration in some services on the routes left in existence. These service problems include reduced train frequencies, less available sleeping accommodation, and a reduction in dining services. This combined with continued maintenance problems can only have negative effects on the VIA Rail system. It is indeed commendable to wish to acquire new equipment for the system; this is in fact an essential requirement. However, if the existing routes are left to deteriorate in quantity and quality of service, the travelling public will not be much inclined to continue to use or to switch to these services.

(iii) The Issue of Commuter Services

Some of the routes discontinued as a result of the Governor in Council's action last fall, included certain short haul passenger lines that were classified by Transport Canada as commuter services. The Committee understands commuter services to mean comparatively short distance routes involving the transport of passengers between suburban areas and a large nearby urban centre. The Committee has doubts as to whether all of the routes that were so categorized by Transport Canada are truly commuter services.

The Committee notes with concern that provincial authorities have expressed some reluctance to undertake control of this type of service in certain instances, and municipalities simply do not have the legislative or financial capability to step in should they wish to do so. This has already produced some serious problems for certain numbers of rail passenger commuters who find themselves either without service, with reduced service, or with the prospect of losing service in the near future.

11. The Committee recommends that the concerned parties, namely the railways providing the service, the municipalities served, the CTC, the provincial governments and Transport Canada undertake consultations and negotiations prior to any route cancellations to ensure that commuter services will be maintained where necessary, either by VIA Rail, or one of the other operating railways, or another entity should that be deemed desirable. The Committee emphasizes that this should be done prior to the elimination of such routes so as to avoid wholesale inconvenience and economic dislocation as a result of relatively sudden changes in long standing commuter services.

The Committee further recommends that a firm technical definition of commuter services be put forward by Transport Canada without delay. This will aid in ensuring that only routes that are truly commuter services will be transferred to provincial jurisdiction.

(iv) Implementation and Expansion of LRC Train Services

The Committee is aware of the fact that a great deal of emphasis is being placed upon the introduction of the "light, rapid comfortable" (LRC) trains into the VIA system. These trains are already in regular service in the Quebec-Windsor corridor, and VIA has just committed itself to purchase an additional ten train sets from the manufacturer, Bombardier Ltd.

It is presumed that a great deal of the money supposed to become available as a result of last fall's service cuts will be directed towards the purchase of this new equipment. While the Committee welcomes the integration of this modern equipment into VIA Rail service, it also notes with some concern that some initial difficulties have become apparent in this system. It is, of course, to be hoped that these are nothing more than "teething" problems. The Committee has been repeatedly assured by representatives of VIA Rail Canada that no serious or major problems have been encountered thus far in the introduction of these trains into service.

These LRC trains represent a significant technological improvement over the current equipment in use in the VIA Rail system. The Committee has been assured that these trains provide a comfortable and modern environment for their passengers. However, the Committee notes that great savings in time are not likely to result from the introduction of these trains into service because of the fact that they cannot operate at their maximum or optimum speed because they have to travel over track and roadbeds that are used by freight trains and are poorly suited for high speed passenger train travel. The LRC trains can operate over such roadbeds, in a quiet, comfortable and efficient manner. However, in order to have them function at speeds of which they are capable, the roadbed would have to be improved and a so-called "dedicated corridor", namely a roadbed that would handle high speed passenger traffic only, might be required. This would be a very costly undertaking.

The concept of dedicated corridors, and possibly the electrification of these corridors to provide for still more advanced technology trains was raised before the Committee. Again, the costs involved in such an undertaking appear to be formidable. However, the Committee feels that the attractions and advantages of such a concept should be more thoroughly investigated in the course of a policy review.

Notwithstanding any of the reservations mentioned above, the Committee earnestly hopes that the LRC trains will indeed operate in an efficient and profitable manner. The Committee also notes with a great interest that both the Minister of Transport and the President of VIA Rail Canada Inc. stated in the course of their testimony that they intend to see the LRC equipment introduced into routes beyond the Quebec-Windsor corridor in the near future. The Atlantic and Western provinces were specifically mentioned. A target date of 1984 has been mentioned. The Committee feels that it is essential that this commitment be implemented at the earliest possible moment.

12. The Committee recommends that LRC train equipment be introduced in regular service on routes in the Atlantic provinces and in Western Canada as soon as is practicable. This should take place no later than 1984, barring unforeseen technological impediments.

APPENDIX I TO THE REPORT

*Canada Gazette, Part II, Vol. 115 (No. 22) p. 3352(Published as an Extra, November 6, 1981)Registration*SOR/81-892 3 November, 1981*NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT*Order Varying Canadian Transport Commission Orders and Decisions*P.C. 1981-2171 6 August, 1981

His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Transport, pursuant to subsection 64(1) of the National Transportation Act, of its own motion hereby varies the Canadian Transport Commission Orders and Decisions referred to in Schedules I to XVII hereto in the manner set out in those schedules.

SCHEDULE I*Halifax-Moncton-Saint John-Montréal Passenger-Train Service (Eastern Transcontinental "Atlantic")*

1. Order No. R-24328 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 4th day of February 1977, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) The second section 1 on page 3 of the said Order, which refers to passenger-train services provided by Canadian Pacific Limited, is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"1. The Railways and VIA Rail Canada Inc. shall continue operation of the said passenger-train services, with the exception of the passenger-train service provided by trains 41 and 42 (now trains 11 and 12) between Montréal and Saint John which shall be discontinued between Montréal and Fredericton Junction effective the 15th day of November 1981."

2. The decision of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission entitled the "Final Plan for Eastern Transcontinental Passenger-Train Service" dated June 1979 is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Clause (i) on pages 2 and 3 of the said Final Plan and all other references to the passenger-train service entitled "The Atlantic", which is provided between Halifax, Saint John, Fredericton Junction and Montréal, are deleted effective the 15th day of November 1981.

(2) The references to the bus connection provided between Fredericton and Fredericton Junction on page 11 of the said Final Plan are deleted effective the 15th day of November 1981.

SCHEDULE II*Edmundston-Moncton Passenger-Train Service*

1. Order No. R-28953 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 28th day of June 1979, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Paragraph 1(b) on page 2 of the said Order is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"(b) discontinue the operation of the passenger-train service between Edmundston and Moncton effective the 15th day of November 1981."

2. The decision of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission entitled the "Final Plan for Eastern Transcontinental Passenger-Train Service" dated June 1979 is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Clause (ii) on page 7 of the said Final Plan and all other references to the provision of passenger-train service between Edmundston and Moncton are deleted effective the 15th day of November 1981.

SCHEDULE III*Québec (Ste. Foy)-Chambord Passenger-Train Service*

1. Order No. R-25988 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 22nd day of December 1977, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) The second section 1 on the fourth page, under the heading "The Committee hereby orders that", of the said Order is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"1. The Canadian National Railways and VIA Rail Canada Inc. shall not discontinue the operation of the said passenger-train services, with the exception of the passenger-train service provided by trains 176, 177, and 199 (now trains 138 and 139) between Québec (Ste. Foy) and Chicoutimi, which shall be discontinued effective the 15th day of November 1981."

2. Order No. R-28150 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 29th day of December 1978 is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Sections 3 and 4 of the said Order which are in respect of passenger-train service between Québec and Chambord are revoked effective the 15th day of November 1981.

SCHEDULE IV*Québec (Ste. Foy)-Hervey Junction Passenger-Train Service*

1. Order No. 28149 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 29th day of December 1978, as amended by Order No. R-28795 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport

Commission dated the 26th day of April 1979, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Section 2 of the said Order is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"2. Canadian National Railways and VIA Rail Canada Inc. shall discontinue operation of the passenger-train service between Québec (Ste. Foy) and Hervey Junction effective the 15th day of November 1981."

SCHEDULE V

Montréal-Labelle-Mont-Laurier Passenger-Train Service

1. Order No. R-29129 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 12th day of June 1979, as amended by Order No. R-29407 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 7th day of August 1979, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Paragraphs (a) to (d) of section 1 on page 2 of the said Order are revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) discontinue the operation of passenger-train service between Montréal and Mont-Laurier and between Montréal and Labelle effective the 15th day of November 1981."

SCHEDULE VI

Montréal-Sherbrooke Passenger-Train Service

1. Order No. R-28952 dated the 28th day of June 1979, of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Section 2 of the said Order is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"2. Orders VIA Rail Canada Inc. and Canadian National Railways, who are responsible for providing these passenger-train services, to discontinue the passenger-train service provided by trains 620, 621, 624 and 625 (now trains 623, 624, 625 and 626) between Montréal and Sherbrooke effective the 7th day of September 1982."

2. The decision of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission entitled the "Final Plan for Eastern Transcontinental Passenger-Train Service" dated June 1979 is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Clause (i) on page 6 of the said Final Plan and all other references to the provision of passenger-train service between Montréal and Sherbrooke are deleted effective the 7th day of September 1982.

SCHEDULE VII

Montréal-Lachute-Montebello-Ottawa Passenger-Train Service

1. Order No. R-25782 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 18th day of November 1977, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Section 1 on page 6 of the said Order is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"1. Canadian Pacific Limited and VIA Rail Canada Inc. shall not discontinue the operation of the said passenger-train services, with the exception of the passenger-train service provided by trains 132, 133, and 134 (now trains 170, 171, and 172) between Montréal, Lachute, Montebello, and Ottawa, which shall be discontinued effective the 15th day of November 1981."

SCHEDULE VIII

Toronto-Stouffville Passenger-Train Service

1. Order No. R-32318 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 29th day of May 1981, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) The second section 1 on page 1 of the said Order is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"1. VIA Rail and Canadian National Railways shall discontinue operation of the said passenger-train service effective the 7th day of September 1982."

SCHEDULE IX

Toronto-Havelock Passenger-Train Service

1. Order No. R-32317 of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission dated the 29th day of May 1981, is hereby varied as follows:

(1) Section 1 on the second page of the said Order is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

"1. VIA Rail and Canadian Pacific Limited shall discontinue operation of the said passenger-train service effective the 7th day of September 1982."

SCHEDULE X

Edmonton-Drumheller Passenger-Train Service

APPENDIX II TO THE REPORT

The Railway Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. R-2, ss. 260(6)

(6) In determining whether an uneconomic passenger-train service or parts thereof should be discontinued, the Commission shall consider all matters that in its opinion are relevant to the public interest including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing,

- (a) the actual losses that are incurred in the operation of the passenger-train service;
- (b) the alternative transportation services, including any highway or highway system serving the principal points served by the passenger-train service, that are available or are likely to be available in the area served by the service;
- (c) the probable effect on other passenger train service or other passenger carriers of the discontinuance of the service, or of parts thereof; and
- (d) the probable future passenger transportation needs of the area served by the service.

APPENDIX III TO THE REPORT

National Transportation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. N-17, ss. 64(1)

Governor in Council

64. (1) The Governor in Council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the Commission, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order that the Governor in Council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the Commission and upon all parties.

APPENDIX IV TO THE REPORT

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Ninth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, in Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, 12 November 1981, 45:4

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, your Joint Committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses SOR/81-892, Order Varying Canadian

Transport Commission Orders and Decisions. (For convenience this regulation will be referred to as "the Order".)

2. Your Joint Committee's objections to the Order rest on four of its criteria, namely:

"Whether any Regulation or other Statutory Instrument within its terms of reference, in the judgment of the Committee;

- 2. has not complied with the provisions of the Statutory Instruments Act with respect to transmittal, recording, numbering or publication;
- 4. makes some unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling statute . . .
- 8. appears for any reason to infringe . . . the rules of natural justice;
- 10. in the absence of express authority to that effect in the enabling statute or prerogative, appears to amount to the exercise of a substantive legislative power properly the subject of direct parliamentary enactment, and not merely to the formulation of subordinate provisions of a technical or administrative character properly the subject of delegated legislation;"

APPENDIX V TO THE REPORT

Railway Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. R-2, s. 331

Information

331. Where information concerning the costs of a railway company or other information that is by its nature confidential is obtained from the company by the Commission in the course of any investigation under this Act, such information shall not be published or revealed in such a manner as to be available for the use of any other person, unless in the opinion of the Commission such publication is necessary in the public interest. 1966-67, c. 69, s. 70.

APPENDIX VI TO THE REPORT

Canadian Transport Commission, Railway Costing Regulations

FOREWORD

On March 28, 1977, Canadian Pacific Limited (CP) applied to the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission for an amendment to the existing cost regulations as set out in Order R-6313. Specifically, CP requested that income tax be included in the cost of capital for the purposes of sections 253, 256, 258, 260 and 261 of the Railway Act. A hearing into this application was held in Ottawa between May 14 and June 5, 1979. During the course of the hearing the application was amended to apply to only sections 256, 258 and 261 of the Railway Act.

The Railway Transport Committee (the Committee) rendered its Decision on August 17, 1979. The Railway Costing Regulations reflect that Decision. The Railway Costing Regulations 1980-3 Rail were registered pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Act on May 1, 1980, Registration No. SOR/80-310. Subsequently, on December 9, 1980, by Order C.T.C. 1980-12, paragraph 5(5)(a) of the Regulations was revoked and replaced by the paragraph which is found in the attached Consolidation of the Railway Costing Regulations. The Registration No. under the Statutory Instruments Act for this amendment is SOR/80-940 dated December 10, 1980.

The Railway Costing Regulations are essentially the same as those regulations found in Order R-6313. Certain substantive changes have, of course, been made to reflect the Committee's Decision of August 17, 1979. In view of the relationship between the Railway Costing Regulations and Order R-6313, the "Reasons for Order No. R-6313 Concerning Cost Regulations" remain valid except as modified by the Decision of August 17, 1979 in respect of cost submissions for the years 1979 and following. Moreover, R-6313 in its entirety (including the Reasons) remains applicable for cost submissions filed with the Committee for the years prior to 1979.

Finally, all persons making use of the present Office Consolidation of the Railway Costing Regulations are advised that it has received the sanction of the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, but that the Consolidation has no official sanction from any other branch of the Government of Canada.

REGULATIONS RESPECTING COSTS FOR THE PURPOSES OF SECTIONS 252 TO 261, 264, 272, 276,
277, 278, 329 AND 330 OF THE RAILWAY ACT, C.T.C.
1980-3 RAIL, SOR/80-310 1 May, 1980 as amended by C.T.C. 1980-12, SOR/80-940 10 December 1980.

Short Title

1. These Regulations may be cited as the Railway Costing Regulations.

Interpretation

2. In these Regulations,

"Act" means the Railway Act; (Loi)

"branch line" means a line of railway in Canada of a railway company that is subject to the jurisdiction of Parliament that, relative to a main line within the company's railway system in Canada of which it forms a part, is a subsidiary, secondary, local or feeder line of railway, and includes a part of any subsidiary, secondary, local or feeder line of railway; (embranchement)

"Committee" means the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission; (Comité)

"costs" means

(b) in relation to a passenger-train service, for the purpose of calculating actual loss, the costs that after allowing a reasonable period of time for adjustment to the new condition, would have been avoided or would be avoided by a company in the carriage of passengers by the service if, in any financial year, the company did not operate the service irrespective of when or in what manner or by whom such costs were incurred; (frais)

"passenger-train service" means such train or trains of a company as are capable of carrying passengers and are declared by an order of the Committee, for the purposes of sections 260 and 261 of the Act, to comprise a passenger-train service; (service de trains de voyageurs)

"Uniform Classification of Accounts" means the uniform classification and system of accounts prescribed by the Commission pursuant to section 328 of the Act. (classification uniforme des comptes)

Application

3. Subject to section 11 and to any exemption ordered by the Commission pursuant to section 46 of the National Transportation Act, these Regulations shall apply in respect of cost submissions filed by all companies under the jurisdiction of the Commission for the year 1979 and the following years.

Variable Costs of the Carriage of Goods

4. For the purposes of these Regulations, the variable cost of the carriage of goods referred to in section 278 of the Act shall

(a) be calculated on the basis of carloads of thirty thousand pounds in the standard railway equipment for such goods and such other weights as are required for purposes of determining a rate; and

(b) if the goods concerned may move between points in Canada by alternative routes of two or more railway companies, be computed on the basis of the costs of the lowest cost rail route.

Actual Loss Under Sections 252 to 258, 260 and 261 of the Act

5. (1) For the purposes of the calculation of actual loss under sections 252 to 258 and 260 and 261 of the Act, costs in relation to a branch line or in relation to a passenger-train service shall, subject to subsections (2) to (5), be based on expense accounts maintained under the Uniform Classification of Accounts and accounts reconcilable therewith or on such special studies of items and factors of costs as the Committee may order pursuant to section 46 of the National Transportation Act.

(2) In computing the costs of a company for the purposes of section 256, 258 or 261, there shall be included an allowance for depreciation on a periodic basis

- (a) that will reflect the annual decline in the net value that could be realized from the salvage of depreciable road property that the Committee is satisfied could or would be retired if the line were abandoned or the service discontinued, and that is required for continued operation; and
- (b) at rates approved under the Uniform Classification of Accounts applied to the book value of such other depreciable assets and of such new assets as the Committee is satisfied are required for continued operation of the line or service.

(3) In computing the costs of a company for the purpose of section 256, 258 or 261, there shall be included in the costs, for the last year of operation prior to abandonment of a line or discontinuance of a service that had previously been ordered retained, an allowance for depreciation on such new assets as the Committee is satisfied are required to comply with the order for retention, which allowance for depreciation shall be equal to the undepreciated cost of such new assets calculated by deducting from the actual cost of the assets their salvage value and the accumulated depreciation allowed on them for subsidy purposes in previous years.

(4) In computing costs of a company for the purposes of section 253 or 260, there shall be included an allowance for cost of capital as follows:

(a) either

- (i) the rate of return on capital, excluding any allowance for income tax, that, in the opinion of the Committee, is appropriate for the company at the time the application is made, applied to the salvage value of the road property that the company proposes to retire if the line is abandoned or the service discontinued, to an amount not exceeding the net book investment, computed on the basis of the group plan or accruing depreciation, or
 - (ii) the rate of return on capital, excluding any allowance for income tax, that, in the opinion of the Committee, is appropriate for the company at the time the application is made, applied to the net book investment of the road property that the company proposes to retire if the line is abandoned or the service discontinued, on condition that the company can develop depreciation charges and net investment calculations acceptable to the Committee as reflecting the specific aging characteristics of the road property; and
- (b) the rate of return on capital, excluding any allowance for income tax, that, in the opinion of the Committee, is appropriate for the company at the time the application is made, applied to the net book value of all other property that the Committee is satisfied is required in the operation of the line or service.

(5) In computing the costs of a company for the purposes of section 256, 258 or 261, there shall be included an allowance for cost of capital as follows:

- (a) the rate of return on capital, including an allowance for income tax, that, in the opinion of the Committee, is appropriate for the company at the time the computation is made, applied to the salvage value of the road property that the Committee is satisfied could or would be retired if the line were abandoned or the service discontinued and that the Committee is satisfied is required for purposes of continued operation of the line or service, to an amount not exceeding the net book investment computed on the basis of the group plan of accruing depreciation;
- (b) where the Committee is satisfied that investments in new assets are necessary for the continued operation of the line or service, there shall be applied to the net book value of such investments the rate of return on capital, including an allowance for income tax, that, in the opinion of the Committee, is appropriate for the company at the time the investments in new assets are made; and
- (c) the rate of return on capital, including an allowance for income tax, that, in the opinion of the Committee, is appropriate for the company at the time the computation is made, applied to the net book value of all other property that the Committee is satisfied is necessary for continued operation of the line or service.

Categories of Costs to Appear in Cost Submissions

6. For the purposes of the calculation of actual loss under sections 252 to 258 and 260 and 261 of the Act, the following categories of costs shall be shown in the cost submissions, with a separation between "labour" and "material and other" costs and, in the case of branch lines, a separation between "on-line" and "off-line" costs:

- (a) "Category I cost" being all expenses that can be directly identified with the branch line or with the passenger-train service through company records;
- (b) "Category II cost" being transportation and maintenance expenses that would be avoided if the line were abandoned or the service discontinued and that are shared in common with other traffic or other services, including the off-line costs of traffic originating or terminating on the branch line;
- (c) "Category III cost" being all other expenses that would be avoided if the branch line were abandoned or the passenger-train service discontinued and that are not included in Categories I and II, including, where appropriate,
 - (i) superintendence expense,
 - (ii) traffic expense,
 - (iii) general expense,
 - (iv) communications expense, and
 - (v) non-revenue freight expense; and

(d) "Category IV cost" being the cost of capital calculated on the basis set forth in subsections 5(4) and (5).

Basis of Costs for Purposes of Sections 264, 272 and 276 to 278

7. For the purposes of section 264, 272, and 276 to 278 or for other purposes pertaining to rates for the carriage of goods,

(a) costs shall be variable costs based either on the expense accounts maintained under the Uniform Classification of Accounts and accounts reconcilable therewith or on such special studies of items and factors of costs as the Committee orders pursuant to section 46 of the National Transportation Act, and shall include the increases or decreases in rail operations expenses resulting from changes in the volume of traffic, after allowing a reasonable period of time for adjustment in view of the traffic to be handled;

(b) there shall be included in the variable costs an allowance for cost of capital based on a rate of return, including an allowance for income tax, that, in the opinion of the Committee, is appropriate for CP Rail (a Division of Canadian Pacific Limited) applied to the variable portion of the net book value of the assets related to the movement of the traffic; and

(c) variable costs shall be shown in the cost submissions separated between "labour" and "material and other" costs, in the categories identified in the costing manuals filed pursuant to any order of the Committee.

Specific Costs

8. Whenever specific costs are known or can be readily determined from company records, such costs shall be used in lieu of averaged or allocated costs.

Costing Manuals to be Filed

9. Cost submissions made pursuant to these Regulations shall be prepared in accordance with such costing manuals as the Committee shall, by order, require.

Information to be Made Available to the Committee

10. Railway companies shall make available to the Committee all unit costs, output units and other statistical and supporting information required by order from time to time by the Committee in determining whether cost submissions are acceptable for purposes of the Act.

Cost Submissions for Other than Class I Railways

11. Cost submissions to the Committee by railways other than Class I railways shall be made as follows:

(a) the submissions shall be based on direct costing to the extent feasible;

(b) where feasible, an empirical adaptation of factors employed by Class I railways shall be made for other than direct assignment of costs;

(c) cost submissions shall be in the same form as those prescribed for Class I railways and shall be supported by a complete description of the methods and procedures used in determining output units and in assigning and allocating cost; and

(d) cost submissions shall include an allowance for cost of capital as follows:

(i) where the railway companies have developed a capital structure satisfactory to the Committee, at an approved cost of capital rate developed in the same manner as prescribed for Class I railways in these Regulations, or

(ii) where the railway companies have not developed a capital structure satisfactory to the Committee, at a cost of capital rate prescribed by the Committee.

Applications Under Section 106

12. Applications for abandonment of any line of railway under section 106 of the Act shall be accompanied by a statement of costs and revenues, showing the actual loss incurred in the operation of the line of railway, prepared in the same manner as these Regulations require for the purposes of actual loss calculations under section 253 of the Act, unless the Committee directs otherwise pursuant to section 46 of the National Transport Act.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 7, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

July 7th, 1982

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 7th day of July, 1982, at 5:45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Jacques Noiseux
Deputy Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. George J. McIlraith, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Wednesday, July 7, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to which was referred Bill C-108, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3)", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, July 6, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. MCILRAITH,
Acting Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Peter A. Stollery, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

CANADA-GERMANY TAX AGREEMENT BILL, 1982

REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONALITY OF INTRODUCTION IN SENATE PRESENTED

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, July 7, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-24, intituled: "An Act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on income and certain other taxes", with instructions to consider the constitutionality of the introduction of the said Bill in the Senate and whether or not this contravenes Section 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, May 12, 1982, considered the matter and reports that, while there were divergent views expressed in committee on the question, the committee is of the opinion, in the light of the the discussions that took place, that the Senate can proceed with the Bill.

Respectfully submitted,

H. CARL GOLDENBERG,
Chairman.

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-24, with amendments, be taken into consideration?

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I move, on behalf of Senator Hayden, that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented to the Senate on May 5, 1982, be adopted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I might explain that Bill S-24 was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The committee studied the bill and reported it with seven amendments, but before it could receive third reading the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee's report was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs so that it could consider the question of constitutionality. That committee has now reported.

Hon. Martial Asselin: The bill was reported twice.

Senator Frith: Yes, because two committees studied it. First, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce studied it and reported the bill with amendments. That report was not adopted. Before it was adopted the aspect of constitutionality was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. That committee has now reported on the constitutionality, and Senator McIlraith, on behalf of Senator Hayden, has moved adoption of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee's report.

Senator Asselin: But he did not mention the name of the bill.

Senator McIlraith: I was careful to move the adoption of the report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I believe the honourable senator is correct. We are now considering the report of the committee which recommended amendments to the bill. In any event, those amendments, to some extent, will tend to help us on the question of constitutionality, and, with regard to the amendments, I do not believe there will be any problem in our adopting them at this time. Therefore, the report and the amendments suggested by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and not the report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, can be adopted at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill, as amended, be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: No, later this day.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe the agreement is to have third reading later this day. I understand that Senator Flynn would prefer that arrangement.

Senator Leblanc: Honourable senators, my motion is for third reading now, but if honourable senators do not agree, then we can have third reading later this day.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the third reading of a bill requires one day's notice. However, there seems to be a spirit of compromise in the air, and it has been suggested that third reading should take place later this day.

Senator Leblanc: Then, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-29, to amend the Railway Act.

Bill read first time.

● (1410)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in explanation, the bill has been prepared and copies are being distributed at this moment, and by the time we reach it on the order paper later this day all honourable senators will have received a copy. It consists of just one clause.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: A simple bill.

Senator Frith: Yes, as they always are.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have just one question. Why is the bill sponsored by Senator Frith when it is not a government bill?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was asked to sponsor this bill as a public bill, but not as a government bill. As a matter of fact, I believe that it is to be sponsored in the other place, if it gets there, by the Honourable Donald Mazankowski. So it is really a bipartisan, non-government public bill.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: You mean multi-partisan.

Senator Flynn: Certainly, yet it is surprising that Senator Frith is sponsoring it.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have a question for the deputy leader with regard to this bill. Is it the intention to ask for second reading later this day or tomorrow?

Senator Frith: I have leave to move second reading later this day, at which time I will explain further.

Hon. Jack Marshall: How do you expect to have second reading today when we don't even know what it is about?

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

CANADIANIZATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In a delayed answer he gave on Monday, he said that the government does not intend to press the pace of Canadianization of the energy industry. Does this mean that Petro-Canada, the Canadianization arm of the government, has no plans to make further purchases of foreign-owned energy companies in the foreseeable future or, if it does not mean that, what did the minister mean?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators, it means that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): They have no money.

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Will the Minister of State for Economic Development assure us that, consistent with the assurances offered at the time of the introduction of the Canadian ownership charge, the charge will be withdrawn once the equivalent of 80 per cent of the total cost of purchase, plus the cost of financing the purchase, of Petrofina has been collected from Canadian citizens?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, judging from the way the honourable senator has put his question he is being very precise in all of the—

Hon. Lowell Murray: Then let's have a precise answer.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Olson: Yes, but if you want that kind of precision, I shall have to take the question as notice. Of course, my honourable friend will realize that there is not only a surcharge or a Canadian ownership charge in crude oil prices, but also in natural gas prices. But the honourable senator is being very precise when he refers to 80 per cent, and I would like to look into the matter before I give an answer.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of State for Economic Development. When Petrofina Canada Inc. was purchased by Petro-Canada the share price at the time was a very contentious item because it was inflated. The justification by the government for the purchase of the shares at that very inflated price is apparently contained in a report written by a consulting firm. To my knowledge, that report has not yet been made public, although I have asked the minister several times if he would provide us with that information. I wonder if the minister is in a position to do that as yet.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not have that with me today, but I will certainly review the inquiries that have been made by the honourable senator and I will see if I can bring in that information soon. It may be that I will also have to check other considerations with regard to that particular report that he claims are there.

OIL—SHIPMENT OF WESTERN CANADIAN CRUDE TO EASTERN CANADIAN REFINERIES

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It was reported last evening and again this morning by CTV News that there is a plan to provide for the shipment of western Canadian crude to Montreal, where it will be transhipped to Saint John, New Brunswick for refining, and that under the program there would be a substantial displacement of imported crude as well as a taking-up of the slack of the oversupply of western Canadian crude at this point in time.

Does the minister have any information on such a program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I can confirm that a plan to reach the kind of situation that has been described by Senator McElman is, in fact, contained in The National Energy Program: Update 1982, published on June 1.

Some of the speculation about the plan and what is involved may not be completely ready for an explanation in detail, but that project is one of the measures included in it. We are aware, for example, that some companies, in particular Irving Oil Limited—at least, that is the allegation, and it may be correct although I am not ready to confirm it today—have agreed to take up to 5,000 cubic metres of oil per day. That is something like 30,000 barrels a day, more or less. If all of these things can be worked out, there could be significant savings of as much as $500 million in oil import charges.

In reply to Senator McElman, yes, the plan is there, but I am not in a position to give details. I am not sure that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has yet worked out all the details with the several private sector companies that will obviously be involved in this arrangement. The objective is correct, however, and it may be that quite soon we can let this house and the general public know those details.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the same minister. In view of the fact that the Irving refinery in Saint John, New Brunswick, is now the largest refinery on the east coast of North America and has a large element of unused capacity, will the minister endeavour to ensure that this program, which he confirms is under consideration, is proceeded with at the earliest opportunity?

Senator Olson: Yes. I can confirm that it is the desire of the government to achieve that, and, therefore, the activity of a number of people in the government, particularly in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, is bent to that purpose. Nevertheless, I will convey to them Senator McElman's admonition to put the plan into operation as quickly as possible.

May I also add that, while this news report—I do not know whether it was a news leak or what, and I am not particularly concerned about that—is directed only at the activities and involvement of Irving Oil, there are other refiners east of Montreal, or east of where the Interprovincial Pipe Line now delivers Canadian crude, that are also likely to be involved in this arrangement.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. As I understand it, the oil pipeline does not go beyond Montreal at the present time. Does this announcement that western oil is to be transported to the eastern shore of New Brunswick mean that some other method of transportation has been devised, or that it is going to go by rail?

● (1420)

My question is: Does that mean the government has investigated the possibility of swaps—and I am sure that the minister knows what I mean by that term; delivery to the Montana area versus delivery to the maritimes—and that they have been considered, and ruled out as being impractical for some reason?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it does not mean that, because that, of course, introduces, or re-introduces, if you wish, very important physical and practical savings.

There are some problems that we feel can be resolved if more time is given, but this proposal to find another means of transportation, perhaps further east by tanker from Montreal, is one that can probably be put into place sooner. That does not mean that we are not also going to try to save the costs of transportation that are potentially available by the kind of swaps that my honourable friend has spoken about, and that we both know were in some of the arrangements entered into in the 1960s and the early 1970s, not only for this type of crude oil, which is medium and heavy crude, but, indeed, for more of the conventional crude oil, or what is referred to as sweet crude oil.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if my honourable friend would be kind enough to give some thought to delivering a statement to the chamber when the final arrangements have been made so that we will have a picture as to what happened to the swaps, and what the financial aspects are so that we will have a well-rounded view of the impact of this relatively new policy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am happy to give such an undertaking, but I think I should say that that statement may have to be given on more than one occasion, because my initial statement will probably deal with that in which the private sector and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources are more directly involved.

It may take a little more time to comment on the international considerations to which my honourable friend referred. Therefore, as soon as I can, I shall bring an interim report to the Senate on what we are trying to do sooner as opposed to later, and also give an indication of the state, if that is the right word, of the negotiations for these swaps in the international sphere.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to ask the minister. Would the minister indicate, when making that interim report to the Senate, whether or not the swaps would be on a straight exchange basis? I know that our western Canadian crude oil is of higher quality than the other crude oil of which we are speaking.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, quality and, therefore, value are always taken into consideration with respect to swaps, but I think that the main thrust at the moment is for some medium and some heavier crude that has, for a long period of time, been taken out of certain fields in Alberta, and more particularly Saskatchewan, and delivered to what is referred to as the northern tier refineries. They have always had a capability for dealing with that quality of crude.

It is a fact that there are some differences in the configurations in the refineries so that they can effectively refine that kind of crude vis-à-vis other types of crude, and certainly the price and the value, in terms of whatever the product value is of the heavy, medium or light crude, is taken into account in these matters.

The main consideration is the transportation costs of that oil going its shortest transportation distance and being exchanged for oil that can, indeed, be brought into some oil refineries in eastern Canada by tanker, which reduces the cost for everyone involved.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—PROCLAMATION DATE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development regarding Bill C-60, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act, and an act which had its genesis in this chamber and which received Royal Assent on December 18 last.

Does the minister have any knowledge as to when this act will be proclaimed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I have some knowledge of that, but the simple and brief answer to the honourable senator's question is that the act will be proclaimed as soon as the regulations attached to it are ready.

However, after having given that brief answer, I must say that it is a little more complex than appears on the surface. Senator Hastings and I, and several other honourable senators, have great interest in that bill, in that we wanted it to amend the law regarding acquisitions and, indeed, expropriations of easements for pipelines so that the landowners would be in a significantly better position in negotiating with the pipeline companies than they were under the old provision in the National Energy Board Act, which really was a reference to the old Railway Act insofar as the proceedings under the law are concerned. Of course, that is always the negotiating position.

● (1425)

I admit it is taking more time than we had hoped it would, but when we come out with not only the act but also the regulations governing its administration we certainly want to achieve what we all spent so many months working on, which is the setting up of procedures that will be simpler, and that will assist landowners when they are dealing with the oil companies respecting easements.

THE BUDGET

APPLICATION OF GUIDELINES

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. A week ago I asked him a question concerning the marketing boards and agencies which would be required to adhere to the objectives of the budget—that is, the 6 per cent and 5 per cent limit on price increases. At that time the minister took the question as notice. Is he in a position to answer it now?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am in a position to answer it now, but perhaps I should wait until delayed answers are called.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Go ahead.

Senator Argue: Senator Phillips asked whether agencies connected with foodstuffs would be required to follow the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule. I take it these are the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency, the Turkey Marketing Agency, the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency, the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Eastern Canada Potato Marketing Agency. I have made extensive inquiries in the various departments involved—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): And the Canadian Wheat Board.

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Argue: And the Canadian Wheat Board.

I have made extensive inquiries in the various departments involved and can state that the government expects that these various agencies will do everything possible to stay within the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule. I was informed that last year all the agencies, with the exception of the Canadian Dairy Commission, had increases that fell within a 6 per cent limit, and that some prices actually fell—for example, the price of eggs. Accordingly, it appears that this limit will be a reasonable one to follow. Where there are indications that prices will rise above the 6 per cent limit, any such increase will be reviewed by the government and will need to be justified in each instance.

I believe that the Minister of Finance answered along those lines in the House of Commons yesterday.

Senator Phillips: Could the minister tell us what the base period will be? I am not quite clear from his answer whether the 6 per cent guideline applies regardless of the increased cost. For discussion's sake, let us say that the cost of production rises by 10 per cent. Can he tell us what the increase would be? Would it still be limited to 6 per cent?

Senator Argue: The information I have is that there are rules within each of these agencies for the setting of prices, and that last year the only one that raised prices more than 6 per cent was the Canadian Dairy Commission. The government hopes and expects that the 6 per cent limit will be followed. If, in the opinion of those operating these marketing agencies, there should be for whatever reasons—cost of production, or otherwise—an increase of more than 6 per cent, then that will be reviewed by the Cabinet and a decision will be made. It is expected price increases will be within those guidelines.

I am not an authority on this, so I am really just speculating, but I take it the base period would be the year—either the calendar year or the fiscal year. On the basis of that year, they will make a projection. This is the answer as far as I can give it today.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have one further question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Will products such as wheat exported to foreign countries be subject to the 6 per cent price increase limit?

Senator Argue: No, with a product like wheat, the price is set on the international market.

The range within Canada has already been set, namely, within $5 and $7. There is a formula in place, and that price will remain in effect. The price-setting mechanism within the Canadian Wheat Board system is really the export price.

I take it, in the case of any other export products, if we can get a better price, and one that is more than 6 per cent higher, we should be very happy and make certain that we do get it.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the minister who has just spoken in connection with the price of wheat. I think it is correct to say that there are two prices for wheat—one that is paid for wheat going into international trade, and the other, the domestic price of wheat, that goes into the price of bread.

There is a formula for the establishment of the second price—that is, the price of domestic wheat that goes into the price of bread. Will that formula be constrained to 6 per cent, bearing in mind that there has been a very considerable reduction in the price of wheat internationally over the last little while? No doubt, that may have affected the domestic price as well.

I would ask whether the present domestic price of wheat, which is within the government's control, will be constrained to 6 per cent or whether some different standard will apply.

Senator Argue: Under the current arrangements, the domestic price for wheat must fall in the range of between $5 and $7 a bushel. If you convert the price of wheat today, which is about $209 a tonne, it would amount to about $5.70 a bushel, so that the international price today is the domestic price, and vice versa; they are the same price. There is a little delay, which is a technical matter, in setting the price for domestic consumption. Basically, and in principle, they are the same, and that is the way it works out. I take it that that range and mechanism will continue.

I think the question that should be and is being looked at is whether the 6 per cent rule should be applied to the $5 to $7 range. The mechanism is already in place, and I have no indication that there is any desire to interfere with that arrangement.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend undertake to look into that matter further for me because the domestic price of wheat is X dollars at the present time and so are the wages of civil servants? The question I am asking is whether the 6 per cent rule will apply with respect to the present price of wheat that goes into domestic trade in the price of bread.

The minister has not been explicit on that point, and I wish he would look into the matter and report back to the Senate as soon as he can.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I may as well stake my ground early.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Argue: The range and mechanism are there, and I would hope that they would be continued. However, I understand the preciseness of Senator Roblin's question. The mechanism is there, and I think that mechanism should be continued.

Senator Roblin: If I understand him correctly, the minister is telling this house that the statement of the Minister of Finance, with respect to restraint in prices that are controlled by the government, does not apply. I am curious to know if that is the minister's own opinion because, on previous occasions, we have had statements from him which are his own opinion, and I rather admire his independence, even although his opinion is sometimes removed from those of his cabinet colleagues and, it seems to me, sometimes breaches the Constitution. Regardless, he is a man of independent mind, and will continue to be that way.

I want to know whether the statement he has made, that the domestic price of wheat is not constrained by the statement given by the Minister of Finance, is policy or whether it is his own view on the subject.

Senator Argue: Before you could come up with a formula, you would have to go back—as was inferred in Senator Phillips' question—to establish a base period. I take it the base period would not be three days ago.

I shall be happy to look into Senator Roblin's important question. The premise of his original question was not exactly correct, namely, that the price for domestic wheat is fixed and that it is a different price. It is the same price. I do not have the figures in my head, but it may well be, if we go back and establish a one-year period, that the price was higher a year ago than it is today.

I will check into the precise question that has been put to me by Senator Roblin, and see if I can bring an answer to the chamber.

Senator Roblin: I do not want to prolong this dialogue. I was really asking the minister whether his view of the matter is government policy or his opinion. He has not answered that, and I wish he would.

THE ECONOMY

IMPACT ON MONEY MARKET

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development who has the pivotal responsibility for the co-ordination and development of economic strategy for the government.

From that perspective of observing the continuing hammering that the Canadian dollar has been receiving for the past week, observing the continuing decline in Canadian stock markets in the past week, and observing what has been described as "chaos" in the bond markets this past week, does the minister admit that these events constitute, at least in good part, a judgment by the private sector on the budget brought in by Mr. MacEachen 10 days ago? If so, what inferences does the minister draw in terms of future economic policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not agree with that statement at all. It is not a matter of admitting or not; I do not believe that the budget has had that consequence on the interpretation of the economy by the private sector.

What has to be taken into account—and I am sure Senator Murray would do this with his normal objectivity in assessing the situation—is that in the last few days there has been a decline in the values of a number of currencies relative to the United States dollar. Indeed, the Canadian dollar has fared somewhat better than most in the decline that has taken place.

An Hon. Senator: Read that.

Senator Olson: I could read this out, but I would not like to take up the time of the house by doing that at this time since I hope to be able to make a short speech later on.

So far as the stock markets and the bond markets to which my honourable friend referred are concerned, what he has referred to is happening in the European market and, although not so much but in some respects, in the United States market as well. I doubt that the Canadian budget would have had a tremendously significant influence on both of those markets.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government.

Since we have heard so much about the declining value of the Canadian dollar, I would like to know if we could have a definitive answer to this question so that we have it on the record once and for all. How does the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar compare with that of the currencies of other countries such as the United Kingdom, Germany, France, the United States and others? Can that valuable information be obtained? Can we be provided with statistics covering the last few years concerning this particular question?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Put it on the Order Paper.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the past few weeks there has been a very encouraging increase in the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to many leading currencies in the world. For example, in relation to the Deutschemark, our position has improved; in relation to U.K. sterling it has improved; in relation to the Japanese yen it has improved; in relation to the French franc it has improved; in relation to the Italian lira, the Canadian dollar has strengthened; and it remains approximately even with the Swiss franc. Yet we still hear this incessant opposition attack on the alleged "weakness" of the Canadian dollar.

● (1440)

The fight against recession in this country is largely a psychological battle and is not being aided by the continuing efforts of the opposition to denigrate the Canadian dollar, and to attack every statistic that indicates that progress is being made in the fight against the recession. Therefore, I am very pleased to put on the record of this house today the improvements since June 30 with respect to the Deutschemark at 0.39 per cent; U.K. sterling at 0.20 per cent; the Japanese yen at 0.15 per cent; the French franc at 0.34 per cent, and so on. I hope the opposition takes joy from these figures. They should be a great encouragement to all of us. These percentages are all in relation to the U.S. dollar, but they also represent an improvement of the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to these currencies.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Let us talk about the Canadian dollar, and not all these other currencies.

Senator Guay: Can the Leader of the Government supply the statistics I asked for in my question, covering the last two or three years, that would give us an indication of how we have fared during that period, and not just recently?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is an excellent question. I want to thank the honourable senator for his grasp of the situation. That information will be obtained and I hope we can provide it on a regular basis for members of the Senate, to indicate the basic strength underlying the Canadian economy, and the strong position the Canadian dollar enjoys in world markets.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES—CUSTOMS TREATMENT

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, my question is directed to Senator Olson, the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I am sure most senators know that in British Columbia, through Trade Minister Lumley, the government has engaged in a policy of directing Canada Customs to embark on a deliberate slowdown in the processing of foreign automobiles, with specific reference to Japanese automobiles. My question for the minister is in two parts.

First, is the government aware of the very serious financial hardships being created for companies that process these automobiles, and is the government further aware of the number of jobs that are being lost through lay-offs or termination as a result of this slowdown?

The second part of my question is this. If a trade union was engaged in this kind of slowdown tactic, they would compensate the employees for making a sacrifice of this kind by means of lock-out pay or strike pay. Is the government prepared to discharge its financial responsibilities to the people who are making this sacrifice, either by reimbursing them with slowdown pay or strike pay, or some form of compensation, as they carry out this government policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): In reply to the first part of the honourable senator's question, let me say that the government and the Minister of International Trade are aware of some hardship that has been created because of a change in the pattern of what is done here in Canada vis-à-vis what is done in other countries, particularly in Japan.

The pattern is pretty important, because, prior to a few weeks ago, Canada Customs did, in fact, clear all those automobiles without any physical inspection. They checked the numbers against the invoices that were there, but there was no physical inspection whatever, except perhaps for some special reason. A certain pattern has been set up there, and we understand that. In Japan, for example, there are up to six different physical inspections of each automobile entering that country for such things as safety control, pollution control, other devices that are on automobiles, and that sort of thing. We certainly have not gone nearly as far as the Japanese go when they are importing automobiles.

I will refer the second part of the honourable senator's question to my colleague, but I have to say that there has been some change in the pattern that hopefully we can adjust to. My honourable friend knows the reasons very well; but we are aware of the hardship and distress that has arisen from changing the pattern.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about job loss?

THE BUDGET

ASSISTANCE TO WEST COAST FISHERMEN

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development through the Leader of the Government.

In the budget, reference was made to small business assistance, including assistance to fishermen. My question is: Will the Indian fishermen of British Columbia participate in this assistance, and, if so, who will qualify? Will it be the fisherman who is incorporated as a company in that province, or will it involve the large number of one-man boats?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to take the question as notice on behalf of the minister who is directly responsible. Perhaps I should let it go at that for now. There is a general reply that I could give, but Senator Williams did ask for some specific information and I will see that he gets an answer.

PUBLIC WORKS

NOVA SCOTIA—NORTH SYDNEY—DILAPIDATED STATE OF FEDERAL BUILDING

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to either the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government, and I might point out that this is the third time of asking.

In view of the very bad condition of the Federal Building in North Sydney, Nova Scotia, is either of those honourable gentlemen in a position to advise me how soon repairs will be carried out? This building is badly in need of repair. Parliament may commence its summer recess either this week or next, and it is important that we have an answer to this question as soon as possible.

Thus endeth the third lesson.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no additional information on that question. If I had I would, of course, have furnished it. I did pass on Senator Muir's concern respecting this matter on two occasions, but I just have not had an answer as yet as to what the plan is. I will put a third tracer on it. I certainly expect to have an answer before we recess.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Ask the Minister of Finance to visit there.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island is between 25 and 30 per cent, it would be very nice if we could get some work going there, and some people employed.

Senator Frith: That gives me something to add to my third tracer.

COOPERATIVE ENERGY CORPORATION

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin has been inquiring from time to time whether a mechanism could be put in place whereby the Cooperative Energy Corporation's report could be tabled, since, of course, as Senator Roblin pointed out, the public of Canada will have $100 million invested in that company. I have received assurance from my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that he will have tabled in both houses of Parliament the annual reports of the Cooperative Energy Corporation and its subsidiaries.

COMMUNICATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Asselin on June 30 concerning the proposed rate increases by Bell Canada.

Proposed increases will be subject to the normal regulatory process, and will then go to Cabinet where each case will be studied on its own merit. The national government is committed to doing all it can to ensure that prices under federal jurisdiction are restrained, and will take appropriate action where exceptional increases cannot be justified.

BANK OF CANADA

INTERVENTIONS IN SUPPORT OF CURRENCY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Croll on May 18 regarding interventions in support of the currency. It has taken some time to prepare a reply to this question, which is available in rather detailed form.

I seek leave of the Senate to incorporate these statistics, and this long reply, in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Question No. 1

How much money has the Bank of Canada spent in each year since 1977 to support the dollar?

A. Official transactions in support of exchange market stabilization operations by the Bank of Canada acting as fiscal agent for the Government of Canada are not published. Information publicly available relates to changes in the official international reserves and the portions of these changes attributable to revaluations, foreign-currency borrowings and repayments, gold sales and SDR allocations. Net transactions for each of these elements for the years 1977-81 (in millions of U.S. dollars) are as follows:

| Year | Total Change | Revaluation Effects | Foreign Currency Borrowing | Gold Sales | SDR Allocations |
|-------------|--------------|---------------------|----------------------------|------------|-----------------|
| 1977 | -1,236.0 | +102.3 | — | -3.2 | — |
| 1978 | -41.3 | +150.1 | +4,906.0 | +16.8 | — |
| 1979 | -679.3 | +19.5 | -1,035.5 | +14.8 | +183.9 |
| 1980 | +142.6 | -67.9 | +600.0 | +685.3 | +186.5 |
| 1981 | +341.6 | -189.0 | -600.0 | +217.9 | +176.6 |
| 1982 | -1,500.8 | -48.5 | +552.2 | +42.3 | — |
| (to May 31) | | | | | |

Question No. 2

In each year, for the past five years, what was the high the low and the average level of the dollar?

A. The high, low and average noon rate for the Canadian dollar in U.S. dollar terms for each of the past five years were as follows:

| Year | Value of Canadian Dollar in U.S. Dollars | | |
|--------------|--|-------|-------|
| | High | Low | Noon |
| 1977 | .9985 | .8963 | .9403 |
| 1978 | .9170 | .8363 | .8770 |
| 1979 | .8778 | .8320 | .8536 |
| 1980 | .8767 | .8249 | .8554 |
| 1981 | .8506 | .8031 | .8340 |
| 1982 | .8446 | .7680 | .7846 |
| (to June 30) | | | |

Question No. 3

What is the actual method by which the Bank of Canada intervenes to support the dollar?

A. The Bank of Canada typically conducts operations on behalf of the Exchange Fund Account through the Canadian inter-bank market for foreign exchange; on occasion, transactions might also be completed through arrangements with foreign institutions, for example, when the Canadian market is closed.

Question No. 4

If the bank has spent money to support the dollar, where did the money go? What institutions or persons inside or outside Canada received the money?

A. No information is available on the ultimate buyers of foreign exchange sold for Canadian dollars. The bulk of the orders undertaken on behalf of the Exchange Fund Account are completed with the Canadian banks, who generally are acting as agents for Canadian or foreign customers. Canadian dollars purchased through these operations are added to the Government of Canada's cash balances.

Question No. 5

What guidelines and other considerations does the Bank of Canada utilize in determining when and to what extent it should intervene to support the dollar?

A. The aim of intervention by the Exchange Fund Account is to counter disorderly conditions in the market by moderating excessive short-run fluctuations in the exchange rate. These operations are conducted in light of an ongoing assessment of trading conditions which is based on a wide variety of information.

Question No. 6

What institutions in Canada are selling the dollar short and in what amounts?

A. This information is not available.

Question No. 7

Does the Bank of Canada on occasion profit as a result of its dollar support operations and, if so, in what amounts?

A. The Bank of Canada does not profit from these operations which are all undertaken on behalf of the Exchange Fund Account. Furthermore, the concept of "profit" is ambiguous with reference to exchange market intervention. Exchange Fund Account operations encompass a wide range of market and non-market transactions. The Currency and Exchange Act specifies that gains and losses by the Exchange Fund Account due to exchange rate changes are to be recognized on assets and liabilities, not on trading operations. The investment income of the Exchange Fund Account is remitted annually to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, while valuation gains or losses are remitted to the CRF in equal parts over the three years subsequent to the Exchange Fund Account year-end. More information on the Exchange Fund Account's income is available in the financial statements attached to the Minister of Finance's annual reports to Parliament on the operations of the Exchange Fund Account.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT PRICING POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I feel anointed. Senator Asselin has agreed to allow me to ask my question first. Perhaps I am going to ask the question he had in his mind, so I thank him for the courtesy.

● (1450)

With regard to control by the federal government of prices within its jurisdiction, I am particularly interested to know what it is going to do about energy prices. If there is any price system that is within its jurisdiction, it is certainly energy. I will be more specific than that. I will deal with the taxation on energy.

As I stated in the house the other day, the taxes per gallon of gasoline today that accrue to the federal government total 60 cents a gallon. According to the escalation of the estimates of the department itself, that total will be 77 cents a gallon before this time next year rolls around. That is an increase of 17 cents on 60 cents, which has to be an increase considerably in excess of 6 per cent; it is probably more like 30-plus per cent.

May I ask my honourable friend what the policy of the government is with respect to that aspect of the price of energy which is under its control?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I believe that some specific information should be obtained from the Minister of Finance on that point.

BELL CANADA—RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—DEFINITION OF “EXCEPTIONAL CIRCUMSTANCES”

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, the leader's answer to the question I put to him is not altogether quite clear in my mind. I wish he would give me an accurate definition of the expression “exceptional circumstances” contained in the budget statement of the Minister of Finance concerning companies which might seek increases in excess of 6 per cent. Yesterday I asked the leader to give us the definition of the expression “exceptional circumstances” used by the Minister of Finance. I also wanted to know whether Bell Canada would qualify under this definition. Can the leader give me that definition?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in my reply I stated that each case would go through Cabinet—

Senator Asselin: As usual.

Senator Perrault: —and would be studied on its own merits. The honourable senator is aware of that process. Indeed, he has been involved in it as a member of the Privy Council. The definition of what would entail “exceptional circumstances” will be sought from the appropriate minister; but, as the honourable senator is aware, there is some latitude in the Cabinet process, and in the ultimate it is a collective decision with respect to what is an appropriate action or decision to be taken under certain circumstances.

With regard to the specifics of what is involved in the term “exceptional circumstances”, I shall have to seek further information.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, do I understand that the Leader of the Government has said that there will be an automatic review of those decisions by the Cabinet? It seems to me that those decisions are not reviewed by Cabinet unless there is an appeal.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That's right.

Senator Flynn: Therefore, does it mean that under the new policy of 6 per cent and 5 per cent all decisions of the boards will be automatically reviewed by Cabinet without the normal procedure of appeal?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I speculate that if in the normal regulatory process an unusual rate increase is granted, as Senator Flynn has stated, then, in the course of events, there is the possibility of a Cabinet review of that proposed regulatory increase.

Senator Flynn: On whose initiative?

Senator Perrault: It could well be the initiative of Cabinet. That is quite a normal process. The Cabinet has the responsibility for the public welfare. As many Cabinets of different political persuasion have done in the past, Cabinet may decide that in the public interest a certain proposed regulatory increase should be reviewed.

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. George J. McIlraith moved the third reading of Bill C-105, to amend the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is put, I should like to make a brief comment about one aspect of this bill, which was dealt with in fine style by Senator McIlraith when he reported for the committee. It has to do with section 168(1)(c) which describes the powers conferred under this act.

The act purports to deal with energy, yet the particular clause to which I refer gives the power to the Governor in Council to extend the application of this law to any prescribed law of Canada or a province whether or not the subject matter is related to energy. It is immediately apparent that this is an enormous extension of the powers that were ostensibly being sought in this bill. It is not limited to energy at all, but goes far beyond that, not only to laws that this Parliament itself might devise but to any law that any province of Canada might devise.

It is perfectly true that there is reference to approval by the Governor in Council, but the law, in fact, invites anyone interested to exercise his imagination as to how far he can stretch the application of this bill. The point was dealt with at some length in committee, and I believe there was general agreement that it was undesirable that this should be so, but not to the extent that the committee was willing to propose an amendment to that effect.

Nevertheless, the chairman—and I congratulate him in this respect—was able to obtain an undertaking from the minister that he would look into the question of whether or not the definition section of the bill, or the powers contained in the bill, could be described in such a way that they were limited to the subject matter of energy and not to the wide spectrum that I have described to the house. It is not an undertaking that he will do it. As I understand it, it is an undertaking that he will look into the advisability of doing it. I bring that point to the attention of the house because, while I respect the minister's good intentions, I am unhappy that he did not see fit to agree to an amendment of the bill in committee, as should be done, before Parliament is asked to give its final approval to this piece of legislation.

I must say that in the past ministers have been fairly faithful in discharging their undertakings, so I make no complaint on that score. I simply emphasize the fact that the undertaking was limited to looking into the matter rather than a clear expression of a desire to amend the bill to limit it to energy.

I hope I have described the minister's undertaking correctly, but I know that if I have not done so I will hear from some of the other members of the committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It certainly sounds plausible.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend does not always consider my remarks to be plausible, so I am encouraged that he does on this occasion. I do not intend to support the bill, because there are a number of points in it with which I find little agreement. However, I wish to thank the acting chairman of the committee for explaining the situation as clearly as he did when he presented the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC, FISCAL AND ENERGY POLICIES OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING ON MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 5:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Yuzk:

That the Senate of Canada do urge the Federal Government to re-direct its economic, fiscal and energy policies, and bring forward as soon as possible a new budget;

[Senator Roblin.]

such budget to provide proper economic direction, improved employment opportunities and measures to restore national confidence in the economy; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "That" in the first line and substituting the following therefor:—

"this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government."—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Olson would like to make an intervention on this order and he is required to leave at about 3.30 p.m., so I ask that he be allowed to go ahead with his intervention.

Hon. C. William Doody: Is he leaving the country?

Senator Frith: No, he is not leaving the country.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the Honourable Senator Olson be permitted to speak now in this debate in place of the Honourable Senator Flynn?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am certainly willing to yield to Senator Olson. I am just wondering whether Your Honour intends to make a ruling on the amendment. I believe a point of order was raised in this regard. I am not worried about what the decision will be, but I think it would be more appropriate if Your Honour would say whether or not the amendment is in order, so that we will know what we are debating.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I was not here when the debate took place on the motion in amendment but I read the Debates of the Senate, among other references, in relation to the amendment. Unless honourable senators would like to add something more to the question under consideration at this moment, it is my decision that the motion in amendment is not in order. It is a pure negation of the proposition and I do not see how I can accept it.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, obviously I shall have to change some remarks in my prepared text, since I am now dealing with the main motion moved by Senator Phillips rather than the amendment moved by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have to say that I agree completely with the amendment which has just been ruled out of order, but I have some difficulty with the main motion.

In any event, I regard it as a pleasure to speak to the motion that calls for the government to restrict its economic, fiscal and energy policies with the aim of providing economic direction, employment opportunities and restored confidence. These objectives are, of course, among the objectives of this government and ones which we are practising. However, I cannot agree with the method proposed in the motion for achieving these goals. For one reason, those proposals are redundant as far as the government is concerned, and implicit in the motion is the suggestion that there are better means of achieving the ends envisaged in the proposals. The government is already doing what is called for in this motion, and in the next few minutes, being as brief as I can be, I shall try to demonstrate that.

I submit that the government has already redirected its economic development policies to the extent required by changing economic circumstances. Those economic circumstances, which exist not only in Canada but in the international market, have changed very significantly over the last six months or so. This sort of adjustment in these kinds of circumstances is a continuing responsibility. It is operating within a general policy framework that permits necessary fine tuning from time to time.

I submit to you that the fiscal policies are being redirected in a most responsible and sensitive way. I further submit that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in his update of the National Energy Program on June 1, provided the redirection required by the industry and by active small-scale Canadian explorers in particular. Finally, I submit to you, at the outset, that the motion's call for a new budget, in some cases at least, is more or less political posturing which fails to recognize the fact that the budget now under discussion proposes, in my view, the only realistic, though perhaps in some cases bitter, prescription for our economic ills.

I say that the budget we now have before us attempts to deal with the disease, and not only the symptoms.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Which budget?

Senator Olson: In our case the disease is inflation, based on the assumption of continued inflation. That is the nature of the disease.

Senator Flynn: And it has been going on for 10 years.

Senator Olson: The symptoms, of course, are high interest rates, a sluggish economy, a diminished labour force and, in some cases, reduced vitality in our economy. Therefore, policies could be designed to treat the symptoms, and, indeed, many have been proposed. These might for a time provide the appearance of health. Unfortunately, the basic illness would continue to rage on within until the facade of health was consumed, and one could say later that the treatment was successful but the patient died. This government is determined to see that that does not happen.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Bravo!

Senator Olson: It is for these painful reasons that the Minister of Finance, through his budget, chose to meet the issue head on—injecting the positive restraint of 6-per-cent medicine into a 12-per-cent environment. By itself, the program of control of federal public service salaries and regulated prices, at a level of 6 per cent increase this year and 5 per cent the next year, will not reverse the entrenched inflationary expectations of our economy. But they can do the trick by triggering long-dormant market reactions throughout our system and serving as an example to other levels of government, and, indeed, from there to the private sector.

As the Minister of Finance said in his budget address, "the only way out of recession is to bring down inflation and increase productivity." All of us, including governments, business, labour, individual Canadians—

Senator Frith: And the opposition.

Senator Olson: Yes, and the opposition—and at the end of my remarks I will make a special appeal to them. All of us must rally to the greater discipline in our income demands and other inflationary behaviour if prices and interest rates are to be brought down. Industry will then be able to make a decent profit, increase productivity and expand markets. Laid-off workers will be recalled and new jobs will be created.

I was encouraged by the response from the provincial governments to the budget initiatives. At the meeting of the first ministers on Wednesday, following the budget address, the premiers were unanimous in accepting the principle of restraint, although they differed on the details. There was also a general consensus on the part of all ten premiers, including some who have serious philosophical differences with the federal government, that now is the time for co-operation rather than confrontation.

Contrast these attitudes with those displayed at last February's summit conference of first ministers on the economy, and ask yourselves whether the budget's leadership on this issue has not already had a beneficial effect—and it has only been in effect for a few days.

I also note that in the days following the Prime Minister's meeting with the premiers, Nova Scotia, for example, announced that as an initial step it is applying the 6-per-cent limit to its non-union personnel.

The Premier of Ontario also appears to be reconsidering his previously cool stance on the issue of controls. Newfoundland, too, indicated at the meeting that it would probably move soon on this issue. In addition, there are signs that the 6-per-cent guideline is spreading to the private sector. I can give you some positive indications of that. For example, CP Air, which is negotiating contracts with four employee groups this year, noted that their salary increases usually remain in lock step with those of Air Canada, and, therefore, logically would be affected by the 6 per cent rule. General Foods has also announced its intention of negotiating within the limit. As other companies fall in line with the guidelines, their business rivals will have to implement them, if they wish to remain competitive.

Establishing a national purpose in response to this problem, therefore, is now paramount, and there are many people, including some from the private sector, who are responding positively. This type of reaction is not only what the public needs but, I think, is what the public wants. I have seen interviews with civil servants, for example, who have said that they will accept the controlled rate of increase of their salaries so long as the controls lead to similar private-sector restraint.

There has already been some indication of that. We hope that there will be more, and yet more following.

In addition to that, honourable senators, I know that this sort of initiative was desired by the business community. Let me explain why. Some of you may know that for the past several months I have been engaged in economic development consultations with representatives of business, labour, provincial governments and other groups. I have picked up some feel of what is wanted, I think, especially by the business sector. I do not want to give the impression that there has been unanimity, but some majority themes have emerged. Let me list about five.

First of all, the business community wants the government to continue holding the line on the growth of public spending. Second, they want continuation of a restraint policy, but they believe that this policy applied to the government sector alone cannot bring down inflation quickly, and they therefore recommended that complementary initiatives be undertaken. Third, the meetings gave a clear indication that they want initiatives to stimulate investment and to improve the climate of confidence. Fourth, they feel that there is a need for increased co-operation and consultation between the government and the business sector. The list is longer, but, finally, they say that within the limitation imposed by fiscal and monetary restraint there should be a program of short-term initiatives to provide some stimulus and aid to the hardest hit sectors of the economy.

Honourable senators, I submit that the budget delivered right down the line on these major stated objectives of business, labour and other interested groups.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: The government has held the line on spending. It is true that the deficit ballooned from November's $10.5 billion projection to $19.6 billion, but that was not because of a spending rise or a whole raft of new programs, but because of a drastic drop in revenues. In that respect the government has taken steps to spur investment and to protect those investors from the effects of inflation. It has proposed a significant but complex package of initiatives to reduce the taxation of investment income and to cut interest rates to borrowers such as small businessmen, farmers and fishermen. It has also promised to consult with Canadians before implementing the package, as had been requested.

With respect to that program, honourable senators, we obviously expect the financial community in this country to administer it. It seems reasonable, therefore, that we ought to have some consultation with them. There has been an initial enthusiastic response to having a tax system in which the tax levy would be only on the real interest earned, but if you look at that in the light of today's financial circumstances, there is a possibility of reducing interest rates up to 8 per cent; but certainly there is a range between a 4 per cent and an 8 per cent reduction in interest rates that we think can be worked out to be sufficiently attractive that a lot of private sector capital will go into that kind of investment.

[Senator Olson.]

Within a few days, or at least within a few weeks, but in any event as soon as possible, as soon as we know that the financial community is ready, that the various financial institutions which will be asked to administer that kind of bond are set to have it fully effective, we are ready, as we have announced, to make this kind of tax change.

The government has, as well, taken steps to create jobs and to sustain some activity where this can be done without a major change in the fiscal or monetary stance. Some $450 million was allocated to direct job creation. An additional $300 million was allocated to create permanent private-sector jobs through leveraged investment incentives. Proposed housing assistance will create, we think, some 65,000 jobs over the next two years, while a further 54,000 jobs will result from the Canada Rental Support Program for the construction of new units in tight markets.

These are only a few of the measures, yet there are those who will still say that these measures of stimulus are insufficient to get the economy rolling on the road to recovery.

Let me be the first, after the Minister of Finance—because he really was the first, but I am the first here—to admit that that is right. The truth is that no government has the capacity to undertake this kind of task alone. But, honourable senators, the people of Canada, taken together, do have that capacity.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: And this budget does what is possible to assist them in getting on with the job.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about the deficit?

Senator Olson: Senator Asselin always talks about that as if he had never looked at the background of how we have arrived at that deficit. The fact of the matter is that in this economy, in the social and economic structure we have in this country, we on this side are proud of—

An Hon. Senator: You are proud of the deficit?

Senator Olson: Just a moment! We are proud of the fact that there are automatic compensators to provide for those who get into serious economic and social difficulties when there is a downturn in the economy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: We are not the ones in office: you are the ones in office, so you should do something about the deficit.

Senator Olson: The deficit! Let me put it this way: the budget did not change the deficit at all.

Senator Roblin: It sure didn't.

Senator Asselin: Of course not.

Senator Olson: No, it was the automatic compensators and the downturn in the economy resulting from the international situation that changed the deficit. But what is interesting in all of this is that Canada is in a good position, so that when the economy does turn around those automatic compensators will also take over to reduce the deficit and stimulate the economy very rapidly.

I think Senator Asselin should study that a little bit, because we will ask him to help us help Canada—

Senator Asselin: You didn't help us when we were in office. When we were defeated, that didn't help Canada.

Senator Olson: —to help Canada to make sure that this whole country mobilizes a national purpose in such a way that we can bring this country together by getting together.

Senator Asselin: We cannot solve your problems. You should just resign; that is all. Resign!

Senator Olson: That is not what would help the situation.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, yes.

Senator Olson: I should now like to deal with the contention in the motion to the effect that the energy policies must be redirected. Once again, I say that the government has already taken the necessary action and I would appeal to Senator Phillips to acknowledge that.

● (1520)

For example, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, took action last May to deal with industry energy constraints resulting from falling world prices of petroleum products, and because of a declining demand. The Canadian petroleum industry, at that time, was not too badly off relative to other sectors as far as historic revenues were concerned, but the revenues were, nonetheless, lower than had been projected the year before. In other words, the industry was faced with very real short-term problems of liquidity, and, because of this, drilling activity was down, and it was the smaller, mainly Canadian companies, which were hardest hit.

What did the government do for them? Long before Senator Phillips brought in this motion, the government, in response to this problem, reduced the petroleum and gas revenue tax by one percentage point for one year, resulting in a benefit to the industry of $200 million.

Secondly, the government instituted a price for old new-oil, which resulted in a benefit of $100 million.

I think you should write this down so that you can tell all of the smaller producers in this country about this.

The government offered a petroleum and gas revenues tax exemption of $250,000 for each company, which was worth $900 million to the industry.

The government instituted a new-oil reference price for high cost oil, placing a further $500 million in the industry's pockets.

The government established a lower petroleum gas revenue tax for existing oil sands plants, which provided a benefit of $125 million for the industry.

And lastly—not lastly, because there are more. I simply want to list these highlights because Senator Phillips obviously had not read them before he moved the motion—the incremental oil revenue tax was reduced to zero for conventional oil for one year, which assisted the industry to the tune of $150 million.

Senator Frith: We will grant him leave to withdraw his motion.

Hon. G. I. Smith: He will do that when he resigns.

Senator Olson: At the end of my speech, I am sure that he is going to be motivated to withdraw his motion.

Those initiatives total $2.075 billion, with most of the revenue increase occurring in 1982-83, when it is most needed by the industry.

The lion's share of this assistance will go to small producers, which are largely Canadian-owned, and which respond most actively and directly to such cash injections.

Senator Asselin: You have lost the confidence of the Canadian people.

Senator Olson: You will recall that in November the government produced an economic development strategy paper entitled, "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s." In his budget address, the Minister of Finance reaffirmed the government's commitment to that strategy, and I shall do so again today, although very briefly.

There is no denying that the economic facts of life, the reality of high interest rates, and a low or declining resource price, have diminished the attractiveness of the largest sized mega-projects that were anticipated—and there was a number of them, such as Alsands, the Alaska gas pipeline, Exxon's Cold Lake project, and its one in the Colorado shales. Such projects will have to wait, I suppose, until technology or opportunities offered by the economy improve.

Senator Asselin: When will that be?

Senator Olson: Now, this is a disappointment, but let us be clear on one thing; that does not kick the legs out from under the economic development strategy. A reading of the original document will clearly show that the mega-projects were only one facet of a much larger and more comprehensive framework. I do not deny that the postponement of these projects has required a re-targeting of emphasis in the strategy toward smaller though still huge projects. Such projects have shorter lead times, lower borrowing costs, and quicker returns. Oil flows in a shorter period of time and, therefore, cash flows in a shorter period of time than is the case with these massive projects such as Alsands.

The increased hydrocarbon resource focus will be placed in other developments, such as those in the Beaufort Sea, the Arctic Islands, and the Atlantic offshore, but that will also lead to a number of smaller extraction plants in the tar sands that are near the surface, as well as some of those that are enhanced oil extraction plants from that same quality of bitumen that comes up from lower levels.

These days I am asked from time to time which ones we are talking about, which ones will go ahead, and I know that there are several under active consideration.

Senator Flynn: They are waiting for a change in government.

Senator Olson: But I know that, until the private companies involved in those projects are ready to make an announcement, I would do a disservice to a lot of people by raising expectations that they will be located in certain communities, and my friends opposite would be on the leading edge of those people who claim that I said something that a responsible minister ought not to say, and I am sure that they would not expect me to do that.

Senator Smith: He is an irresponsible minister.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: He is useless.

Senator Olson: In the budget address mention was made of the problem of our declining productivity relative to some of our major competitors. This is an issue which will also result in some changes in emphasis on strategy. Increased resources will have to be allocated to developing and applying technology both to production methods and to product design.

What is more significant than these shifts in the emphasis, I should add, is the large body of the economic development strategy that remains unaffected despite the turbulence of the times, and which is being put into effect. The strategy is a broad range of policy thrusts designed to ensure that Canada is able to take advantage of the economic upturn when it occurs. We do not want this nation to be unable to participate and to be unable to capitalize on the recovery when it comes, so the strategy proposes a number of initiatives.

There is no use, for example, in sitting on a mother lode of renewable and non-renewable resources if one cannot get the goods to market. So, this strategy promises western rail capacity improvements and measures to upgrade ports. Increasingly complex modern production technology demands a sophisticated work force, so the strategy provides for increased emphasis on the upgrading of skills.

Success in marketing demands that you have a product that the world wants and cannot get more cheaply elsewhere. To get such a product demands expenditures on research and development. The strategy proposes active federal government support in this field.

Canada's small population often makes it necessary for producers to find markets abroad to achieve economies of scale. That is not the only criterion, but it is one that is very important. The strategy lays stress on improved international marketing, and the federal government is totally re-organizing the Department of External Affairs to increase significantly the importance of its trade function. External Affairs officials around the world have received and are acting on this message. Services which were being delivered effectively prior to the re-organization are still operating well during the transition period and will be even more beneficial as the new system increasingly takes hold.

Turning to another area of activity, it is clear that renewable resources do not necessarily renew automatically: agricultural land can deteriorate; forests regenerate faster with human help, and so do fish stocks. The strategy proposes to lay increased emphasis on resource management.

[Senator Flynn.]

Then there is the investment climate, of which I spoke earlier. Improving that climate requires efforts to promote better relations between the federal government, provincial governments, business and labour. The federal government's current re-organization, which stems from the economic development strategy, should spark and mark—that is already beginning to happen—a major step in that direction.

● (1530)

There will soon be an economic development co-ordinator in every province. I believe that in nine of the ten provinces that official has already been named, and within a few days the tenth one will be named.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Well done.

Senator Olson: These senior officials will increase the regional sensitivity of the whole federal government. We shall be able to listen better and to act more effectively.

That is part of what we are doing, and it gives you an idea of our economic development directions and the reasons behind the choice of these directions. Once again, I remark that we have already done what the motion calls for.

In closing, I should like to sum up my reaction to the motion in this way: It is true that for—

Senator Phillips: Which motion?

Senator Olson: Your motion. That is the only motion we have before us.

An Hon. Senator: It isn't much.

Senator Olson: No. It is true that for many the current economic situation is grim. I do not want to minimize that aspect, but, on the other hand, there is an underlying strength—

Senator Asselin: The evidence is there; you cannot do otherwise.

Senator Olson: I do not know whether Senator Asselin has made his speech. I will sit attentively and listen to it, if and when he makes it, but at the moment I should like the message and the optimism that I have for the Canadian economy and the people who will be supporting that economy—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: —to get through, because it is extremely important.

Senator Flynn: We didn't have that in December 1979.

Senator Olson: To get back to what I was saying, it is true, as I said before Senator Asselin wanted to say something, that there is a difficult situation. It is grim, and I do not want to minimize that aspect of the matter.

Senator Roblin: You can hardly do that.

Senator Olson: On the other hand, there is an underlying strength in the Canadian economy based on resources—

Senator Flynn: That's good!

Senator Olson: —on manufacturing capacity, on technological skills and the innovative genius of our people and, indeed, Canadians themselves.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: A bad government cannot change that, thank God.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn has a habit of interrupting, which most days I enjoy, but I am being serious now—

Senator Flynn: For a change.

Senator Olson: —and am soliciting the support of the opposition, because the situation is so serious that we have to do that. I have said all of those things, and I was just going to give an example.

The figures released yesterday show that Canada recorded a merchandise trade surplus of $1.361 billion in May.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: What is the reason?

Senator Olson: This brings the surplus over the first five months of 1982 to—

Senator Flynn: We couldn't buy anything outside.

Senator Olson: —$6.2 billion—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: —which is more than double the $2.7 billion surplus for the same period last year.

Senator Asselin: We have no more money to buy anything.

Senator Olson: Furthermore, if you take this $6.2 billion—

Senator Frith: Good news for the country is bad news for the Tories!

Senator Olson: If you take this kind of—Senator Roblin: Do you want to debate that?

Senator Olson: Another example of our capacity to perform even in difficult times is evident in the recent breakthrough, for example, in the Telidon videotext system which last week was adopted as the North American communications standard, giving Canadian firms a head start in that field.

Senator Roblin: Hurrah!

Senator Olson: For those who have not looked into it, they should take the time to do so, because the enormous size of that prospective market, with Canada being on the leading edge of that technology, is something that we in this country should be proud of.

Senator Roblin: We are, too. We just are not proud of the government.

Senator Olson: Another example is the recovery in the United States economy which has begun to surface in recent weeks and months, and we need that recovery to move forward ourselves. No one in Canada denies that, if they are being realistic. A Conference Board study of large American industrial corporations released this week shows their spending intentions in the first quarter of the year increased 28 per cent over the final quarter of last year to some $27.1 billion.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I am not advocating the rose-coloured glasses approach, but perhaps—

Senator Flynn: Not “rose” but “red”.

Senator Olson: —some honourable senators would see more clearly if they took off their dark glasses—perhaps including Senator Phillips—and let some of the sunshine in. Let us be realistic about this and not be defeatist.

I was going to say that I entirely support the amendment that is not before us any longer. I have some difficulty with the motion, but—

Senator Flynn: We knew that.

Senator Olson: —I would like to suggest to honourable senators opposite that there is a time in any nation—we know some of the current crises that we have faced before—when we should all get together for the good of each other and for all the people who are out there.

Senator Asselin: What a joker!

Senator Olson: My point is—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Frith: Getting together is a joke as far as the opposition is concerned.

Senator Olson: I am sorry that the opposition takes that attitude.

Senator Asselin: What kind of attitude did you take when you were in opposition? What did you do?

Senator Olson: I think there are all kinds of things that they should criticize from day to day, and they do it rather well. I want to compliment them on that, but to reduce inflation in Canada down to the point where we are at least doing as well as our main competitors, and perhaps a little better, is a great national purpose that all of us ought to promote, in this chamber and everywhere else in this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: It's been ten years.

Senator Asselin: You don't have the confidence of the country any more.

Senator Olson: I would like to plead with, or solicit, or whatever the right word is, honourable senators opposite to join with us in this campaign to bring inflation down to 6 per cent by the end of this year. Then, I am sure that all of the people in this country will applaud them for their efforts.

Senator Asselin: Resign!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Phillips: Would the minister permit a question?

Senator Asselin: That was a good show, Bud.

Senator Phillips: In the minister's remarks on the amendment which has been declared out of order, he stated that the government had practised a policy of restraint. I find it difficult to accept that statement, in view of the fact that the government's expenditures have increased 20 per cent in each of the last two years. I ask the honourable minister to elaborate on this new economic theory of his, where he says the deficit did not increase but the revenues merely declined.

Senator Olson: I said, as a result of the budget.

Senator Phillips: Could he tell us why the revenues declined? Apparently, according to him, he has a well directed economic policy, but why did revenues decline?

Senator Olson: A large portion of the federal government revenue is based on income, be it corporate or personal income, and its profits are involved as well.

Senator Asselin: You put forward the energy policy.

Senator Olson: Do you want me to answer the question? I did not notice that Senator Phillips had asked you for your opinion. It is a fact—

Senator Asselin: Have you a written opinion?

The Hon. the Speaker: Order!

Senator Olson: I shouldn't do this. I won't do it any more. I will just answer the question. It is a fact, of course, that the federal corporation tax is very largely based on profits. That is taxable income left after expenses, and that is the first to go when there is a downturn in the economy. Therefore, it has a profound effect on federal government revenues.

Hon. David Walker: Would my friend be good enough to tell us who wrote his speech for him, because he certainly did not?

Senator Olson: I will tell my honourable friend that I wrote this speech myself. All of the thoughts contained in it are not particularly new. They could be gathered up in a number of ways, but I put it together in a way that seemed to make a great deal of sense to me, and I hope my honourable friend will agree with that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I move the adjournment of the debate, in order to consider the problem of continuing the debate on that motion.

● (1540)

However, before I move the adjournment of the debate, can Senator Olson tell me if the government, in asking everyone to do his part, would consider doing the main thing which 70 per cent of Canadians want to do, and that is call an election and let the electorate decide what government it wants at this time?

Senator Perrault: You have just been listening to echoes.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if my friend has reached the conclusion that 70 per cent—

Senator Flynn: Minimum.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Olson: —of the electorate want an election, he has been doing some selective listening.

Senator Flynn: I was being very generous.

Senator Olson: The indications to me are that they would like the government—that is, the members of Parliament in both houses, those in the provincial governments—business and labour all to make a concerted effort so that the whole of this nation, in all of its geographic and socio-economic sectors, can get together and achieve the competitive position that we need for the good of the nation as a whole. I have heard almost no comment that an election would achieve that.

Senator Flynn: You must say these things with tongue in cheek because you obviously do not read the press.

In any event, since the honourable minister listens only to himself, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—THIRD READING

Hon. Peter A. Stollery moved third reading of Bill C-108, to amend the National Energy Board Act (No. 3).

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like at this point to make some comments on this bill. It will be recalled that, when the bill was before us on second reading, I raised the question of whether a certain clause was contrary to the agreement entered into between Canada and Nova Scotia with reference to offshore development, with particular reference to Sable Island.

When it was suggested that the bill be referred to committee, I agreed—not that anyone asked me to—not to delay the bill's going to committee but to wait until it came back from committee for third reading before I made my comments, and that is what I have done.

I have been in touch with the Government of Nova Scotia, and I also attended the committee meeting this morning when this bill was dealt with. I am advised that, with reference to the provisions in the bill concerning Sable Island and offshore development, the Government of Nova Scotia has taken, and does take, the position that this legislation is not consistent with the agreement and that, consequently, they are not in favour of it. They say, however, that they communicated this problem to the federal government and have been negotiating at some length with the federal government.

Based on the undertaking in writing given to the Province of Nova Scotia by the federal government that an amendment will be introduced in the fall to correct or do away with any conflicts that there seem to be between the two governments on the basis of how existing legislation, not only this bill but other legislation, might affect Sable Island and offshore resources generally, and the agreement between the two governments, they are prepared not to press their objections but to rely on that written undertaking. I am only saying what I have gathered from telephone conversations and I have nothing in writing, but the undertaking was, to some degree, confirmed by a witness at this morning's committee meeting.

As I understand it, the undertaking is twofold: legislation will be introduced in the fall by the federal government to make whatever amendments are necessary to this or other legislation to do away with the particular points at issue between the two governments related to Sable Island and the existing agreement concerning offshore development; and, indeed, the two governments will endeavour, at that time, to have legislation passed by the legislature of Nova Scotia and Parliament, which will have the effect of dovetailing the federal and provincial legislation in such a way as to not interfere with the appropriate and proper operation of the agreement which, as I am sure honourable senators will recall, was entered into some months ago.

As the Government of Nova Scotia relies entirely on the written undertaking I have just explained, perhaps not completely accurately but substantially so, I believe they are prepared to withdraw any objections they did put forward and, consequently, I am prepared not to oppose the bill for the same reason—I am relying on the same undertaking.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, following consideration of this bill by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee this morning, I am still of the opinion that it is a vicious, Machiavellian measure—

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Don't denigrate my ancestors!

Senator Flynn: No doubt Senator Bosa will recall what I said in the debate on the Speech from the Throne in October 1980, when I had just returned from Italy. When I visited the Church of St. Francis Xavier in Florence, I came upon the tomb of Machiavelli. I thought I had forgotten all about what had taken place in Canada, but at that moment I saw the face of Trudeau, and that vision recalled to my mind all that had gone on before, and it spoiled the rest of my vacation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Serves you right!

Senator Flynn: I was not looking for that type of reaction; I was trying to forget.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: You should have thought about Diefenbaker.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: In any event, to get back to the bill, we have considered a number of provisions. I would like to draw your attention to the provision in clause 87.1, on page 17 of the bill, which reads:

87.1 (1) The Governor in Council may by order direct that the Board assume supervision and control of the movement of oil or gas, or both, or any quality or kind thereof (hereinafter in this Part called "designated oil or gas") out of a province or the offshore area or both (hereinafter in this Part called the "designated province or area").

Why does the Governor in Council want those extreme powers? No explanation is given. It is obvious that under this provision, the Governor in Council, through the Board, could prevent Alberta, for instance, from entering into an agreement to export oil to, let us say, the province of Quebec. Or if the Supreme Court should decide, and I certainly hope it does, that the Hibernia area belongs to Newfoundland and were to say: Newfoundland, you cannot sell oil to Nova Scotia, you will have to do so somewhere else, under this provision, the government can intervene in this fashion. It has absolute discretionary powers and does not have to give any explanation for its actions. In fact, there are no restrictions in the terms of this provision and clause 2 merely confirms this.

This is a good example of the attitude of the government. However, there is even more reason to criticize the government's attitude if we consider this provision in the light of the amendments in the Constitution Act passed in December 1981, which were made to clause 92A. It is perhaps unnecessary to read the entire clause, but I will quote the main part:

92A. (1) In each province, the legislation may exclusively make laws in relation to

(a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;

(b) development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and

(c) development, conservation and management of sites and facilities in the province for the generation and production of electrical energy.

The other paragraph reads as follows:

(2) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province to another part of Canada of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for discrimination in prices or in supplies exported to another part of Canada.

I think I will have to quote paragraph 3 as well if we are to have a proper understanding of the problem:

(3) Nothing in subsection (2) derogates from the authority of Parliament to enact laws in relation to the matters referred to in that subsection and, where such a law of Parliament and a law of a province conflict, the law of Parliament prevails to the extent of the conflict.

It is clear what the intent is of paragraphs 1 and 2 and that paragraph 3 is applied only exceptionally. By including this provision in Bill C-108—

Senator Frith: What are the numbers of the clauses in Bill C-108?

Senator Flynn: Clause 87.1 on page 17.

What we are saying is this: whatever legislation was passed last December, we are taking away your right to legislate in that area, because we can at any time control the movement of oil or gas from one province to another.

It is this extreme power, unjustified under the circumstances, which is found in this bill we are being asked to pass today.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Senator Flynn: That is the reason why I feel that this provision should be deleted, and I therefore move, seconded by Senator Doody:

That Bill C-108 be not now read the third time but that it be amended by deleting from clause 29, at page 17, the proposed section 87.1 entitled "Control by Board" and that the subsequent proposed sections be renumbered accordingly.

I have copies of this amendment for honourable senators. Before His Honour puts the amendment, I mentioned yesterday that in my opinion, Newfoundland was offered the lure of a corridor in exchange for absolute control by the federal government of the movement of offshore gas and oil. I think that it is quite clear—

Senator Frith: Do you say that this is not constitutional?

Senator Flynn: I did not say that. I think that it is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution. Even before—we are faced with a problem of this kind and I am referring to gas and oil—the jurisdiction granted to the provinces under section 92A (2) is removed. It is done in anticipation it is quite obvious. This is nothing new, it is not the first time that the federal Parliament and the Liberal government with its followers in the other House have practically squashed the provisions and the spirit of the Constitution.

Senator Frith: You find it unconstitutional.

Senator Flynn: I say that it is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution. It is just as bad whether it is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution or whether it is unconstitutional from a technical point of view.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: I wonder if Senator Flynn would permit a question, for clarification. As I listened to him read his motion I understood him to refer to section 87. In his argument he was referring—and, if he has the bill before him, he will see this—to section 87.1 only.

Senator Flynn: I corrected that.

Senator Frith: It was that part of clause 29.

Senator Flynn: Yes. I am sorry. It is section 87.1.

Senator McIlraith: That is what I understood your argument to be, and it does not touch section 87.1(2), or section 87 by itself.

Senator Flynn: It is section 87.1.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that:

Bill C-108 be not now read the third time but that it be amended by deleting from clause 29, at page 17, the proposed section 87.1 entitled "Control by Board", and that the subsequent proposed sections be renumbered accordingly.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Flynn: For the record, I say that at least six senators came in after the vote, and they would have bolstered the vote on both sides.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I was not here, but it was not through any desire not to be here or lack of attempt to be here. I have never experienced such a quick locking of the doors in my life—

Hon. David Walker: I agree.

Senator Smith:—and there were several of us in the same position. I wanted to be here to vote with my colleagues, and I very much resent that the opportunity was taken away from me by an extraordinarily quick locking of the doors.

Senator Frith: If there was anything extraordinary, it was bipartisanly so, because it was experienced by both sides.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I rise on the same point of order. I agree with the deputy leader that the occurrence was bipartisan, but I have never heard such a short bell.

An Hon. Senator: That is not true at all.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Speech!

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Muir: If honourable senators wish to interrupt me, I have lots of time and I can stand here all day until I get an opportunity to speak.

A group of us, composed of honourable senators from both sides, attempted to break down the rear door, but we were not strong enough, so we went to the front door, only to find it locked as well. That is the explanation why we were not here. There are two or three honourable senators on the other side who may wish to speak for themselves.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, on the same point of order, I was on the far side of the East Block when the bells began to ring, and they rang for 15 minutes, and I made it through the door.

Hon. Guy Williams: I was unable to make it because the elevator slowed down.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I will move another amendment, but in this case I shall not ask for a recorded vote.

Senator Lamontagne: Why not?

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator may ask for one if he wishes.

Senator Frith: Let's go!

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Senator Flynn: The other problem concerns electricity and the intervention in the dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec. I simply want to voice for the record the objection of some of us on this side and say that, in my opinion, the government should not settle this dispute through legislation by way of expropriation through Quebec territory or otherwise. I am not certain whether the amendment I intend to move would have the desired result, but it is more in the nature of a symbolic amendment since the senators on the government side have toed the party line on the issue on which we have just voted and which is much more important. Since even Senator Riel did not object, I have no doubt about the result of the vote. I therefore move:

That the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by deleting from Clause 31, at page 20, the proposed Section 90 entitled: "Status of Act".

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. I declare the motion in amendment defeated.

Honourable senators, we now come to the main motion. It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Stollery, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, that this bill be read the third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

CANADA-GERMANY TAX AGREEMENT BILL, 1982

THIRD READING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the third reading of Bill S-24, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to taxes on income and certain other taxes.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to put on record that the question of the constitutionality of this measure was considered by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs because doubts were expressed about it. According to the report of the committee, there was a divergence of opinion, but I would say that doubts were expressed rather than that there was a divergence of opinion.

In any event, we have agreed to let the bill go forward on the understanding that it is not our responsibility. After all, it was the government that introduced the bill; we simply raised the question. If the government is now satisfied that it need do nothing about it, then, fine, the bill can be sent to the other place for consideration there.

In my opinion, it was the duty of the Senate to consider this problem. Now I simply say that it will be the responsibility of the government to consider the same question if and when similar bills come before us.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill S-29, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Molson for his warning not to say that this is a simple bill, because not only does that often lead to trouble but in this case it is not true. This bill is complex, but non-controversial.

The problem Bill S-29 seeks to solve relates to the financing of railway rolling stock. When the financing of personal or real property takes place, there is usually some document of security such as a mortgage, a chattel mortgage, a conditional sale agreement or some other form of agreement.

Hon. Eric Cook: Or a letter of comfort.

Senator Frith: No, that is in a different category.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You were supposed to find that humorous.

Senator Frith: Oh, I am supposed to laugh? Then let the record show that, rather than "Oh, oh!" I say, "Ha, ha!"

As I have said, there is usually a document of security to secure the advance of money on property—in this case, railway rolling stock. In most cases such documents are registered somewhere. For example, if you take a chattel mortgage on your automobile, or have it as a conditional sale, the company advancing you the money takes back the mortgage or the conditional sale document and registers it somewhere.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Where?

Senator Frith: At the moment I am speaking in general terms. It depends on the document. In the province of Ontario, for example, for many years the registration had to take place in each county so that, if you wanted to check whether you should buy a car or should give another mortgage on a car, you had to check in every county to see if there was a registration. You had to do that to be sure.

It is that kind of problem we are facing here, because the Railway Act provides for registration of documents that secure the financing of railway cars, but that registration is limited, in the central registry, to railway companies. In fact, there are at least four companies engaged in the business of manufacturing railway cars and leasing them to a number of users situated throughout Canada which are not "railway companies" under the provisions of the Railway Act.

The problems involved in financing an inventory of cars and securing the liabilities incurred are inherently different from those faced by participants in similar transactions involving railway companies, such as CN and CP. CN and CP use the central registry referred to in the present section and in the amendment. They can use the central registry, whereas manufacturers and industrial lessors cannot. Because such companies cannot use this registry, it is necessary for them to turn to other means. That means registering in each of the provinces, and in the province of Quebec, for example, it is impossible to register a leasehold interest such as required for equipment trust financing. In other provinces the ease of registration varies. In some provinces there is a central registry, but in others there is a requirement to register in every county, even for this sort of security.

Because these registries have to be updated every three years, it can be seen that this is an onerous, time-consuming and expensive task. The problem is so difficult that there is no equipment trust financing done in Canada by companies other than the railways, and as I understand it the railways and these companies and all others involved do not consider that situation desirable.

The alternative is to finance through another vehicle known as a trust deed or mortgage note, and, while that alternative can be resorted to in Canada, it does incur considerable registration expense. The cost of financing is greater by as much as 1 per cent compared with equipment trust financing, and 1 per cent of the millions of dollars we are dealing with is a lot of money.

The motivating logic behind the request for the amendment, therefore, is that it will simplify registry administration and reduce the cost of financing railway cars. The net result of such a change would be that Canadian shippers could experience lower costs, financing would be accomplished through Canadian auspices and the registration of rolling stock would be accomplished on an efficient basis.

Honourable senators, I am told that the proposed amendment to section 86 has been considered non-controversial and has, to put it another way, been the subject of widespread agreement since 1969.

During its history there was a concern as to whether or not it was subject to some constitutional doubt. There was some doubt whether it infringed section 92.13 of the B.N.A. Act, dealing with property and civil rights, or whether it was in essence railway legislation.

I believe that most provinces have taken the position now that, as the constitutional law expression goes, it is "in pith and substance" railway legislation. It is legislation dealing with railways and is therefore constitutionally valid. I am told that some provinces, although they have not actively agreed that it is constitutional, have at least quieted their objections to it on that constitutional ground.

So, honourable senators, if this information is correct, and I believe that it is, we are looking at a bill that will remedy, if it receives passage, a problem that admittedly is rather esoteric but does have important secular consequences in railway financing. Its passage could have a salutary effect on railway financing, with consequent help to shippers.

Honourable senators, I mentioned earlier this afternoon that I believed this legislation has the support of the financial community, and understand that it has the support of the Conservative Party. I only say that because it does have the support of a former Minister of Transport, the Honourable Donald Mazankowski. I should like this bill to receive first, second and third reading today, if possible. If that is not possible, it can be read the third time on another occasion. I understand that if the bill is sent to the House of Commons before adjournment it will receive speedy passage there. Mr. Mazankowski, I understand, will sponsor the bill in the other place. If it is as non-controversial as I understand it to be, it can be passed by both houses before the summer recess.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I think it might have been prudent of the Deputy Leader of the Government to have taken more heed of the advice given to him by Senator Molson who, of course, told him not to start out by saying that the bill was a simple one, because it is not quite as simple as it seems. It is a significant bill and has complications for the Province of Nova Scotia which have not yet been cleared up. Had I been aware the deputy leader was going to ask for first, second and third reading today, I would have told him that I would not give consent. Allow me to explain the reasons for that.

Beginning late yesterday afternoon and continuing throughout this day, almost without interruption, I have been the recipient of quite a number of representations that this is a bill to which the Province of Nova Scotia has agreed, and therefore I should not take any exception to it, which, if correct, would be the right course of action for me to take.

In an endeavour to ascertain that that was so, I have been in communication with the authorities in Nova Scotia several times, including the office of the Attorney General, and the only minister with whom I was able to get in touch, because this is a day on which Nova Scotia ministers do something else besides sit in their office.

Senator Frith: As a matter of interest, why are they not in their offices today?

Senator Smith: I still have not received any assurances from Nova Scotia that they have no objection to this bill. However, I am informed, and have it in writing from one of the persons advocating the passage of this bill, as follows:

Throughout the years discussions with the Provinces have been entertained by the Department of Justice and others.

The Government of Nova Scotia was approached on two separate occasions and did not raise any objections.

That, on the surface, seems to be quite satisfactory. However, I took the precaution of trying to determine whether the province did have any objection to the bill, and have been informed, as a result of a number of telephone calls, that the Province of Nova Scotia is not yet prepared to say that it does not object to the bill. Consequently, being a senator from Nova Scotia, it seems to me that I ought not to take any position contrary to the views of the government of that province.

As the deputy leader has indicated, there have been some questions raised as to the bill's constitutionality, and other questions which may not have been brought to his attention with respect to whether or not the central registry idea benefits anyone except the immediate proponents of the bill, and just how that will affect the activities and convenience of people residing in distant provinces.

For instance, it would appear that if there were a central registry in Ottawa, of necessity, anyone in Nova Scotia wishing to make a search would have to make arrangements to have that search conducted in Ottawa with consequent delay and expense, and the same holds true for anyone residing in any other province in Canada.

I have not prepared myself to argue its constitutionality. It may well be within the provincial field because of the property and civil rights provisions in the Constitution Act.

While I am not going to urge that second reading not now take place, I feel bound—unless in the immediate future I receive a message from the Government of Nova Scotia to the effect that they do not have any objection—to say, consistent with my duty as a senator from Nova Scotia, that I will not consent to third reading today. I say that not because I want to have any great argument against the bill, but simply because I consider it my obligation as a senator from Nova Scotia, knowing that the Government of Nova Scotia has not agreed to avoid taking any action.

Senator Frith: Are you moving the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Smith: I am not moving the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Flynn: Senator Smith has said that he has no objection to second reading being given today, but I would hesitate giving this bill first, second and third reading in one day. We have not done that in the past, except with respect to government legislation which has been considered in the other place and which has been before Parliament for quite some period of time. I would worry about doing that for this particular bill, although there may be some valid interest that we are trying to protect.

I suggest that we give the bill second reading today and refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, the committee of which Senator Smith is chairman. If that were to occur, perhaps the committee could meet to consider the bill tomorrow; or if, as the deputy leader has said, we adjourn later today until either next week or the following week, we could leave it at that, and, when we resume, complete second reading and then proceed with third reading and send the bill to the other place.

By giving the bill second reading today, referring it to committee for study tomorrow morning, and giving it third reading tomorrow afternoon, it could be sent to the Commons on Friday. As they are going to complete their debate on the budget tomorrow, they certainly will not consider this bill tomorrow. Otherwise there is nothing to be gained by doing that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the situation is that we have passed Bill C-105 and Bill C-108, which was our main objective. There is really no reason for us to sit tomorrow because I do not think it is reasonable for me to ask honourable senators to sit for the sole purpose of considering what is, in effect, a private member's public bill.

Senator Roblin: I agree with you.

Senator Frith: However, I have a memorandum that says that things were set up so that if we pass the bill this week all is ready for quick passage in the other place on Friday. That is tempting because if we wait until the week after next to deal with it, there is the risk of the inevitable legislative log jam in the last week before the recess. The memorandum I have is that if it is passed by the Senate today "all seems clear for quick passage in the House on Friday." That is how it apparently is. I cannot insist, nor do I intend to use pressure to have third reading today by saying we have to sit tomorrow. If we can send the bill to the Commons by Friday, apparently, they will pass it on Friday, but if we cannot do that on a voluntary basis, I am certainly not going to do it on the basis of saying, "We have to sit tomorrow unless . . ."

Senator Smith: Perhaps I may be permitted to speak again. I had expected to receive a call from Nova Scotia before now, but as yet I have not received it. I have received a message from one of those people who are urging—not a member of the House—the passage of this bill informing me that he has just been in touch with Nova Scotia and they have told him that they have no objection, but I have not received any such call, although I expect that whatever the answer would be, if it were available today, I would be the recipient of a call from Nova Scotia. I do not want to upset anybody's plans or make things difficult for anybody, especially since I do not have any strong views about the bill personally. On the other hand, I am in the position that the Government of Nova Scotia has been in communication with me. In fact, I was in communication with them partly at the request of the people who want the bill passed.

[Senator Flynn.]

I do not feel very comfortable in saying, in the face of a lack of any message from the Government of Nova Scotia, that I withdraw my—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I interrupt to mention another possibility? Senator Smith has made his position very clear, and I understand it. I do not want to put any more pressure on him, so I suggest that we let the matter stand for the moment, because we have a couple of other items to deal with. In the meantime, perhaps he could call and see if he can satisfy himself. If he cannot, there is also the possibility that the concerns of Nova Scotia can be looked after in the other place. I leave it to Senator Smith because I have to so leave it in any case. If any honourable senator objects, then, we cannot go on.

Senator Smith: I understand that, and I guess that is why I am the object of so many representations today which flatter me, and which I have tried my very best to give effect to by communications with Nova Scotia. I thank the honourable gentleman for his suggestion. Perhaps it would be helpful if the matter were to stand, but there is another little obstacle. I have to speak to the next item on the Order Paper, which is consideration of the interim report of the Transport and Communications Committee.

Senator Frith: Order No. 3 stands in my name, and I can spend five minutes on it.

Senator Smith: If the honourable gentleman will undertake to talk until I come back, I will see what I can do.

Senator Frith: We can have a benevolent filibuster.

Senator Flynn: There are other problems than those of Nova Scotia involved here. It is certain that the bill will pass eventually. What I don't like is giving three readings to that kind of bill, a private initiative, in one day. I do not expect the House of Commons to adjourn on Friday, but, if it does, we will have to return because there will be bills for Royal Assent, and we can deal with this bill at that time. I would have agreed to second reading today if it was the intention to refer the bill to committee for study tomorrow morning, and possibly third reading tomorrow afternoon. Otherwise, I think this debate should be adjourned.

Senator Frith: I am not going to ask honourable senators to attend tomorrow simply for the purpose of this bill. I do not think that is reasonable.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

TWELFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed on Thursday, May 27, the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the adoption of the Twelfth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I recommend we adopt this report. One aspect of the mandate of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is consideration of whether subordinate legislation conflicts with the Bill of Rights. In its twelfth report, the committee recommends that its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, have added to it a consideration of whether regulations and other subordinate legislation conform with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In addition to the other criteria and tests they apply to the subordinate legislation referred to them, the committee wants to be able to apply the test of conformity with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As Senator Godfrey made clear in proposing this motion, it is not to be confused with his other motion that his committee have power to consider bills in the light of whether they conform or not. That is a separate matter and that motion will still stand on the Order Paper. All the committee is saying is that as they presently have the right to look at subordinate legislation in the context of the Bill of Rights, they should also have the right to look at it in the context of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

That is reasonable, and I recommend that we adopt this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.—INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on passenger rail service provided by VIA Rail Canada Inc., which was presented yesterday.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I note the hour and will endeavour to shorten the remarks I had previously intended to make.

● (1650)

At the outset, I should say that the interim report may be found, as an appendix, at page 2345 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and also as an appendix to yesterday's Debates of the Senate, at page 4564.

I draw your attention to a couple of what I think are minor errors which I have not yet determined to be printing or typographical errors. At page 2349 of the Minutes, in the fourth line of recommendation No. 6, there appears the word "charges." It says: "Major charges in passenger rail service". That should read: "major changes in passenger rail service". In recommendation No. 8, on the same page, there appears the word, "therefore". It says: "The Committee therefore recommends". I do not think there is any need for the word, "therefore," and it should be deleted.

Honourable senators will note that the report is designated "Interim Report." That is simply because the subject matter of the inquiry appeared so complex, involving so many aspects of transportation, that the committee was unable, satisfactorily, at any rate, to conclude its investigation in the time available before the day of the presentation of the report. The committee, therefore, states that it has not been able to do so and, if the sitting were to continue, it would conduct further hearings, but, if Parliament is prorogued now or in the near future, it hopes that the committee will be re-constituted in some way and be able to continue its investigation of the matter when Parliament resumes in the fall.

The committee held some 13 meetings for the hearing of witnesses. It heard a great many witnesses, the list beginning at page 2399 of the Minutes. Of course, the Minister of Transport was one of those heard. He was heard on the first day that he and the committee could make arrangements convenient to both for that purpose, which was November 10, 1981. I will not go through the list of witnesses; it is there for all to read. Anyone who does read the list will see that the witnesses came from a very wide spectrum of people who would be interested in this sort of inquiry, including VIA Rail, CN, CP and the Canadian Transport Commission.

As a result of its hearings to date, the committee has concluded that it should place before the house its interim report and some 12 recommendations it feels should be made. Those recommendations begin at page 2348 of the Minutes and continue on the next two pages.

The event which triggered the reference to the committee by the Senate of the subject of this inquiry was, of course, the reduction in service by VIA Rail which occurred in November 1981. The committee proceeded from there to begin its inquiry. Of course, the date of November 15, 1981 passed long before the committee had completed its inquiry, and the committee was unable to do anything effective about delaying that reduction in service.

I shall not deal at any length with all the recommendations, but there are, I think, two or three which I wish to mention simply by way of emphasis.

The first recommendation states:

The Committee recommends that a special joint committee of both houses of Parliament be created for the purpose of analyzing the contemporary and future options for passenger transportation services in Canada for the current and following decade. This study should be comprehensive and include an examination of all modes of passenger transportation. This special joint committee should have as its primary objective the presentation of recommendations that will ensure viable, economical, efficient and convenient passenger services for Canadians in all regions of the country.

In making this recommendation, the committee concluded that the inquiry needed to be of the widest practical scope and that this could best be done by a joint committee of the two houses, since that would ensure that whatever findings were made would have behind them the whole weight of both houses of Parliament. In that circumstance, they might very well be more persuasive than findings by a committee of one of the houses of Parliament.

The second recommendation states:

The Committee recommends that any future decisions on passenger rail service reorganization or rationalization that involve route or service cancellations, abandonments or reductions be preceded by open and representative public hearings so that all parties concerned will have an opportunity to state their views.

I will not read the whole recommendation, but I point out that the committee sets great store upon the absolute necessity of making sure that no further reductions or similar activities in relation to passenger services should take place unless those who are going to be affected by it, namely, the people of Canada, have an opportunity, in advance, to make their views known and to place before some appropriate body the feelings they have as to how any proposed reduction would affect their method of conducting business, their method of travelling in the country and, generally, their way of life. The committee feels this is an extremely important matter and one that should not be departed from in any circumstance whatsoever.

There is, of course, a body, not specially created for the purpose of hearings, but one of whose special duties is to conduct hearings in relation to railway service, both passenger and freight, and this would seem to be a reasonable body before which such recommendations should be made.

Of course, all honourable senators will remember that preceding the matter of the change in rail services, which eventually resulted in VIA Rail, very extensive hearings were held by the Railway Committee of the CTC throughout Canada. The committee very strongly feels that the same sort of hearings should precede any further reductions or substantive changes in service.

A recommendation which I believe the committee would consider of equal importance to that is recommendation No. 3 which deals with the urgent necessity for full and complete legislation dealing with the situation of VIA Rail. Recommendation No. 3 reads:

The Committee recommends that an enactment providing a clear and all-encompassing legislative framework for VIA Rail Canada Inc., and in consequence for passenger rail service in this country, is an essential requirement—

● (1700)

It became perfectly clear to the committee—"perfectly clear," I suppose, is a strong expression but I use it intentionally, believing that it is applicable—that VIA Rail does not have the legislative framework on which it can adequately and appropriately carry out its duties of providing passenger service in this country. One of the difficulties, for instance, is its inability to obtain the necessary information on which to plan its management course of action. The information it needs has to be obtained from the two railways, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific. The relationship between VIA Rail and CN and CP is based on contracts between VIA Rail and the railways. These contracts have been negotiated, but up to the time this inquiry began, at any rate, negotiations had not been successful in making arrangements for complete, necessary information being made available to VIA Rail by the railways.

We were informed during the inquiry that considerable improvement in this respect had taken place with reference to information from Canadian National, but that there was still room for a good deal more improvement there, and room for still greater improvement with reference to information from CP. We also came upon what seemed to us to be a most extraordinary situation with reference to information necessary for efficient management, or that seemed to us to be necessary for efficient management. Unless the supplying of this information is arranged by negotiation, there exists what amounts to an adversarial procedure which is equivalent to a law suit. VIA Rail has to make an application in a particular form to the Canadian Transport Commission for information which it has in its possession, and which it receives from CN and CP. That application has to be made on a certain form, as I say, and, much to our surprise, the CTC had felt unable to deal with a request for information from VIA Rail because it did not completely meet the requirements of the particular form in question.

Once the form is satisfactorily completed from the point of view of the CTC, notice has to be given to each of the railways that this information has been requested, and the reasons in support of such a request given. The railways then have to have time to prepare their reply, if they do not wish to give the information, and after the completion of these proceedings, which would be pleadings in a law suit, the matter may be heard by the CTC, which may or may not require the railways to produce the information.

In this respect I want to make it very clear that I am not finding fault with the CTC. They did not institute this procedure. This is a procedure set out in the present legislation. The CTC is advised by its counsel, and probably correctly, that unless it insists on following this procedure it may be subject to legal proceedings by the railways or other interested parties. The committee feels that the legislation it hopes will soon be implemented to give VIA Rail a proper legislative framework will deal with this question of information in such a way that it will be readily available to the extent that it is needed for proper management decisions.

There is another situation that I think we should bring to the attention of honourable senators. That is the matter of audit of CN and CP, in relation to VIA Rail, by the CTC. This audit, in our opinion, has two deficiencies, or areas in which changes should be made. One is that the audit is very much behind time. For instance, we were informed that the charges to VIA Rail for 1981, which ought to be audited by the CTC, will not be completed until March 1983. For the year 1980 they will not be completed until the end of 1982, and 1978-79 was not completed until the end of March 1982. This seems to us to be insufficiently up to date to be of very great help in management planning.

The other deficiency relates to the kind of audit which is made. It seemed to the committee—and I think it was agreed by the CTC—that this is not an audit of a kind designed for management purposes, but one that primarily devotes its attention to ascertaining whether charges made by CN and CP to VIA Rail are charges of a kind which are in accord with the costing order which CTC has to follow. It is not concerned with the vital question of whether service is received for these charges, or whether sufficient or proper service is received for these charges. It seems to us that, again, the legislative framework should ensure that these charges are audited, not only in order to ascertain that they are of a kind or nature authorized by law, but that proper service is given in return for whatever charges are made. This is not now the case.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if I could interrupt just for a moment.

Senator Smith: Surely.

Senator Frith: What I propose to ask is that Senator Smith yield temporarily to the Leader of the Government on this report. The reason is that the government has already studied the report of the committee. It considers it to be an excellent summary of all the issues involved in this question. The government is prepared to make some commitments by way of implementation of some of the recommendations, and has other responses to make.

It has occurred to me that it might be useful for Senator Smith and the Senate to have the government's position before them, particularly since a good deal of it is very positive and accepts many of the committee's recommendations. Senator Smith could then resume and include a response to what Senator Perrault puts on the record for the government.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would be very glad to yield to the Leader of the Government in this respect, and now do so without equivocation.

Senator Frith: I should say, so that there will be no misunderstanding, that if we finish today I am going to propose that we do not sit until July 20, subject to recall. We will then put the matter back in Senator Smith's name. I would be happy to sit tonight in order to hear more, if that is considered to be necessary.

Senator Smith: That is very good of the deputy leader. I would, of course, like to have the opportunity, as soon as possible after the Leader of the Government finishes, to make further comments. On the other hand, I do not think it is essential that I follow him the very moment he sits down. Perhaps I should not say that, since I do not yet know what he is going to say.

Senator Frith: There is no question but that when he has finished the matter will revert to you.

Senator Smith: That is all right, then.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I very much appreciate the courtesy extended to the government by the Honourable Senator Smith and other honourable senators.

The government regards the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to be one of great importance. We believe it to be an excellent summary of the major issues and problems with which the rail passenger program is now confronted, and that it offers constructive solutions to help resolve those difficulties.

The Minister of Transport and members of the ministry have done a great deal of work since the issuance of the report. Indeed, they have provided a detailed reply to every one of the 12 recommendations. This is the material to which the Deputy Leader of the Government referred.

● (1710)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Are they restoring the service?

Senator Perrault: This may develop into a long debate; but it is not a controversial reaction. I want to give that assurance.

Consistent with its mandate, which was to inquire into the government decision of July 27, 1981, on the reorganization of passenger train services, the standing committee has paid considerable attention to the fact that Cabinet chose to invoke section 64 of the National Transportation Act instead of the CTC public hearing process to implement service cutbacks. As stated on many occasions by the Minister of Transport, this was a policy decision and, given this policy, little discretion would have been left to the CTC as funding limits had already been set by the government. Indeed, given those funding limits, a decision from Cabinet was required quickly to allow VIA Rail more funds for its much needed equipment investment and for developing services with good revenue and traffic potential.

The committee expresses deep concern in its report about the possibility of the creation of an entirely undesirable precedent for possible further rail cutbacks. In this connection, I am pleased to say that honourable senators should be informed that the government is not contemplating any further service reductions by order in council.

An Hon. Senator: That's good.

Senator Perrault: Furthermore, in order to foster public input, the government is considering the possibility of releasing a discussion paper on the legislative requirements of the rail passenger program.

So, point by point, first, regarding the proposal to undertake a comprehensive study of all modes of passenger transportation, the government believes this to be an interesting proposal which would allow the bus and air industries to express their views on the current VIA Rail program and the resulting impact on their respective operations and the financial situation. However, due to the complexity of such a study, and to avoid duplication of effort, the terms of reference should be worked out in detail with advice from the Minister of Transport. In the view of the government, this study could possibly be undertaken concurrently with or as part of the review of legislation on rail passenger transportation, but should not delay the introduction of new legislation or of amendments to existing statutes.

Second, public hearings on service cancellations. The rationale for using the authority granted by Parliament under section 64 of the National Transportation Act was that an exceptionally urgent decision was necessary. Service cancellations were essential in order to finance additional modern equipment for VIA Rail. However, it should be noted that the CTC public hearing process is still in place and continues to be used extensively. For example, the CTC is currently reviewing services in northern Ontario, Farlane-Winnipeg, and in the maritimes, Truro-Sydney and Matapédia-Gaspé. Also, public hearings had been held on all services prior to the July 1981 decision as part of the normal CTC review process, and thus the government considers that the views of the public were well documented.

Third, enactment of a legislative framework for VIA Rail. The Minister of Transport has indicated that he is prepared to release a discussion paper on the subject as soon as it is feasible to do so—possibly next fall. It is expected that all of the major issues identified by the standing Senate committee will be covered in that discussion paper. It is intended that the discussion paper will be the subject of broad public consultations. Referral of the matter to a parliamentary committee is under consideration.

Fourth, the “fixed price contracts” with CN and CP. The problems associated with the current contractual arrangements, and specifically those leading to the need for cost adjustments, are being examined by Transport Canada on a priority basis, in consultation with all of the parties concerned. Progress has been made in the contractual negotiations, and all parties agree, first, on the need for more predictability in the final level of railway payments, in order to eliminate or reduce the “surprise” factor associated with the current billing mechanism; and, secondly, on the requirement for more effective incentives for productivity improvement.

Fifth, the CTC audit of railway charges to VIA Rail—which has been the subject of some criticism by Senator Smith and the committee. Audit of charges to VIA Rail by CN and CP Rail are carried out by the CTC once accounts for a particular operating year have been finalized and upon application of a complex regression analysis technique to disaggregate freight from passenger costs. The government recognizes the need for the CTC to become more current in its audit program. Accordingly, the CTC has developed a schedule of audits whereby it would become up to date in its audits by December 1984.

Sixth, the proposal to review costing order R-6313. The contractual agreements between VIA Rail and the operating railways are based on costing order R-6313 which was issued by the CTC in 1969 pursuant to extensive public hearings on the matter. Since that date, numerous studies have affirmed that R-6313 is an appropriate and accurate methodology for railway cost calculation.

Senator Smith: “Is” or “is not”?

Senator Perrault: They say yes, it is an appropriate and accurate methodology for railway cost calculation.

[Senator Perrault.]

In respect of the standing committee's recommendations to review this methodology, it must be emphasized that the government has already funded numerous and costly studies on this subject and that the CTC costing order is currently being examined by the special Treasury Board secretariat review committee.

Seventh, railway/VIA Rail contributions to the provision of reduced fares for railway employees. As mentioned in the committee's report, it would be desirable in future to see both CN and CP contributing a greater proportion of the funds that are required to finance employee travel passes. In this connection, the committee will note that railways' contributions are negotiated between VIA Rail and the railways as part of the railway union settlement agreements and of contractual agreements between the parties. These agreements are continuously under review and a new agreement was reached recently.

Eighth, the acquisition of railway stations by VIA Rail. Studies are now under way by VIA Rail regarding this question. A multimodal terminal is also under development in Regina, and studies on similar facilities are being conducted in Quebec City and Lévis. The question of ownership of assets will also be raised through the planned review of the legislative requirements of the rail passenger program.

Ninth, the terms and conditions of station acquisition. Further to the answer given in relation to recommendation eight, the question of reasonableness of acquisition prices will be reviewed by both VIA Rail and Transport Canada. Moreover, the principles for purchase will come under strict scrutiny by the government, as is the case for all proposals in respect of purchase of assets.

Tenth, the re-examination of data used for the July 1981 decision on service cutbacks. On the basis of previous statements made by the Minister of Transport it is expected that the government will not be prepared to accept this recommendation. The service restructuring was undertaken in light of government funding constraints and expected rate of operating cost escalation. In fact, costs are now known to be even higher than originally envisaged, making the need for last summer's decision, in the view of the government, even more evident. It should be mentioned, however, that Transport Canada and VIA review system and service performance is an ongoing activity with the aim of improving service to the public within current funding constraints.

Eleventh, the need for consultations prior to the discontinuance of commuter services by the federal government. The discontinuance of services to Havelock, Stouffville, Barrie and Sherbrooke, announced in July of last year, was based on a policy decision which took into account the role of those services. Since those services carry mostly people between suburban communities and the downtown of large cities, in the view of the government they were more properly part of the urban transportation network, not part of the national rail service network, and hence a provincial responsibility. In this respect, it should be noted that the Ontario government has agreed to assume responsibility for two of the three commuter services in the Toronto area, and that commuters using the third line will be adequately served by the existing commuter transportation network.

Finally, twelfth, the introduction of LRC trains in the Atlantic provinces and in western Canada. On April 8, 1982 the Minister of Transport announced the signing of a $100 million contract for 10 new LRC trains, the delivery of which will begin in the second half of 1983. The new purchase will allow the government to fulfill its commitment to introduce LRC service on routes in the maritimes and western Canada. The specific routes to be chosen will depend on demand at the time the new trains are introduced into service.

• (1720)

Honourable senators, the government felt it important to react as soon as possible to the recommendations of the committee. I would like to close by saying once again that the government believes that the report is an excellent summary of the major issues and problems confronting the rail passenger system, and that the committee is to be commended, for its work offers constructive solutions to those difficulties.

Senator Smith: I thank the Leader of the Government for his intervention, and I am glad that I yielded. I was very interested to hear what he said. I am sure, however, that he does not expect me to react from the point of view of what the committee's feeling will be, because I would like to have a meeting with the committee to consider fully what they believe his comments will mean in light of their view of what should be done.

There are just two or three things that I should like to mention now, and then I shall move the adjournment of the debate. I did not hear any comment about adjusting the audit procedure of the Canadian Transport Commission except through an endeavour to make it more current, which, it is hoped, will be achieved by 1984. I draw attention to the fact that the committee's report placed a good deal of emphasis on the kind of audit that was necessary to be helpful from the point of view of providing efficient rail service by VIA Rail, and that is an audit that does not merely ascertain whether the charge was in accordance with accounting order R-6313, but whether the particular charge made was in fact justified by the quantity and quality of the service rendered. We think that it is of vital importance.

With all respect to the assertion, which, of course, is true, that the costing order received great study before it was implemented in 1969 or whenever, that does not necessarily make it relevant to the very changed conditions of today where the passenger services are provided by one railway which is entirely dependent upon the services provided by two other railways in terms of trackage and so on.

While that costing order may be perfectly adequate to determine the things it was meant to determine in the first place—that is, what subsidies should be paid to CN and CP for their losses on passenger services—it is not by any means adequate or appropriate to determine what should be charged to VIA Rail. I think the committee would feel very strongly about that.

The Leader of the Government said that the travel passes were a matter which, in some measure, was between CN and CP and their respective labour forces by virtue of negotiation. The committee understands that, but if CN and CP want to make some beneficial arrangements with their employees about travel at the expense of VIA Rail, then, surely, CN and CP should pay something towards that cost which they inflict for their own benefit because it helps them in their negotiations.

With reference to costs—and this is the last point I will try to make today, although probably not the last point after the committee has had time to consider this situation—we believe that there is a very substantial difference in the way the United States rail service, Amtrak, costs are computed as a result of its legislation and the way costs are computed with reference to VIA Rail by the CTC.

In support of this allegation, I would like, first, to make reference to a study on this very point carried out by the staff of the CTC and made available to the committee, and then read an extract from that report. On page 49 of the staff report of the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC, dated March 31, 1982, entitled "A Comparison of Amtrak and VIA Costing Approaches," the following statement appears:

To summarize this examination of the effects of using U.S. strictly avoidable costing in place of Canadian long-run variable costs, there would appear to be an annual saving to VIA of the order of $9.5 million under Train Operations, $11.3 to $20 million under Maintenance of Way, and $8.5 million under Station Services. In total, the savings to VIA would therefore be in the broad range of $30-$40 million. There is one further adjustment to be made before finalizing this range. As indicated earlier, Amtrak has been paying incentives to the contracting railways at a rate somewhat higher than that paid by VIA. If VIA were to adopt a similar rate of incentive payment to that made by Amtrak, this would increase costs by some $5 million, reducing the range of savings from adopting the U.S. costing methodology to $25-$35 million.

VIA Rail's evidence on this point was to the effect that they believe that the estimate on annual savings is low. They place the figure at between $50 million and $55 million per year. That is part of the reason we suggest that the costing rules, as set out in the costing order referred to, are not consistent with the kind of costing that is applicable to the present situation with reference to VIA Rail.

Honourable senators, that is all I wish to say today. I should say that after consultation with the steering committee of the committee, I look forward, if the steering committee concurs, to asking the committee at some reasonable opportunity to consider carefully the statement made by the Leader of the Government, which I welcome and which I think is very positive and helpful, and to seeing what comments, if any, the committee might consider it necessary to make on that point.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

● (1730)

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 20th July, 1982, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

He said: Honourable senators, as you realize, rule 14A of the Rules of the Senate provides that:

If, during any adjournment of the Senate, the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting—

In other words, the Senate is subject to recall. If this motion is adopted, then, when I move the adjournment at the end of the day we will not sit tomorrow but will return on the 20th, subject to recall.

I have moved this motion because I have been informed that we will not receive any more legislation this week and that it is unlikely that we will next week.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the supplementary estimates (C), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

BILL TO AMEND THE HOLIDAYS ACT

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the leading article on the front page of the Globe and Mail of last Tuesday, July 13.

For those who have not seen the article, it is headed: "Renaming of July 1 a priority in Senate." The article, under the byline of Robert Sheppard, says, in part:

A spokesman for Senator Raymond Perrault, Government Leader in the Senate, said yesterday that although the bill—

That is, the bill to amend the Holidays Act.

—went through the Commons as a private member's bill, the Liberals intend to give it the same support in the Senate as they would Government legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator Bell: The article further states:

—the Government expects it will pass before Parliament recesses for the summer.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Does this spokesman truly speak on behalf of the Leader of Her Majesty's Government in the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I would remind the honourable senator that it is not in order during Question Period to inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are true. I have made no statement on the subject of the Canada Day bill and the proposed re-naming of the July 1 holiday, and I do not intend to make any comment on the subject at this time. In due course, there will be a debate on this subject in this chamber.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Does this nameless, faceless, junior-grade éminence grise speak for the Leader of the Government in the Senate?

● (2015)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate speaks for himself. Secondly, I do not believe it to be in order for any honourable senator to talk about "nameless, faceless, junior-grade people" when such persons, who have not been named or properly identified by the honourable senator, are not here to defend themselves.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government or to his deputy and is entirely unrelated to the previous question.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: There is a supplementary question.

Senator Flynn: If there is a supplementary question, I am happy to yield. Of course, I would not refuse Senator Guay anything.

Senator Guay: I thank the Leader of the Opposition.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can indicate when we will be given an opportunity to vote on the changing of the name of Dominion Day to Canada Day. I would like to have such a change.

Senator Flynn: That is none of his business if it is a private bill.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, my question is: When will that bill come to this house?

Senator Perrault: It was introduced in the Senate this evening, senator.

Senator Flynn: In case the honourable senator does not understand, I may tell him that the bill was placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading next Thursday. Perhaps he may be invited to sponsor it.

Senator Guay: Thank you; I would not mind that.

PARLIAMENT

SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed either to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or his deputy. We have authorized the National Finance Committee to study the subject matter of Bill C-124 and Bill C-125 in the hope that perhaps Parliament will adjourn for the summer recess on Friday. Can the leader tell us whether that is hoping for too much? We hear so many rumours around here that it is difficult to make an assessment of the situation.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Ask your boss.

Senator Flynn: Despite the concept that the government opens the session and the opposition closes it, I think that the closing of this session will depend on the government as well. In this very case it all depends on the concessions that the government may make.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can inform the Leader of the Opposition that it might well be expecting too much to suppose that Parliament will adjourn for the summer recess on Friday. It is my understanding that conversations are being held today involving representatives of all other parties to determine how to deal with the remaining legislative proposals which the government and the opposition may wish to advance before the adjournment. Hopefully, a report can be brought to the chamber later this week.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—IMPACT OF MODIFICATIONS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development? It has been reported that a discrepancy amounting to some $600 million exists between the petroleum industry and the government concerning the impact of modifications to the National Energy Program tax régime which was recently announced. In light of the review of these estimates which I assume has taken place, would the minister indicate which estimate is correct—that of the government or that of the industry?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and will come back with an explanation. I am afraid, however, that at this point in time the explanation will not reduce the matter down to who is correct. There may be some factors and assumptions in the calculations that are different.

I will endeavour to get a complete and detailed explanation so that my honourable friend can examine those assumptions as well.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Nobody will be blamed.

HOUSING

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a brief question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Publicity has been given recently to a discovery made by a chemistry professor of the University of Manitoba related to the almost complete removal—a reduction of about 90 per cent—of the fumes caused by urea formaldehyde foam insulation. This injection process is estimated to cost approximately $200 per house.

Having regard to the problem faced by many people in this country who are trying to remove that insulation, and having regard to the government proposal for far more expensive aid to be given to those people, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could indicate whether the federal government has offered either to fund further research or to investigate this discovery as a possible solution for what really is a national problem?

● (2020)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I read with interest the statements made by the eminent scientist from the University of Manitoba, who, I suggest, should be commended for his interest in providing the solution to a problem afflicting thousands in this country. As yet, I have no official government reaction to the report, but there is a good deal of interest on the part of the government in the claims made by this Manitoba scientist. I hope to have more information on the subject tomorrow.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Manitobans always have good suggestions.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

APPOINTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP COURT JUDGE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning the vacancy in the Citizenship Court in British Columbia. I understand that the minister, in his capacity as chairman of the Liberal patronage committee for that province, is sitting on that appointment and causing a great deal of inconvenience to people who would normally appear before that court.

May I ask the minister if an early end is likely to the dispute between himself and his colleagues on the question of a suitable replacement?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the term “patronage committee” may be in common usage in the party of the official opposition. However, we have no such committee in the Liberal Party or on the government side in this place. There is no dispute of which I am aware involving an alleged Citizenship Court vacancy in British Columbia. Those judges who serve in that important capacity are doing excellent work in that province as they are in other provinces. If, indeed, a “patronage committee” to appoint citizenship court judges was established by the Clark government, I can give the assurance that it has been dissolved.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I might ask the Honourable the Leader of the Government why he insists on making himself look so foolish over this matter. Why does he make such foolish assertions?

I should like also to ask whether it is true that any reluctance of any official of the Citizenship Court in Nova Scotia was the cause of, or contributed to, the celebration in Truro, Nova Scotia, of the holiday which I prefer to call Dominion Day on June 30, 1982, instead of July 1. Specifically, was it the reluctance of a judge of the Citizenship Court in Nova Scotia to conduct her affairs in conjunction with that celebration on July 1?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice. I have no answer to the ultimate query advanced by Honourable Senator Smith. I can say, however, with respect to his initial comments, that I suggest he knows very little about the Citizenship Court situation in British Columbia, and should tread warily in waters where there could be alligators.

Senator Smith: If the alligators are all blow and nothing else, like the honourable gentleman, I do not think I need to worry about alligators either in Nova Scotia or in British Columbia. If the honourable gentleman wishes to misinterpret what I said as having anything to do with British Columbia, that is his privilege. I was, however, talking about Nova Scotia, not about British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: You started by talking about British Columbia.

Senator Smith: I did not. You started with a bunch of nonsense about British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: Of course, this is the very point to which I referred. Senator Smith said that I spoke a bunch of nonsense about British Columbia. I happen to know a great deal about British Columbia, and the allegations made by Senator Murray are untrue. He is not in possession of the facts, and Senator Smith is equally ill-informed concerning this matter in British Columbia. There is no long-standing dispute with respect to the filling of a Citizenship Court vacancy in the province of British Columbia. I understand that because of a vacancy or a new position an earnest search is under way to determine whether or not there is a suitable candidate available for this very high position.

Senator Murray: In that respect, will the Leader of the Government undertake to consult his former colleague, the Honourable Robert Andras, who I understand is on the west coast and has a suitable candidate ready for appointment if the Leader of the Government will agree to that appointment?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can say without equivocation that the Honourable Robert Andras has not been in contact with my office, and, to the best of my knowledge, he has not been in contact with any other ministerial office in the province of British Columbia regarding this particular matter. The source of the honourable senator's questions must remain a profound mystery!

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, it seems that someone is determined to misunderstand either questions or answers, and rather than launch into a dissertation on which I think it is, I shall repeat my question. Is the honourable gentleman aware as to whether or not, in the town of Truro, Nova Scotia, with regard to the celebration of the holiday, which I prefer to call Dominion Day, on July 1, 1982, it was necessary to hold such a celebration on June 30 because of the reluctance of a judge of the Citizenship Court in Nova Scotia to perform on July 1?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated previously, the question will be taken as notice. I do not have the reply ready at my desk this evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Surprise!

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES—CUSTOMS TREATMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I should appreciate it if, in his answer, the minister would clarify once and for all, for all the members of this Chamber—

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Impossible!

Senator Asselin: —a conflict that seems to be becoming quite serious, namely, that between Canada and Japan. The Minister of State for International Trade has tried to reach an agreement with Japan regarding the access of Japanese cars to the Canadian market. Apparently, he failed to reach an agreement, and it seems that now Canada, through its customs officers, is using all kinds of unfair tactics to delay the delivery of Japanese cars to Canadian dealers.

[Senator Perrault.]

It seems that these tactics are going to put thousands of Canadians out of work, because Japanese car dealerships employ Canadians. It seems that 16,000 cars are stuck in Vancouver as a result of the action taken by customs officers who are carrying out prolonged and excessive inspections.

By acting in this way, the minister is trying to achieve indirectly what he was unable to achieve directly. I feel that in the long run, this kind of action is going to lead to further problems in trade relations between Canada and Japan.

Is this matter going to be resolved shortly? Are any discussions taking place? Could the minister inform Canadians who make a living from Japanese industry that they can expect a solution soon or whether the government simply wants to let the situation deteriorate and thus further harm the job situation in Canada in this sector?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the discussions that took place among a number of officials, led by the minister responsible for international trade, have just concluded. I am of the opinion that we should at least wait long enough for the minister to make a report on the basis of what was involved in those discussions. I do not intend to anticipate what the minister will say, because I was not present at the meetings. Often, with such discussions, for a number of reasons it takes a few hours to articulate the results. I have a great deal of confidence in the negotiating ability of the minister. Therefore, I do not think it unreasonable to expect that there will be a positive response from the kind of activity he has been involved in during the last few days.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: If I can take the minister at his word, I hope that this time, the Minister of State for International Trade will have better results than when he went to Japan two months ago with a strong delegation from the Department of External Affairs and a number of businessmen, to try to settle the issue. Apparently, the Japanese ministers would not even listen to his arguments, and he came back empty-handed. Are there any new developments in this area? Has anything new transpired that would help Japan and Canada reach an agreement? What has happened since then?

● (2030)

[English]

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is trying to do what was just suggested to me—that is, to call the score in the seventh inning instead of the ninth. I think my honourable friend understands, as he has been around long enough to know, that after such long and detailed negotiations with such a large group we should wait a few hours, if not a few days, for a report from the minister directly involved. It does not seem to me necessary to explain to my honourable friend, who is knowledgeable and intelligent, all the reasons why the minister involved will probably need those few hours or perhaps, at most, a day or two to evaluate the conclusions reached during those discussions.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the political minister for British Columbia—not the minister responsible for patronage, just the political minister. According to the news on radio and television and reports in the press, there is some concern in British Columbia regarding dealers in Japanese cars who have been obliged to close their businesses. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us in a few words what the situation is for Canadians who make a living selling Japanese cars in British Columbia? What is the unemployment situation in this sector? We have a right to know all the facts.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Olson has stated so well—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Of course, you have great confidence in him.

Senator Perrault: We are confident that a successful result will ensue from these negotiations. There has been a temporary inconvenience for dealers—

Senator Asselin: “Temporary”?

Senator Perrault: —across Canada, as well as for those involved in the transshipment of automobiles.

Senator Asselin: Tell us about the situation in your province.

Senator Perrault: We admit that. However, Canada is involved in an important two-way trade relationship with Japan. I have been informed that the current customs procedures adopted with respect to certain Japanese automobiles are almost identical to those procedures adopted on more than one occasion by the Japanese with respect to certain imports including automobiles, into that country. The procedures are not unusual, I have been informed, and they are not unprecedented.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Are they retaliatory?

Senator Perrault: We believe that it is very important to achieve a clear understanding with respect to our trade relationship, a relationship which has been excellent in past years, and one which we hope will be even more successful and mutually beneficial in the years to come.

Senator Asselin: Can the minister tell me whether the actions by the Canadian government in this matter are retaliatory?

Senator Perrault: The word “retaliatory” is not in our vocabulary.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure?

Senator Asselin: Then use your word.

Senator Perrault: Admittedly, the customs inspection process is longer and more detailed than has been the practice, but, as I have said, it is quite similar to inspection procedures in force in certain other countries, including Japan, under various circumstances.

Senator Flynn: As Senator Guay says, the deputy leader is the only one who can give adequate replies, so would the deputy leader confirm whether we have received an adequate reply?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Hear, hear.

AIR CANADA

DISCOUNT FARES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. First of all, I would like to say that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has finally done one thing right in telling the Canadian Transport Commission to keep its nose out of the discount fares offered by the airlines. Air Canada has a skybus fare or some type of weekday reduction in fares for different parts of Canada, but why is it that those fares apply only in the east as far as Halifax, while people in Newfoundland, where the need is the greatest, must pay regular fares?

● (2035)

Just to give you an example, the fare from Ottawa to Halifax is $89 one way instead of $135, and yet a person flying to St. John's, Newfoundland, has to pay the regular fare.

Would the leader ask the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to look into that skulduggery?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it rather extreme to employ the word “skulduggery”. The allegations made by the honourable senator will be investigated. In any event, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: Will you also take into consideration the fact that many Newfoundlanders find it necessary to go to Toronto and other parts of Canada to find employment? In view of the fact that their parents might want to visit them, would Air Canada show some national responsibility by including all parts of Canada in their reduction of air fares, and not come crying to the Canadian people all the time?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator's remarks will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport who has the responsibility for Air Canada.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—DECREASE IN INFLATION RATE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Are you giving notice of a question?

Senator Bosa: No, this is a spontaneous question.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable minister care to comment on the dramatic and aggressive climb of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the United States dollar?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: That is a planted question.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bosa: My honourable friends do not want me to ask positive questions. They want to dwell only on negative questions.

An Hon. Senator: That's right.

Senator Bosa: Would the minister also care to comment on the decrease in the rate of inflation announced this morning in the statistics given for the month of June?

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I came prepared to answer a question of that nature, but, quite frankly, although I appreciate its coming from Senator Bosa, I really expected it to come from Senator Murray. I had expected that he would want me to comment today on the fluctuation that is taking place with respect to the value of the Canadian dollar, because he was consistently asking that question about two or three weeks ago.

It is true that, although the Canadian dollar has been fluctuating, the net result of that fluctuation has been a steady upward movement towards 80 cents. The latest word I have had is that it now stands at 79.52 cents.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is even up to 79.57 cents tonight, if you want to know.

Senator Olson: Inasmuch as Senator Murray did not ask the question, I am grateful to Senator Bosa for having done so.

Senator Bosa is also correct when he speaks about the inflation rate for June, as released today, showing a decline in the year-over-year inflation rate, it being down to 11.2 from 11.8 per cent in May. There are several aspects to this in which I am sure Senator Murray and Senator Flynn will be interested. One is that the Bank of Canada rate has moved downward. It is now at 16.17 per cent. The expectations in the market are that it will probably go down again this week. In the meantime there has been a lowering of the prime rate by two major American banks. The Manufacturers Bank and The First National have moved down from 16.5 to 16 per cent, and the Federal Reserve rate has moved from 12 to 11.5 per cent. I expect, therefore, that the opposition will be asking a number of questions on this matter during the course of the week, because they are important questions.

Senator Bosa: May I put a supplementary question to the minister? I appreciate the minister's response and his quotation of the statistics, but, in addition to what he has already said, could he tell us to what he attributes this dramatic decline in the rate of inflation and the aggressive increase in the value of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar?

Senator Flynn: He has already told you.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did attribute it to a direct matter with respect to the prime rate, but I expect that, if you were going to look for the real reason behind all of these favourable changes—

An Hon. Senator: MacEachen's budget.

Senator Olson: —you would cite the budget and the demonstrated determination of this government, in spite of the opposition—

An Hon. Senator: American policy!

Senator Olson: —to lower the inflation rate in this country; and that, of course, is the primary, fundamental prerequisite for the lowering of interest rates and a lot of other things at the same time.

● (2040)

Hon. R. James Balfour: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of State for Economic Development? In light of the very encouraging comments he has made, will he amplify his remarks to the point of providing us with an estimate, say within one or two percentage points over the next six months and over the next 12 months, of what the rate of inflation will be at December 31, 1982 and at June 30, 1983, as well as an estimate of the value of the Canadian dollar on those dates?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, to take that question seriously, of course, would require a great deal of explanation, insofar as inflation and price movements that affect our domestic prices are, in fact, beyond our borders and, therefore, are beyond our control, although not beyond our attempting to have some influence on them.

Insofar as the domestic market is concerned, and insofar as the federal government has the authority, without moving to price and wage controls in all of their forms, we have determined that by the beginning of 1983 we will have many factors in the inflationary calculation down to 6 per cent.

That is the target, and we have shown, I think rather firmly, that it is the government's determination to reach that level. Whether all the other factors or components of the CPI will get down to that level by that time, of course, is impossible to predict.

Certainly the government has shown leadership. The government intends to be firm in that leadership in getting those things which we have already announced down from wherever they were, or wherever they might have been, to the 6 per cent level. That will have a very salutary effect on the inflation rate.

Senator Balfour: Is my honourable friend saying that the government has no number, even within two percentage points?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what my honourable friend knows very well is that we have set a good example. We have received a great deal of favourable response from the private sector and some of the other decision makers, such as the provincial governments, and so forth. We have not received as enthusiastic a response from other sectors. I am not complaining about that, because, quite frankly, things have moved rather significantly.

The level to which inflation, with all the components in the CPI, which I explained a minute ago, would respond to this depends largely on the Canadian public's response at all levels. That, of course, is something that cannot be scientifically measured to the point where one can give figures at this time as to what the inflation rate will be in six or 12 months, but I can say that the responses we have received so far have been satisfactory, and we hope that that will continue to be the case so that all sectors will join with us in getting to the target we have set for January 1, 1983.

BUDGETARY DEFICIT—CALCULATION OF ANNUAL INFLATION RATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, speaking of examples that the government is setting for the country, will the minister state whether the government has in its possession any information from the Department of Finance, subsequent to the presentation of Mr. MacEachen's budget a while ago, indicating that the budgetary deficit for this fiscal year will be even higher than the amount forecast by the Minister of Finance a short time ago?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I do not have any information that would lead me to that conclusion. I suppose that it depends on the assumptions one makes and what some of those assumptions are relating to the level of economic activity in this country.

I think we have a mixed blessing, in that we have some automatic compensators in this country that are highly desirable to remove or diminish the distress that is involved in economic downturns, and, of course, that has a direct effect on budgetary deficits. On the other side of the ledger, it is also a fact that those automatic compensators also cut in to reduce the deficit rather significantly if there is an upswing in the economy. I think that that is something that Canada and Canadians, and particularly this party, which has been in government while a lot of these matters were put in place, consider of great value to this country.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my question is whether, in fact, the government and its advisers in the Department of Finance have been counting our mixed blessings and, whether, as a result of counting our mixed blessings, they are arriving at a deficit figure well in excess of $20 billion for the budgetary deficit in this fiscal year. Perhaps it is closer to $24 billion as a result of counting the mixed blessings to which the minister referred.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Shame!

Senator Olson: That is the kind of activity the opposition normally engages in, but I did answer that question in the first two sentences of my reply.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Assuming that the minister is correct in his assumption and his hope that the rate of inflation will be around 6 per cent on January 1, 1983—

Senator Olson: I didn't say that.

Senator Flynn: You just said it. What did you say then?

Senator Olson: What I said was that that is the target for the federal government—

Senator Flynn: I know, but you said you would be close to the target.

Senator Olson: I said that for all of these areas, including salaries and wages and, to the extent that we have influence on them, prices, that is the target, and that is where we will be in that sector by January 1, 1983, but my honourable friend—

Senator Flynn: That is what I said.

Senator Olson: —knows that the CPI is not measured on government or government administered prices only.

Senator Flynn: I didn't say it was.

Senator Olson: He said that I had said that our target is to have all the component parts of the CPI down to 6 per cent or less by 1983, but I did not say that.

Senator Asselin: It is a very easy answer.

Senator Flynn: Assuming what you say is correct—

Senator Olson: It always is.

Senator Flynn: —would you say that the rate of unemployment will improve accordingly, or, if not, what will it be?

Senator Olson: One thing that this government is convinced of is that there is a proper scenario to being helpful in correcting the economic problems that we have. What we have consistently said is that inflation pressure needs to decrease first. We are firmly on the way to reaching that goal. We hope that following that we will have a reduction in interest rates which, obviously, is going to stimulate a lot of investment and the employment that goes with it. We do not know whether all of that will be in place because there is a bit of a time lag between each one, but certainly we are on the right track in providing or, at least, leading in doing things that will lead to the kind of economic activity that will lower unemployment rates very significantly.

Senator Asselin: That will be because of American policies.

Senator Flynn: Is the minister saying that we cannot expect any improvement in the unemployment situation until there is a drop in inflation and interest rates?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what I said was that—

Senator Flynn: What you said was—what?

Senator Olson: What I said was that inflation and interest rates and all related things that are involved leading to investment—

Senator Asselin: All hypotheses.

Senator Olson: —are extremely important—indeed, of major importance—but I could reiterate for my honourable friend if he has not already heard a number of direct employment—

Senator Flynn: If you have nothing else to say, I don't need any further reply.

Senator Olson: Well, I think if you asked the question seriously you are entitled to a serious reply.

Senator Flynn: I asked the question seriously and I expect a serious reply, not a repetition of vague, nonsensical things.

Senator Olson: I thought perhaps, from the way the question was put, that my honourable friend had not been made aware of all the other initiatives that have been taken to reduce unemployment, but if he already knows them, then I shall not repeat them.

Senator Murray: Give us a list of the mega-projects.

Hon. R. James Balfour: How about Alsands?

Senator Asselin: What about government expenditures?

Hon. Jack Marshall: If all these great things are happening, why are there 1,250,000 unemployed. Why is the country as degraded and deteriorated as it is? If everything is so great, where in hell are the jobs that you are going to produce?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows or, at least, he ought to know—

Senator Asselin: It is American policy.

Senator Olson: —that there are a number of actions in terms of economic activity that automatically follow other actions. My honourable friend probably knows that there is a tremendous amount of work to be done in economic development in all regions of this country.

Senator Flynn: It should have been done a long time ago.

Senator Asselin: The same old story.

Senator Olson: It is being impeded now by high—

Senator Flynn: Too little too late!

Senator Olson: —rates of interest and a lowering of the demand in the international market. We believe that some of the action that we have taken now is the most important action possible leading to recovery in that situation.

Senator Asselin: Do admit your errors sometime.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Marshall: Who caused it?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Could the minister tell us his estimation, as he goes through the scenario, of how many Canadians will be out of work? How many Canadians will be looking for jobs by the time he reaches the end of the scenario that he outlined for us, including the time lags between the battling of the inflation bit and then the downgrading of the interest rates, and then, eventually, the providing of jobs for Canadians? How many Canadians will be completely out of work by the time that happens?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, we do not need to get to the end of anything. When there is an improvement in those things that I have been talking about—when inflation starts to back off, which I think it is going to, and interest rates start to move down, there could be some gradual improvements starting very soon. We do not need to wait until 1983 or 1984.

Senator Asselin: When will it be?

Senator Doody: It seems to me that the minister said a few minutes ago that in order to take pressure off the inflation rate, and in order to take pressure off the economy, then this unemployment factor has to take a significant toll before the economy turns around. Is there a bottom line below which the government is not prepared to go in terms of unemployment in combatting inflation and interest rates? What is the expendable number in terms of unemployed Canadians?

Senator Olson: The opposition may have some number in mind. This government does not have one. Indeed, if it did have one, it would have been triggered a long time ago because several weeks or months ago this government took some positive action to ameliorate that situation.

Senator Asselin: There are more than a million unemployed people in this country.

Senator Flynn: If the minister is so confident about the efficacy of the measures taken by the government, would he tell us why he did not bring in these measures about two years ago?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not know if one wants to spend a great deal of time on—

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Olson: —what was not done yesterday. I guess that is fun, but it is never very practical in my terms. Of course, there was a very different international economic situation two years ago and, indeed, there are some areas where there has been almost a 180-degree change in the requirements there.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Do you have any more nonsense to tell us?

Senator Olson: That's not nonsense, but fact.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is the minister aware that Dr. MacIntosh, President of the Canadian Bankers' Association, and Dr. Thomas Courchene, Professor of Economics of Western University—two of the more eminent economists in this country—in testimony before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance stated that if the consumer price index in Canada were constructed using the same methodology by which it is constructed in the United States the inflation rate in Canada—

Senator Flynn: That question has been asked and replied to before.

Senator Everett:—would be 3 to 4 per cent less than that shown at the present time? Has that fact been taken into account in the formulation of government policy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am aware that there is a significant difference between the calculation in Canada and in the United States. In one of my delayed answers that I will give in a few minutes in response to a question from Senator Bosa, I will have some explanation of that.

• (2100)

I was not aware that those two eminent gentlemen had, very recently, made those comments. However, I am certainly interested, and I will refer this to those people in government who make recommendations respecting the calculation of the inflation rate because I think that is useful information to have.

Senator Everett: I will be pleased to send the minister a copy of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance containing their comments.

Senator Doody: I would ask a supplementary question of the minister subsequent to Senator Everett's question.

If the inflation rate in Canada is, in fact, four percentage points lower than it really is in terms of the American rate, why then is the interest rate in Canada as high as it is in terms of the American rate? Surely, it should be proportionately lower. If that is so, how do we still explain the unemployment rate in Canada?

Senator Olson: The interest rate in Canada is as high as it is at the moment because, if we had a significantly lower interest rate—this, by the way, has been explained many times—than in the United States, we would have an exodus of capital from this country, which the government feels is undesirable.

Senator Doody: What the government is saying, in effect, is that the inflation rate in Canada is not four percentage points lower than the American rate, and that it is actually what it is.

Senator Olson: We are not saying that at all. That is a complete misinterpretation of what Senator Everett has said, although the honourable senator can speak for himself.

Senator Flynn: Let him speak for himself.

I have a question for Senator Everett as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which was referred the subject matter of Bill C-124.

If he is satisfied that our rate of inflation is only about 7 or 8 per cent, will he ask the minister, or whoever appears before the committee, whether we really require passage of Bill C-124 which has a target of only 6 per cent because we want to achieve that rate of inflation? In that event, this bill is not required, and I am quite sure that Senator Everett will want to make that point in committee.

Senator Everett: The honourable senator raises an interesting point. What I am saying, and what the witnesses said, including Dr. Courchene who is one of the leading economists in Canada and who, incidentally, was a Conservative candidate in the last election—

Senator Asselin: It does not matter.

Senator Everett: It does matter; he is not necessarily on the government's side.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): He may be a good economist in spite of that.

Senator Everett: The fact is that there is a statistical difference between the way the two consumer price indices are constructed.

The opposition often asks why our inflation rate is so much higher than the American inflation rate. The fact is that, if we constructed our consumer price index on the same basis, we would show it to be three or four percentage points less than what it is on the basis on which we do construct it.

Senator Flynn: Then we would not need all these measures.

Senator Everett: On the contrary, labour unions and others looking at the way we construct our CPI tend to demand higher rates of increases in pay. In fact, it was Dr. Courchene, appearing before the committee, who recommended that the government should act to restrain increases in the wages of its own employees. That was Dr. Courchene's own recommendation.

Senator Flynn: But the government says the inflation rate is 12 per cent; it should be brought down to 6 per cent, so what do you do with that?

Senator Marshall: What are the poverty-stricken going to do with that?

Senator Murray: I should like to ask Senator Everett, in his capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, what inferences he draws for public policy from the statements he has just quoted to the Senate.

The Chairman of the National Finance Committee, next to Gerald Bouey, is one of the most ardent defenders of the monetarist policies of the Bank of Canada. I would like to know what inferences he draws, in terms of monetary policy, with respect to government fiscal policy. Ought it to be more expansionist, if we accept the evidence the honourable chairman has just quoted to us?

Senator Everett: The inference I draw from those points is that the inflation rate in Canada is coming down a great deal faster than the opposition will admit.

Senator Perrault: You should be cheering.

Senator Everett: The government is being a great deal more successful in its policies than the opposition will admit.

Senator Flynn: If it is, it was because it was very high indeed.

Senator Perrault: Success just flattens the opposition

Senator Smith: I suppose you could bring it down by changing the method of calculation.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was looking for a suitable opportunity to change the subject and ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the Post Office.

Under the statute that governs its operations, the Post Office is authorized to prepare a regulation which will define for us what a "letter" is in terms of the Post Office operation. The definition of "letter" is, of course, exceedingly important because, based on it the Post Office erected a monopoly of service.

Under the statute, the Post Office is instructed to solicit the views of the general public or anyone interested, and that it is proceeding to do. However, as far as I know, the statute says nothing about publicity.

Therefore, I have two questions to ask the Leader of the Government: First, will he undertake to make available to the general public the contents of the representations that are made to the Post Office in respect of the definition of "letter;" and, second, I would appreciate an undertaking from the government that, before the Governor in Council approves of this regulation, there will be a parliamentary opportunity to examine the definition proposed by the Post Office and to allow Parliament to have some expression of its view and its opinion in respect of what this definition of what is, in effect, a monopoly position really ought to be in the best interests of the Canadian people as a whole?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED CONVERSION OF MIRABEL AIRPORT TO CANADIAN FORCES BASE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to give notice of a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with an excellent article in the Montreal Gazette which suggests that Mirabel Airport might be turned into a Canadian Forces base.

Would the Leader of the Government ascertain from the Minister of National Defence if that is a consideration which is being studied, and report back to the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

[Senator Perrault.]

THE BUDGET

ASSISTANCE TO WEST COAST FISHERMEN

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question raised on July 7 by Senator Williams related to federal assistance to west coast fishermen.

Since it is a fairly lengthy answer, if it is agreed I will file it with the Hansard reporters and have it taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators will be happy to know that in the Budget of June 28, 1982, the federal government allocated $400 million under the Small Business Investment Grant in order to reduce interest costs by up to 4 percentage points for two years on borrowings by small business, farmers and fishermen to finance new investments and research and development. (This grant will be adjusted in cases where, together with any other assistance available, the interest on the loan would be less than 12 per cent.)

Both small business corporations and unincorporated enterprises that carry on an active business in Canada are eligible under the program (inclusive of B.C. Indian fishermen).

Loans to small businesses by financial institutions will qualify for the new assistance program if they are used after June 28, 1982 and before March 31, 1983 for the following purposes:

- Financing purchases of new depreciated property to be used in active business in Canada.
- Financing expenditures on scientific research.

THE ECONOMY

ALSANDS PROJECT—REFINERY CAPACITY IN EASTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised on July 6 by Senator Roblin relating to the proposed Montreal central heavy fuel oil upgrader.

I ask that this answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Carmont project has been under consideration by industry for some time. The advantages of such a project were noted in the October 1980 National Energy Program report. In the "National Energy Program: Update 1982" report, published on May 31 of this year, it was further noted that the Government remains committed to consult with the industry to find the appropriate approach in light of present forecasts for petroleum product demand.

On June 29 of this year in order to improve the economic viability of the project, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources offered to recommend to his colleagues that a federal grant of $200 million be made to the Carmont project, divided equally over a five-year period, starting in 1983.

The Carmont project originally had as participants, B.P. Canada, Gulf Canada, Petro-Canada, Shell Canada, Société québécoise d'initiatives pétrolières (SOQUIP) and Texaco Canada. Shell announced its withdrawal from the consortium on May 28. On June 30, after analyzing the results of Carmont's investigations, B.P. and Texaco decided not to continue their participation. Gulf, Petro-Canada, and SOQUIP decided to maintain their participation in Carmont for at least a further 60 days and the upgrader project is now being re-examined in the light of recent developments.

The advantages of upgrading Canada's excess supplies of heavy fuel oil have been well demonstrated as a means of making more efficient use of domestic oil and reducing oil import dependence.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer in response to a question raised by Senator Doody on July 7 and July 9 relating to the existence of a consultant's report justifying the price that Petro-Canada paid for the purchase of Petrofina shares.

I am advised by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources that the government has no knowledge of such a report. Any report that may have been obtained by Petro-Canada would be a matter of proprietary information.

Honourable senators, I have a another delayed answer in reply to a question raised on July 7 by Senator Balfour relating to the Canadian ownership charge. It is a quite lengthy reply so perhaps it can be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The amounts received in respect of the Canadian ownership charge are credited to the Canadian Ownership Account and the share purchase of, and property acquisition from, Petrofina are charged against it. When the purchase is completed, a decision will be taken concerning the Canadian ownership charge.

Expenditures can be made out of the Canadian Ownership Account to finance acquisitions on the authority of the Governor-in-Council, subject to a procedure of negative or affirmative resolution*. Thus Parliament has authority to scrutinize expenditures from the Canadian Ownership Account through the means of negative or affirmative resolution.

*Bill C-103, Clause 39, section 65.27:

This section makes the decision to spend monies from the Canadian Ownership Account to increase Canadian public ownership of the oil and gas industry in Canada subject to a procedure of negative or affirmative resolution by Parliament.

This procedure is as follows:

—The Order subject to the procedure of negative/affirmative resolution is laid before Parliament not later than the fifteenth sitting day of Parliament after it is made.

—The Order come into force on the twentieth sitting day of Parliament after it has been laid before Parliament unless before that time a Motion to the effect that the Order be confirmed (affirmative resolution) or revoked (negative resolution) is filed with the Speaker of the House of Commons.

—A Motion for negative resolution can only be filed if no Motion for affirmative resolution has been filed. It requires the signature of not less than thirty Members of the House of Commons.

—A Motion for affirmative resolution is filed by a Minister.

—Where a Motion for affirmative resolution is filed, if the House does not adopt the Motion, the Order is revoked.

—Where a Motion for affirmative resolution is adopted by the House, the Senate will have an opportunity to look at the Order. If the Senate concurs with the House, the Order will come into force. If the Senate does not concur with the House, the Order is revoked.

Where a Motion for negative resolution is filed, if the House adopts the Motion, the Order is revoked.

—Where a Motion for negative resolution is filed, if the House does not adopt the Motion the Order comes into force on the fifth sitting day after the failure of the House to adopt the Motion unless before that day a Motion to the effect that the Order be revoked is filed with the Speaker of the Senate. The Motion must be signed by not less than fifteen Senators.

Where there is a dissolution or prorogation of Parliament, an Order that has been laid before Parliament, but that has not come into force, is revoked.

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer to a question raised on June 16 by Senator Roblin who asked for trade-related figures in relation to the volume of business Canada does with other countries, especially the United States.

It is a fairly long answer including some tables. If honourable senators agree, I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In the table below, price indices are shown for the Canadian dollar in terms of the U.S. dollar, in terms of other Group of Ten currencies, and in terms of total Group of Ten currencies. These indices are geometrically weighted by 1971 bilateral trade shares. The Group of Ten includes Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, Sweden, the U.K. and the U.S.; Switzerland is also associated.

PRICES INDICES OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

| Average for Period: | In U.S. | In Other G-10 | In Total G-10 |
|------------------------|------------|------------------|------------------|
| 1976 | 102.4 | 102.6 | 102.5 |
| 1977 | 95.0 | 92.8 | 94.5 |
| 1978 | 88.6 | 75.2 | 85.6 |
| 1979 | 86.2 | 69.5 | 82.4 |
| 1980 | 86.4 | 67.9 | 82.1 |
| 1981 | 84.2 | 75.7 | 82.3 |
| Jan. 1981 | 84.8 | 66.3 | 80.5 |
| Feb. 1981 | 84.2 | 69.0 | 80.8 |
| Mar. 1981 | 84.8 | 70.3 | 81.5 |
| Apr. 1981 | 84.8 | 72.3 | 82.0 |
| May 1981 | 84.1 | 74.9 | 82.1 |
| June 1981 | 83.9 | 77.5 | 82.5 |
| July 1981 | 83.4 | 80.0 | 82.6 |

| Sept. 1981 | 84.1 | 80.5 | 83.3 |
| Oct. 1981 | 84.0 | 79.4 | 83.0 |
| Nov. 1981 | 85.0 | 78.4 | 83.6 |
| Dec. 1981 | 85.2 | 78.5 | 83.8 |
| Jan. 1982 | 84.7 | 79.4 | 83.5 |
| Feb. 1982 | 83.2 | 80.6 | 82.6 |
| Mar. 1982 | 82.7 | 81.8 | 82.6 |
| Apr. 1982 | 82.4 | 82.8 | 82.5 |
| May 1982 | 81.8 | 80.0 | 81.5 |
| June 1982 | 79.2 | 81.2 | 79.6 |

UNEMPLOYMENT—TRANSFER OF 300 JOBS TO UNITED STATES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers in response to a number of questions raised on June 22 by Senator Charbonneau and Senator Godfrey relating to the transfer of any research and development activities of Ayerst, McKenna to the United States. The answer is three pages long and I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Ayerst, McKenna and Harrison Ltd. was founded by Canadian businessmen in 1925. The company was sold to American Home Products Corporation, a U.S. company, in 1943, and has been a wholly-owned subsidiary of that company ever since.

Ayerst has carried on research since the early years of the company, and long before it was taken over in 1943, although its present facility at St. Laurent was established in 1944.

It has been suggested by some that section 41(4) of the Patent Act has lessened the incentive for pharmaceutical companies to do drug research in Canada. But drug companies, in assessing the potential costs and benefits of research, examine the possibilities for marketing the fruits of their research throughout the world. Canada itself accounts for only some 2 per cent of the world drug market and the level of patent protection available for Canadian inventions in the major foreign markets does not depend on the level of patent protection which Canada provides; rather it is determined according to the principle of national treatment, which means that Canadian inventions receive the same level of patent protection in foreign countries as is given to nationals of those countries. The impact of Canadian patent law on the global profitability of Canadian R&D is therefore minimal.

Bill C-102 was enacted in 1969 to curb the over-charging for drugs which had occurred prior to that time, and to stimulate competition in the Canadian drug market. The bill was preceded by several enquiries into drug prices which concluded that over-charging was, in fact, taking place largely because drug companies were shielded from effective competition by the high level of patent protection provided under the then existing law. These enquiries canvassed a number of possible solutions, including the outright abolition of pharmaceutical patents. In the end the compulsory licensing solution, recommended by the parliamentary committee on drug prices (the Harley Committee) was chosen.

It should be noted that most other industrialized countries do have drug price restraint mechanisms in place, although they may not depend, as Canada's system does, on a free marketplace supported by licensing.

For the Canadian pharmaceutical industry profitability levels have been maintained relative to other industrial sectors. On the other hand, Canadian drug consumers have benefited substantially from compulsory licensing, both as private purchasers of drugs and through their participation in public medicare programs whose costs have been kept lower than would have been the case without compulsory licensing.

There are many reasons why Ayerst may have decided to close down its Montreal research operation. The decision could have been triggered by the high level of personal taxation imposed on its professional staff in Quebec, and by other difficulties in doing business there which have led other companies in other sectors to leave Montreal. It could also have resulted from the current economic recession which has led many companies to curtail "non-essential" expenditures. Such cost cutting tends to be especially severe for subsidiaries when their foreign parents move to restrict expenditures. You must remember that the law in question had been in force for some 13 years before the decision was taken.

Finally, in assessing the R & D environment in Canada one must remember the 150 per cent tax write-off under the Income Tax Act for incremental R & D. That more than compensates for the provisions of section 41.

ENERGY

JUNIOR OIL COMPANIES' PRODUCTION—PROPOSED PRICE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised on June 10 by Senator Charbonneau relating to the proposed price for the production of two junior oil companies. It, too, is a fairly long answer and I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

"The National Energy Program: Update 1982" stipulates that the New Oil Reference Price (NORP) will be made available, as of January 1, 1983, on oil wells that have been suspended for a period of at least 3 years, provided the production from these wells qualifies for new oil royalties. The oil royalties qualification is determined by the province in which the oil well occurs.

Other measures announced in the NEP Update publication designed to improve the position of higher cost sources of oil include the following:

- New Oil Reference Price for existing tertiary recovery projects
- Earned depletion for tertiary recovery projects
- New Oil Reference Price for experimental projects
- Reduction in rate of PGRT for synthetic oil production from oil sands plants

These measures are set out on pages 74 and 75 of the Update publication.

Furthermore, since the September 1, 1981 energy agreement with Alberta, the Government of Canada has included the introduction of a Low Productivity Well Allowance for wells having a small production. These special measures, and the incentives announced in the NEP Update, are directed in particular to the small oil companies. They are additional to the 3 principal measures which will also be of particular assistance to small producers, namely the reduction in the rate of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax (PGRT), the reduction of the Incremental Oil Revenue Tax (IORT), and the special price for oil discovered after 1973.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

LIAISON BETWEEN MINISTRY OF STATE AND FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS OFFICE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, this delayed answer is in response to a question raised on March 2 by Senator Murray, relating to the respective roles of liaison officers of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office and those of federal economic development co-ordinators in MSERD. It is a fairly long answer and I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The Coordinator is the senior federal government economic development official in the region and will:

- Help coordinate the activities of other government departments in the field;
- Promote cooperative and joint planning with the provincial government;
- Consult business, labour and municipal governments;
- Feed regional considerations into the Cabinet decision-making process; and
- Help transmit government policy back to the regions.

To facilitate this essential consultation, the Coordinator will serve as the chairman of an interdepartmental committee and will encourage departments to ensure that economic strategies, policies and programs are well understood throughout the region and are integrated right down to the level at which they impact on individual communities.

Insofar as the role of the Liaison Officer reporting to the Federal-Provincial Relations Office is concerned, it is important to recall the broad objectives of FPRO:

- (a) to assist the Prime Minister in his overall responsibility for federal-provincial relations;
- (b) to provide Cabinet with greater assistance in examining federal-provincial issues of current and long-term concern; and
- (c) to assist in developing federal-provincial consultation on an increasing range of policy fronts.

In view of the increasing need to ensure that the full range of national policies and programs are sensitive to regional conditions and concerns as appropriate, and in order to fulfill the mandate of FPRO as set out above, the liaison officers of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office, now based in Ottawa, will be located in the provincial capitals before the end of this year.

NEWFOUNDLAND

DEVELOPMENT OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on May 5 by Senator Marshall relating to the government's policy with regard to oil exploration off the shore of Newfoundland. Again, I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

As honourable senators will recall, the Minister of Justice announced on May 19 that the federal government had filed a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for an early decision on who owns the seabed resources in the Hibernia area offshore Newfoundland. The case is scheduled to be heard on November 29 of this year.

The prospects for Hibernia are very promising and close to commercial production but development will require heavy investment that can only come within an established regime. The major oil companies need a firm legal basis as to which level of government has jurisdiction.

In his May 19th letter, the Prime Minister suggested to the Premier of Newfoundland "that this issue (ownership) could be set aside for the purpose of negotiating an agreement on co-operation resource management and revenue sharing. I was convinced that our two governments should be able to reach an honourable agreement to which both would commit themselves regardless of the outcome of any court ruling on ownership."

THE ECONOMY

CALCULATION OF ANNUAL INFLATION RATE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have one other delayed answer in response to a question raised on May 26 by Senator Bosa, relating to the calculation of the inflation rate in Canada and in the United States. The answer is two pages long and outlines in some detail the differences as to how these indices are calculated. I ask that it, too, be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

In general, the consumer price index concept is similar in Canada and the U.S. There are, of course, some differences.

In Canada, the CPI basket of goods and services has just been updated in the April 1982 release to reflect 1978 expenditure patterns to replace the old 1974 patterns. Meanwhile, the U.S. CPI continues to make use of 1972 expenditure patterns to represent the relative importance of various components in the CPI.

| | Canada | U.S. |
|--------------------------|---------|---------|
| | 1978 | 1972 |
| | Weights | Weights |
| Food | 21.1 | 17.7 |
| Housing | 35.4 | 43.9 |
| Owned-Accommodation | 13.1 | 23.0 |
| Clothing | 9.5 | 5.8 |
| Transportation | 16.3 | 18.0 |
| Health and Personal Care | 3.7 | 5.0 |
| Other | 14.0 | 9.6 |

One of the major conceptual differences in the CPI between the countries is the treatment of the housing component or more particularly owned-accommodation costs. In the U.S., the index is constructed on the assumption that the purchase of a new house and the financing of a mortgage is carried out by owners every month. In comparison, the Canadian index is constructed on the more credible assumption that only a fraction of homeowners buy a house in a month and the mortgage interest costs in effect for a given month is a weighted average of rates over the past five years. The U.S. treatment of owned-accommodation costs is partly responsible for the large relative importance of housing costs and builds considerable volatility into the U.S. CPI.

There are a number of ways that the consumer price index has been used to measure the rate of inflation at annual rates and the suitability of the various measures depends on the questions they are intended to answer. In Canada, the general focus appears to be on the year-over-year rate while in the U.S. the press often quotes the annualized month-to-month inflation rate.

The year-over-year rate is the measure of actual inflation over the course of the year. It is, in effect, a twelve-month cumulative rate. For example, in Canada, on a year-over-year basis the CPI increased 11.3 per cent between April 1981 and April 1982. Similarly, the U.S. CPI increased 6.6 per cent in April on a year-over-year basis. The seasonally adjusted month-to-month annual rate is a measure of what the year-over-year rate would be twelve months hence if the latest month's price change were to be obtained in each of the next twelve months. The presence of random and special factors and the magnification of these factors at annual rates makes this an inappropriate measure of annual inflation.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question arising out of one of the minister's replies respecting whether or not the government had any documents that were provided it by advisers or by others with respect to the purchase price of Petrofina. I understood the minister to say that the government did not have any such document. Then, however, he went on to leave the impression that Petro-Canada may have had some advice of that kind. I asked the minister whether Petro-Canada had been asked whether they had received that kind of information.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator is quite right. The answer does not say whether or not they were asked. The answer does say, however, that any report that may have been obtained by Petro-Canada would be a matter of proprietary information. I can ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to put the question and to perhaps give some additional information, if that is available, on whether or not it would be within the bounds of propriety to release that information.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is the point that attracted my attention; namely, the minister's statement that this was proprietary information that was not likely to be made available to Parliament. I wonder if that is really the position that the honourable minister maintains. It seems to me that, if there is to be any degree of accountability of these crown corporations to Parliament, this might well be a case where some accounting is required.

After all, one of the largest financial adventures put in hand by any crown corporation was the purchase of Petrofina. Every consumer of gasoline in this country is paying for that purchase right now, to the tune of several cents per gallon in respect of every gallon of gasoline he buys. If we are to be told that information which bears on this point is proprietary, then what becomes of the doctrine of accountability to Parliament?

I ask my honourable friend whether he will give some consideration to this matter. It seems to me that if Petro-Canada check their records they will find that they have information as to what the value of Petrofina is. I think it is a matter of legitimate public interest to have that information, because the public has had to pay for it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could reaffirm the undertaking I gave a moment ago, and I could take into account what I suggest is the submission made by my honourable friend, but I do not think there is any point in repeating that I have already given an indication that I will make the inquiries.

Senator Roblin: I would like to take the question one step further. I appreciate the fact that the minister is now going to officially ask whether they have such information. My question, however, goes beyond that. I want to know if the minister is willing to produce it.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend will have to wait until I get a response regarding the other inquiries he has asked me to make.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The original question which was asked months ago, at the time of the takeover of Petrofina, was based on the fact that the minister told us at that time that the price of the shares which was arrived at was based upon a consultant's report. At that time it appeared to me and to other members of the Senate that that report must have been available, at least to the ministers who made the decision to buy the shares at that price through Petro-Canada. Whether the shares were purchased through any other body does not matter to me; it still involves taxpayers' money.

The original question was: Would the minister make that report available to the Senate? The minister undertook then to inquire as to whether that document could be made available.

On three other occasions I asked the same question. It really boils down to the original question, which is: Will the minister make that document available to the Senate and, through the Senate, to the people of Canada, whose money is being used to buy these shares? If not, why not?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not think that this question raises anything different from what was raised by Senator Roblin. Therefore, the previous reply applies equally to this question.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the Minister of State for Economic Development would indicate to me when he expects to be in a position to reply to the question I put some time ago regarding the change in tax morality standards which evidently occurred between the time certain tax incentive measures were introduced by the Liberal government and the budget proposals of November 1981 and June 1982?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): If the honourable senator will be kind enough to identify the date on which that question was asked, I will give him an undertaking that we will look into it. If he does not have that information available immediately, we can find it.

PUBLIC WORKS

NOVA SCOTIA—NORTH SYDNEY—DILAPIDATED STATE OF FEDERAL BUILDING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise in a spirit of freedom of information.

Hon. C. William Doody: Another first for him!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Watch out, there's a curve coming!

Senator Perrault: I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Muir on June 9 and June 17, 1982, concerning the repair of the federal building in North Sydney, Nova Scotia.

The following projects are in the works program for the fiscal year 1982-83: installation of a paraplegic ramp; installation of a paraplegic washroom; refurbishing of the main floor to include painting and floor coverings; installation of an elevator; roof revitalization—and I would point out that, rather than referring to restoration, the word is “revitalization”; and parking lot repairs. The total estimate of expenditures is $240,000, and the work is to commence subject to the availability of funds.

It is unknown at this time whether, in the future, buildings of this kind will be maintained by Public Works Canada or by Canada Post. However, in the interim, Public Works Canada will continue to maintain the buildings.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED GOVERNMENT GRANTS TO FIRST-TIME HOME
PURCHASERS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on June 15, 1982, concerning HUDAC recommendations of government grants to first-time home purchasers.

The Minister of Finance, in his budget of June 28, 1982, announced that $3,000 federal grants would be made available to first-time buyers of homes, both old and new, and to all buyers of new homes. This follows, in large part, the HUDAC recommendations which were alluded to by Senator Marshall in his question. Further, I am happy to say that HUDAC is very pleased with the housing provisions contained in the June 28 budget, and that public announcements have been made by that organization to that effect.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In his answer, the honourable senator failed to mention that people have to have a down payment before they can get the $3,000 grant. Where will they get a down payment today?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the full details of the federal program will be made available imminently. I hope that that question can be answered during our Question Period within the next few days.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED DELAY IN PROCESSING INCOME TAX RETURNS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Phillips on June 17, 1982, concerning an alleged delay in processing income tax returns.

There may have been a delay in Senator Phillips' case, but I can report that, as of the week ending June 25, 1982, 10,272,350 refund cheques, in the total dollar amount of $5,006,183,647, have been printed and mailed. This is estimated to be about 93 per cent of the refunds that are expected to be made this year.

THE CONSTITUTION

PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Asselin on October 27, 1981, concerning the constitutional information program in the province of Quebec.

The Minister of Justice, in a previous reply, indicated that the Canadian Unity Information Office had prepared the constitutional information campaign used in the province of Quebec. Senator Asselin then asked for the specific names of the officials who worked on the federal campaign.

As an experienced parliamentarian, Senator Asselin should know that it is the minister who shoulders the political responsibility for government actions carried out by many public servants. To bring the names of public servants working in the Canadian Unity Information Office into the political realm would be an abdication of responsibility by the Minister of Justice.

● (2120)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Why talk about ministerial responsibility? That's a thing of the past.

Senator Perrault: I therefore cannot supply the names of the public servants in response to Senator Asselin's original question.

Hon. Martial Asselin: We know who they are.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STATEMENTS BY LEADER OF GOVERNMENT IN THE SENATE AND PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Nurgitz on March 2, 1982, and by Senator Asselin on March 3, 1982, concerning co-operative federalism.

I think that the government's recent actions in the field of federal-provincial relations help define this government's attitude toward co-operative federalism. The consultative process arising from the recent budget is an example of this. Co-operative federalism in this case is a meaningful exchange of ideas between the private sector and labour, as well as provincial governments, taking into account these ideas in the formulation of national policy.

May I say that the conversations thus far have been very helpful, and very constructive, and there is no question at all but that a national consensus is developing in support of the program of restraint.

The constitutional conferences and constitutional committee hearings are also examples of the efforts of this government to achieve a degree of national consensus on issues.

In addition to this, honourable senators, many services at the federal level have been decentralized as well as given over to the provinces to be administered by them.

The degree of co-operation depends upon what is in the national interest. It is the primary responsibility of the federal government to uphold the national interest while taking account of both provincial and regional concerns in its policies.

This is what this government has endeavoured earnestly to do, namely, protect and serve the national interest while soliciting co-operation from provinces, the regions, the private sector, labour and other interest groups.

The explanation could go on much longer, but this, in capsule form, indicates the main lines of government policy.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Just file it. We have heard it before.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA TREATY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on May 19, 1982, Senator Marshall asked a question concerning what pressure Canada put on the United States to sign the Law of the Sea Convention.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, expressed Canada's "profound disappointment" with President Reagan's announcement that the United States will not sign the Law of the Sea Convention. The President said in a statement on July 9 that the Convention failed to meet objectives relating to seabed mining which he had set out prior to the eleventh and final negotiating session in New York. In a note delivered to the United States embassy on July 14, the Department of External Affairs pointed out that the Convention will not be open for signature until December. In these circumstances, Canada is convinced that the United States announcement at this time could undermine the Convention.

The note underlines the importance Canada attaches to consultations with the United States and other western countries on matters affecting our mutual economic, political and security interests. The fact that the U.S.A. announcement was made without adequate consultations is a matter of further concern to Canada. Indications that the convention is gaining increasing acceptance, even among states which abstained when it was adopted in New York, demonstrate the importance and utility of continuing close consultations, in particular among allies, on this subject of crucial national and international interest.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with regard to the note delivered on July 14 to the United States embassy, I should like to point out that in the voting at the Law of the Sea Conference there were 17 abstentions and four votes against. The important thing to note is that although those nations who voted against, or who abstained, appear small in numbers, they are nevertheless countries that produce more than 60 per cent of the world's GNP and provide more than 60 per cent of the contributions to the United Nations. Does the Honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate not consider that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be asked to comment further on those particularly important facts?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be apprized of Senator Marshall's comment, and efforts will be made to provide further information on this point.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

REPORTED ANNUAL RATE INCREASES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Last, honourable senators, but certainly not least, I come to a question asked by Senator Roblin on May 19, 1982, concerning information on federal expenditure growth for 1982-83.

Honourable senators, there are statistical tables in this reply. May I propose that the reply be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings?

That information was made available in the November 12, 1981, budget, but the figures have been updated in the June 28, 1982 budget. The requested information is provided in the table below. It should also be pointed out that the data treat both Canada Post and oil import/petroleum compensation on a perfectly consistent basis between years. For comparability, Canada Post is treated as if it were a crown corporation throughout. As has always been the case, the oil/petroleum compensation payments are net of revenue funds in the public accounts, while they are stated in gross terms in the national accounts.

| | 1981-82 | 1982-83 | % Change |

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, July 7, the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for the second reading of Bill S-29, to amend the Railway Act.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, on the last occasion when this bill was before the Senate I made some remarks indicating that I was not able to give the unanimous consent that was being asked for at the time, and detailed my reasons for not doing so. Briefly, those reasons were that up to that time the province from which I come, and to which I think I have a responsibility, had not given me, although I had asked for it, any definite indication that it had no objection to this bill. In fact, I suggested that there might be objections.

I am now informed by the Government of Nova Scotia that in view of all the circumstances they do not intend to press further any objection, and consequently I am not prepared to oppose the bill, or in any way impede its progress.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are three points I would like to put on record with regard to this bill, and they address some of the concerns that have arisen during the debate and during discussion elsewhere.

First, there was the question of the position of the provinces. I can say, as I think I mentioned in my comments when introducing this bill on second reading, that it has been around for some time. It is generally thought to provide for a desirable correction which would facilitate, as honourable senators will remember, the financing of rolling stock for the railways.

Five provinces have been supporting such a bill as this since 1980. Ontario and Saskatchewan however, had concerns on the ground of provincial jurisdiction with regard to property and civil rights. I have here, honourable senators, letters from both of those provinces in which they withdraw their concerns, and express as a reason for withdrawing them that they are convinced of the practical utility of this proposal.

Quebec, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia had made no formal response in connection with this bill, but I now have a formal response from Prince Edward Island. I have a document showing a response from Nova Scotia, and in addition to this we have the formal response of Nova Scotia delivered by Senator Smith this evening.

That, therefore, covers all of the provinces except Quebec. The position of Quebec is rather special, because Quebec has no provision for registry of such property, and has so far shown no interest in the bill from one point of view or the other. If we remember that aspect of the Quebec dimension, then, in effect, we have no objection from any of the provinces.

All of these considerations, honourable senators, I think, ought to be relevant with regard to whether there is any necessity for this bill to go to committee. I suggest that it is not necessary in that context.

Honourable senators, the second concern was in connection with ease of access to information from a central registry. On that point, the whole purpose of the amendment is to facilitate the gathering of information and to make it easier for provinces, or for anyone, who may be interested in acquiring such information, to get it from a central registry rather than having to check with every provincial registry.

The third concern, which was not raised in the Chamber, but which I think I should deal with for the satisfaction of honourable senators, concerns the question of collection of taxes. After consultation with experts in the Department of Finance and some private tax lawyers, no one has been able to identify a situation where a tax would be affected by this method of registration.

In the light of these considerations, honourable senators, I respectfully ask your support for second reading of this bill.

• (2130)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question regarding the position of Quebec? Do I understand that a letter was sent to the Attorney General of Quebec about this bill? How were replies obtained from the other provinces?

Senator Frith: As I understand it, over this period of some two years responses were requested from all of the provinces.

Senator Flynn: By letter?

Senator Frith: I am not sure whether it was by way of letter, telex or telephone contact between the attorneys general, or those concerned in the provinces, and the Department of Transport. However, all the confirmations were in writing, but I am not sure whether they were requested to be in writing.

Senator Flynn: Since there was no response from Quebec, I am wondering what interpretation we should put on the silence.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, no response has been received from Quebec, but for most types of transactions no registration procedures are available in that province, and it would appear that the Province of Quebec, unlike the other provinces, has not shown an interest in it for that reason. For example, Ontario and Saskatchewan for some time said they had reservations, and they only recently withdrew those reservations for that reason. We cannot force an answer from Quebec. This covers a period of some two years and, so far, Quebec has shown no interest in it. That is all I can say.

Senator Flynn: I agree with you.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Order of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, July 6, the debate on the motion of Senator Williams for second reading of Bill S-28, establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, it gives me a great deal of pleasure and, indeed, it is a privilege to participate in the debate on second reading of Bill S-28. The motion for second reading was moved on July 6 by Senator Williams and was seconded by Senator Willie Adams.

I am sorry to delay honourable senators. We have had a rather extended Question Period, which I believe in some areas was quite fruitful and in others not so fruitful. In any event, before I proceed to give the gist of my remarks, which will not take too long—and I am sure, because of my ability to hold an audience, no honourable senator will wish to leave, of course—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No way!

Senator Muir: Hear, hear. I love to applaud myself; I'm so modest. In any event, I should like to pay tribute to Senator Guy Williams, a man who has served his own people and others, and also this institution, well.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Muir: Senator Williams is an honorary Doctor of Laws of Simon Fraser University. He was President of the Native Brotherhood of British Columbia for 14 years. He has been chairman of the Fishermen's Co-op, and also—he will excuse me if I do not pronounce the name correctly—Ucluelet Fish Processing and Cold Storage. He is also a member of the Management Committee of the North Pacific Native Fishermen's Co-op, Port Simpson, B.C., and so on.

I give Senator Williams full marks and full credit for bringing forward Bill S-28.

I also wish to pay tribute to Senator Willie Adams. He was born at Fort Chimo; is Vice-President of the Rankin Inlet Hotel Association, a member of the Board of Directors of Panarctic Oils, Chairman of Rankin Hamlet, and so on. He has also distinguished himself in many and various ways, and did so by seconding the bill when it was introduced by Senator Williams.

I should like to read a little of the bill. Some honourable senators may ask, "Why is he reading it? It is all here. We know all about it." To those honourable senators I should say that I recently discovered that there are people who read Senate Hansard. There are people in the other place who read Hansard, but maybe there are more who read Senate Hansard. The bill says:

1. This Act may be cited as the Indian-Inuit Week Act.

2. Throughout Canada, in each and every year, the week beginning on Monday, Victoria Day, shall be kept and observed as "Indian-Inuit Week", and Sunday, the last day of Indian-Inuit Week, shall be kept and observed as "Inuit-Indian Day".

That may sound a little confusing. It did to me when Senator Williams read it on moving second reading. However, if honourable senators read it slowly, it will be understood quite clearly. The bill also says:

3. Indian-Inuit Week may also be called "Indian Week" or "Inuit Week", and Inuit-Indian Day may also be called "Inuit Day" or "Indian Day".

The Explanatory Note says:

The purpose of this bill is to designate a special week and day for the celebration, by Canada's first settlers, of their cultural heritage. This would also be an occasion for all Canadians to join with the Indians and Inuit in celebrating the Canadian mosaic.

Honourable senators, when Senator Williams moved second reading of this bill on July 6 he said:

Honourable senators, Bill S-28 is not new, particularly in this year of our Constitution newly brought over to Canada. There are senators in this Chamber who in 1966 took a principal part in the debate on the subject of celebrating an Indian Day. At that time the Honourable Robert Muir introduced a private member's bill in the other place. Another principal participant at that time was the Honourable Stanley Haidasz. Both are here with us today, and I am sure, in my heart, that they will again participate fully.

Well, I had planned on participating, and after an invitation like that, how could I resist?

Senator Williams, in the course of his remarks, outlined clearly the purpose of the bill. He spoke of the record of service of Indian veterans during the various wars in which Canada has been involved, and in this connection he paid tribute to those who had paid the supreme sacrifice during those wars. As he said, they fought and died for their country. He then quoted a moving lament by the late Chief Dan George. Honourable senators can look that up, and those who have not yet read it should get busy and look it up tomorrow.

Finally, Senator Williams said:

As many of you know, I believe that when this house adjourns for the summer I shall be leaving you. I do not think the house will sit before my birthday, though if it does I will be thankful. So this is part of my farewell. I do not believe that for my part I could do anything greater than try to make Bill S-28 a reality for my people and my colleague's people.

At that point he was referring to Senator Adams. He continued:

I hope it will go down in history as part of what we all dreamed when the struggle was on to bring the Constitution to Canada.

Further on he said:

The place to get things done by the federal government is in Ottawa.

I repeat. He said:

The place to get things done by the federal government is in Ottawa.

I plead and ask each and every one of you on both sides of the Chamber to vote in favour of this bill.

I also appeal to honourable senators on both sides of the Chamber to vote in favour of this bill.

Senator Adams, in seconding the motion for second reading, said:

There are 24,000 Inuits scattered across Canada, without counting our friends in Alaska and Greenland. Though some of us live in Greenland and Alaska, we think of ourselves as being one people.

● (2140)

I was surprised that Senator Williams referred to something I had done so long ago, because I did not think that people read Hansard. Let me tell you a little story about that. While driving around Victoria County on Cape Breton Island, when a member of the House of Commons, I would stop at the various houses, whether they were Liberal, Conservative or NDP. Of course, the NDP were scarce in my riding and it is my hope that they will continue to be so. In any event, I would drive up the driveway and knock on the door of any house. Usually the people would invite me in for a cup of tea, even though they might not be voting for me. On many occasions, these people would not only ask questions about what was going on in the House of Commons and the Senate, but questions about recent legislation passed in Congress in Washington. It might be an old gentleman who was farming, fishing or working around at different jobs. Of course, he was subscribing to the Congressional Record. So there are people who read more than Hansard.

[Senator Muir.]

In any event, Senator Williams did his research well. On April 20, 1966 I moved the following motion in the other place:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of appointing a day during the course of our centennial year as a "National Indian Day", to mark the presence among us of our first citizens and to recognize their outstanding contributions to our national life.

At that time I said that I did not want to say too much. Nor do I plan to say too much tonight. However, I do want to indicate that I endorse and support this bill wholeheartedly. The reason I said at that time in the other place that I would not take too long was because I wanted to give other members an opportunity to speak so that we could vote on the motion before the time limit on the debate was up.

There are probably not many throughout Canada who realize that several hundred thousands of Canadians are of Indian descent. In the years before and since nationhood, the Indians and Inuit, I feel, have been misused and abused by those of other origins who have had the responsibility of determining policies for our successive governments. There are those who would say that that is an old cliché, that it is great to get up and say these things and then sit down and forget about them. I am not saying what I have just said because it is something to say "that we are concerned about the Indians and Inuit and that we cry and bleed for them", and so on. I am not the type of person who would say such a thing if I did not mean it. I sincerely hold the views I have just expressed, and am expressing them now, regardless of the political stripe of the governments in power since Confederation.

Progress has been made and continues to be made, but it is not fast enough. It seems that at this stage in Canada's development—and we are really growing up—everyone wants to retain parts of their origin. For instance, the Scots love to dance around in their kilts. Then there are the Polish, Ukrainians, Italians and so on. I look at Senator Bosa and at other senators around me and think of what a wonderful thing it is that out of this meld and mix we have the best. But let us not forget the natives of this country who were here long before any of us and before our forefathers. I think we should pay these people every tribute and give them more recognition.

It has been my privilege since 1957—and I know that I look the same now as I did then, when I was first elected to the House of Commons—to be involved with the native peoples, particularly the Micmacs. Prior to being elected, I knew many of these people quite well and worked with them. The reservations were close by and I had many dealings with the Indian people. In fact, when I was a boy the reservation near the town of North Sydney was located on a hill. Senator Marshall, who came from Cape Breton but has since adopted Newfoundland—

Hon. Jack Marshall: But not from North Sydney.

Senator Muir: No, not North Sydney, but close to there. Glace Bay was your birthplace and your home.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: He was a Cape Bretoner.

Senator Muir: Yes, Senator McIlraith, he was and is a Cape Bretoner, and there is a difference even though there is a causeway there now. In any event, on that hill was the reservation, and the Indians lived in teepees.

What the native peoples have done for this country, for the people of this country and for themselves is exemplified by the fact that during World War I every eligible man of the Micmac tribe of Cape Breton Island volunteered to fight for his country in time of peril. Further, in World War II many of the Indian people from my constituency—I still have the habit of referring to “my constituency,” and it truly is my constituency, though, as many of you do, I receive letters from all over the nation. Of course, it is our job to act for all the regions of the country, but I cannot seem to lose the habit of referring to “my constituency.” In any event, I am glad to see that Senator Roblin and others agree with me. As Senator Williams said the other day, the Indians and Inuit served with distinction in our armed forces overseas.

It concerns me when I hear of the discrimination and neglect that these, our first people, have been forced to suffer during our years of nationhood. It is not uncommon to hear people say, “Indians are lazy and slovenly. They do not want to work and they drink more than other people.” I do not believe that at all. There are many places I could take you to in this country where you will find people of all races and nationalities who are lazy and slovenly and who drink more than they should. So let us not point our fingers and look down our noses, or should I say long noses, and condemn others for what they do. It is neither right nor fair. I have heard such things said by white people, and I always come to the defence of the Indian people. I condemn that line of thinking and I condemn those who say such things.

Senator Williams has gone further than I went in 1966. He has proposed a week, whereas I proposed a day. In either case this recognition will in no way eliminate the inequities which exist in our nation with regard to the Indians. But it would, I believe, pay honour and give recognition to the native peoples and focus public attention on the tremendous contributions which Indians and Inuit have made towards the development of our country. I am not merely suggesting that we have a national apple day or a national apple pie week or anything such as what exists over the border in this regard. I would not be surprised to learn that there is a national hair cut day or a national tobacco day in the United States. Too many such days ruin the meaning of the more important ones. I suggest that we have a truly national Indian and Inuit day and a week in which all the people of Canada recognize our Indian and Inuit brothers in a proper manner.

Senator Williams suggests that we have a week set aside in recognition of the Indians and Inuit. This recognition will not remedy the lack of housing or the problems which still exist with our native peoples, but we must all work together, including both the federal and provincial governments, to remedy some of the sad and unfortunate situations that still exist among our native peoples.

A host of people may ask, “Well, what did the natives contribute?” In fact, it is not generally well known that they have contributed much of significance. That is partly because there is a tendency on the part of the natives to hide their light under a bushel. A biblical scholar like Senator Macquarrie might find a more aphoristic quotation from the Douay version or the King James version or the Revised Standard version, but the fact is that they do hide their light under a bushel. Personally, I don’t think they should do that. I think they should shout from the rooftops what they have done and the significant contributions they have made.

Unfortunately, if one were to inquire of most Canadians their opinion of the status of the Indians and Inuit, they would probably indicate that according to their understanding the Indians and the Inuit are a drain on the federal treasury, and a problem they would like to eliminate, if only someone could suggest an easy solution that does not cost too much money or take too much time. That attitude is not in keeping with the facts. We need only look at the kind of men the Indian population of this nation has produced, but, as I have already said, some people would like to cover that up.

Some time ago I saw some figures that indicated that for every dollar spent on our native people it costs $6 to administer it through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I hope that is not correct, but I understood that to be official at the time. I would be the happiest person in the world if it turned out to be incorrect.

Let me just mention a few of the great natives of this nation. They have represented their people in all walks of life, including the Senate, the House of Commons and various provincial legislatures. For example, Senator Gladstone was a member of this Chamber, having once been an outstanding leader in Alberta. Mr. Frank Howard, about whom I will say more later, was the honourable member for Skeena in the House of Commons. In the British Columbia legislature we had Frank Calder. I am sure some present today will recall Dr. G. C. Monture, who was a distinguished civil servant and world authority on mineral resources development. You may also recall Jack Beaver, who was a nuclear engineer, and Leonard S. Marchand, who was a Cabinet minister.

I could go on and on, honourable senators, but let me just mention a few more of these great Canadians. Dr. Ahab Spence, a clergyman, was the first Indian to receive the degree of Doctor of Laws. There were well-known artists such as Gerald Tailfeathers and George Clutesi, and a great number of clergymen, lawyers, doctors, dentists, school teachers, nurses, stenographers and hairdressers as well as members of a variety of other trades and professions. There were even fishermen back home, coal miners, steel workers, lumbermen and garage workers. The natives have taken their place in all walks of life.

If I may just make an aside for a moment, I would ask if any of you have ever seen the paintings of Simon Brascoupé? I might as well put in a plug for him here. Simon is an Algonquin Indian from Maniwaki. If you want to see an excellent exhibition of his paintings, go to the Den-Art Gallery on Bank Street. I am fortunate to have two pieces of his work. I am happy to have them because they are fantastically beautiful. There should be more of this type of work on a local level.

Another Indian I consider to be an artist of note is Lee Cremo. Many of you will wonder who Lee Cremo is. He has appeared at Shelburne. I am sure those senators who come from Ontario will know something about Shelburne, and the fact that there are fiddling contests that take place there. Lee Cremo has done very well. He is a composer and a fiddler. Someone else might call him a violinist, but to me he is a fiddler. I suppose the only difference between the two is your impression of what you hear. To some people, if it sounds nice, the music is from a violinist; to others it is from a fiddler. For me Lee Cremo is a great fiddler. He is a fantastic man and has done, and is still doing, a tremendous job.

Another great native is Noel Doucette, President of the Union of Nova Scotia Indians. At the present time he has four children at university. He works night and day not only to keep his family going—and he has a lot more than just those four—but to work for the Micmac people on the east coast and as President of the Union of Nova Scotia Indians. Another Indian who has done tremendous work on behalf of the Micmac people is Grand Chief Donald Marshall who has ministered to his people spiritually and in many other ways. We should be very proud of him. He has had a cross to bear in recent years and months, and I hope that will soon be remedied.

Honourable senators, is it not shocking that it is only a little over 20 years ago that the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker's government gave the vote to the Indian people? Think about that. Twenty years is not that long ago. Did we not consider the natives to be people at that time? Surely they should have had the vote many years before that time, regardless of what government was in power. And yet some of us have looked askance at the southern part of this continent, wondering why the blacks should be treated so terribly, not being given the vote, and all that sort of thing. But can we really look askance at them, when we consider our own situation? We cannot afford to be snobbish, because we have not done too much to be proud of so far as the vote is concerned.

Honourable senators, there is a great deal more I could say in support of this measure, but let me just mention that during the debate which took place so many years ago Mr. Ian Watson, the member from Châteauguay-Huntington-Laprairie, spoke with approval of what I was doing. Following him, Frank Howard, the member from Skeena, who was later defeated, also supported what I was trying to do. In his comments Mr. Howard made the following statement:

The concept of a national Indian day perhaps had its origin among the native Indian peoples on March 4 and 5, 1965, when at a meeting of the Indian advisory committee to the Centennial Commission the idea was proposed by

Mr. Guy Williams who was then and is now the president of the Native Brotherhood of British Columbia.

Mr. Howard went on to say:

I think it is appropriate and coincidental that Mr. Williams is in Ottawa today and is in fact a guest of the House of Commons in the gallery together with three extremely attractive, young native Indian ladies.

So Senator Williams was keeping up to form by being in the gallery with the beautiful young ladies. In any event, I did not know, when I was proposing my motion, that Guy Williams was present in the gallery. So Senator Williams was, in a sense, a catalyst with respect to a national Indian Day and, later, a national Indian Week.

Further in his speech on that day, Mr. Howard mentioned the fact that people give lip service to the native peoples without really doing anything. Incidentally, little did I ever think I would be quoting Frank Howard, but this is what he had to say on that occasion:

This is not the time for parliament to be speaking with a forked tongue, as the saying goes amongst some native tribes;

In other words, let's not pay lip service by saying what we might do for the Indian people or what we might provide for them; let's not talk about it and then forget about it; let's do it.

● (2200)

Mr. Alex Patterson fully agreed with me and made a short speech so that it could come to a vote before the time was up.

Mr. Albert Bécharde then commended me on the motion I had made. He stated:

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to congratulate the mover of this notice of motion stressing the importance of the contribution of the Indians to the building of our country, since they were its first inhabitants.

We will celebrate next year the centennial of our country's confederation and the Centennial Commission, which is responsible for the preparation of the various programs and celebrations which will mark in 1967 the various events of that period of our history, wants to stress the importance of each of the ethnic groups which make up our country. That is why the Centennial Commission looks very favourably on this motion moved by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir).

He then went on to say that the National Indian Advisory Council was in favor of the motion:

The Indian National Advisory Council met again at the beginning of January 1966 in Ottawa and strongly recommended to the Indian Affairs Branch to create a National Indian Day.

Following that, as Senator Williams mentioned the other day, Senator Haidasz spoke, and those of you who have been in the other place know that there is a certain time limit on motions. Senator Haidasz rose and said:

—I welcome this opportunity to join with my colleagues in this house in expressing my tribute to the Indian people—

MR. MUIR (CAPE BRETON NORTH AND VICTORIA):
You can express it by voting.

I said that because the time was short.

I asked Senator Haidasz, following that exchange, whether he would allow it to come to a vote. Mr. Howard was shouting across the floor for the question, and Mr. Haidasz finished his remarks by stating:

However, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that this resolution should first of all be studied by the government and referred to the National Indian Advisory Board of Canada. May I call it six o'clock?

Bang went the motion.

He asked that the matter be referred to the National Indian Advisory Board, yet the Honourable Albert Bécharde had previously said that the National Indian Advisory Board of Canada had suggested it, recommended it and asked for it. However, that was the end of that.

Honourable senators, let us hope and pray that Bill S-28, sponsored by Senator Williams, receives the approval of this Chamber, because, as he has stated, it would be a great contribution for him to make before he retires. He will be retiring from this Chamber, but certainly not from his activities. I say that knowing him, and bearing in mind what I have read about him. The finest thing that this Chamber could do for Senator Williams would be to vote unanimously in favor of Bill S-28.

Senator Williams pleaded with the members of this Chamber—I plead with members of this Chamber—to pass this bill unanimously because it is a wonderful bill, a good bill, and a measure that should be passed.

The Indian Festival of Arts and Culture held on Victoria Island in Ottawa, just a stone's throw away, if one can throw a stone like Senator Marshall can, is a fine exhibition of work done by the native peoples. If one wants to see paintings, if one wants to see culture, if one wants to see something produced by the native people, one should go there. I invite all of you to visit that festival, which, by the way, is sponsored by the government.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I wish to say—and I am not boasting—that I did work with the Micmac over a long period of time, and still do. In 1977, on the occasion of my 20th anniversary as a member of Parliament, I was honoured by the Micmac tribe. Senator John M. Macdonald had a lot to do with that. He has been close to me over the years and has been a dear friend. That function was organized for me. The Grand Chief of the Micmacs, Chief Donald Marshall, made me an Honorary Grand Chief of the Micmacs. That is something of which I am very proud.

You know, in political life we get a lot of brickbats and bouquets—mostly brickbats—but we look for them and we ask for them, and if we are not doing the right thing we deserve the brickbats. But isn't it nice to get a bouquet once in a while? I was a little worried about the Micmac name they gave me—Kobet. I do not believe I even have to spell that for our Hansard reporters because they are pretty good at certain languages and in translating them, but it is spelled K-o-b-e-t. I wondered what it meant and found out it means Chief Beaver. Whether I deserved it or not, I do not know.

This title of honorary grand chief has been bestowed on the Honourable Robert L. Stanfield and the former Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Nova Scotia, the late Honourable Harry McKeen, and I was the third one to receive it. Obviously, they do not toss these honours around. I am not saying I deserved it or anything else, but I was honoured, pleased and proud to receive that recognition. As an honorary grand chief, as a member of this Chamber and in honour of Senator Williams, Senator Adams and the native people across this country, I ask all honourable senators to give consideration to supporting this bill unanimously.

On motion of Senator Rowe, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.—INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on passenger rail service provided by VIA Rail Canada Inc.—(Honourable Senator Smith).

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, this order stands in my name. I plan to speak to it further but I do not feel I should do so this evening. However, if any other honourable senator wishes to speak to it, I shall be glad to yield.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

TUESDAY, July 20, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare, and Science which was "authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Supplementary Estimates (C), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of November 26, 1981, examined the said matter and now reports as follows:

In the course of its study, your Committee held two meetings. At one meeting the Committee heard the Honourable W. Bennett Campbell, Minister of Veterans Affairs, and officials of his Department, the Pension Review Board and the Canadian Pension Commission. The Committee also heard officials of the National Council of Veterans Associations in Canada and of the Royal Canadian Legion. At these meetings the Committee examined various aspects of the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs, particularly matters relating to disability pensions and war allowances payable to veterans or to their widows and dependents.

Your Committee is concerned that a number of recommendations contained in its Report entitled: "They Served—We Care", tabled in the Senate on October 20, 1981, have not yet been implemented and, further, that the prospects for implementation of others are not as positive as would be desired. The recommendations which have been implemented, for example the phasing-in of proportionate pensions, were enacted by legislation which is not under the purview of the present Order of Reference.

It is your Committee's wish that, when the next estimates are tabled, the Senate will consider it advisable to refer them to your Committee so that the update of this examination may be carried out.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

NATIONAL HARBOURS

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of Bill C-92, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Before leave is granted, honourable senators, I would like to explain my reasons for this motion.

[English]

Honourable senators, this motion is to refer the subject matter of Bill C-92, dealing with the ports authorities, to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. This bill has had some publicity and has just been reported from the committee in the other place, I believe with some amendments.

It is not certain that we will receive the bill before we adjourn. However, in my judgment of the state of the legislative calendar in the other place, it is possible that next week this bill will receive third reading in the other place and will come to the Senate.

While I do not expect that Senator Smith will be launching forthwith on a pre-study of this bill, I am asking that he be given the authority to do so in the event that it is required.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANAGREX CORPORATION

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of Bill C-85, intituled: An Act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Before leave is granted, honourable senators, the explanation in this case is more or less the same as for my previous motion, because this is one of three bills that are before the other place at the present time, namely, Bill C-92, to which I referred a few minutes ago, the present bill and Bill C-109 concerning urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

As far as the last bill is concerned, I intended to ask for leave to authorize the committee chaired by Senator Bonnell to make a preliminary study of this bill as well, but I think that for the time being this will not be necessary. However, there is still a possibility that we will receive the bill in the Senate next week. So, for the time being we are only concerned with authorizing the committee chaired by Senator Sparrow to give preliminary consideration to Bill C-85.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

PARLIAMENT

SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, unless the leader himself would like to take the question.

We have just authorized preliminary or prior consideration of two bills, but I feel that, as things stand now, Parliament should be informed of the government's schedule of bills it wants passed. We are hearing new rumours every day. Yesterday I asked the same question but failed to get a satisfactory reply. Nevertheless, I feel the Senate has a right to ask the government to let us know, by tomorrow, how many bills are to be passed before the summer recess. They are adding a day here and a day there, and we have no idea what is going to happen. The preliminary consideration formula is being used, a procedure I feel is highly irregular, except in very specific cases. I think the Senate should be clearly informed as to the government's intentions. This kind of exercise is getting to be a bit much.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to the questions raised by Senator Flynn, I cannot close the door on the legislative program, although I agree with him that the more certain we can be of that program, the better. I think his questions are quite properly raised, and I will give all the information I have to the Senate.

I can safely say that the government will not wish to adjourn for the summer recess without passage of Bill C-124, dealing with government restraint, and Bill C-125, the borrowing authority bill.

I will pause there, honourable senators, because those are the two bills we can be quite firm about. As to the status of those two bills, I believe that notice of the application of Standing Order 75C may be given today in the other place with respect to Bill C-125. That would mean there will have been about five or six days of debate on second reading in the other place, after which I presume the bill will go to committee.

As for the Senate, the subject matter of Bill C-125, the borrowing authority bill, has been referred to the National Finance Committee. I believe that a meeting of that committee, with the minister as witness, has been scheduled for tomorrow. That is the state of play as far as Bill C-125 is concerned.

● (1415)

Bill C-124, dealing with restraint, is in committee at the present time. I am not sure whether it is getting clause-by-clause study now or will be getting it soon, but there is a chance that that bill will be reported from the committee by the middle of next week. I cannot say anything more definite, but that is my prediction as to what is going to happen in the other place. As to whether the government wants that bill passed, I can be much more firm and say that it does.

That leaves the other three bills I referred to. I believe the UFFI bill, as it is called is out of committee in the other place, along with the Canagrex bill. The ports bill may be out of committee next Tuesday or Wednesday.

There is only one other bill I have heard spoken about, and that is the one respecting deposit insurance, which has not yet been introduced in the other place. It is not controversial, as I understand it, but I shall be able to give more details about it tomorrow. I know nothing about it except that it is non-controversial. In any case, it is something that is in the mists of the future at this stage because it has not yet received first reading in the other place. I am only mentioning it because I undertook to give the Senate all the information I have.

The other bill is the one that amends the Holidays Act—the so-called Canada Day bill. That will probably be introduced on second reading tomorrow. We will have time next week to debate that and any other bills that we may receive.

[Senator Flynn.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION—SAFETY OF CANADIAN DIPLOMATS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In view of the suffering in Lebanon since the incursion of the Israeli armed forces, can the leader give us an up-to-date report on developments in that war-torn country, and also on the situation of Canadian diplomats in Beirut, which has been besieged by the Israeli armed forces for several weeks?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we received confirmation today from the Canadian ambassador that the Israeli defence forces in Beirut have searched his car on more than one occasion in the past few days, despite his protest. Such searches constitute a serious violation of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and will be protested to the Israeli authorities. We will request that they ensure that effective measures be taken to prevent the recurrence of such incidents.

There are one or two other recent reports, honourable senators, that may be of interest.

The Canadian government strongly supports the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Lebanon, and shares the view that the restoration of peace and prosperity in Lebanon would be aided by the early withdrawal of all foreign forces except those that might be explicitly authorized by the Government of Lebanon.

There is also available a general statement provided to me by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the Canadian position regarding the Palestinians.

The Canadian government recognizes that if there is to be a just peace in the Middle East, the legitimate rights and concerns of the Palestinians must be realized. We believe the Palestinians have a right to play a full part in negotiations to determine their future and the right to a homeland within a clearly defined territory, the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The question of recognition of the Palestine Liberation Organization does not arise since it does not claim to be a government. Moreover, we do not regard the PLO as the Palestinians' sole legitimate representative. Of course, we acknowledge that it does represent an important element of Palestinian opinion.

Unlike the United States, which has placed certain prior conditions on any contacts it might have with the PLO, we have had contacts with the PLO over time, particularly in Beirut, and have maintained these during the present crisis. Cabinet ministers have not undertaken contacts with the PLO. We have not authorized the opening of any PLO mission or office in Canada.

Finally, a report has been provided by the department with respect to the status of the Canadian doctor known as Christopher Giannou who has figured in news stories in recent days.

The minister is aware of the reported statement by the Israeli press spokesman in Washington to the effect that Dr. Christopher Giannou, a Canadian, was suspected by the Israelis of belonging to a European terrorist organization, that he was arrested because of this, and that it was only because of strong pressure from Canada that Israel released him. The minister is also aware of the report that Dr. Giannou has denied any ties to terrorist groups.

At no time have the Israeli authorities indicated to us why Dr. Giannou was detained, and there was never any suggestion to us by them, either then or subsequently, that he was suspected of anything related to terrorist activities.

On June 20, Dr. Giannou was turned over to the Canadian embassy in Tel Aviv by the Israeli authorities after repeated requests by us for information on his whereabouts, and on any charges against him, as well as a request for immediate consular access to him. Our embassy obtained confirmation from the Israelis that Dr. Giannou had been released unconditionally. No mention was made of any charges.

We have instructed our embassy in Tel Aviv to seek an explanation of the remarks made by the Israeli spokesman who was quoted in the press.

LEBANON—MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE—POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Is the Leader of the Government in a position this afternoon to inform this Chamber whether any diplomatic representations have been made to the Department of External Affairs to have Canadians take part in a United Nations peacekeeping force in Lebanon?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as to Canadian participation in a peacekeeping force, the last report I have from the minister indicates that it is premature to speculate what the Canadian government's reaction might be to a multinational force within or outside the U.N. or to Canadian participation in it, if invited. No invitation has yet been received. So far Canada has not been requested, either by the U.N. or any government, to participate in such a force.

That said, in support of a negotiated settlement, Canada would seriously consider any approach made to it based on its extensive experience with U.N. peacekeeping operations in the area. In so doing, we would wish to have a very clear indication of the force's mandate and how its activities would contribute to a longer term settlement.

It is not clear, from reports on current settlement efforts, what arrangements might be worked out regarding the withdrawal of foreign forces now in Lebanon and how a peacekeeping force would be employed.

Honourable senators, to complete this rather lengthy report, I have some information about U.N. assistance to Lebanon and our role there. A number of Canadian armed forces personnel and vehicles assigned to the U.N. disengagement observer force—known as UNDOF—are, over the next three weeks, assisting in the transportation of U.N. relief supplies from Damascus to Beirut. There have been two convoys of supplies since June 21.

Canada has also provided an initial contribution of $1 million to the Red Cross in support of their relief efforts in Lebanon.

The Secretary General has appointed a co-ordinator for relief efforts in Lebanon by various U.N. agencies. Canada is considering what further assistance it can provide to aid the victims of the conflict.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question on the subject that was opened so well by Senator Haidasz. Could the minister indicate if Canada is involved, by extending its good offices or in other ways, in any aspect of the efforts toward establishing a peaceful solution to the Lebanese situation?

In connection with the grievous situation which exists nearby, has there been any change in the directive of the Department of External Affairs with reference to Canadian nationals in Iraq? It seems to me that when I was in Basra there were a good many Canadians there.

Finally, we have all become aware of an interesting proposal by the Secretary General of the United Nations with regard to holding a summit of the veto-carrying powers of the United Nations. Provided we do not expect too much of summitry, this seems to be an interesting suggestion. Although Canada is not a member of this illustrious group, is the Canadian government expressing its view in favour of such an interesting avenue toward trying to solve a grievous situation which is not confined to the Middle East but is becoming worldwide?

● (1425)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, those are important questions, and they will be taken as notice.

THE ECONOMY

PRICE RESTRAINT IN FEDERAL PUBLIC SECTOR

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate a statement issued yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board concerning price restraint in the federal public sector. It indicates that all departments, agencies, crown corporations and their wholly owned subsidiaries, whether they be direct or indirect, as well as those established under the authority of a regulatory body will be affected. My question is: Would the minister be kind enough to give us a list of those bodies that are to come under this price restraint rule of 6 per cent so that we may have some information as to the scope of this policy?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, unless Senator Olson has some information on this point, the question will be taken as notice.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think the question will have to be taken as notice in any event, although, as the President of the Treasury Board pointed out yesterday, it is intended that the extension of price restraint will be as wide as possible, including all departments, agencies, crown corporations and other organizations over which the federal government is able to exercise its influence without specific legislation respecting controls.

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend, that the policy is, indeed, very wide ranging. That is why I am anxious to establish what its boundaries are. The minister goes on, in the statement issued yesterday, to envisage the possibility that there might be revenue losses to people in connection with this policy. I would like to have some information on just what the minister means by that statement. The statement says that net revenue losses that might result from price restraint would be offset by expenditure reductions.

There are two aspects of that matter on which I would like my honourable friend to enlighten me, if he would. The first is, just how do we set about measuring net revenue losses? For example, Bell Canada is controlled by a federal regulatory agency, and I presume that it will be affected by the 6 per cent rule. I am anxious to know, if the government has not already drafted its policy regulations with regard to this matter—and I presume that it has, because the matter has been before us since the time of the budget last month—what the rule will be by which these losses will be measured.

Another example of a corporation which may come under this rule is Canada Post, and there is also the Canadian Grain Commission, which is trying to raise its rate above the 6 per cent level in order to cover its costs. Undoubtedly, the minister has given some thought to the implications of this policy, what these costs are and how they are to be measured.

My next question, I must admit in advance, has a large element of guess work in it, but I presume that some estimates have been made by the government as to what the costs of this policy will be to those upon whom it is imposed, because it is going to become a very important topic later on, since, according to this statement, it is bound to involve a considerable amount of money to cover the shortfall. Off hand, it occurs to me that if it is possible to reduce expenditures on that account, then, surely to heavens, it is possible to reduce them right now on account of the deficit. So I would like a statement from the minister on that topic.

I would also ask, if he cannot cover it by expenditure reductions, what will be the policy of the government then. Will it allow these prices to rise, or will it seek to make them good from the consolidated fund?

● (1430)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think Senator Roblin has himself partly answered the series of questions he asked. I am not sure if the document he is referring to is the same as the one I have, but the second page of mine says quite clearly that the government intends to implement its price restraint policy in a manner consistent with containment of the federal deficit. I think that is rather important. The document also refers to net revenue losses, because, obviously, there may be some losses on the expenditure side, but with the 6 and 5 per cent restraints there will also be some savings.

In those circumstances, the question that must be assessed is whether or not the net loss of revenue will exceed the net savings involved, consistent with the overall deficit position.

This statement also mentions that any exceptional circumstances that could require deviation from the stipulated price limits would have to be explicitly considered and approved by Cabinet. Therefore, if there are some losses that would obviously add to the deficit, the federal Cabinet would look at those. There might be some cases where that would be justified. I think it is fair to say that they would be rare. Certainly, we hope that it would rarely happen. In other cases there might be offsets by expenditure reductions to take care of net losses in other not directly related areas.

The point the President of the Treasury Board is attempting to make is that, even though there are some losses involved, these price restraints should not be regarded as having the effect of significantly increasing the deficit.

Senator Roblin: Obviously, the minister and I were reading from the same paper because he quoted the excerpt which I had already mentioned in my remarks. I take it, therefore, from what the minister has said in quoting with approval the sentence, "Net revenue losses that might result from price restraints will be offset by expenditure reductions", that he is giving there the explicit policy of the government, and, therefore, if net losses are experienced they will be financed by expenditure reductions by the government. I would like the minister to tell me if I have understood him correctly.

Senator Olson: I think what my friend is trying to do is more or less eliminate the other paragraph I referred to, which says that any exceptional circumstances which might require deviation from the stipulated price limits would have to be explicitly considered and approved by Cabinet. If he is attempting to say that the one paragraph he has read should stand absolutely alone with no qualifications or exceptions, then it would be necessary to leave out the paragraph I have just referred to again, and we do not intend to do that.

Senator Roblin: I do not think my honourable friend and I are on any different ground on that. I simply interpret "net revenue losses" to mean what it plainly seems to mean in the English language, which would take care of the exceptions he has referred to in the previous paragraph. I think he would probably agree that that is not an unfair interpretation.

I have another question, however. What publicity does the government intend to give to any Cabinet decisions which approve of deviations from the 6 per cent rule on account of exceptional circumstances?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that we intend to spend a great deal of money on advertising or on publicity—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Oh, come on. That is not the kind of thing Senator Roblin was referring to.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Jack Marshall: What is the extra $4 billion for?

Senator Olson: —and in that respect we will certainly provide the information to the news media, and I am sure, or I hope, they will do their job well and communicate it to at least the people who will be affected. Then, of course, we will obviously have to send out some notices to people more directly affected. However, we would like all these decisions to be as widely known as possible, and perhaps even the opposition would help us out in that respect.

Senator Flynn: Don't worry about that.

● (1435)

Senator Roblin: I am prepared to help my honourable friend. If he will give me a Cabinet statement defining "exceptional circumstances," I will undertake to ask him any questions that might appear to be appropriate so that he can explain the thing satisfactorily to the Senate and, no doubt, to the country.

I am taking from that that the minister is assuring us that when this special Cabinet committee is set up under the President of the Treasury Board, and it makes a decision regarding what are "exceptional circumstances," the full details of those exceptional circumstances will be given to the Senate and the public in the cheapest and most economical way—which is a statement by the minister.

Senator Olson: I think that that is another way of saying what I said a few minutes ago.

Senator Roblin: We will hold you to that.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether it is the intention of the government to apply the six per cent guideline to such crown corporations as Air Canada and Canadian National Railways, in view of the fact that those two bodies set fares and tariffs; and, if so, how the government proposes to apply the guidelines to those corporations?

Is it the position of the government that it can require those two crown corporations to comply with the six per cent guideline in respect of fares and tariffs?

Senator Olson: The answer to the first part of the question is yes. With respect to the other part of the question concerning the legality of that, I shall obtain a report for my honourable friend. That report will not be just for him, but for the thousands of people living in the country who are also curious about this.

Senator Murray: May I ask the minister whether the government has obtained, or is in the process of obtaining, any voluntary undertaking from crown corporations such as Canadian National Railways or Air Canada with respect to their fares and tariffs?

Senator Olson: Whether or not a formal notice or letter has been sent to them requesting their co-operation, if that is the right word—

Senator Flynn: I doubt that it is.

Senator Olson: It does not matter whether my honourable friend doubts it or not. I am sure that those crown corporations are fully aware of the fact that they are crown corporations and that the government intends to apply the guidelines to all federal crown corporations.

Senator Murray: In view of the fact that both those crown corporations are in competition with companies in the private sector, is it the intention of the government to try to exact compliance with the guidelines from their competitors, such as CP Rail and CP Air?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend has raised a more complex question than perhaps he even realizes, because, for example, there are some situations—and I suppose that Canadian National Railways and CP Rail are examples of this—where, for a long period of time, a common labour union has represented the employees of both organizations because the employees are involved in almost identical activities. Collective bargaining, in the past, has in fact applied to both companies.

Senator Murray: I am more interested in the fares, tariffs and rates charged by those corporations. The problem of collective bargaining is a separate problem. I should like to know the position of the government with regard to the tariffs and fares charged by those crown corporations, and the position of the government with respect to the tariffs and fares charged by their private sector competitors.

Senator Olson: That is why I said a minute ago that the question is more complex than even my honourable friend realizes it to be.

I shall obtain a report for my honourable friend regarding the schedules, fares, tariffs, and so forth, to which he referred. Those schedules, fares and tariffs also come under the jurisdiction of certain regulatory bodies, such as the CTC, and we do not have complete details of the application of the guidelines at this point in time.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I can cite a specific example. Reports in the news media today indicate that Air Canada and CP Air will eliminate reduced air fares that they have been advertising now that they have found themselves in the position of being forced back to regular fares. That means quite a difference in cost.

Would the guidelines force those corporations to retain those reduced fares which they advertised in good faith? Could they be forced to keep the fares at the level they are at now?

Senator Olson: I shall have to look into that, although I can say that I am not sure that the policy is to maintain the low fares that they have been offering. It seems to me that the guidelines would probably be more applicable to regularly scheduled air fares that are announced from time to time.

● (1440)

WAGE AND PRICE RESTRAINT—PROVINCIAL CO-OPERATION

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the minister if he can tell this Chamber if there are negotiations going on between the Government of Canada and the provincial governments to the end of getting the provincial regulatory bodies to apply the same guidelines as have been announced by the federal government? I think the minister will agree we do have a considerable number of utilities that are regulated by provincial boards, and if they follow a different set of guidelines from the ones under federal jurisdiction, obviously it will create some rather serious problems. Are steps being taken to get uniformity by provincial, as well as federal, regulatory bodies, and, if so, what is the status of that effort?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is a fact that the federal government is keenly interested in having the support, co-operation or concurrence—or whatever other term is appropriate—of provincial governments, and many of their regulatory agencies in respect to following the guidelines insofar as it is possible. I think it goes even one step beyond that, in that we would also welcome the support of municipal governments in applying the guidelines to wages and prices under their control.

In reply to the question: "Are there negotiations going on?" I do not believe I can say that there are formal negotiations in meetings that have been called specifically for that purpose. However, we are certainly hopeful that the meeting that was held between the Prime Minister and the first ministers of the provinces will lead to as wide an acceptance of those guidelines as possible. However, if there are further meetings of a more formal nature called in the near future, I shall advise the Senate.

GRAIN

WHEAT PRODUCTION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, but, in his absence, I wonder if I could put the question to the jovial and informative Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Who said he was jovial?

Hon. C. William Doody: The minister does not recognize who you are speaking to.

Senator Bosa: Oh, yes, he does.

It was announced yesterday that 3 million tonnes of wheat have been sold to Brazil for a total of $700 million, I think. What is the situation on the prairies now? Are we producing to capacity? Are we asking farmers out west to produce more wheat so that we can meet these gigantic sales that have been made recently?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the most recent crop reports coming from western Canada indicate that almost all of the grain-growing area in western Canada is, in fact, experiencing near ideal growth conditions. It would appear at this point in time that we again have the prospect of a record-breaking crop, which will be in excess of the record-breaking crop of last year. That is further supported by the fact that a record-breaking number of acres were seeded, so the prospects are excellent. If this crop is harvested, the sale to Brazil, along with a number of others that the minister directly responsible has announced, will indeed tax our delivery capability to the limit. I do not have the information with me, but the Canadian Wheat Board is setting a target of something over 27 million tonnes of delivery for 1982-83. If they are able to achieve that target, all records will be broken.

THE ECONOMY

CALCULATION OF ANNUAL INFLATION RATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In reply to a question posed by Senator Everett yesterday about the United States method of calculating the inflation rate which, if used in Canada, would show our rate to be 3 to 4 per cent less than that shown at the present time, the minister said, as reported at page 4633 of Debates of the Senate:

I was not aware that those two eminent gentlemen—

He was referring to the two eminent economists who testified before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

—had, very recently, made those comments. However, I am certainly interested, and I will refer this to those people in government who make recommendations respecting the calculation of the inflation rate because I think that is useful information to have.

Yet, a little later on, at page 4638, the minister in replying to a question by the also very jovial Senator Bosa, mentioned figures concerning both rates of calculation in the United States and Canada, and said:

In comparison, the Canadian index is constructed on the more credible assumption that only a fraction of homeowners buy a house—

Later in that answer at page 4639, dealing again with the rate of calculating inflation, the minister said:

The presence of random and special factors and the magnification of these factors at annual rates makes this an inappropriate measure of annual inflation.

That is referring to the U.S. method of calculation.

I should like to know which the minister favours, the method used in Canada or the method suggested by Senator Everett, which he found so interesting last evening, just to deny its value a few moments later.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, it is not necessary to completely agree with a change in the formula that is used in calculating the CPI to be interested in comments that other people may make about it. If my honourable friend would look at all of those statements he has just now read, he will see that there is no contradiction in any of them.

[Senator Manning.]

Senator Flynn: In any case, does the minister still think we have the right formula, or that possibly Senator Everett's suggestion is worth retaining?

Senator Olson: The point that my honourable friend misses, and it is unfortunate that he does miss it—

Senator Flynn: I didn't miss the contradiction any way.

Senator Olson: —is that there are some differences in calculating the CPI between the two countries and, therefore, to take in a figure of 11.2 per cent, which is the latest one—it was 11.8 per cent last month—and to compare that to what it is in the United States, whether it is 6.8 or 7.2 per cent, is not completely fair. That is the point that my honourable friend should take into account. If he will carefully read the reply that I gave to Senator Bosa, he will also note that the method and pattern of spending that goes into the CPI has been updated more recently in Canada than it has in the United States. For example, we are using what I hope is a typical pattern set up in 1978; the United States, I believe, are still using a consumer spending pattern that was calculated in 1972. My honourable friend knows that there are changes in the patterns of consumer spending from time to time. Therefore, you have to make adjustments or you get out of touch with reality. In his party that may not be an unusual thing, but on this side we try to keep up with the real world.

● (1450)

Senator Flynn: You never reply directly to a question.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that is unfair. I made a very explicit and accurate reply to the matter raised.

Senator Flynn: Explicit for you is not explicit for me.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. The Leader of the Opposition has stated that I recommended one mode—

Senator Flynn: I did not say that.

Senator Everett: "Suggested" was the word used. In any event, if the Leader of the Opposition says that he did not say that, then I accept it. However, for clarification, I was saying that the two methods of arriving at the CPI are statistically different.

In his answer yesterday, the Minister of State for Economic Development gave some of the reasons why it was different. One of the salient reasons is that we construct our CPI on a year-over-year basis; the Americans do it on a monthly basis to the twelfth power. I think it is simple to accept the fact that that makes a significant difference when inflation rates are moving.

Senator Flynn: We all understand that.

Senator Everett: I am somewhat mystified as to why the opposition keeps asking, "Why is our inflation rate not as low as the American inflation rate?"

All I did was mention the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance which spoke of the evidence given by the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association and Professor Courchene. Their evidence was that if we constructed our CPI on the same basis as the Americans did, our CPI would be lower.

It is important that we understand that, because time and time again critics of the government get up and say, "Look at what the Americans have done; look at what they are doing; we are not doing as well." All that those witnesses were saying, all that the report was saying, all that I was saying yesterday, and all that the minister is saying is that we are doing much better than we appear to be doing because of the difference in the way we construct our indices.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Spread the good news.

Senator Flynn: That is the argument, but the minister in his reply said that we are doing the right thing in calculating the rate as we do, and that it is not correct to use the American formula.

Everyone is in agreement that our rate of inflation is much higher than it is in the United States; that is all there is to it. If you say, "It is not as high as we claim," that is something else, but it is still too high.

Senator Everett: In answer to that, we believe our method of constructing the index is a more accurate reflection of what is going on than the method used by the Americans.

Senator Flynn: You are so wise!

Senator Everett: That is not the argument. The argument is that people keep saying, "Why are we not doing as well as the Americans?" The answer is that if we constructed our CPI using their method, we would appear to be doing considerably better than we are.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in view of the interest of the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance in different methods of calculating consumer price indices, may I ask him whether he would consider calling before his committee representatives of Statistics Canada who, according to reports, have recently presented a very interesting study to the federal Cabinet, apparently drawing a distinction between price increases in the private sector and the government sector in Canada and, apparently, showing that the price increases in the government sector, including those companies regulated by government, are much higher than those in the Canadian private sector.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I would not particularly want to reply to the second part of the question. However, in response to the first part, I think that how we construct our consumer price index might, at some point, be a worthy investigation for the committee. Indeed, that recommendation was made by Dr. MacIntosh, the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, we probably could consider that matter as a committee.

Senator Murray: I would ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether the government accepts the calculations put forward by Statistics Canada to the Cabinet some time ago to the effect that inflation is running at a much higher rate in the government sector than in the private sector and that, in fact, the rate of inflation has fallen in the private sector and risen in the government sector.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would have to look into that matter. I was unaware that that kind of matter was put to the government for them to either accept or deny.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask the minister if it is not a fact that the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais made a presentation to Cabinet with respect to the Statistics Canada information, which indicated that the rate of inflation in the private sector was about half of what it was in the sector under government control. Was this not a factor in inducing the government to come down with its proposal to regulate costs of the government sector to the 6 per cent level?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice because my honourable friend knows very well that, while he can ask the questions, I cannot answer as to what goes on at Cabinet meetings.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend cannot answer that, can he tell me whether these matters were factors that were taken into account in establishing government policy?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have already said that I will take that question as notice.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXPENDITURES FROM FUND—DEFICIT—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN CONTRIBUTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to pose a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development concerning the unemployment insurance fund.

A piece of information which apparently emerged from the Public Accounts Committee of the other place indicates that the expenditures under the unemployment insurance fund will be some $7 billion this year. Would my honourable friend tell me if that is the estimate of the government with respect to that item?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

I have that press report before me and, if my honourable friend wishes to know if that is a somewhat more formal estimate by the government, I will look into the matter.

Senator Roblin: While my honourable friend is checking that, there are a couple of other points he might examine for me.

I notice that the Auditor General has not made an audit of the unemployment insurance fund for some years—that is, since 1978—and is not scheduled to make one before 1984. In view of the fact that one of the problems with the unemployment insurance fund is that illegal or unapproved payments—that is payments beyond what the statute provides—amounted to some quarter of a billion dollars in 1978—

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Did the article state “under” or “over”?

Senator Roblin: It was established in 1978 that it was over a quarter of a billion dollars—$280 million, to be precise. It is a matter of some concern.

The reason I think it is a matter of some concern is, if the deficit is about $2 million—a figure which my honourable friend gave us a little while ago—that constitutes a 40 per cent increase if applied to the payroll tax which is now imposed to support the unemployment insurance fund. I want to know how the government intends to finance that.

This is not a matter of idle curiosity. I know the minister has told us that we have to wait for some budgetary pronouncements, but employers and employees have to make their plans. If there is to be a 40 per cent increase in this payroll tax, they have to know about it, and the sooner they know about it the better.

I ask my honourable friend to give some consideration to giving us a date on which we might expect to hear what the policy of the government is respecting this large deficit.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I also read that the Auditor General had not made a complete, in-depth audit of the Unemployment Insurance Commission accounts for some time and that he does not plan to do so for one or two years.

However, I do not think my honourable friend would want to leave the wrong impression, in that, even though the Auditor General has not done an in-depth audit of those accounts, internal audits do take place in that department, and other departments, which are also not subject to the in-depth audit of the Auditor General. In fact, internal audits are going on in these departments all the time.

Concerning the amount of the deficit, yes, I will try to get that information and will try to give a date so that not only my honourable friend but the other people who have to make plans on that basis will be informed. I think that it is fair to say, however, that Parliament has already passed some rules with respect to taking care of deficits in the unemployment insurance fund. Of course, the government is obliged to abide by those rules, which provide that, over a period of time, those deficits are to be financed from within the earnings or the fees schedule of the commission.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend means what I think he means, he has just told me that the payroll tax will be responsible for making up that deficit, according to the current law. I would remind him that the law on this subject has been changed in just about each of the past two or three years, and can be changed again. Is he really certain that that is the way the law stands now; that the deficit will be paid for through the payroll tax and not through the consolidated revenue fund?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that I should be very careful about trying to give legal opinion—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You certainly should.

Senator Olson:—so I am not going to do so. I am well aware that, if there are insufficient funds within the commission, the consolidated revenue fund is obliged to make payments—and to make good the payments, if that is the right word—to those people whose applications meet the criteria set down for approval of applications. I believe, however, that there are one or two applicable sections within the law that has been passed by Parliament, which I will not go into any further than to say that Parliament has, through those sections, more or less instructed the commission, if that is the right word, or the government, if that is the right word, to adjust the fees to make sure that there is a self-financing portion of that obligation.

Senator Roblin: I think that my honourable friend is confirming my fear, if I can express it that way, that the government does possess the power to raise the payroll tax rates on both employers and employees. I gather that he is saying that the current policy of the government is that that is the way the deficit will be financed. I am not going to hold him to that, but I do appreciate the fact that he will give us a statement—I hope, a timely statement—as to what the whole thing really will amount to when the bill has to be paid.

I just point out to my honourable friend that, although I am sure there is an internal audit, the Auditor General is reported as having said that there is still “a high incidence of error.” That concerns me, because if we are going to contemplate increasing the payroll tax, it will be wise to assure the people who have to pay it that their money is being properly spent, insofar as it is humanly possible to control.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I accept that. On the first point that my honourable friend was making, however, it is not a matter of whether or not the government has the power to change the fees in the unemployment insurance fund. The point I was trying to make—and I will check it out—is that I think that Parliament has given the government some instructions with respect to how to deal with deficits in the unemployment insurance fund.

Senator Roblin: We are going around in circles. My honourable friend continues to tell me that the payroll tax will be used to support the deficit, and I think he is right.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should not ask questions if he has read the law and has made an interpretation that satisfies him.

Senator Roblin: The honourable minister has undertaken to tell us what the government's interpretation is. That is really what counts—not my interpretation—and I look forward to hearing it.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT BONDS—RATE OF INTEREST

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It deals with an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning with respect to the recent government bond offering. I must say that I am not prone to Senator Bosa's faults, but it is interesting to note—and I do not know whether this is good news or bad news—that the 16 per cent issue traded as high as $100.60, that the other issue traded at $100.25 in the aftermarket, and that the securities sold out quickly and began trading at sizable premiums. That may or may not be good news for Canadians, and I would like the comments of my honourable colleague in that regard.

Is the government trying to lead general interest rates higher than those in the market place, or is this, perhaps, happening inadvertently? Has the government's credit slipped on the market, requiring it to offer these attractive rates, or, as is suggested in the Globe and Mail article, are our government rates tied inevitably to U.S. interest rates? That last question arises from this statement in the Globe and Mail:

The issues moved well because of the news late Monday of a discount rate cut in the United States. In addition, short term U.S. interest rates continued to fall, causing bond prices to rally.

I am interested in knowing whether we are that closely tied to the U.S. economy with respect to our federal bond issues.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I think that all offerings of bonds, whether they be government bonds or any others, are tied to the market's response. As my honourable friend is aware, the market in Canada and the United States, insofar as the movement of capital is concerned, is very open. Therefore, it is not a matter of whether government bonds are tied to U.S. interest rates. There exists a very open field where investors may, if they so wish, purchase Canadian bonds or U.S. bonds or move their money from one country to another. The market place, at least in that field, is open almost to the extent that the border hardly exists, at least with respect to movement.

I suppose that it could therefore be argued that some changes took place in the entire North American market. I think it coincidental that, at the same time, one of those changes was that the rate in the United States moved down a little in response to the Federal Reserve moving down slightly, either the day before or perhaps the same day that those bonds went on the market. Perhaps that occurrence caused the bonds to look a little more attractive at the rate at which they were offered. Thus arises the explanation as to why they traded at over 100 per cent of face value shortly after they were put on the market.

I do not think, however, that it is fair to make the explanation that, somehow, government bonds are tied to the United States interest rates, any more than all offerings of securities are judged by the market, almost without restriction in North America. The changes in prices are a reflection of that fact.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE REPORT—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with today's release of the Minister of National Defence in response to the report of the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence.

It is heartening to note that the minister agrees with many of our recommendations—most particularly, that he seems to agree with the production of a white paper, which he refers to as a policy review.

I wonder whether we could get something more specific from the minister as to when such a white paper or review will be carried out, and as to the implementation of some of the recommendations, which he indicates is now taking place. Could we have a list of the specific recommendations that are being implemented and some more precise information as to what is being done about them?

I should also like explained to me one of the paragraphs of his release wherein, although he indicates that he agrees with the subcommittee, he seems to give the impression that perhaps he just means "maybe." The release indicates that the government is in fact wrestling with the question of how to create and maintain modern Canadian forces that are sustainable in combat in a way that permits the maintenance of an overall balance of capabilities at a cost that is affordable in the prevailing economic conditions. Perhaps the minister could clarify whether that means "yes," "no" or "maybe," in response to the need for an effective modern Canadian force.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. At the same time, I would draw to the attention of the Honourable Senator Marshall that the other day, on behalf of the minister, I did reply to a number of questions raised by the Senate Subcommittee on National Defence. I hope that Senator Marshall will review the response which was made at that time.

AIR CANADA

CANCELLATION OF SCHEDULED FLIGHTS

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It is my understanding that Air Canada, due to lack of traffic, is cancelling flights listed in its published schedules, thus inconveniencing travellers. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate ascertain whether this is a fact, and whether Air Canada has a legal right to do this?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

RAILWAY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill S-29, to amend the Railway Act.

[Senator Marshall]

He said: Honourable senators, when I closed the debate on second reading of Bill S-29 I made some comments about the position of the provinces, and confessed that I had no firm position from Quebec, although all other provinces had withdrawn any objection they had had to the adoption of this bill.

I can now answer Senator Flynn's question with regard to the kind of invitation issued to Quebec to respond on this matter, and whether this was done in writing. The answer is that it was. Other than that there is no change. There has not been a determination of Quebec's position. No answer has been received from Quebec, and as I said during the debate on second reading, honourable senators, that has to be taken in the context of a totally different system, applying under the Civil Code, as opposed to the common law, which is addressed by this bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am satisfied with this reply, to the effect that Quebec was informed of this bill, or that it was informed of the intention to present this bill, some years ago, and did not reply. It is therefore within the competence of Parliament to bring forward this amendment to the Railway Act, with regard to central registration. This is an area which is within the competence of this Parliament.

However, there are certain provisions in the Civil Code and elsewhere, also, with regard to the registration of some of the details described in section 86, as it is now and as it is proposed to amend it. I merely want to say, especially with regard to the registration of a mortgage or conditional sale rights on rolling stock, that there is in the Civil Code a chapter, Chapter IV, entitled, "Of Commercial Pledge" containing sections 1979e, 1979f, 1979g, 1979h, 1979i, 1979j and 1979k, which provide for the registration, under Quebec law, in the registry office, of a deed.

Section 1979e provides:

A person carrying on a commercial business may pledge, as security for a loan which he contracts, for a term not exceeding ten years, machinery and equipment pertaining to his business, while retaining possession thereof.

I think that would be a case that would be covered in part by this legislation, but I doubt that it creates any conflict.

On the whole, I want to make it clear that if there was no objection by the Quebec government, we must assume that it does not create any problem or conflict of a practical nature.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, so that it is on the record for anyone who might be interested, and to confirm what Senator Flynn has said, there is an article by John F. Varcoe, published in the Canadian Business Law Journal, entitled "Finance Leasing and Analysis", which confirms what Senator Flynn has said and refers to the deed procedure he has mentioned.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Williams for the second reading of Bill S-28, establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I regret that I was unavoidably absent when, the week before last, Senator Williams introduced this bill and Senator Adams spoke in seconding it. I regret it for two reasons. First, naturally, as a Canadian and as one who has always been deeply interested in the aboriginal history of Canada, I would have liked to be here to hear them in person. Then, as it happens, Senator Williams and I have a very close relationship, because, along with Senator Michel Fournier, on December 9, 1971, the two of us, never having met before, arrived in the ante-room of this Chamber to be inducted into the Senate.

I was very happy that Senator Fournier was one of our party, and particularly happy, I think I can say in all fairness, that Senator Williams was too. He came from the extreme west of our great nation, and I came from the extreme east of it. It was a case of the twain meeting right there.

Actually, we had met before, though vicariously, if I may use the word, and not in actuality. When I was in the Newfoundland government as Minister of Resources, the then Mr. Guy Williams was one of a group of western entrepreneurs who made very substantial investments in the resources of my province of Newfoundland, and we did have some dealings then.

It therefore gives me great pleasure now, especially since Senator Williams' term of office is approaching its end, to say a few words in respect of the bill and also in appreciation of Senator Williams himself.

I do not know how many Canadians are aware of the fact—I know his fellow senators are—that we have in Senator Williams one of the most distinguished Canadians living today. Senator Williams has been a leading businessman and entrepreneur in British Columbia, western Canada and elsewhere, and his great contributions to the Canadian economy and Canadian culture have been recognized repeatedly. He was for 14 years chairman of the Native Brotherhood. He was for some six years chairman of the Fishermen's Co-operative of British Columbia, and subsequently, its honorary chairman. He was also chairman and honorary chairman of Ucluelet Fish Processing and Cold Storage, one of the well-known enterprises in western Canada. Senator Williams, above all, has been a great Canadian.

I was very happy, on reading the Hansard report of his introduction of the bill, to see that Senator Williams testified to the fact that the Indian people of the west, in particular, and of Canada, generally, have, in his view, made substantial progress in recent years, presumably as a result of the enlightened policies that have been adopted by the Government of Canada and by the several provinces concerned. I appreciated hearing that from one who has no axe to grind at this time and who has had a vast experience both within the confines of his own culture and of Canadian culture as a whole.

Senator Williams has introduced a bill which I find most intriguing. It seeks to recognize the Inuit and Indian cultures in Canada in a special way by naming a week and a day in their honour. I had never given much thought to this, and no doubt very few other honourable senators had, until Senator Williams introduced the subject. To be honest, I do not know what all the implications are—and I am sure that my friend, Senator Williams, would expect me to be honest. I do not know whether there are any implications of which I am not aware, but on the surface it would appear to be singularly appropriate for Senator Williams to introduce such a measure. I assume that the matter will be looked into and that all of its implications will be examined. If there are no serious objections raised from any particular source, then it seems to me that the legislation could have a clear passage.

I am not sure whether Senator Williams will find it possible to attend the sittings of the Senate when we resume in the fall, because I believe his term expires on October 7, and there is some doubt as to whether the Senate will be sitting at that time. I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to say that I regard it as a great honour to be associated with such a distinguished senator as Senator Williams. I know that I express the hope and desire of all of his colleagues in the Senate in wishing him continued success, happiness and longevity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in order to give other honourable senators an opportunity to speak on this order, I propose to move the adjournment of the debate. I do not wish to participate in the debate at this time.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

VIA RAIL CANADA INC.—INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, July 7, 1982, the debate on the consideration of the Interim Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on passenger rail service provided by VIA Rail Canada Inc.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, it will be recalled that on July 7, after the report was submitted to the house and after I had begun to make some remarks on it, the Leader of the Government conveyed to the house the response of the Minister of Transport to the 12 recommendations made by the committee. At the time I replied in some measure to the minister's response, and I should now like to make a few more comments. I propose to preface them by saying that I am sure the committee appreciates the quick response of the minister to its 12 recommendations, and, it would be fair to say, appreciates the fact that he seemed willing to accept, in substantial measure, those 12 recommendations. It seems to me that his quick and favourable response indicates not only the reasonableness of the minister but also the reasonableness and well documented nature of the committee's recommendations. I am sure the committee appreciates that quick response, as does its chairman.

I should like to express my gratitude to the members of the committee for the long and arduous study they made of this subject, which was referred to them in October 1981, and to thank them for their attendance at the many meetings and their interest and participation in the conduct of those meetings.

I should like also to offer my thanks to the staff who helped the committee so much. I should first like to mention Mrs. Aline Pritchard, who was clerk of the committee until her retirement in December 1981; then Mr. Eric Innes, who acted as clerk of the committee for some months until a new clerk, Mr. André Reny, was appointed. Their help was invaluable to me and, I am sure, to the committee, as was that of Mr. Jack Silverstone, of the Research Branch of the Parliamentary Library. I wish also to express my gratitude to the staff of interpreters and to Hansard. We certainly kept them busy, and they were most diligent, helpful and cheerful in their attendance and assistance.

I would not suggest that, at my very best, my speech would likely be exciting or interesting, but today it may be even less exciting, because to make the points I wish to make—and I shall not try to deal with all of the recommendations—will entail a good deal of quoting from the committee proceedings, and, in particular, from two issues.

I shall begin this part of my remarks by making reference to certain responses by the minister to some of the recommendations. I propose to begin with his response to the second recommendation, namely, that public hearings on proposed service cancellations be held before the cancellation is made, in such place and in such measure as to give the public full opportunity to make its views known.

The substance of the minister's response was that a public hearing on service cancellation was not held in the particular instance that occasioned the appointment of the committee because it was a matter of exceptionally urgent policy and it was necessary to make a decision quickly so that there would not be a great lapse of time before the decision became effective.

● (1530)

The committee did not accept that as sufficient reason for not having the hearings provided for in the statute held by the Canadian Transport Commission. Attention is drawn by the minister to the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission public hearing process is still in place and continues to be used extensively, and he makes reference to hearings which are either being held now or are planned for the immediate future. We are certainly glad to know that, if problems arise in rail passenger service, public hearings will be held, but we would like to place the emphasis on the fact that the information elicited at these hearings, together with the recommendations of the Canadian Transport Commission, should be taken well into consideration before decisions are made, and should be taken into consideration in making such decisions.

The third recommendation was that there should be a legislative framework for VIA Rail. The report sets out many reasons why that should be so. The minister, I am glad to say, recognizes that need and has indicated that he is prepared to release a discussion paper on the subject as soon as feasible. But I should like to emphasize that a proper legislative framework under which VIA can operate, and in particular which will regulate its relationship to the government, to the Canadian Transport Commission and to Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways, is a matter of urgency. While I certainly very warmly commend the minister for getting on with the discussion paper so that all concerned will have a chance to make contributions to the legislation, I do emphasize, from the point of view of VIA and therefore from the point of view of the public, the necessity of speeding up the matter, consistent with proper consultation and paying reasonable attention to that consultation.

The fourth recommendation had to do with fixed price contracts, which the committee felt would be advantageous for VIA to be able to negotiate with CN and CP for services provided to VIA by those railways. The minister says, and I agree with him, that some progress has been made in the contractual negotiations between VIA and the two railways to achieve this, or to achieve it to some degree; but I must emphasize that, without the legislative framework and the right not only to negotiate but to insist on certain things being placed in the hands of VIA, VIA has not much to negotiate with. It is really pretty much a prisoner of CN and CP in respect of the services provided by those two railways. It cannot go out and get the same services anywhere else. CN and CP own the tracks and much of the equipment used by VIA, and if VIA does not like what CN and CP are charging for services rendered it cannot simply go somewhere else to get such services, but is forced to accept their charges. Without a legislative framework under which to operate, VIA will remain in that position, although it does seem that CN and CP have perhaps realized that in due course VIA will have that right and it will be well for them to negotiate on a more equitable basis with VIA now.

The fifth recommendation had to do with the question of the audit of railway charges to VIA Rail. It is on this matter that, in a moment, I must turn to the printed proceedings to get, through the words of the witnesses and the questioners, the exact picture which seems actually to exist in this respect and to demonstrate what the committee feels is a deficiency in the audit system. The response of the minister indicated that there was to be some speeding up of the kind of audit carried out by the CTC of charges made by CN and CP. That, of course, is a good thing, because the delay has indeed been most substantial and contrary to the best interests of VIA and, therefore, contrary to the interests of the public and of the taxpayer. That is so because, as all honourable senators know, the loss which VIA incurs must be met from the public treasury and, therefore, to the extent to which the loss of VIA can be reduced, the charge borne by the taxpayer can be reduced. The effect of an inefficient or insufficient audit may well be to allow the railways to have the financial advantage of charging too much for the services they render while the cost which they should bear is borne by the taxpayer. So it is not merely a question of an audit between VIA and the two railways, and involving nobody else but those three parties; it is a question of an audit which involves very substantially the taxpayers of the country.

Indeed, just to take an example which I mentioned the other day—and I am not saying that the figures I shall use in a moment are necessarily accurate, but they do illustrate the situation—a study by the Canadian Transport Commission of the methods used to calculate the charges made to VIA, as compared to the methods used to make charges to the American railway passenger system, Amtrak, shows that, if the American system were applied to VIA, VIA would be saved something in the neighbourhood of $25 million, $30 million, or, some people say, even $50 million per year. I would remind honourable senators that the $25 million to $30 million is a figure given to the committee by the CTC itself, and not by VIA. That simply means that if the method of calculation used with reference to Amtrak had been used in reference to VIA, the taxpayers of Canada would have paid $25 million to $30 million less annually to pick up the losses sustained by VIA.

Moreover, on the question of the audit, it is clear from the evidence that the audit is one of limited scope. It is an audit which CTC makes to ensure that the charges of the CP and CN to VIA are of a nature authorized either by statute or by regulation, but it does not determine if sufficient and proper service has been given for the money paid.

That brings me to the point where I would like to quote from the proceedings to honourable senators. I shall first make reference to issue No. 20 of the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications of Thursday, December 10, 1981. I shall refer to pages 18, 19 and 20 thereof.

A question asked by a member of the committee reads as follows:

The question of management function was raised in terms of the audit. The audit itself, the CTC audit, is it simply an audit to check the arithmetic on the invoices? Is it simply an audit to check the number of miles of track and the day's use of stations, and so forth? It appeared that this was, more or less, the type of audit that does not show value for money. Does it demonstrate the need of a particular service to VIA, or does it simply show a charge to VIA from CN or CP for a service? The question was raised whether, to determine this, it was a management function or an audit function.

I should like to ask you whose function it is. Surely, the objectives of VIA's management must be quite different from the objectives of the management of CN and CP in terms of their passing the cost on to others. VIA Rail's management appears to be pretty much at the mercy of the management decisions taken by CN and CP in terms of passing these costs on, and if the CTC is to be the auditors, surely it must be the responsibility of CTC to interpret if the management decisions of CN and CP are strictly in the interest of these two companies, or if the decisions are in the interest of VIA. How does VIA Rail get some protection in this matter if not through the audit system?

The answer by a senior financial official of the CTC was as follows:

I think your earlier comments, Senator . . . were substantially correct, that we are doing an audit of the arithmetic, the invoices, and so forth. The audit process is a little more complicated than that, though, because we are also trying to disentangle common costs, which are not easily disentangled, such as roadway maintenance costs, in order to determine the proportions of this that should be assigned to the passenger service. It is because we have these lengthy calculations, based, among other things, on statistical regression analysis, that makes it take so long to complete the audit.

I think the second point you made, that we are not doing a value-for-money audit in the full sense of the word, is perhaps fair comment. I think that in my response earlier . . . I was recognizing that this is, perhaps, a hazy area, and I think we should go back to consider this in conjunction with Transport Canada to try to clarify this area that you have quite correctly identified.

The senator said:

So the answer is that there really is no protection for VIA from the management decisions of CN and CP. VIA is completely at the mercy of those decisions.

Then we received the following answer from a senior official of the CTC:

I should like to make a comment here. We assume that Frank Roberts knows something about railroading, the costs of railroading and the management of railroading because he has had years and years of experience in it. I think that the point should be made that there should be some ability on the part of the management of VIA Rail itself to know whether it is being taken or whether it is not being taken in connection with charges.

It is difficult for me to say anything more than that about it, but surely there should be some managerial skill involved in VIA Rail itself to protect their own interest. They do negotiate the contracts.

Then there was a further question by a member of the committee, which was as follows:

No matter how much expertise the management of VIA has, it would appear to me that unless they are in a position to have somebody—themselves, I am sure, they would like to have, but certainly an outside independent auditing agency—look at the process by which management of CN and CP come to their charging decisions, the amount of expertise Frank Roberts has is irrelevant. VIA is not in a position of saying: “We do not like the charges of CN and CP; we are going across the street to buy from another supplier tomorrow.” They will have to use that system whether they think the charges are fair or not. Obviously, they will try to get the cheapest rates they can, but unless somebody is in a position to say that they are getting value for money, or are not getting value for money, they are very much at the mercy of the management decisions of the two companies which are their only source of equipment or supply and on whom they depend in a way for their existence. They are completely locked in, as a senator has said.

It would seem to me that one of the basic and most important functions of the CTC audit would be to see that VIA, and through VIA, the people who use the service, get value for their money.

I should now like to refer to the proceedings of March 4, 1982, issue No. 23, beginning at page 29. There was the following question put to one of the senior officials of the CTC, who was again a witness before the committee:

I recall that one of the questions raised at a previous meeting of this committee—and I think you were here at the time—was whether your audit actually examined the billings to determine whether there was good value given for the charges actually made for the various items charged to VIA by the railways. Do you have any comment on that?

The answer was as follows:

Yes, Mr. Chairman, this question was indeed raised earlier. The audit essentially is a fiduciary type of audit ensuring that what the railways were charging VIA are costs that have been actually incurred. It is not a management-type audit, a comprehensive-type audit, to try to determine the efficiency and effectiveness of VIA's operations.

In other words, as we go into the question of examining charges made for back-shopping and general equipment repairs, we will certify that the charges were made, that the work was carried out, and we check time sheets and so forth to make sure of that. We are not, however, certifying that the work was necessary for the effective operation of VIA, which I think is essentially the concept that you are advancing.

If we were to do that, we would effectively be doing a management audit of VIA itself, and we do not appear to have any mandate to do that.

The question was asked:

Do you know whether anybody is actually doing that?

[Senator Smith.]

The witness answered:

I am not aware of that. In the course of our investigations in the United States, we visited the U.S. General Office of Accounting, and they do in fact comprehensive audits of Amtrack, examining the efficiency and effectiveness of management. I am not aware that this has been done in respect of VIA as yet, but I could be incorrect in that statement.

Another question was asked:

Under the law as it now stands, are you saying that no one is empowered or has the authority to do that, except, of course, VIA itself?

The answer was as follows:

I am not absolutely sure on that, but, if we were to do that, we would need, presumably, a direction from the Minister of Transport to do that type of audit, and this is not the direction we have at the moment. In addition, we have never done that type of audit. That does not mean that we would not necessarily have the ability to be able to undertake that. I am not sure that we have the resources, but I believe we would probably have the competence.

In another reply he said:

—if you are asking whether I think a comprehensive audit of the management type of that nature is necessary, I believe yes, that it is necessary in every type of organization. We in the Canadian Transport Commission have been subjected to this type of audit by the Auditor General, and while we may not have liked it, and we may have disagreed with some of his findings, I believe that, in principle, comprehensive audits are necessary, yes.

Then there was a further response by the senior legal counsel of the CTC which was as follows:

Mr. Chairman, may I add that I believe that the Government of Canada can pass regulations with respect to VIA that could include a power to conduct such a management audit of VIA by the Government of Canada or an agent acting on its behalf, since VIA is essentially dependent upon the public treasury for any shortfall. I do not know of any such regulations that have been passed, but I certainly would agree that I do not think that at the moment the Canadian Transport Commission enjoys any power to conduct such an audit.

In those very words it must be clear to all who read the proceedings or who listened to the testimony that the kind of audit the Canadian Transport Commission carries out and, presumably, the only audit it is authorized to carry out, of charges made by CN and CP has nothing whatever to do with value received for money expended by VIA. Therefore, it has nothing to do with value received by the public for the money it is compelled to pay to meet the losses sustained by VIA.

It seems to us, then, that whatever one may say about other phases of the relationship between VIA, the government, the public, and the other two main railways, it is absolutely essential that the kind of audit which deals with the value of service obtained for the money spent is the kind of audit that must be established legislatively, so that there can be no doubt about the competence of the CTC, or whoever may be authorized by legislation to carry it out. That is the only way to ensure that the money which VIA—and therefore the public—is forced to pay to CN and CP does not simply go to augment the profits of CN and CP. That would simply be another way of paying a sort of subsidy to them in relation to rail passenger service, which they do not even carry out.

I have emphasized this question of the audit because of its importance, and because it is rather clear from the response of the minister, which was given to us by the Leader of the Government the other day, that the actual nature of the audit was not fully dealt with by that response. It is important that the audit be taken very carefully into consideration in the matter of the legislation which is either under consideration now or will be under consideration when the minister issues the discussion paper which he mentioned in his response.

I thank honourable senators for their patience in listening to what must have been my rather dull attempt to deal with this extremely important question. Once again, I wish to express the view that, if VIA Rail is given the proper legislative framework within which to work, as well as reasonable sympathy and attention by all concerned, it can do what I think must be done as the country develops—that is, provide a good and reliable rail passenger transportation system for all major parts of the country.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this order is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, July 27, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think the Deputy Leader of the Government should let us know whether he has any information on the summer recess for this session, which started two years and three months ago. We do not know when we are going to adjourn for the summer, and it is already the end of July. Furthermore—

[English]

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Well, you are in the best position to answer that question.

Senator Flynn: Senator Benidickson, may grumble, but surely he must realize what has happened. The government is guilty of gross mismanagement. Bills C-124 and C-125 have just been introduced, and they arise out of a budget brought in to cover up a previous disaster.

Senator Benidickson: I meant no offence, but only that you would probably be the most knowledgeable. I was not complaining with respect to the question.

Senator Flynn: If you accept what I just told you as proof of what you said, that is fine with me.

The other point I want to make to the deputy leader is that there is no legislation before the Senate, with the exception of two private bills, namely, the Canada Day bill—I understand that the deputy leader will confirm that that is not a government bill, and that the government is not considering it as such—and the bill introduced by Senator Williams concerning Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day. We have no assurance that the bills that were referred to yesterday, namely, and more specifically, Bill C-124 and Bill C-125, will reach us next week.

As the situation is today, Bill C-124 is in committee, and my information is that it is going to be in committee all of next week. With regard to Bill C-125, the government has indicated that it will move a motion for time allocation, which would cause the vote on second reading to be taken on Monday night. Therefore the bill, following the vote on second reading, will go to committee. I understand it is going to a standing committee and not a committee of the whole. One way or the other it does not seem that the bill will reach us until late next week, if then.

• (1410)

My suggestion is that we should adjourn until some time the following week, subject, of course, to recall. If the Deputy Leader of the Government hears that there is agreement in the other place to adjourn for the summer, we could always be recalled. That would give Senator Denis an opportunity to take a few days of rest.

Hon. Azellus Denis: You and your funny jokes—we need plenty of rest from them.

Senator Flynn: When I make jokes I try to make them funny, but you never do.

Senator Denis: Hard worker!

Senator Flynn: Seriously, I was hoping that in the end Senator Denis would smile, because he knows how to smile occasionally. When he is rested he can smile.

Senator Denis: Very funny!

Senator Flynn: You have tried very often to be funny, but without success. Why are you jealous?

Senator Denis: You are either phony or funny. You have a choice.

Senator Flynn: Hansard will show that Senator Denis intervened in the debate.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Oh, oh!

Senator Denis: Keep on joking.

Senator Flynn: Keep on intervening.

That is one of the best interventions and contributions that Senator Denis has made for months. Senator Denis does know how to smile.

My question is: Why should we come back next week rather than the week after in view of the situation in the other place?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, following what I said yesterday as the reason for our returning next week, the situation respecting the two main bills arising out of the June budget—that is, Bill C-124 and C-125—is essentially the same as it was at that time and as described by Senator Flynn, except that I know that negotiations are taking place in the other place, and I am advised by colleagues in the Cabinet that those negotiations look promising. Therefore, there is quite a good chance that we could get both of those bills next week. Even in that event, of course, we could be recalled.

However, the situation regarding Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act, is not precisely as described by Senator Flynn. It is a private member's public bill, and the motion for second reading will be moved later today by Senator Bird. The government is supporting that private member's bill and wants it passed in its present form before the summer adjournment. I wish that to be very clear and unambiguous. The government is supporting this private member's public bill and wishes it passed in its present form before the summer adjournment. I am not giving an opinion; I am making a statement of the government's position. When we reach the debate stage, I am sure that Senator McIlraith, Senator Murray—

An Hon. Senator: Senator Doody.

Senator Frith:—Senator Doody, Senator Marshall, Senator Lang—anyone else?

An Hon. Senator: Senator Everett.

Senator Frith: Senator Everett, Senator Hicks—keep them coming.

An Hon. Senator: Senator Manning.

Senator Frith: Senator Manning—

Senator Flynn: Senator Denis.

Senator Frith:—Senator McGrand, Senator Roblin, Senator Smith, Senator Walker—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Dispense.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Question.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Senator Graham.

Senator Frith: So now I want to thank each one of those honourable senators, whose names I have just mentioned, for demonstrating why we have to sit next week.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

● (1415)

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I ask the deputy leader whether he will consider his position. We are not being brought back to deal with public business that is of a very important nature. The present indication from the Deputy Leader of the Government is that there are negotiations in progress which will lead us to knowing when we might expect those two budget bills. If that is so, why are we being brought back on the possibility of an agreement being reached, rather than using the other very good and former frequently used practice in this place of adjourning to a date in the future with the sure and certain knowledge that if any agreement is reached indicating that either bill is, or both are, to be sent here we will be recalled to deal with them at that time. Surely the remarks of the Deputy Leader of the Government indicate the very reason why we should use the other practice that we so frequently use with respect to adjournments.

Senator Marshall: Now, that is common sense.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as to the likelihood of an agreement on Bill C-124 and Bill C-125, my position and the position of the government is that it is a good thing for the Senate to be here ready to deal with those bills and, if we are here, it will hasten the adjournment.

As to the other question of whether the Holidays Act amending bill is a matter of public business, I think Senator McIlraith knows that it is a private member's public bill. I can only say that I do not share Senator McIlraith's apparent opinion that this is not a matter of public business. I think that—

Senator McIlraith: Government business.

Senator Frith: That is different. You did not say that; you said "public." It seems to me that it is also a matter of public business that there has been some considerable discussion about the amount of time that was given to debating that bill in the other place.

I believe the Senate should be here for the first reason—that is, to deal with Bills C-124 and C-125, if necessary—and, therefore, with the possibility of an adjournment earlier than now looks possible, and so that all honourable senators have a full opportunity to debate Bill C-201.

Senator Flynn: There is nothing in it.

Senator Frith: I think we should debate it next week. I simply want to make my position clear. I do not expect everybody to agree, but is the position, and that is why we are asking that the Senate reconvene next week. I believe there is plenty of public business for us to deal with next week.

Senator Flynn: Would you call us back for Bill S-28, which is also a matter of public interest?

Senator Frith: Not that bill alone.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government has stated the position of the government extremely well. I would point out that there are a number of other important measures now before Parliament.

Senator Asselin: Name them.

Senator Perrault: For example, there is the urea formaldehyde bill, which will affect thousands of people in the province of Quebec and across the country, the ports legislation and the legislation regarding Canagrex. There are a number of important measures. The Senate has authorized pre-studies of certain of these bills. There is work to be done by the committees next week. There is the possibility, as a result of a very amicable meeting held this morning, of certain legislation coming to us next week. I suggest that the problems in the country today certainly warrant—

Senator Flynn: A change in government.

Senator Perrault: —having the Senate sitting next week to deal with important legislation. I do not want any honourable senator to be under the illusion that the only reason for sitting next week is that we shall then be able to debate the motion for the second reading of Bill C-201, because there is the potential for much more legislation than, in addition to the pre-studies which have been authorized by the Senate.

● (1420)

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct to the Deputy Leader of the Government a question arising out of his remarks about the private member's public bill concerning the July 1 holiday. Why is the government so anxious to have this bill passed now—what is the urgency—bearing in mind that next July 1 is something like eleven and one-third months away?

Senator Marshall: Good point.

Senator McIlraith: Surely we should deal with legislation according to the importance of its subject matter, with decency and dignity and without undue haste.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in answer to that question, which is a good one, I would say that the position will be made clear during the debate on the bill.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): They are all good questions.

Senator Frith: Frankly, I doubt that this is the right time for me to enter into a discussion on that, because, first, this is not the time to enter into debate on that bill, and, second, the question is important for that debate. As I understood the question, it was why the bill should be passed in its present form at this time, when, as Senator McIlraith says, the next time the date concerned will arrive is over 11 months away.

I suggest that it would be more appropriate for me to give an answer to that question during the debate on the bill than to give it at this time.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Especially if you do not have an answer.

Senator Frith: I do have one.

Senator Smith: This gives you time to think it up.

Senator Frith: No, that is not so, although I don't blame you for saying so, because, in your place, I would take that shot, too, but it just does not happen to be true.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That has never bothered Senator Smith before.

Senator Frith: On the non-debatable motion for adjournment which we are talking about—

Senator Flynn: No, this is debatable.

Senator Frith: All right. In any event, it is appropriate for us to discuss why we are asking honourable senators to come back, and I have no quarrel with the fact that that question has been raised or that honourable senators have intervened on the subject.

Senator Roblin: Well, of course not; it is debatable.

Senator Frith: I admit that, if that helps. In any event, there it is.

Hon. David Walker: The honourable senator is now talking with his hands while he is sitting in his place. I suggest that he look in the gallery. He will see the greatest of all senators sitting there.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: Ask him what he thinks. He has already expressed his views in the press.

Senator Marshall: Bring him downstairs.

Senator Walker: Who are you, Senator Frith, to make a pronouncement on the greatest trick ever perpetrated in the House of Commons? It was shocking.

Senator Frith: I beg your pardon?

Senator Walker: Can't you hear me? I'll come over and talk directly to you.

Senator Olson: Stay in your place.

Senator Walker: I'll look after myself.

Senator Olson: I'll take care of you.

Senator Walker: I thought that if I came over and stood on your side and addressed my remarks directly to you, you might hear me better, Senator Frith, and I want to make sure you hear me because this is an important issue.

My people came to Canada to fight in the War of 1812. One of them was an officer in Brock's army. We feel very deeply about this matter. Whatever your correspondence might be, mine is overwhelmingly in favour of having this matter properly decided and adjudicated. It is almost criminal to take rules of Parliament and abort them in the way it was done in the House of Commons.

I realize you are not responsible for that. You were not there. In fact, there was not even a quorum. Only 13 members were present. No step was taken to correct that situation and the bill went through. Imagine—thirteen out of a house of 282.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Walker: It is shocking. There was no opportunity for members to express themselves because they were not there ready to express themselves.

That action was probably planned. It looks as if it was. A trick was played and the House of Commons put the thing through. Now it seems that you propose to continue the trickery by putting it through the Senate—dragooning your own side in order to put it through the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Let me say at once that I am looking forward to hearing Senator Walker's intervention in the debate on this bill, but the matter concerning us now is a motion to adjourn until Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I certainly do not want Senator Walker to feel that we are not all anxiously awaiting the elaboration of what he has already said concerning his position on Bill C-201. However, at the moment I believe he is entering into debate on that bill rather than talking on the adjournment motion.

Senator Walker: I do not intend to do that, but I do intend to make it quite clear that we have between now and the end of the week to go into and decide this question of Bill C-201. So why not do that today? Why not do it now? Why wait until we are not here? Why wait until you will have an opportunity to pull another trick on us?

An. Hon. Senator: No one is pulling any tricks.

Senator Walker: As far as my friend with the whiskers is concerned, my friend on the other side, nobody needs to pay any attention to him.

● (1425)

Senator Frith: I would be interested in the reaction of honourable senators to Senator Walker's suggestion.

An Hon. Senator: Let us have a vote on it.

Senator Frith: I can withdraw my motion and we shall sit tomorrow at 2 o'clock. Then, if everyone has had a chance to debate it, we shall come back again on Monday, Tuesday, or whenever.

Senator Flynn: You cannot withdraw your motion.

Senator Frith: Unless I get leave—

Senator Flynn: You have not been given leave.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn will have noticed that I prefaced this intervention by saying that I would be interested in hearing senators' views on this subject—which, of course, is asking for leave. If leave is not granted, my motion stands and we shall vote on it.

Senator Olson: If we defeat the motion, then we shall come back tomorrow.

Senator Everett: The deputy leader has stated that he wishes to have the fullest possible debate on Bill C-201. Would he agree that we could possibly debate it next week and vote on it the following week?

Senator Frith: I think that and many other possibilities exist. It would be acceptable to vote on it next week, providing every senator who wants to speak on it has an opportunity to do so. I hope we will have more than one speaker per day on the bill so that we can give everyone a full opportunity to participate. As I have already said, it would be desirable that as many senators as possible have an opportunity to speak on it.

Senator Everett: The deputy leader has said that he hopes it will be voted on next week. I am asking him if it is his feeling that it could be debated next week and voted upon the following week. Is that a possibility within his schedule?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is a possibility.

Hon. George van Rогgen: I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if the government leadership is agreed that this bill will be referred to committee for proper consideration and the taking of evidence.

In answer to some correspondence I told people interested in this matter that I was sure that, when the bill came to the Senate, it would be properly dealt with in committee, where representations could be made both pro and con. I hope I have not been incorrect in stating that in my correspondence.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would not attempt to anticipate the actions or the will of the Senate. We should await the second reading debate and then determine, in discussions with the Leader of the Opposition, whether it is appropriate to refer the bill to committee.

Senator Roblin: It will certainly go to committee; there is no doubt about that.

Motion agreed to.

HOLIDAYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Florence B. Bird moved the second reading of Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-201 proposes to change the official title of the July 1 holiday from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day".

● (1430)

At the outset, let us understand clearly what this bill does not purport to do. It proposes no changes in our form of government. It proposes no change in the name of our country.

I am sure many of you have read a recent letter to the Globe and Mail by our former colleague, the Honourable Eugene Forsey. He is a recognized authority on the Constitution, and he is distressed about this bill. He says that in the Constitution Act, 1982, "Dominion" is clearly set forth as the official title of our country. He goes on to say that it would be impossible to change it without a constitutional amendment. As usual, he is quite right.

Furthermore, Canada is, of course, a constitutional monarchy, and that fact is also entrenched in our Constitution.

What we are talking about today is our national day, and whether it should be officially designated as "Canada Day". This change would not, of course, require an amendment to the Constitution. It is something that Parliament has the power to do and should do as a public symbol of our evolution from colony to nation.

Honourable senators, history is not a stagnant pool. Canada's history is like the St. Lawrence River, which is fed by the Great Lakes, by the Gatineau, by the Rideau, by the Saguenay, and by many other lakes and streams. It keeps on moving along, ever changing, ever growing in depth and power. Over the years, many changes have taken place in Canada's political history.

All of us know that in 1867, a former French colony, La Nouvelle France, had become part of a British colony that joined two other British colonies in a union of four provinces called the Dominion of Canada. The name was chosen, at the insistence of the British Foreign Office, in preference to the word "Kingdom" that our Fathers of Confederation had used in their draft of the bill. The Dominion of Canada was a British dominion, authorized by the British North America Act, an act of the Parliament of Britain.

In those days, Canada was still in what might be called an adolescent stage of nationhood. Its final Court of Appeal was at Westminster; it could not change its Constitution without the permission of the British Parliament; its foreign policy was designed by the British Foreign Office; and Britain was responsible for its defence. Later the title "Dominion" was adopted by other federations of British colonies—by Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. As history flowed on, Canada and the others came of age.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about Newfoundland?

Senator Bird: Yes, of course, as well as the other provinces.

In 1931, the Statute of Westminster, another act of the Parliament of Britain, made Britain and the Dominions equal in status as members of the Commonwealth.

Up until this year, however, Canada was the only one of the Dominions which still, by its own choice, had to go to Westminster in order to change its Constitution. In 1982 an act of the Parliament of Britain made Canada a completely independent country.

There have also been changes in names and titles in order to conform with the changes in Canada's political status.

When George V assumed the Throne he was styled: "George the Fifth, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India." No royal style and title mentions "the British Dominions Beyond the Seas" prior to the Royal Proclamation of November 4, 1901. What it did was to sanction a convention that had been accepted after 1867 as the description of not only Canada but the other Dominions also.

The present title of the monarch owes its wording to the Commonwealth Conference of 1952 where, among other things, the Commonwealth's heads of state "recognized that the present titles are not in accord with current constitutional relations within the Commonwealth". The form they proposed in 1952 allowed each country in the Commonwealth to use a form suited to its own particular circumstances, for its own purposes and which included an appropriate territorial designation, but which, in addition, kept as its common element a description of the sovereign as "Queen of Her other Realms and Territories and Head of the Commonwealth".

The form proposed for Canada was "Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith". It was adopted by the Parliament of Canada in 1953 when Bill 102, respecting the Royal Style and Titles, was assented to.

● (1435)

Bill C-201 is, therefore, following a precedent with regard to changes in titles that was established 29 years ago, when Parliament changed the title of the sovereign.

Honourable senators, changing the name of our national day cannot, in any way, deprive us of the great heritage that has come to us from Britain. It is one of the great rivers that flows into the stream of our history. It is like the blood in our veins.

Canada's form of parliamentary government was inspired by the mother of parliaments. The common law used in nine of the provinces and in both territories is based on the common law of England. The rights of habeas corpus, of trial by jury, of freedom of speech, have come to us from Britain. We are still a monarchy and the monarchy is entrenched in our Constitution.

All this bill does is recognizing the fact that on July 1 we will be celebrating the national day of Canada as a completely independent country.

In his letter, the Honourable Eugene Forsey says that the official French translation of "dominion" is "puissance," which means "power".

[Translation]

For a long time now the people of Quebec have been celebrating Canada Day, not Dominion Day. I believe they are quite right.

[English]

Who on earth would want to wave a flag and cheer on "puissance" or "power" day? I remind honourable senators that the title of our national anthem is "O Canada," not "O Dominion"—and not "O Puissance," and that the oath that most of us took in this house was an oath of allegiance to the Queen of Canada, not to the Queen of the British Dominion beyond the Seas. I would also remind honourable senators that the statute passed by the Parliament at Westminster, which gave validity to the Constitution Act, 1982, is entitled: "The Canada Act."

I ask you, honourable senators: Do you think that the men who fought in two world wars were fighting for dominion—

Hon. Jack Marshall: Yes.

Senator Bird: —or for puissance, or do you think they were fighting for Canada? Those men wore proudly the word "Canada" on their shoulder patches.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bird: I think, honourable senators, that those who died had the word "Canada" engraved on their hearts.

Honourable senators, our sister dominion, Australia, calls its national day "Australia Day." Perhaps the people of the antipodes had less of an inferiority complex than we had because they severed their last legal tie to Britain—though not, of course, to the Commonwealth—earlier than we did. Now, at last, in the year 1982, we have achieved full nationhood. The days of our so-called inferiority complex are over. We know our own identity.

Honourable senators, Canada is a great country, a beautiful country. People have come from every corner of the earth to build and to defend this country. We are proud of our achievement. We are proud of Canada, and on July 1 we should know our gratitude to this great country, and the love that we have for it, by celebrating Canada Day.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I wish to speak on this bill, and I am prepared either to do so now or to adjourn the debate, whichever honourable senators wish.

Some Hon. Senators: Proceed.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I am very interested in this bill. Its sponsor in the Senate is really sponsoring a private member's bill that has come to us from the other place. It is a private member's bill proposing to amend a public bill—namely, the Holidays Act. The purport of the amendment is what the honourable senator dealt with in an able, eloquent, literary style which, with great deference, is completely irrelevant to the points I wish to raise in the debate by way of objection to the bill.

In other words, honourable senators, "Dominion Day" has been the correctly identified designation of the holiday we have celebrated as our national holiday since Confederation. I want to deal with that at some length a little later on in my remarks, but what is proposed in this bill is the change of that designation to "Canada Day". It may well be that we have developed to that point in our history where "Canada Day" would be a better designation for that date. At the very outset of my remarks, I want to make it clear that I have no objection whatever to the designation of the July 1 national holiday as "Canada Day".

I am grateful to the sponsor of the bill who spoke with much greater eloquence than I can on it, and I thank her for her references to our constitutional development through the years. I hope that, as a lively and energetic country, we will continue to develop for many years to come, but the very point I wish to make arises out of that. I think we should do it in a way that will make us an even greater country in the decades ahead than we have been in the more than a century that has passed since 1867. We did not achieve the status, or the progressive improvements in our status, that the sponsor mentioned, by conducting ourselves in the way we are seeking to conduct ourselves with regard to this proposed change by means of this private member's bill. Canadians can be rightfully proud of the manner in which we achieved that status.

If the honourable senator will take the time to recall the Imperial Conferences of 1926 through 1930, culminating in the Statute of Westminster, which was the final confirmation of our full and complete independence, and to read the debates of both houses of Parliament on the Statute of Westminster, she will come to realize the importance of proceeding correctly in such matters.

In the recent debate on the Constitution assertions were made on that subject that are not historically correct, and we started out with a procedure on the Constitution address that was not in keeping with the best traditions of this country. We started out with a procedure that was found by the courts—

Senator Asselin: You voted in favour of it.

Senator McIlraith: The honourable senator is quite wrong. We started out in a way that was not in keeping with the tradition of conduct of the Parliament of this country in either house. By virtue of debate and pointing out the errors in that method of proceeding, we were able to get the matter referred to the Supreme Court of Canada and our procedures set on a correct course with the provinces being consulted. The litigation launched by the provinces was allowed to be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada. After the Supreme Court had delivered its judgments, whether one like them or not, the government consulted with the provinces before legislating in the area having to do with the sovereignty of the provinces, and amendments were made to the Constitution Bill. The importance of that was that, in the final analysis, we did proceed correctly, although there are many views on the procedure we initially adopted before ultimately adopting the one that allowed us to achieve that final result. I am one of those who believe that that is why our Constitution will be respected.

I want to make my position clear as to what is wrong with this bill. Frankly, I think it is a horrible little bill. Technically, there are many things wrong with it, but, theoretically, those could be corrected in committee.

There are many people in this country, whose ancestors were here in 1830s, and who took part in a rebellion to achieve self-government. There was very real feeling abroad. There are Canadians whose ancestors were in that struggle, and who, through that struggle, achieved a lot of reform.

I could describe what happened following the 1837 episode and the British Commission that came to investigate the trouble in the colony and the changes resulting in the Act of Union between Upper and Lower Canada, and so on. I could describe the history of the Rebellion Losses Bill of 1849 resulting from the rebellion in Montreal when the Parliament Buildings were burned, and what that meant by way of achievement of responsible government in Lord Elgin's day. The people had more say in governing themselves by making their government, which was still a colonial government, more answerable to them than it had been to that time.

These developments culminated in the four provinces—New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Upper Canada and Lower Canada—coming together. After three years or so of eloquent debate and discussion, these intelligent, far-sighted gentlemen succeeded in arriving at a set of resolutions to form a country. What was it they succeeded in doing? By the statute called the British North America Act, they succeeded in having the imperial authority relinquish its control and government of the colonies. What did they do with that power when they relinquished it? They did not just throw it into the air and abdicate. Through the B.N.A. Act they provided that those colonists should henceforth govern themselves and have dominion over themselves through their federal Parliament, as set out in section 17 of that act, and through their provincial legislatures.

That was what the Dominion was all about. To celebrate that great day of achieving the right of self-government—something that surely all people in Parliament today value and respect—they called the national day, July 1, which was the day the measure came into effect, Dominion Day. Those far-sighted people who had fought to bring us to that point in the struggle for self-government, and their successors, have, through all those decades, celebrated as Dominion Day the day upon which they achieved the right to govern themselves. Certainly, our great national holiday, brought about in that way, is worthy of better handling than it is sought to give it here today.

If each one of you will take the trouble to recall how you have celebrated July 1 in the past, I think you will agree with me that on that day there were three obvious things. First, no matter what form the celebration took, or whether you were in a town, a village or a city, it was a happy holiday. The people celebrating it were a happy people, with dignity and pride in themselves. Secondly, there was quite a bit of emotional feeling about the day. You did not have to be very bright to discern that. Thirdly, they were proud of their country. That is the history of Dominion Day.

A long time has passed since 1867. Canada has welcomed many tens of thousands of immigrants who have come here to become citizens of Canada and share their lives with us. It may well be that we ought to change the name of this holiday to Canada Day, and I have no objection whatever to that.

Let us just see, however, what we are being asked to do. Before July 9 there were two bills on this subject before the other house. What were those two bills? One of them was Bill C-37, introduced in the House of Commons by the Secretary of State of Canada for first reading in this session some two years ago. Why it was not proceeded with I do not know. As a matter of fact, it is none of my business. Neither do I know why the session has lasted so long since then.

Bill C-37 seeks to change the name of the July 1 holiday from Dominion Day to Canada Day. It has that much in common with the private member's bill that is before us today. In addition to the mere change of name there are some consequential amendments that provide for certain things that are required to be done in order to make the change in name effective, and to obviate the litigation that may follow if such changes are not carried out in, for instance, the Bills of Exchange Act. If any of you have been confronted with the more technical aspects of that legislation, dealing with notes and drafts, you will at once see the significance of such provisions. There are other provisions of lesser consequence dealing with changes to the Labour Code, the Interpretation Act, and so on. In other words, Bill C-37 was a bill that was properly drafted for the purpose of dealing with the subject matter contained therein.

Now we come to the present inadequate bill, and although I do not have the date of the first reading, there is no doubt that it was presented only very recently as a private member's bill in the other place. Whether it is proper to introduce a private member's bill when there is a public bill on the order paper at the same time, dealing with the same subject, is a point that I do not propose to argue now, although I have done so, and I believe successfully, in the past.

However that may be, as a part of the Parliament of Canada we have a responsibility. We are being asked to deal with legislation here that is of great emotional interest to all of our population. The matter is quite important and is of national significance. With this in mind, it would be just as well to look at the record of proceedings in the other place, and that we are entitled to do. House of Commons Debates for Friday, July 9, 1982, at page 19201, deals with private members' hour. It is entitled, "Private Members' Public Bills." Just above that title, you will see the figure "(1600)". That refers to the time of day. Remember that this is the official report of the proceedings of the House of Commons, so we must take cognizance of that fact. The Deputy Speaker dealt first with the other orders on the order paper. Then this bill was brought forward, and Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved that Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

The Deputy Speaker then asked if it was the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion. There was a discussion on a point of order as to whether or not they wished to deal with the bill in Committee of the Whole, which is exclusively their business. The bill was then called, was given second reading—

Senator Benidickson: The Deputy Speaker put the question?

Senator McIlraith: Yes. The motion was agreed to and he put the question. Then it went into Committee of the Whole. In Committee of the Whole, the clauses and the preamble were called in the usual order and were agreed to. Then the bill was read the third time and passed.

After this there followed a discussion as to whether or not they could say that the clock read 5 o'clock, that being the hour for adjournment. That discussion was very brief, but I just want to get the exact language here. There was some discussion about giving up the right to do other business in the next fifty-five minutes of the private members' hour. Then the discussion as to time, and so on, took place. They then agreed that the house would adjourn. After agreement that the house would adjourn, the house did so in fact and the official report says:

At 4.05 p.m. the House adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

I ask each one of you if you seriously think that a proposition of as much significance to the people of Canada as this one should be rushed through by us in the dying days of a session, which most of us thought would end some two weeks ago, without anybody who may have ideas on this subject being heard either here or in the other place? I even wonder if we should deal with this inadequate bill at all. I suggest, however, and I suggest this most firmly to the government, that they consider proceeding in a different way. I suggest that they proceed in what I would regard as a more—I hardly know what adjective to use—dignified way—and I am trying to be gentle in using only that word, I suggest that they have a minister of the Crown present to the House of Commons or to the Senate the government bill which deals with this subject properly. I would hope that it would be to the Senate, because that is where I think it should originate, since either money nor expenditures are involved. Then, once it is given second reading, a committee of the Senate should hear any associations or individuals who may wish to be heard on the matter, after which the bill could be reported out of committee and, if desired, passed.

I spoke a moment ago about our expectations with regard to the adjournment of this session, and I have mentioned in my remarks how long it has already gone on. I think any objective person would agree that it has been much too long. In any event, we are at the point where we are seeking adjournment of this much-too-long session, in the reasonable expectation that a new session will commence—I cannot say when, but probably, early in October. Then, not this bill but a properly drafted bill should be presented to the Senate. I am sure it could be dealt with expeditiously. It could be sent to committee, and the committee could hear such bodies as may wish to be heard. There may be none, but I have learned that it is important that public bodies be heard if they wish to make representations to Parliament, and that the committee procedure is the way to do it. The bill could then be reported back to the Senate, passed and sent to the other place, where they have already indicated by their vote on this bill that they would adopt such a bill without any loss of time.

I respectfully suggest that our best procedure now is not necessarily to defeat the bill—although I will not accept it in its present form because I do not think it is worthy of the occasion. To me, it just does not dignify the occasion sufficiently when dealing with our great national holiday. Rather, we should not call it again for debate, but should let it die on the Order Paper. Then, in the new session, the government should bring forward the correct bill and let us deal with it quickly.

I may not have made myself clear, in connection with some earlier questions today on procedure, when I tried to get from the Deputy Leader of the Government an answer as to whether or not there had been real consideration of the matter by the government. I suspect not, and that it merely considered the question of having the name changed.

As I have already indicated, we have eleven and one-third months in which to deal with such a bill with decency and dignity, and I ask the minister of the Crown now present in the Senate, and the three who have just left the chamber, to take up with the government the question of proceeding in the way I have indicated, or in some other way that would do justice to the occasion.

Honourable senators, I wish to thank you for hearing me so patiently on this subject, but I feel strongly that it is one that deserves our careful attention.

Hon. Robert Muir: Would the distinguished senator permit a question for clarification and my edification? I listened carefully to what he said.

I should point out that according to House of Commons Debates for Friday, July 9, 1982:

MR. HAL HERBERT (VAUDREUIL) moved that Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

That motion was agreed to—that is, that the bill should be referred to that committee.

Would the honourable senator explain to me why the bill is now before the Senate and is not before the committee that is referred to in the Commons motion? Is that not what they voted on, that it be referred to a committee?

Senator McIlraith: In answer to the honourable senator's question, I am not sure that I can be helpful. I do not wish to get into a discussion of the internal procedure in the other place—I do not consider it proper to do so here—but may I draw the honourable senator's attention to part of the debate in the other place? It is reported as follows:

MR. SMITH: I rise on a point of order. Perhaps we could seek the unanimous consent of the House to see if this matter could be dealt with in Committee of the Whole so that we could deal with all stages of this bill today, as it seems to be meeting with the approval of the House.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I started to declare that the motion was carried. The hon. member's point of order is a little premature, the Chair will now entertain the Parliamentary Secretary to the Privy Council (Mr. Smith) on his point of order.

MR. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could see whether the House would be disposed to give unanimous consent to this bill being dealt with in Committee of the Whole today.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is there unanimous consent that the bill be considered in Committee of the Whole?

Is the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) rising?

MR. ROSE: I am not rising, Mr. Speaker.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is there unanimous consent?

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon—Mr. Francis in the chair.

I believe that is the answer to the honourable senator's question. I believe it is clear.

Senator Muir: I know what the answer was, but I thought it was a good try.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, having regard to the seriousness of the conditions that prevail in our country today, I find it hard to believe that Parliament is being asked to deal with a bill of this kind at this time. A little over a year and a half ago, when Canada was slipping into the depression conditions that we now face, the public affairs of the country almost came to a standstill for months because of the government's obsession to proceed with its constitutional proposal. I am not minimizing the importance of that subject one iota, but, as I have said in this house before, it was an issue about which there was no significant public interest or demand, and yet the country was divided as it was never been divided before by the interjection of the constitutional issue at a time when the government's attention should have been directed to far more serious conditions that were developing and with which Canadians as a whole were deeply concerned.

After going through that exercise, with the hard feelings and alienation created by it, now that we are in the crisis situation which arose out of what was developing in the country at that time, we find that Parliament has to deal with an issue which has relationship to that former matter, which is highly emotional, and which, again, is the type of thing that creates serious divisions and alienation among Canadians. To me, it is almost unbelievable that the government would ask Parliament to proceed with this matter at this time.

Again, I am not minimizing the importance of this subject. As Senator McIlraith has rightly pointed out, this is a matter of statute and importance, but it is in a different realm altogether from the day-to-day economic worries of millions of Canadians. I am quite certain that the last thing that is on the minds of the 1,300,000 Canadians who are out of jobs, wondering how they are going to make the next mortgage payment, how they are going to provide for the education of their children and preserve their businesses, is whether July 1 should be called Canada Day, Dominion Day or anything else.

Honourable senators, I honestly feel—and I hope that you share this feeling—that the situation in this country today is so serious that under no circumstances should we be interjecting, in this house or the other place, issues which will again divide and alienate hundreds of thousands of our people, when it is so totally unnecessary.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Manning: In times like these the public have the right to expect their government to set aside irrelevant matters and to concentrate on steps to deal with the great concerns that are in the minds of almost every Canadian today. As a symbolic gesture in that direction the government could at least let this bill die on the Order Paper. It is unfortunate that it ever appeared on the Order Paper, but the least the government can now do is indicate its intention to concentrate on matters that are more urgent and important in the minds of the public, by letting the bill die on the Order Paper to be dealt with at a later time, in the manner which has been so clearly and ably outlined by Senator McIlraith.

• (1510)

If the government is unwilling to do that, then I appeal to honourable senators to defeat this bill for two reasons. The first one, dealt with so very ably by the Honourable Senator McIlraith, is that an issue of this kind should be dealt with in a dignified and appropriate manner. The form and manner in which this bill came to this house is objectionable, to say the least, and certainly should be beneath the dignity of Parliament when dealing with an issue of this kind. On previous occasions the government has proposed government bills to do this very thing. I think the record will show that they were not proceeded with in the other place because opposition to them was such that the government wisely did not want to make an issue out of the legislation. In this case, as has been outlined, the matter was sneaked through the other house without debate, with less than a quorum in the house, and it now turns up on the Order Paper of this chamber for sober second thought.

Anything of this importance coming to us in this manner should be rejected out of hand as being beneath the dignity of this assembly.

If this matter of changing the name of Dominion Day is of such tremendous importance and is something the public of Canada is clamouring for, there would have been no problem for the government to introduce a bill and have it passed through the house with overwhelming support. They knew that could not be done, which in itself is proof that this is not the kind of issue on which the public is either united or, under present conditions, is even deeply interested in. So, for that reason, the form of the bill and particularly the manner in which it came to this house, I suggest that it should be rejected. I agree completely with what was said by the speaker who preceded me, that if the bill is to be dealt with at all it should be dealt with in an appropriate and proper manner.

There is a second important reason why this bill should not be proceeded with. That is, while it serves no constructive purpose or meets no urgent national need, it wipes out one more part of Canada's heritage by abolishing, Dominion Day and all that name implies to millions of Canadians, and replaces it with a name that has absolutely no historic significance. I do not know of another country on earth—and this has been pointed out by others—that names its national birthday after itself. Has anybody ever heard of "France Day", "England Day", "Scotland Day"—

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: What about "Australia Day"?

Senator Manning: —or "United States Day"? These names do not convey anything like what is conveyed in the historic name "Dominion Day," which was not forced on this country or even suggested to it by Great Britain, but was a suggestion that originated in Canada and met with immediate approval by the Fathers of Confederation—and very appropriately so.

One may ask, "What real difference does it make anyway?" We have to recognize that to many Canadians it would make a lot of difference. There are those who still cherish the heritage of the past in this country. Many, perhaps the majority who feel that way, are persons who were pioneers or are sons and daughters of those identified with the opening up of this country and whose memories go back to the early days of Canada's history. Heritage means a lot to those people, and why shouldn't it?

Those people will deeply resent what they will perceive, rightly or wrongly, as one more step by this government in a long series of deliberate steps to chip away at all those things which pertain to the rich heritage of this country's past. You may say that is not what they are doing, but I say to you, honourable senators, that you can travel across this country and everywhere you go, particularly in western Canada, you will find a very firm belief that this government has followed a persistent course of whittling away at almost everything that pertains to the rich heritage that we knew in this country in earlier days.

I say especially to the government: You have nothing worthwhile to gain by this action, but you have much to lose. If you are really concerned for the unity and future solidarity of this country, then do not go on doing these things which alienate and antagonize so many people. You can use your overwhelming majority to steamroller this ill-conceived bill into law, but what will you accomplish by doing so? You will have achieved nothing constructive and worthwhile. You will have angered and alienated another large group of Canadians who already deeply resent the government's sordid record in actions of this kind. I can tell you, whether you believe it or not, that in my part of western Canada, at least, the fires of separatism are burning over wide areas of the region, and ill-advised and unnecessary actions of this kind are the very thing that will further fan those flames in a conflagration that can do irreparable damage to this country. I am not so sure that some of those flames are not already almost out of control.

Honourable senators, at a time when the government itself is appealing to Canadians to unite to face our economic crisis—as has been done in this house, in the other place and publicly—why take such a foolish step that will further impair the national unity we so much need if we are going to successfully come to grips with the serious problems confronting us as a people today? If the government must have a Canada Day—and I do not think anybody will quarrel too much with that—let it pick any day it likes, identify it with the new Constitution if it feels that is what should be done, call it "Canada Day," "Trudeau Day," "Liberal Day" or anything it likes, but do not destroy the rich heritage that attaches in the minds of millions of Canadians to Dominion Day, which has been the official birthday of this country since it was born.

I appeal to the government, for these reasons, not to take this foolish step and, therefore, let the bill die on the Order Paper—or else let us defeat it.

Hon Charles McElman: May I ask a question of the honourable senator?

Senator Manning: Yes.

Senator McElman: Throughout his discourse, the honourable senator kept wondering why the government did not do this and did not do that, as though he were talking about a government bill. Is he not aware that this is a private member's bill, and would he stop the process of Parliament on a private member's bill?

Senator Manning: I am quite aware that we are dealing with a private member's bill, but I agree with Senator McElman, that this kind of bill should be introduced by a minister of the Crown, as the first one was two years ago. I think that is a far more appropriate way.

● (1520)

Senator McElman: My question is related to the fact that the senator seemed to be blaming the government for this bill at this stage of events; that it should not be before Parliament; that the government should not have it placed before Parliament. Is he not aware that the government had nothing to do with the introduction of this bill?

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I am quite sure my honourable friend knows as well as I do that, if the government had not been behind it, this bill would never have been passed through the House of Commons by any private member.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macquarrie, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 27, 1982, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, July 27, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE LATE HON. JOHN J. CONNOLLY, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are times in Parliament when mere words are inadequate for the occasion; this is such a time.

The death of the great John Connolly inspires many thoughts in all of us because John, and his life and work, touched the lives of so many parliamentarians—indeed, thousands of people both inside and outside Parliament in such a positive, beneficial and sensitive manner.

All of us have our own private recollections of John Connolly. Some served in Parliament with him longer than others; some knew him in different ways from others. Some will recall him as a parliamentary leader with a deep respect for the parliamentary system and its traditions—a reverence and respect which transcended all partisan considerations. He was a scholar. He had an enormous knowledge of the history and the operation of Parliament, and he possessed a great concern for the preservation of the integrity of Parliament, its traditions and rules.

Some knew John Connolly as a philosopher-politician whose vision, interest and concern went beyond his own party in Parliament to encompass the entire parliamentary system. Some knew the John Connolly who inspired hundreds of people across this country to contribute to the parliamentary system, either to work for some political party or to dedicate a life to Parliament.

One of the speeches that he made before he died was to a group of young people. In this speech he recalled that he had taken it upon himself to have installed permanent lighting at night on the Laurier tomb in the Notre Dame Cemetery, close to the school where he was speaking. He said that he believed that that light on the Laurier tomb at night, for the thousands, perhaps millions, of people who would pass there in the course of time, would become a symbol and a beacon of the great Canadianism which Laurier inspired, but John Connolly was the type of man who would have supported a beacon on the tomb of Sir John A. Macdonald or on any other monument honouring those who had served this nation with dedication and distinction. His was not just a narrow, partisan concern.

Others will recall John Connolly, the architect of many election campaigns—more of them successful than not. Many of us in our party have our own memories of those campaigns. Undoubtedly, several volumes could be filled with stories arising from campaigns in which John Connolly played a major role.

Some honourable senators will recall John Connolly's considerable achievements in his chosen profession of law. His co-religionists will remember his steadfast and abiding faith, and his work and support for the church he loved. His was a faith which encompassed the differences which exist among the various denominations, creeds and religions in our nation.

Some will carry memories of John Connolly, the graduate of Notre Dame who loved sports—the man who rejoiced with every Expo or Blue Jay or Notre Dame victory and suffered with every loss; the man who enjoyed, along with the late Mike Pearson, an afternoon in the sunshine at the ballpark, eating peanuts and rooting for the home team, unfailingly a good sport—a good winner and a good but reluctant loser, in both sports and politics.

Everyone will recall the infinite number of kind and considerate acts that he performed for all peoples of every background and station in life, from the newest employee on Parliament Hill to heads of state.

● (2010)

Honourable senators will be interested to know that in the last week of his life Senator Connolly was active still on behalf of those who needed help. One of his last painful telephone calls was an inquiry on behalf of one of the workers at the hospital, asking if some information could be obtained so that that employee could be helped with a personal difficulty.

The fact is that we in Canada have lost more than an able, eloquent and dedicated parliamentarian; we have lost a very great friend and we mourn his passing. Together with all honourable senators, I join in extending profound condolences to his wife, Ida, and to his sons, Peter and John, and their wives and families.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am deeply saddened, as we all are, by the death of John Connolly. Only a short time ago—it was on October 31 of last year—he left the Senate after deciding to retire at the age of 75. He left us in apparent good health, and we were very glad that he would be able to look forward to, not necessarily a more restful life but a life in which he would have more time for his favorite pastimes. Unfortunately, he was struck by illness a few months ago, and we have known for some time that he would be unable to overcome the problems caused by his illness.

When he left this House, at the beginning of November last year, we mentioned his very considerable professional career—he was a member of the Bar of both Ontario and Quebec and had acquired an excellent legal reputation—and also his political career. We also touched on his admirable qualities as a human being. He was a gentleman in the classical sense of the word, with an abiding interest in every aspect of human life—his professional concerns, politics, sports, literature, religion—in fact, he was a typical seventeenth century gentleman. He was also a gentle man and extremely good company. I know this personally, since I had the same responsibilities that I have now when he was Leader of the Government in the Senate. I remember that immediately after I was appointed, he took it upon himself to come to my office to discuss the business of the Senate. I mentioned that it was actually up to me to go and see him, but he said, no, he wanted to have a talk in my office. From that moment on, we became fast friends, and this never changed. Later, on various trips, we had an opportunity to discuss many other subjects aside from matters concerning the Senate or politics in general. His wife Ida and my own wife were also present on these trips, and these are among the memories I cherish most.

With his family, I mourn his passing, and I am saddened by the thought that he did not have a chance to enjoy his well-deserved retirement for more than a few months.

[English]

I want to assure his charming wife, Ida, and his sons, and all other members of the family, of my deepest condolences, which are, of course, those of all of us on this side.

• (2015)

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, it is with much sadness that I rise to add a few words of appreciation for the great service given by my erstwhile deskmate, the late Senator John Connolly, to the Senate and to Parliament. For the last half century, or perhaps a little longer, we were thrown together in one capacity or another, whether as fellow practitioners of the law in Ottawa; whether it was when he was executive assistant to the Honourable Angus Macdonald, the then Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and I was a private member in the House of Commons; whether it was later when he came to this House and was appointed Leader of the Government, and, of course, Minister without Portfolio, and when I was a minister in the Pearson government and, for a few years, government house leader; whether it was later on when we were together in the Senate sitting at either adjoining desks or the same desk; or whether it was during the 20 years when we lived next door to each other.

In one way or another I have had the privilege and opportunity to know him, to work with him and to discuss many aspects of public affairs with him. I must say that during all that time he remained always the same person. He was always true to himself and sought to serve the public interest, as he saw it. I can tell honourable senators that when he was Leader of the Government in the Senate and I was in the other place as a minister of the Crown, I know, from my own personal knowledge—and remember that for two and a half years I was government house leader—how well and ably the interests of the Senate were presented and how much that contributed to the general well-being of the work of Parliament.

I want to acknowledge and place on record that appreciation of his service. Whether it was his natural good manners and dignity, whether it was his full appreciation of our Canadian system of government—which is based largely on convention and an understanding of the importance of convention and tradition in the functioning of Parliament—or whatever the cause, he always sought to conduct himself and the business of the institution of Parliament in full recognition of such factors.

I shall miss him greatly. His sensitivity in dealing with other parliamentarians and with matters pertaining to Parliament is something I shall always remember. I speak of him with some emotion for that reason.

Honourable senators, I wish to add my sense of loss at his passing from us, and to express my condolences and sympathy to his wife, his two sons and his two brothers.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, like Senator McIlraith and a few other members of this House, I had the pleasure of knowing Senator Connolly before his appointment to the Senate and, of course, before I became a senator myself.

We had the opportunity to be involved together in numerous undertakings, not always of a political nature but often so.

When the Leader of the Government referred to the flood-lighting of the Laurier monument, I was reminded once again that this was a favourite and very secret plot that John and I carried out for a couple of months before we could bring it to a successful conclusion. I have been thinking quite a bit, much more than usual, about John over the past several months. I was worried about his physical problems, though I had no worries at any time about his moral problems.

I think we should remember John Connolly for one word which he uttered at all times, a word with which we in this Chamber are all familiar, the word “concern”. I might even be tempted to try to imitate his stance and his words: “Now, this is my concern; I am concerned about this; the Senate should be concerned about this; or the government should be concerned about this.” “Concern” was John’s watchword. His concern was not only with issues or peoples, but with individuals. In a jocular fashion, he would often try to dissimulate, but anyone, regardless of station, who had a problem could seek out John in this building—where he could be found almost daily for nearly 30 years—or in any other institution he was associated with, and John would talk to that person, draw out the problem and try to solve it, and most of the time he did solve it.

God created man with full freedom of thought, full freedom of judgement and full freedom of action. I am not privy to God’s criteria for man, but in my view, resulting from my association with John Connolly these many years, he was as close to the man I think God would envisage as anyone I have ever known.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, when I think of John Connolly, whom I have known intimately during the twenty years I have been here, I think of his unsurpassed kindness, humility and ability.

● (2025)

I do not think we appreciate that Senator Connolly was probably the best educated man in the Senate. He graduated from the University of Ottawa, from Queen's University, and from that famous university, Notre Dame. He then came back to Canada, after earning Ph.D. and LL.D. degrees, and studied law at the University of Montreal. He was subsequently called to the Quebec Bar and became a lawyer in the province of Quebec, and to the Ontario Bar. He earned his degrees and did not gather honorary ones. That is the way he conducted his entire life.

I have never seen another Liberal leader in this place for whom I have had as much respect. He was tremendous. He had personality. He had character. He got things done the way he wanted them done, in a kindly way without upsetting people. The hostility which sometimes prevails here did not apply to John. You could not even feel nasty when he was around.

He was a kindly, good man and deserved all the success he achieved. He also deserved the wonderful life he had, and when I think back on his achievements I realize that they were monumental.

I think it was because he was such a good executive and such a good administrator, in addition to his proverbial good nature, that he was able to achieve his mastery over the Senate. I think of how well he did during the war and how he took hold of the Department of National Defence and became the executive assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. For five years he slogged away at that job and did it magnificently. I think, too, of the other contributions he made as a Cabinet minister, all of them outstanding.

My memory of John Connolly will not be that he was an outstanding man, as he certainly was, but that he was a kindly, good and enlightened human being who was devoted to his family, Ida and their two fine sons. He was completely devoted to them, and they to him. Finally, I think of him as a great, devout Roman Catholic.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, it was on the fourth day of November last that I rose in this chamber to pay tribute to Senator John Connolly for his 28 years of service in the Senate. We all wished him many happy years in retirement. We little realized how short that time was to be.

It was on the occasion of his seventy-fifth birthday that he retired, a distinguished jurist and parliamentarian. He had served his country in many different capacities, both in war and in peace. His record of achievements is already well known to senators and I will not repeat it.

John Connolly and I had been friends for more than 40 years. I was first attracted to him when I found that he could listen and consider what one had to say. He was an excellent listener.

He loved Canada and its institutions. His contribution to the Senate was outstanding. He believed in the Senate and rose to its defence vigorously, logically and effectively. His approach to the Senate made it sensitive to the public domain. He displayed great responsibility and patience when he was Leader of the Government in the Senate. He had an acute sense of humour, loved sports, especially the Notre Dame football team, and could discuss baseball with the late Mike Pearson, which took some doing.

● (2030)

He stepped on few toes and ruffled few feathers. He was a man of broad vision and stood tall in Ottawa, which made him even taller across the country.

During his many years in public life his advice was sought by leaders. His life was always useful. He had tolerance and humility, was a man of wisdom, reason and wit, a man immensely involved in the working of society, a true democrat, a man for all seasons, a truly civilized man. I lament his passing and express my deepest sympathy to his wife and family.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, the year is 1671, from Milton:

Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail

Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,

Dispraise or blame; nothing but well and fair,

And what may quiet us in a death so noble.

And one hundred years earlier, from Shakespeare:

Good-night, sweet prince.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise with some hesitation, because you may wonder why I, a relatively new member of this body should speak about the late John Connolly.

I knew John Connolly before I came to this place. He and I first met when we were mourning the death of the late Honourable Angus L. Macdonald, his former minister, and through the years that followed I met him frequently.

I do not rise to pay him an ordinary tribute, because beautiful tributes have already been paid to him this evening, tributes which I heartily endorse. I wish to speak about something which has not been brought to the attention of the Senate this evening, and which is of direct interest to those concerned with the passing of John Connolly.

My memory is not as good as it was, but some years ago I came to Ottawa representing my native province at a conference of ministers who were endeavouring to deal with the Constitution of Canada. The Minister of Justice at that time was the Honourable Guy Favreau. His predecessor was the Honourable Davie Fulton. The Honourable Davie Fulton and the Honourable Guy Favreau were good men to have working on the Constitution of Canada.

As a result of that conference a proposal was made regarding the Constitution of Canada. That proposal was called the Fulton-Favreau formula, and had met with the approval of the representatives of all the provinces. At a later date one of the provinces had a change of heart and withdrew its approval of the Fulton-Favreau formula. At that time, unanimous consent was necessary, so the Fulton-Favreau formula was not proceeded with, but it was an excellent formula. I do not wish to be contentious at a time like this, but, in my opinion, that formula would have stood the rest of Canada in good stead had it been adopted. As I say, it was called the Fulton-Favreau formula, but, in my opinion, it should have been called the Fulton-Connolly formula, because the late Senator John Connolly was associated with Guy Favreau at that conference. He, among others, was chairman of that conference, but of all the chairmen who were effective, of all the chairmen who sought to bring about unanimity, of all the chairmen who really made us feel that we were proud to be Canadians, John Connolly was the one. He was the man to whom the major portion of the credit for the success of the Fulton-Favreau formula should have gone. As a young man representing my province, I had that experience of seeing him in action—an experience I have never forgotten. Years later I met him in this body, and he showered me with kindness. He sent me samples of his literary works.

John Connolly was everything that has been said about him this evening. Of all the persons who have graced this chamber and will no longer grace it, the one who will be missed the most, and who perhaps made the greatest contribution to it, is Senator John Connolly. All of us feel a deep sense of loss at his passing, and in our sorrow we extend our heartfelt sympathy to his wife, his children and the other members of his family.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was associated with Senator John Connolly for about 25 years, mostly in the world of politics, but not entirely. During that time he gave unerringly good advice and played a warm-hearted, avuncular role to Senator Davey, Senator Lang and me. He sponsored me in the Senate, but I do not think that we should allow that to mar our otherwise excellent memory of him!

The testimony to his faith, and the way he lived his faith, is that although he spent his life in politics—a field of conflict and controversy—he made only friends and assured his place in history and, I believe, beyond. The loss is ours, but an occasion like this is one on which not just to mourn a death but also to honour a life, and that is what honourable senators have been doing so eloquently this evening. The only regret I have is that he did not stay longer so that he and, more importantly, we could continue to enjoy the fruits of his exemplary life.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am sure you do not expect me to repeat the speeches that have just been delivered. I consider that they were altogether quite fitting. I had known Senator Connolly not only in the Senate but also as a member of the Cabinet when I was sworn in the Privy Council in 1965. He did me great favours, for it was not easy for a newcomer to find his way through the tortuous maze of Parliament and the public administration. John Connolly was indeed one of those who made it a lot easier for me to understand a little how the entire operation worked. He was a very learned man. He was good, humane, intelligent and strong.

The last time I saw him he was seriously ill in hospital and suffering great pain. He said to me, "I have never been so sick, but it does not matter, we will continue to fight for the things in which we sincerely believe".

I wrote a letter to Mrs. Connolly and sent a copy to each of you. I said that the sentiments expressed were shared by honourable senators on both sides of the House, regardless of the political affiliations or convictions of each honourable senator, and that we all agreed that John Connolly was a great man who made a generous contribution to our country.

Honourable senators, do you agree that the letter I wrote to Mrs. Connolly be reproduced in Hansard as being part of the tributes paid to our friend John Connolly?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The text of the letter follows:)

Speaker of the Senate
OTTAWA, K1A 0A4

July 27, 1982

Mrs. John J. Connolly
281 Roger Road
Ottawa, Ontario
K1H 5C5

Dear Mrs. Connolly:

It was with shock and disbelief that I received the news about John.

We had all been following the course of his courageous battle the last few weeks and had hopes that our prayers for recovery might be answered.

There may have been, I must confess, an element of selfishness in that hope in view of the inestimable assistance John had been to the Senate and myself both before and after his recent retirement.

We had warned him back in October that we wouldn't let him get away easily and he was quick to accept that challenge.

He was good enough to ease the burden of my own office by taking over some speech-making duties and had continued in his well-known role as a learned and respected spokesman for the Senate.

He was in a unique position to fulfil that role because of the esteem in which he was held by all Parliamentarians, from both Houses and all political persuasions.

Everyone looked forward to his occasional visits back to these corridors and his confreres took unabashed advantage of these opportunities to "ambush" John for his invaluable advice.

I confess to being among these offenders, as were my staff—who often saved themselves hours of research with one phone call to "Senator John".

Indeed, John always had a special rapport with Senate employees, treating them with a respect that was both appreciated and returned in kind.

Senator Connolly will be deeply missed by all of us and we share acutely your own sense of loss.

Please accept, and extend to your family, our heartfelt condolences in this hour of bereavement.

Mere words are so inadequate at such a time but it is hoped that you and yours will take some comfort in knowing that Senator Connolly is one Canadian whose memory will stay with us and strengthen us always.

I am at your complete disposal, Mrs. Connolly, if there is any way in which I might be of assistance.

TRANSPORT

QUEBEC AIRPORT—STAFFING OF CONTROL TOWER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have one question for the Minister of Transport, which I am quite sure the Leader of the Government will convey to him.

It relates to the situation at the Quebec airport which, apparently, indicates there is a lack of personnel in the control tower, the result being that for several hours last Sunday it was impossible for aircraft normally stationed at Quebec to land at that airport. Furthermore, a Wardair Boeing 747, scheduled to leave at midnight, had to conduct its departure in a rather delicate way since there was no one in the control tower at that time.

I have been told that there is a lack of control tower personnel, and I should like the Leader of the Government to find out exactly what the situation is at that airport—

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is a labour problem.

Senator Flynn:—and try to remedy this problem.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to give the assurance that the question will be taken as notice and immediate inquiries made into the situation.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Leader of the Government or the Minister of State for Economic Development to explain to the Senate the policy of the government respecting an aspect of the 6 per cent price ceiling. I am not talking about wages; I am talking about the price ceiling.

A statement was made by the President of the Treasury Board on July 20 explaining the government's policy, the final sentence of which reads as follows:

Net revenue losses that might result from price restraint would be offset by expenditure reductions.

Honourable senators, the first part of the statement deals with the government's intention that prices which come within its purview will be expected to be restrained to the 6 per cent world we are going to live in, and that it would be the firm policy of the government to see that that is done. However, obviously somebody recognizes that, if this policy is implemented at its face value, there may be some difficulty, in some instances, in making good a shortage of money. It stated that net revenue losses would be offset by expenditure reductions. I wonder if some explanation could be given as to what that means. Are these expenditure reductions to be made by the government as a whole, perhaps by means of the creation of a fund to make good these shortfalls, or are they to be made by the individual firm concerned? Depending on the answer I get, I would then proceed, naturally, to ask the means by which it would be carried out.

● (2050)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board indicates that the government intends to be firm with respect to the administered prices—that is, those prices which the federal government has the capacity to influence. I believe that the specific portion of the statement to which my honourable friend referred is there in order to satisfy him and others that, if there are matters that constitute a charge on the treasury because of holding to the 6 per cent rule, there would be offsetting cuts by way of accommodation. Therefore, it does not mean that the deficit would increase by the amount of whatever loss of revenue might be incurred as a result of holding the administered prices to 6 per cent.

Senator Roblin: I thank the honourable minister for his reply. Could I offer him a specific problem with respect to this matter? Suppose, for example, that the 6 per cent rule is mandated to the Canadian National Railway, to Bell Canada, to Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or to any other corporation covered by it. Can the minister tell me whether any damage suffered by them on this account will be made good? In other words, will the consolidated revenue fund be used to make good any shortfall that Bell Canada, for example, might experience as a result of this policy?

The minister can see that this is a question which is of some interest to widows and orphans in Canada, if I may use that expression, because Bell Canada is considered to be a stock that is held by people who are in need of income and who require a certain degree of security. We know that if that company suffers a financial shortfall because of this policy, there will be an effect on the value of that stock and on the ability of the company to pay dividends. This may be an extreme case, but it is certainly one that is in the public mind right now.

What would be the policy of the government in this case? Would Bell Canada's loss be made good out of the consolidated revenue fund?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as Senator Roblin knows at least as well as I do, there are regulatory bodies that make some of the decisions with respect to public utilities such as Bell Canada. I do not think that the example of the Canadian National Railway is quite as valid, because its rates can be changed in a large number of areas without having to make a submission to a regulatory body for permission to do so.

I will endeavour to get an expanded answer in response to the nub of my honourable friend's question as to whether the government is giving an undertaking now to make up 100 per cent of the difference between what is perhaps requested and the limitation to 6 per cent. There are, however, other complicating factors involved in the situation, one of which results from differences in the request. Another such factor might be the difference in what is allowed by a regulatory body and the limitation to 6 per cent. Therefore, I will bring to the chamber an expanded explanation.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I have chosen an inappropriate example, my honourable friend can correct me. There are many other examples that come to mind which have nothing to do with regulatory bodies but which have everything to do with the policy of the government. I think that the statement should be interpreted by way of its apparent meaning in ordinary English, and it says: "Net revenue losses that might result from price restraint would be offset by expenditure reductions." Does that mean that the person who experiences the loss will have the net revenue losses made up from this fund developed by expenditure reductions, or will he have to do something within his own particular company in order to make up the loss? That is a fairly important policy to have explicated so that we know what it really means.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is why I have given an undertaking to get an expanded answer.

Hon. R. James Balfour: He does not know what it means.

Senator Olson: The explanation depends on the assumptions that are made. If the so-called losses are absolute, reducing the net profit to below zero, that is one set of circumstances. My honourable friend referred, however, to another set of circumstances involving some amount of revenue that would inhibit Bell Canada in paying dividends at a certain rate to its shareholders. Because of the various aspects to the issue, it seems to me that a further explanation is required. While I am seeking that, I think that some of the other explanations I give with respect to these assumptions will be valid. Certainly to make a flat statement that all differences between anticipated revenues in the absence of the six and five and revenues with the reduction to six and five—that would not be an undertaking, on the face of it, that the government is committed to.

Senator Roblin: It really cannot be expected that people will accept this policy with any ease of mind until they know what the government intends to do. That is all that I am seeking to develop.

Senator Olson: If I may say so, I do not think that that is quite all the honourable senator is seeking to develop. I think that he has asked whether or not there is a firm government commitment to offset all of the losses, or all of the differences between expected revenue and net profit, and what that amount would be if the administered prices are limited to 6 per cent. I believe that is what he asked. I have given an undertaking to get a more detailed answer with respect to this matter.

Further, I would like my honourable friend to understand that the government is firm in trying to hold inflation to 6 per cent. Obviously, prices form an important part of inflation. There are now and there will be in the future a number of circumstances, some of them special circumstances, which will unfold. For that reason there is a committee of the Cabinet on administered prices, which will consider exceptional circumstances that ought to be taken into account.

Senator Roblin: The minister stated that it was the policy of the government to hold inflation to 6 per cent. He did not say "wages," he said "inflation." Is that really what he meant to say?

Senator Olson: I suppose, honourable senators that inflation is largely made up of prices, wages, and all of those things. It is our hope that, by the target date of 1983, the federal government will have been influential in pulling inflation down to 6 per cent.

Senator Roblin: Good luck.

[Senator Roblin.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PERSONNEL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which I presume will have to be taken as notice. It concerns the problems with regard to housing for the Canadian forces. It appears to be a matter of concern that Canadian forces personnel who are transferred into the Ottawa area are having great difficulty finding accommodation commensurate with the pay they are receiving.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government could find out if the Minister of National Defence or any segment of the department is taking any initiative in providing accommodation, particularly in view of the scarcity and high prices of such accommodation in the Ottawa area.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to take the question as notice.

PURCHASE OF F-18A AIRCRAFT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have another question having to do with the announcement that the minister will be reviewing the new F-18A aircraft in the United States. I presume that he will be making a statement, or will be asked a question regarding his visit, in the other place. I wonder if we could have a statement on the minister's assessment of the aircraft and on what is going to happen regarding this order which is being filled for the Canadian forces?

• (2100)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Well, the request will most certainly be directed to the minister. However, all reports with respect to the superb new fighting aircraft have been good reports.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers.

First, I would like to respond to a question raised on March 25 by Senator Murray, relating to the relationship between the inflation rate and the exchange value of the Canadian dollar. I would ask that this answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

It is difficult to relate movements in exchange rates over a relatively short period of time to differences in inflation performance between countries; many other factors, including international interest rate developments, are also influential. While Canada's wage and price performance in recent months has been less satisfactory than that of the United States, our international competitive position remains (although it could be undermined if the current inflation gap continues for some time) and our merchandise trade surplus, including our bilateral surplus with the United States, has been particularly strong so far this year.

It can also be noted that over the first half of 1982, both Germany and Japan experienced more moderate rates of price increase than did the United States, yet both the deutschmark and the yen declined sharply against the U.S. dollar. The decline of these currencies against the U.S. dollar was more marked than was that of the Canadian dollar. Finally, it could be remarked that international interest rate movements and expectations of future developments have played a major role in the declines that most major currencies have experienced against the U.S. dollar since the end of last year.

ENERGY

MARINE DIESEL FUEL—INCREASE IN PRICE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have here a reply to a question asked by Senator Donahoe on May 21, 1981, relating to the transportation fuel compensations recovery charge on marine fuel. Perhaps that could be accepted as though it had been read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jack Marshall: That answer was in the newspapers three months ago.

Senator Olson: Senator Donahoe was not advised of that. If you saw it that long ago you could have informed him, and he might have withdrawn his question.

(The answer follows:)

The Transportation Fuel Compensation Recovery Charge (TFCRC) on marine fuel is based on prevailing competitive fuel prices in the United States and other relevant international markets. Some have argued that the TFCRC has had a serious negative economic impact on the marine sector. In fact, much of the reduced activity which has been ascribed to the TFCRC is the result of changing international market circumstances and slower economic growth.

The administration of the charge has helped to ease the impact on the Canadian Marine sector; for example, fuel consumed by domestic vessels in Canada-U.S. trade when moving in ballast is exempt from the charge as is fuel consumed in port.

In addition, the National Energy Board can consider specific situations where applicants submit that the charge should not apply or should be reduced.

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on June 8 by Senator Murray relating to the exchange value of the Canadian dollar. May this reply also be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators will recall that the Canadian dollar dropped against its U.S. counterpart over the first half of 1982. It touched a low of U.S. $.7680 on June 29th, down from $.8435 at the end of last year. This decline took place in an environment in which the U.S. dollar was very strong internationally; over this same period the Canadian dollar moved up against the major European currencies and the yen. Recently, in July, the Canadian dollar has recovered somewhat; it closed July 19th at $.7950.

A decline in the external value of the Canadian dollar has a two-edged effect. On the one hand, it helps improve our international competitive position, thereby promoting exports while restraining imports. On the other hand, it makes the battle against inflation more difficult. Generally speaking the trade effects are slow to develop (with effects only beginning to be visible in the flows of exports and imports after two or three months or so), whereas the price effects occur relatively rapidly and can trigger secondary wage and price adjustments. Opposite effects occur with a rise in the exchange rate. While recognizing that movements in the exchange rate have these effects, in the Government's view it would be inappropriate for it to attempt to attain or maintain a particular exchange rate such as 80 U.S. cents per Canadian dollar. It would be virtually impossible for the authorities to choose an exchange rate which would not lead to imbalances in the foreign exchange market and balance of payments difficulties, if not immediately then relatively rapidly, as shifts in economic conditions fed through. It is in this sense that there is nothing magical about the 80-cent figure.

Nor would it be appropriate for the Government to comment on whether, in its view, our dollar is currently under-valued or over-valued relative to that of the United States. Not only would this be inconsistent with allowing the exchange rate to be determined by market forces (with official operations in the foreign exchange market confined to the promotion of orderly trading conditions), but it could lead to speculative capital flows. As for policies to strengthen the dollar, it should be noted that improvements on the inflation front would be the surest way to achieve this over the longer term and the latest budget has endeavoured to address that particular problem.

COLD LAKE, ALBERTA—HEAVY OIL PROJECT—TOTAL COST TO THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on July 6 by Senator Roblin relating to government financial assistance to the Cold Lake project.

This reply is not very long, but it might be as well to give it the same treatment as the others.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The amount of the loan, which does not have to be repaid because the project was suspended prior to July 1, 1982, was $40 million. To this amount will be added interest charges for Petro-Canada inasmuch as that company had made the loan on behalf of the government at the time of its approval. The principal and interest charges will come very close to $50 million.

SUPPORT OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on July 6 by Senator Smith relating to the difference in interest rates being paid on the money borrowed by Canada and the rate received from the proceeds of that borrowing.

This is rather a long, detailed answer, and I would be glad if this too could be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators will know that the foreign currency borrowings of the Government have all been associated with the management of Canada's official international reserves. The proceeds of net new borrowings are added to reserves and used to acquire interest-earning foreign currency assets such as U.S. Treasury bills.

The Government's portfolio of foreign currency assets is managed with an eye to both liquidity and profitability. Since the foreign currency assets acquired are more liquid than the foreign currency liabilities incurred, in the normal course of events the cost of the funds borrowed would be more than the income earned on the corresponding assets. The difference between interest paid and received is the cost to the Government of the liquidity so gained.

The recent U.S. $750 million Eurobond issue of the Government carried an annual coupon of 14½ per cent; since the issue was priced at par, the yield to maturity was also 14½ per cent. At the time these proceeds were received, the rate on 91-day U.S. Treasury bills was 12.07 per cent. The net foreign currency interest cost of the Eurobond issue will not be known until the issue matures in 5 years time, since both the stock of foreign currency assets and the applicable interest rate are subject to change in the interim.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would also like to respond to a question raised on July 6 by Senator Roblin relating to the sums committed to support our currency.

This answer is also rather long and detailed, and I would be happy if honourable senators would agree that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

As I stated in my initial response, the Government borrowed during June a total of U.S. $2.35 billion in order to replenish Canada's international reserves, which had been run down during a period of strong downward pressure on the Canadian dollar. It should be noted that the proceeds were added to reserves, they were not used to purchase Canadian dollars; thus, it is not correct to state that the funds were used to acquire Canadian dollars. It is, of course, possible that the acquired reserves could ultimately be spent at some future date, should the Canadian dollar come under renewed downward pressure. So far in July, however, our dollar has been subject to upward pressure.

The June borrowings consisted of a Eurobond issue of $750 million and drawings of $600 million and $1.0 billion on the Government's standby credit lines with the Canadian and a group of foreign banks respectively. The yield to maturity on the placement in Europe was 14.38 per cent. Drawings on the Canadian standby facility are at the London Interbank Offered Rate (LIBOR) plus ¼ of one per cent, while drawings under the facility with the group of foreign banks could be made at LIBOR plus ¼ of one per cent or at the U.S. prime rate, at the Government's option.

At mid-June the 3-month LIBOR was 15.72 per cent, while U.S. prime was 16.50 per cent. In the past drawings on the standby credit facilities have been repaid after a relatively short interval of time; it is not possible to say in advance what the gross interest cost of these drawings will be since both the amount outstanding and the applicable rate are subject to change. Additionally, it can be noted that foreign borrowing is undertaken to add to our reserves with additions to reserves held in the form of interest-earning assets; consequently the net interest costs are considerably smaller than the interest payments alone would indicate. In the event that subsequent official operations in the foreign exchange market led to the use of the acquired reserves, the Government's Canadian dollar financing requirements should be reduced and there would be a corresponding interest saving which would offset, in large measure, the interest cost of the foreign funds.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF SPOT PURCHASES ON OIL PRICING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 13, 1980, concerning International Energy Agency recommendations on oil prices.

Most international oil purchases made by oil companies—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Do you not think you had better ask that it be taken as read? You do not want any supplementaries, so perhaps you should do that.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is an offer he cannot refuse.

Senator Perrault: I would be most pleased to have it taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Most international oil purchases made by oil companies are made on the basis of term contracts, under relatively stable price conditions, rather than on the more volatile spot market. Continuity of supply is thereby protected. Petro-Canada manages Canada's state-to-state type of crude oil purchase from Mexico, and its experience in this agreement, and in other international transactions, serves as a basis on which the government can judge the appropriateness of private industry contracts. Through the administration of the Oil Import Compensation Program, the federal government has another means of monitoring foreign crude purchases and promoting price stability.

Canada strongly supports the International Energy Agency, which was founded in 1974 on principles which provide a framework for member countries to expand indigenous energy supplies and lower energy demand, and deal with pricing questions. The IEA has given considerable attention to international price anomalies. The collective action of members on supply and demand initiatives will have a long-term effect in encouraging price stability although possibly no immediately perceivable impact on spot price irregularities that occur from time to time.

HOUSING

UREA FORMALDEHYDE FOAM INSULATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I now come to a reply to the question asked by Senator Nurgitz concerning possible federal government funding research into ammonia gas as an antidote to UFFI fume problems.

I have a page of notes on this subject, which I would be glad to have taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

At the University of Manitoba, Dr. Hyman Gesser is working under the auspices of a National Research Council research grant, investigating the use of ammonia gas as a neutralizing agent for in-place urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

Basically, the process involves the injection of the ammonia into the wall cavity which contains the UFFI, which effectively reduces off-gassing by a ratio of approximately 10 to one. In other words, concentrations of .5 ppm (parts per million) of formaldehyde could be reduced to about .05 ppm. At present, Dr. Gesser's is the only research contract exploring this ammonia gas application, though there are others involving the use of ammonia in solution as a neutralizing agent for wall cavities following UFFI removal.

Dr. Gesser's work is short term. At present the results are promising, but the process still remains to be tested under extreme temperature and humidity conditions, when UFFI off-gassing tends to accelerate. To this point there has been no in-home testing of the Gesser method.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 20 last Senator Roblin asked for a definition of "letter".

I have here the proposed definition of the word "letter" submitted by the Canada Post Corporation and published in Part I of the Canada Gazette, July 3, 1982, at pages 4873 and 4874. I should like particularly to point out, however, that there is provision for submissions from interested parties until September 3, 1982.

I ask that these proposed regulations be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The proposed Letter Definition Regulations follow:)

CANADA POST CORPORATION
CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

Notice is hereby given, pursuant to subsection 17(3) of the Canada Post Corporation Act, that the Canada Post Corporation, pursuant to paragraph 17(1)(a), proposes to make the following Regulations prescribing a definition for the word "letter".

Any interested person wishing to make representation concerning the proposed Regulations must do so within 60 days of the publication of this notice. All such representations should be sent to the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation, Box 9600, Ottawa, Ontario K1G 4B1.

Given at Ottawa, this 3rd day of July, 1982

R. M. WARREN
President and Chief Executive Officer
Canada Post Corporation

REGULATIONS PRESCRIBING A DEFINITION FOR THE WORD LETTER

Short Title

1. These Regulations may be cited as the Letter definition Regulations.

Definition of "Letter"

2. For the purposes of the Canada Post Corporation Act and any regulations made thereunder, "letter" means mailable matter in any form, the mass of which, if any, does not exceed 500 g, whether or not enclosed in an envelope, that is intended for transmission to any destination or delivery to any addressee, but does not include

- (a) a newspaper, magazine, book, catalogue, blank form, manuscript or musical score;
- (b) an item having no further address than "householder", "boxholder", "occupant", "resident" or other similar expression;
- (c) a money packet within the meaning of the Special Services and Fees Regulations;
- (d) a specimen for medical or scientific analysis;
- (e) goods;
- (f) an invoice or other document specifically related to a newspaper, magazine, book, catalogue, specimen for medical or scientific analysis, blank form, manuscript, musical score or goods when delivered therewith by the same individual; and
- (g) an invoice or other document relating to the purchase of goods or services that is delivered personally to the purchaser by the vendor of the goods or services at the vendor's normal business address.

3. A letter does not cease to be a letter by reason only of its inclusion with, or attachment to, other mailable matter.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

(This note is not part of the Regulations, but is intended only for information purposes.)

These Regulations prescribe, for the purposes of the Canada Post Corporation Act and the Regulations made or continued under that Act, the definition "letter".

Senator Perrault: After honourable senators read all of this in the record of today's proceedings, I feel sure that there will be further questions.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that is not my point. I know what my honourable friend has been telling us, because that is in the statute and was published in the Canada Gazette. We know about that. My question was as to whether the representations that are being made to the Post Office will be made public, because this certainly is a matter of wide public interest and concern. I suggest that these things should be made public, and I want some assurance that that will be the case.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, those assurances will be sought.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, July 22, the debate on the motion of Senator Bird for the second reading of Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I usually rise at this stage to say what a great pleasure it is to participate in the debate. Usually, it is indeed a pleasure, and tonight is no exception; but my pleasure, my joy, my delight, in talking with my colleagues, is on this occasion somewhat marred.

It is marred in the first instance because I find it rather strange, and slightly uncomfortable, to be talking about a subject which really requires a long, steady and clear perspective, but which instead is phased into a situation in which the Parliament of Canada, at best, is probably going to begin a summer recess some time in August. That is an idiotic situation, one which no school board in Canada would allow itself or its pupils to get into.

While much can be argued as to whether the opposition or the government is more to blame than the other for a session that has gone on for two years, I believe Senator Flynn was quite right the other day when he said that the burden of responsibility must lie on those who have control of the parliamentary agenda. Something is wrong when the session becomes so long, so protracted, that even the brightest people, with the finest of memories, forget whether measures have been introduced, disposed of, or not even considered.

Under our system, the people's representatives are supposed to spend a part of the year in Ottawa, and a part of the year at home with the people who sent them to Ottawa; but when you crowd two years into the calendar year something is wrong, something is lacking, and I do not have to delineate or set out any footnotes as to how wrong things are. That this matter should be brought in at the very heel of the session is distressing.

One is slightly ill at ease when a debate upon the fundamentals of our country, reaching back into pre-Confederation days, must be scheduled as a sort of leitmotiv in a long, hot summer, the end of which no one can yet clearly see.

Another aspect of the situation, and a very painful one, is what in fact went on, or did not go on, in the other place. We all know that when, in the usual and frequent course of events, measures come to this chamber, we look back to see what has been said in the other place. When we do that with regard to this bill we do not find very much. What we do find is neither helpful, positive, encouraging, nor in any way conducive to an improved regard for the institution of which we are also members.

I do not believe that it would be profitable, and I am not sure that it would be proper, to dilate upon the performance of the other place—or its non-performance—although I have noted through the years that the members of that place have not always allowed themselves to be circumscribed by that kind of restraint when they have been discussing this chamber; but there are mores and folkways of a parliamentary nature that some of us here, at our best, try to observe. I am therefore, as I say, not going to dilate upon what went on over there, or upon what did not go on.

Senator McIlraith, I thought, did a masterful job the other day. That one little page of Hansard that he directed our attention to will live forever, though it will not glorify many of the people who were involved with it. In fact, I am reminded of a Shakespearean line from Macbeth:

All the perfumes of Arabia will not sweeten this little hand.

Down through the years, when people talk about Parliament—I suppose in future generations as in ours—they will be inclined to be denigratory. It will be recalled “Oh, yes, don’t forget that five-minute period when they tried to change the name of the national holiday.” So it is not for me to make that period more painful or to dilate upon what was said or not said. But a few people in our time and in our press—and people do not give much attention to this chamber—have noted that there is a second chamber. People have been saying that the Senate, the chamber of sober second thought, must do some remedial work, and I have read that it is up to the Senate to send the measure back to the other place and tell them to do it properly.

I believe that is a recipe that cannot, in fact, be followed. As I understand it, the Senate may pass or reject the measure, or it may amend it, but I do not think it is incumbent upon even the chamber of sober second thought, that reviewer of hasty and ill-considered legislation, as Macdonald used to say, to say, “Do it right and then we will look at it.” There is no precedent for that. So we have to deal with this not exactly de novo, because that would be impossible in the second chamber, but we have to deal with it with great seriousness; and while we do not talk about what went on in the other place, I doubt whether we could ever be unmindful of what did not happen there. So the aspect of propriety, of certainty, of careful judgment, is laid upon us in a very special way. That is why I believe it is incumbent upon the Senate, in this important issue, to take upon itself that designation of the chamber of sober second thought more seriously than ever before. We have to be diligent, we have to be careful, and we have to be above suspicion. Even though it may be midsummer—indeed, the end of July, the height of summer—we must discharge our duty to the parliamentary system with high seriousness, perhaps with some discomfort and, if necessary, with some pain.

I have no intention of talking about those famous five minutes. Nor will I discuss the inadequacies of the bill. They have been well discussed by Senator McIlraith, and they have been pointed out by other people—the things which should have been there and which are not there. I suppose that would come under the category of “hasty and ill-considered legislation”. But that is not to be my line of thought tonight. I will try, because it is the first sitting day of the week, to be positive, to be helpful if I can, and give my view as to why, despite the irregularities, the paucity of thought and debate, had the whole thing been done with the most careful regard for proprieties, precedents and orders of procedure, the end result is not an improvement, is not a good thing for Canada but is, in fact, the opposite.

I shall try to argue that the name “Dominion Day” should not be changed. Naturally, I do not think it should be changed improperly, but it is my view that it should not be changed at all. Indeed, I am of the conviction that the name “Dominion Day” represents a highly appropriate and uniquely significant designation for our country and our people.

There are those in our land—and I suppose in every land where there is the glory of free speech—who say that because anything is old it should be discarded. Some say that about the Senate. They say that some of us are old, and that because something is old it should be in a position of non-regard. I have been told—in fact, I was told this in the other chamber when I was speaking on the subject—that it was a mistake on occasions like this to be going back to the past all the time. I tried to reply that surely, on a birthday, what one does is to go back to the past. If one is celebrating one’s birthday, one celebrates the beginning, and how one can discuss Canada’s national celebration without reflecting upon what went on in 1867 I cannot conceive.

I am saddened that it seems so easy for people to cast aside, and to allow others to cast aside, our glorious history. As some parts of the world go, we are a very young country. For us, a hundred years is a long time—and not only for us, but for all those who study and care about the development of great states and fine communities. What took place on July 1, 1867 was not a casual achievement, but a noble development. It took a long time. They came down to Charlottetown in 1864. They say there was a lot of champagne and other goodies dispensed in the few days, but there was also a lot of wisdom cast about.

Last Friday I attended the opening of an historic park in Charlottetown, which was the country residence of the Honourable W. H. Pope, the Island’s leading Confederation Father. It was a lovely ceremony and I am proud of the department which provided it, but I did note that there was no champagne served. What W. H. Pope would have thought of that, I do not know; on the other hand, it was 2.30 in the afternoon. Perhaps it was a bit early, so I did not make any fuss about it.

It was a magnificent exercise in nation-building which began in Charlottetown. They moved to Halifax, to Saint John, and then up to Quebec, and they argued and pondered for three years, and, indeed, perhaps fought over it. But then they came to the situation where they were prepared to launch out, to move into new achievements—and how difficult it was.

The thing that has struck me in our own time is that we think of Confederation as being a frail fabric. We are troubled about its breaking apart, and thoughtful people should be troubled. We hear about separatism here and there. One does not hear much about it from the maritimes, because we had our outburst long, long ago. People sort of take us for granted, but there was disquiet there. One reads what people like Joe Howe thought about Canadians in the 1860s. People in the Atlantic region had not seen many Canadians, and the ones they saw they did not like. It was a tremendous problem of communication. Even today, to go from Moncton to Montreal, one has to go through a lot of wide open spaces. I hope that senators from northern New Brunswick will not be offended when I say that. The trip from Ottawa to Winnipeg is not all through lush, green valleys.

Then, we can think of the problems of getting across those magnificent mountains. It was an enormous challenge at a time when there were few developed communications techniques. There were no telephones, press officers or public relations people to doll up Sir John A. Macdonald and pretend he was a saint of the church when he was something else. They did not have all that malarkey. They had the difficulties, but none of the techniques to make it easy.

I often wonder what is wrong with us that we seem to have more trouble keeping the country together than the Fathers of Confederation had in bringing it together in a much earlier age. That is the challenge we should be facing. I am sure we are all too shamefaced by the Fathers of Canadian Confederation. When I went to school and to university—and that was a long time ago—we heard about people like Cavour, Mazzini, Bismarck and all the great nation-builders. Well, old guys, we have our own nation-builders.

Who achieved nation-building status without a war, without bloodshed, after the process of deliberation, after what Edmund Burke talked about as the essential ingredient of all government and human progress—compromise and barter—drawing these disparate, different, widely-separated groups into a community. And when they did that they wanted to indicate that it was something different. This coming together was not as a result of a revolution, so our forefathers had to find some symbols to point out that there was something new, and that is where the word, “Dominion” comes in.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

The British North America Act is still here. It is still part of our law of the land and essentially part of our tradition. The few lines I am about to read form the only guarantee of our parliamentary structure, and all the rest of it is implied.

The first paragraph of the preamble to the B.N.A. Act reads:

Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom:

That is where the rule of law and the parliamentary institutions come in. Why was the word “Dominion” included? Did the British say that they should use it? Of course not. Some of the Canadians, particularly Sir John A. Macdonald, liked the name “Kingdom of Canada”. Certain peoples south of the border—and they were very conscious of that border then in more than economic and cultural terms—did not like that name, so the Canadians, not the British, came up with something different. Did they call this federation just Canada? No, because from what I read from the British North America Act—“Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire”—the country could not be called Canada because Canada was one of the components, one of the provinces. Would the proud New Brunswickers or Nova Scotians—and they have much to be proud of—have settled for the name of one of the partners and for being subsumed under that name? Of course, they would not.

There was a new designation. It was not the old Province of Canada with its portions east and west, it was the Dominion of Canada—a new and important entity—and that was essential to our founding fathers. I hope that people from the east are not considered to be narrow or overly sensitive when they say, even 100 or more years later, that they do not think that that intellectual bargain should now be abandoned, that the name of one component, one ingredient, should now be the name for all of those who participated in the Confederation.

The choosing of this name was unique in other ways. Here I come to a ground that I am not overly comfortable with. I am, I hope, a religious man, but not a righteous one. In no case am I an expert in theology. But in the travail of what name should be used, one of the good men of the Canadian delegation while at Westminster—and, again, the Canadians were making the decisions although they were in Westminster, and this is something we must never forget—had an inspiration while reading the Bible one morning. People in those days read the Bible more, and they used biblical references in their speeches a good deal more, and, in my opinion, the speeches were the better for it, both in content and construction. Samuel Leonard Tilley from New Brunswick was reading Psalm 72. It reads in part:

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

I do not wish to get into the exegesis. Many people are of the opinion that what was in his mind was that he was talking to God about this matter, but as I read the Psalms he was talking about Solomon. And who was Solomon? He was a new ruler, a new king, a new administrator which means a new administration.

What were these fathers of ours doing over in London? They were not invoking God; they were creating a new entity for the northern part of this great continent. They did not want it to become part of America, and they knew that it would not be British, so it had to be a new indigenous society. Could anyone have come up with a better description of that country? It is from "sea to sea". In 1867, the country was not from "sea to sea", but they had in mind what would happen, and it was only a very few years until British Columbia and the areas in between joined Confederation. "From the river"—what river would that be? It was not the Jordan River; it was the St. Lawrence River, an important part of the historic development of Canada. What would the "ends of the earth" be? Would anything be any more appropriate than one of the poles? Within a few years after Tilley read that passage and brought it to the attention of his colleagues, this Dominion of Canada was extended to the very North Pole. How prophetic, how magnificent, how uniquely Canadian.

One does not have to be a saint or an ivory pillar of the church to say that the history of the word "Dominion" is unique, that it is something meaningful to the history of this country. One only has to realize that here at a crucial time some thoughtful man found some meaningful expression. I leave it to others to decide whether or not he was divinely inspired. All I can say is that I cannot think of anything in religious literature or any other kind of literature which would give a more appealing or exciting description of our great country as seen in those early days, when they knew far more adversity than they did satisfaction, when they looked upon that little land as something which would become great, which would become known.

Another thing that disturbs me is that it is suggested that the word "Dominion" represents a British suzerainty and a Canadian subservience. Lord Carnarvon, as Dr. Eugene Forsey, who knows more about this than anyone in Canada, has mentioned in many articles, pointed out that the people from Canada wanted that word, the people from the new Dominion wanted that word, and Lord Carnarvon wanted it to go through because it added dignity to their new status.

One of our great historians is Dr. Lower whose magnificent—perhaps it is the greatest—history of Canada is called simply From Colony to Nation. We got into trouble a few years ago with the use of the word "nation." Perhaps ill-intentioned people made unfortunate use of that expression. I never could see anything wrong with any of these descriptions, but we now find it difficult to talk about the nation. But the Dominion, surely, can be understood as not British, not subservient, but as something nobler, something better than a colony. I think we now know that, whether the formalities were arranged in the order papers of deliberative bodies or not, in domestic matters in 1867 this was a free country. This was a country which made its own decisions.

John A. Macdonald more than once indicated to the British that the Canadians were not prepared to do what the British might have thought they should do. One thinks about his reference to "Gladstone and company" regarding problems in Egypt and the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. That is why I feel so strongly that when we talk about the Dominion we are not bringing up some British word. That is not an exercise that comes all that easily to me. We are not talking about Wolfe's landing; we are not talking about something that is French—the glorious voyages of Cartier or the magnificent colonization of Champlain; we are not even talking about Giovanni Caboto. We are talking about a Canadian experience and a Canadian experiment, a successful experiment of which we are all the very lucky heirs.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Right. Canada. Canada Day.

Senator Macquarrie: Canada's Dominion Day, when we became a dominion. We were a province before that.

There is always the danger, when one talks about the virtues and verities and values of the past, of being accused of not being sufficiently progressive; of being a square or an antiquarian. I have gone through a great deal of that, interspersed with suggestions that, being red Tory, I am not sufficiently respectful of persons and things that are long established.

I often wonder, however, if we are always on the right course when we decide that because something has been standing a while we had better knock it down. Can we always be sure that the "get with it" group are the right group? Sometimes it appears to me that the progressives might be wrong. I suppose in a society of lemmings, the most progressive guy is the one who is over the cliff first. I don't follow that. I am troubled about that sort of thing.

I hear that it would be good to have "Canada Day" because it is simple and easy. Well, over the last ten years I have watched the Department of Transport become Transport Canada; the Post Office become Canada Post; the Dominion Bureau of Statistics become Stats Canada. I do not know that anything has improved with the change in nomenclature. I sometimes wonder if we might not be becoming a nation of stutterers, if every time something comes up, we say, "Oh, that is 'blank' Canada," or "Oh, that is Canada 'blank'." There must be something more imaginative than to stick "Canada" on everything. You do not have to prove the love of your country by tacking the name on everything that comes to mind.

There is a more serious criticism, and I think this is about the only criticism I find requires deep and thoughtful consideration. For some reason—and I am not a linguist, God knows!—for some reason there are those in the land who say that in this bilingual country there are implications in the word "dominion" and in the expression "Dominion Day," which make some Canadians uncomfortable. The last thing I would want to do would be to advocate something, no matter how dear to me, which would legitimately cause some emotional anguish in fellow Canadians.

I am told that the word "dominion" had a respected place in the French language in an earlier period, but no longer. I respect that situation, but I can only say that if there are those Canadians who feel that way, then I, as one of the other language group and as one who has tried to do his best to understand our history, can merely say that there is no intention of implying anything. I am sure that when this, in my judgment, majestic word was chosen there was no disagreement among the Fathers. I cannot imagine Macdonald and Cartier disagreeing on this.

I am one of those who are privileged to have offices in the East Block, along with Senator Guay and Senator Robichaud and other distinguished members of this chamber. I am glad I am near John A. Macdonald's office—just two away—because when I decide to have a second drink I feel that he wouldn't mind. Perhaps it would be better for my health if I were up against R. B. Bennett or some of those old codgers, but as I walk over here I pass the room that John A. Macdonald used, and just a few doors away the room that was used by Sir Georges Etienne Cartier.

Macdonald said that without Cartier there would have been no Confederation; that he was as brave as a lion. Cartier was over in Westminster; Cartier was in Charlottetown; Cartier was at all these meetings. He was a formidable person. They said he was highly sociable, and because he was sociable, Langevin, who wasn't, got more of the work to do. Well, that was too bad for Langevin, I would say. But, in any event, I cannot believe that the problem existed then, and it does not exist in my heart now.

If there is any aspect there, we can discuss it. All I can say is that I am convinced that it was a fine word. It was a noble word. It was a meaningful word. If we are to change it—and I am not so narrow as to say that we cannot change it and change it agreeably—I would say that this Senate, this chamber, should look at the matter very carefully. I have little feeling for the suggestion that we should look at this for a day or two. I would appeal to the people opposite to have the matter sent to a committee, and to invite people like Dr. Forsey, who is so learned in the matter; to call in Canadians from all across the country so that it will not be said of us that, because others were hasty and ill-considered, we fulminated for a day or two and then followed their example.

Senator McIlraith, a great mathematician, a great logician and a great parliamentarian, told us the other day how far away next Dominion Day is. Why not give the people of Canada a chance to come here? But not in the heat of the summer. Give them a chance to research the matter, to look into it. Then I think we would all be agreeable and amenable, and we would come up with a suggestion that would be worthy of this place, of this country, and of the noble aims of our Fathers.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I am not an expert on the rules of the Senate, but I should like to hear what the government's interpretation is of our debate, bearing in mind rule 93, because I am not sure whether we are dealing with a private bill, a public bill, or a government bill. How our procedure should evolve depends on whether it is one or the other.

I will not accept the government's judgment on this, but I should like to have the government's opinion so that we might deal with this.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, our position is that this is a private member's public bill.

Senator Lang: Does "public bill" mean a "private bill" within the meaning of that rule?

Senator Frith: It is our opinion, Mr. Speaker, that rule 93 refers to a "private bill"—that is, a bill that is not a public bill.

Senator Lang: Would you please address your remarks to me and not to "Mr. Speaker"? That style is used in the other place.

Senator Frith: Since you are asking for a ruling, I think it proper to address my comments to the Speaker.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Senator Lang has said that he will not accept our interpretation but will only accept the Speaker's, so I have addressed my comments to the Speaker.

Senator Lang: Does this bill come within the term "private bill" found in rule 93?

Senator Frith: In our opinion, no.

Senator Lang: Thank you.

Hon. David A. Croll: I am glad that that is settled—if it is.

Honourable senators, when I first read the first order, I had mixed feelings. We who have grown up with the designation "Dominion Day" will always have a special feeling for it in our hearts. That is part of our shared background, along with the Union Jack. One becomes attached to such things, and the inevitable change is always hard to accept when it comes.

I am not going to put on the record what has already been put on the record with respect to the words "Dominion of Canada". Many people think that the name "Dominion of Canada" comes from the British North America Act, but it does not. If one reads the British North America Act of 1867 one will see that, from beginning to end, there is no mention of the words "Dominion of Canada". Such a name does not exist. What one finds is a decree, in these words:

It shall be lawful for the Queen... to declare by Proclamation that... the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall form and be One Dominion under the name of Canada;

So, from the beginning, Canada has always been "Canada", and never "Dominion of Canada". The latter expression grew out of common usage. Now that the time has come for change, I can understand that some people are reluctant to leave the words "Dominion Day" behind. However, we cannot allow our regret at the passing of a symbol blind us to the fact that the world moves on and we must move with it.

Speaking personally, I served under the Union Jack and was both proud and sad when the time came to change to the maple leaf flag. The same mixed feelings are attached to this change. I see no magic in the word "Dominion". There are some who regard that as a badge of subservience, but I do not agree with that interpretation either.

The words of the British North America Act are good enough for me. This country is "one Dominion under the name of Canada", and the change from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day" seems completely appropriate and acceptable.

These are new times and I do not think we should allow ourselves to become preoccupied with the past. I want to spend what time I have left looking forward, not looking back. I am proud of this great country, which has given me everything I am and everything I have. I think that "Canada Day" sums up, for me, both the heritage and the future we all share.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest to my honourable friend from the Hillsborough River, where we both used to dig clams. I can tell him that I am a monarchist too.

I wish to refer him to a book—the reference to which I will give later—that was written by a librarian in the Library of Parliament in which it is said that a letter was written to Sir Leonard Tilley, one of the Fathers of Confederation, in which Sir Leonard was told by one of the lords of the realm that if the Fathers of Confederation used the words "Realm of Canada"—and Canada is really a realm, as my academic friend knows—they might offend the delicate sensibilities of the Yankees. They were told to use the word "Dominion". So, if we use the words "Canada Day", I do not think we will offend the delicate sensibilities of the Yankees.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, if no one else wishes to speak—

Senator Frith: I am not sure that that is the case.

Senator Marshall: That is why I am asking.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest to the arguments advanced by Senator Croll. I find them totally and absolutely unconvincing.

I felt the same way about the Union Jack as he did, and I felt the same way about the Canadian Ensign, as it was called, as he did. People fought wars under those flags, died under those flags and felt that something was being taken away from them when those flags were replaced. I had the same high regard for those two flags as those people did, but I did not have all of the sympathy that I should have had, or might have had, when we decided to select a new flag. I did not think at that time—and I am not sure even yet—that we picked the very best flag that could have been picked. I thought there were other designs that might have been more appropriate, that might have been better looking, that might have inspired more enthusiasm in the minds of many people, but eventually we picked a flag, and that flag has one characteristic: it is Canadian; it represents this country. No one could look at that flag and say that it is anything but Canadian. That is what I say about the Dominion of Canada.

There is no comparison whatever between the adoption of a new flag and the adoption of a new name, because when we speak of "Dominion of Canada" and, more particularly, of "Dominion Day" that day which has been honoured and recognized and has meant so much in the minds of so many people over so many years—what does it bring to mind? It brings to mind only one thing—not another nation, not another service, but the nation of Canada.

The word "dominion", to me and to those of my generation, was synonymous with Canada, and it is still synonymous with Canada. "Canada" was, as has been so adequately pointed out this evening, the name of a portion of this great country, and those who belong to it should be proud. It was a portion which, like other parts of this great country, made its contribution towards the formation of the country, but it is, nevertheless, still only the name of this country, despite what my honourable friend reads me from the act.

The British North America Act states clearly and unequivocally that there shall be one dominion and that its name shall be Canada. I have no objection to that at all. All I am saying is, let us admit that Canada is what the Fathers of Confederation said it was—a dominion. Let us recall that, when we sought a name for our country by which we could honour it, we chose the name "dominion". When we named the day on which to honour this country, we chose "dominion". I have no objection to our nation being called Canada, because I have great regard for that name, but we are not now naming a nation but a day. Those men who formed this country named it, and they said it shall be a dominion. That is what we called it; that is what we honoured; and that is what, in the minds of most Canadians, it should continue to be.

I do not know what the reaction is in other parts of the country, but I am returning to you from the part of the country in which I was born and in which I live, and I have had many people there speak to me about what is to take place in this chamber. I have even had people urge me to return to this chamber in order that I might play a part in asking this chamber to do what my honourable friend has asked me to do: to impose upon this ill-considered and undigested proposal the sound, sober second thought—the cool, considered, lengthy second thought—that is required, because we can do what is proposed. We can scupper the word "Dominion" and replace it with the word "Canada," but we can never make up the difference in the hearts and minds of those who love the word, who honour the word and to whom the word means "Canada".

It is not like naming a flag. It is not a word that is appropriate to anything else in the world except this great nation of Canada. It is the word that was selected; it is the word that has meaning; it is the word that has the love and sympathy of millions of people in this country. I suggest to you that we throw it out for no useful purpose, without any real justification and without any real accomplishment. If we change the name today we will not be one bit more advanced than we are now.

Despite anything that anybody may say to me, I shall go to the end of my chapter perhaps being a rebel and perhaps not recognizing the law of the land. If the law of the land says that we shall call that day "Canada Day," I hereby proclaim in this Senate that I shall not obey that law. I was born in this country; I was raised in it; I paid honour to it; I celebrated Dominion Day, and I shall continue to do so for the years which may be left to me.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I had no intention of speaking this evening, but I feel that I must because of the speeches of Senator Macquarrie and Senator Donahoe, who was Attorney General of his province at the same time as I was Attorney General of my province.

There is no question that all honourable senators know that I am an Acadian, and, as such, I have the feeling that I am a great Canadian, or, at least, I want to be so in every sense of the word. I can understand a competent, intellectual scholar like Senator Macquarrie supporting the retention of the word "dominion" because it has been that way since the time of Sir John A. Macdonald. I can understand the traditional nature of some honourable senators who are good Canadians of British origin, of Irish origin, of Scotch origin, of French origin, of Ukrainian origin and of Polish origin, but I have difficulty in digesting the point that because Canada, in 1867, was called the Dominion of Canada, dominated by the British, it would remain a dominion over the years. I do not want Canada to be dominated, which, to me, is what the word "dominion" means. We live in this country called Canada, so why should we call the day we celebrate it "Dominion Day"? When I travel to the United States or anywhere else in the world I am not ashamed of telling people I come from Canada. I do not tell people that I come from the Dominion—

• (2200)

Hon. Martial Asselin: Of Canada.

Senator Robichaud: The Dominion of Canada?

Honourable senators, I could say many things, but my remarks would be purely emotional.

Although this concept has been around for many years, the bill was introduced in the House of Commons at an unexpected time.

[Translation]

As a fairly bilingual Acadian, a true Canadian, I think that Canada is the right formula. For instance, when we chose the Canadian flag it stirred up a certain amount of controversy. The moment it was accepted, by practically everybody throughout Canada, people were saying that the Canadian flag was beautiful. Is it the flag of the Dominion, of a dominated country? Of course not, not at all; it is the flag of Canada. It is a nation, a people that wants to be economically and linguistically united as much as possible. It is difficult and we are not going to achieve that overnight. If, for instance, we want to maintain certain elements of our country which will always be linked with something outside, we will be dominated. Should that be the case, we will say we are a Dominion and we will never be altogether independent.

[English]

We can become autonomous.

I know that members of the opposition are saying that this bill was passed by the other place in confusion. So what? I will vote for it regardless of what some members of the opposition may say.

Senator Asselin: That applies to some members of your party too; Senator McIlraith said he would vote "nay."

Senator Robichaud: That is his privilege.

Senator Asselin: Do not confuse members of the opposition with members of your own party.

Senator Robichaud: It is Senator Asselin's privilege to vote as he wishes.

Senator Asselin: For sure.

Senator Robichaud: Our flag was proclaimed on February 15, 1965; we have our own national anthem; and we can now have our own "Canada Day" on July 1.

The people of Quebec celebrate St. Jean Baptiste Day on June 24, which holiday is recognized on Parliament Hill.

Senator Lang: Why not change that to "Quebec Day"?

Senator Robichaud: And then split the country? Is that what Senator Lang wants? I know he does not want that.

I believe in Canada; not a dominated Canada. I do not want to get into the economic situation of the day since it is a worldwide situation and has no bearing on the matter at hand. The economic situation is rough at the moment, but I still believe in Canada, not a dominated Canada.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Would the honourable senator permit a question? He has just made an eloquent speech indicating that he would prefer that our national holiday be known as "Canada Day" instead of "Dominion Day." Having made that remark, he did not deal with the major point before us, which is whether that should be achieved by voting for this bill or in the proper way by voting for another bill, whether it be the government bill on the Order Paper of the other place, or a similar bill. Could he clarify his logic in that regard?

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, by voting for this bill I do not believe I will be voting improperly since I believe the bill is proper.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, I rise on a point of order.

I should like to address a question specifically to the Speaker. Would the Speaker please take under advisement and report back to the Senate his opinion as to whether Bill C-201, now before us, is, in fact, a "private bill" within the meaning of rule 93 of the Rules of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, since it is your wish, I will take that matter under advisement.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-125, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

• (2210)

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-125 is in much the same format as previous borrowing authority bills. Clause 1 deals with the name of the bill. Subclause 2(1) gives to the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed, authority to borrow additional sums of money, not to exceed $7 billion. Subclauses 2(2) and 2(3) deal with lapsing and expiration. Subclause 2(4) deals with currencies other than Canadian currency.

Honourable senators, I mean to make observations under six headings by way of answers to questions. Since this is a bill dealing with supplementary borrowing authority, it seems to me that the first question is: Borrowing authority supplementary to what? The authority is supplementary to that provided by Bill C-111, which was the borrowing authority corollary to the budget of November 12. Since that time, the budget of June 28 has been adopted in the other place, and Bill C-125 before us now is supplementary in that sense.

The second question is: The June budget has been passed, so why do we need supplementary borrowing authority? The answer to that question, honourable senators, is found in the Financial Administration Act, which stipulates that statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament in order for the government to increase its outstanding debt, which is exactly what this bill proposes to do in the sense that it gives authority to so increase that debt. The reference, honourable senators, is to Part IV, section 36, of the Financial Administration Act, which requires that "no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament". Consequently, in order to borrow new money to meet the government's financial requirements, statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament.

The third question is: How much supplementary borrowing authority is being requested? Honourable senators, the answer, as given to the National Finance Committee in its pre-study, which committee meeting I attended, as did the Minister of State, the Honourable Pierre Bussières, is as follows: There was a carryover borrowing authority from previous borrowing authority legislation of $3.5 billion. Bill C-111 requested authority to borrow $6.6 billion. Bill C-125, the bill before us, originally requested $11 billion additional borrowing authority, which was divided as between $7 billion and $4 billion contingency. When one takes the carryover borrowing authority, the borrowing authority provided by Bill C-111 and that provided in the original Bill C-125, one arrives at a total borrowing authority of $21.1 billion. In fact, by reason of an agreement reached in the other place, the government has agreed to ask for only $7 billion, leaving aside the contingency fund of $4 billion. I will have a little more to say about that in a moment.

The fourth question is: Why have the financial requirements of the government risen so as to require the supplementary borrowing authority that is being requested here? By way of general information, honourable senators, the financial requirements have increased from $6.6 billion to $17.1 billion. The simple reason for the increase is the rise in the projected deficit from the $10.5 billion which was forecast last November to the current projection of $19.5 billion. The main reason for the change in this projection is the extent of the decline in economic activity, which was far greater than was anticipated at the time the forecast of the economy was prepared last November. This weakening in the economy has reduced estimated revenues for 1982-83 by $6.4 billion, and has increased expenditures by $2.6 billion.

This increase in expenditures, honourable senators, was not the result of an extension of government programs, with the exception of job creation programs, but, rather, was primarily due to the increased public debt charges and energy-related expenditures.

Honourable senators, I do not think we should leave this aspect of the question without pointing out that not only the government but private organizations and public institutions vastly underestimated the severity of the slowdown in economic activity. Furthermore, developments in Canada are in line with those being experienced in other developed countries.

The fifth question is: What about the concern expressed in committee about non-lapsing authority? I will first briefly explain non-lapsing authority. Normally, any borrowing authority which is provided automatically lapses at the end of a fiscal year. A practice then developed which enabled the government to save a bit in a sort of "hip pocket" in order to provide flexibility in the event of an election, unexpected demands depleting the borrowing authority by the end of the fiscal year, and so forth.

Under the chairmanship of Senator Everett, the National Finance Committee, when studying Bill C-111, expressed concern about this non-lapsing authority and felt that it was not proper—in view of the Financial Administration Act and in view of the principle that Parliament should always vote borrowing authority—for the government to have a retained non-lapsing authority. It was the request of that committee that the government and the minister give serious consideration to discontinuing that practice.

The government has given consideration to the committee's recommendation, and honourable senators will remember that that recommendation was dealt with when the committee reported Bill C-111. In accordance with the concerns expressed by honourable senators at the time consideration was being given to that bill, the present bill provides for the cancellation of all unused non-lapsing authorities remaining outstanding from previous fiscal years.

In its original form, the bill seeking supplementary borrowing authority sought a new, non-lapsing contingency reserve of $4 billion over and above the $7 billion needed to meet the financial requirements. Thus, the bill requested a total of $11 billion in new authority, of which any unused authority in excess of $4 billion would expire on March 31, 1983. However, during its passage through the House of Commons, the bill was amended so that the contingency reserve was dropped, and the bill now before the Senate was amended to request $7 billion of supplementary borrowing authority.

This principle was established and enunciated in the committee not only by Conservative members but, I must say, significantly by Conservative members. I think that led to the negotiations which have reduced the amount requested by the bill to $7 billion and have left no non-lapsing authority at the end of the period. I should say that I congratulate the members of the committee, including the members of the opposition, for their insistence on that point.

In lieu of the $4 billion contingency reserve, it was moved that the Standing Orders be amended so that, if at any time prior to March 31, 1983, the government introduces a bill requesting new borrowing authority of not more than $4 billion, debate on all stages of that bill in the house shall be limited to a period not exceeding three days. This amendment will be known as Standing Order 72A and shall expire with the passage of any such bill.

The sixth and last question is: Why is there authority to borrow and repay in foreign currency? Honourable senators, as I mentioned when sponsoring Bill C-111, the clause referring to the ability of the government to borrow and repay loans in foreign currencies is a technical one, and has been included in the last five borrowing authority acts. Over the years, Canada has borrowed and repaid funds in a number of currencies. In recent years, however, this clause has been added to confirm Canada's right to borrow in foreign currencies.

As I mentioned in the debate on Bill C-111, Bill C-96, which has received first reading in the house, proposes certain amendments to the Financial Administration Act, including an amendment clarifying the government's ability to borrow and repay in foreign currencies. Once this amendment has been passed, there will no longer be a need for this clause to reappear in a borrowing authority bill.

● (2220)

Honourable senators, those are the reasons why the government is requesting Senate approval of the supplementary borrowing authority of $7 billion, as provided for in Bill

[Senator Frith.]

C-125, and I ask your support for the motion for second reading.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could have leave to add something. I do not mean to cut off Senator Riley, but merely wish to add something to which the honourable senator may wish to refer. I cannot proceed if he will not let me do so.

Senator Riley: I have one question to ask, if the honourable senator will permit me. Why is it that the original legislation that was introduced requested borrowing authority for $11 billion, and that amount has now been reduced to $7 billion? What is the saving to Canadians as a result of that reduction?

Senator Frith: The honourable senator may have come into the chamber after I had dealt with the first part of his question. However, I will repeat it.

The figure was originally $11 billion, made up of $7 billion in borrowing authority and $4 billion in contingency. The agreement is that the non-lapsing contingency of $4 billion will be dropped in exchange for an agreement that if the government needs it, then debate on the bill asking for it will be limited to three days.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): In the house.

Senator Frith: In the House only. Exactly. It was a House agreement. We did not make the agreement. The saving could be substantial. If authority to borrow $4 billion were used, then, of course, interest would be mounting on that figure. The fact that the authority is not there means that that amount cannot be borrowed, and any saving could be projected, I suppose, on the basis of interest charges on $4 billion. However, that is hypothetical, since it would only arise if the $4 billion authority were used. In other words, interest does not start to run when the government is given authority to borrow, but only when, in fact, it uses that authority to borrow.

Senator Riley: As a supplementary, in the beginning was it explicitly stated to the house that the extra $4 billion was only on a contingency basis?

Senator Frith: The $11 billion originally asked for was divided into $7 billion for direct borrowing authority, and $4 billion for a non-lapsing contingency fund—that is, a contingency fund that would not lapse automatically if unused, as borrowing authority normally does. That is what has been taken out of the bill. So the government is now asking Parliament for authority to borrow $7 billion and not $11 billion.

Senator Flynn: It was not split in the bill.

Senator Frith: No, there was no split in the bill. I was not suggesting there was.

Senator Flynn: It was a statement of the minister.

Senator Frith: When I referred to the split between $7 billion and $4 billion, I was referring to my notes taken in committee. It was in committee that the minister explained the split. Therefore, I am able, because of what the minister said in committee, to answer the question as to why, of the original straight $11 billion that was asked for, the split between $7 billion and $4 billion arose. It arose as a result of explanations given in committee.

Senator Riley: As a further supplementary, when did the contingency suggestion arise? Was it in the original statement of the minister when he wanted to borrow the $11 billion, or did it come later?

Senator Frith: As I understand it, it was in answer to questions in committee, and I believe also in the House, for a breakdown of the $11 billion.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, with your leave, I would like to rise on what I would qualify as a question of privilege, regarding the course of events in committee and the manner in which the debate is proceeding at this time.

Last week, at a meeting of the Committee on National Finance—last Wednesday if I remember correctly—the chairman of the committee insisted on having a special meeting the next day, when the minister would make a presentation. So the next day, Thursday, the committee met and the Minister of State for Finance made his presentation of the situation, which was challenged by various members of the committee. The government's case was challenged on the grounds that the $4 billion contingency fund or reserve borrowing authority was perhaps not entirely necessary.

The proceedings lasted all morning until around noon, after the minister had mentioned that negotiations were going on in the other place. We were there, discussing the substance of the bill as a committee of the Senate, in order to determine and take a position on the advisability of having either a split between $7 billion and $4 billion or on the advisability of having this damned contingency fund. During all this time, everybody knew that consultations were being held at the other place. At three o'clock in the afternoon, we were advised that while we were discussing the bill in committee, with the minister defending his $11 billion and some committee members challenging that $11 billion and wanting to cut this amount to $7 billion, during all this time, consultations were taking place elsewhere. So we were advised of the outcome at three o'clock in the afternoon, namely, there was to be a new bill, for $7 billion instead of $11 billion.

My question of privilege may be somewhat naïve, but being a relative newcomer to parliamentary procedure, I wonder whether we were not indulging in an exercise in futility with a minister of the Crown, since finally, an entirely different arrangement was negotiated.

The Deputy Leader of the Government has been giving us somewhat convoluted explanations this evening for the fact that the government is now seeking authority to borrow $7 billion instead of $11 billion.

Strictly speaking, perhaps this is not a question of privilege but more like a series of questions at least regarding our working procedures. Just think, last Thursday, we spent four hours discussing the pros and cons of $11 billion, while over at the other place, they were negotiating to settle for $7 billion, and finally, today we have a government proposal for $7 billion instead of the original $11 billion.

I really would like to know whether this kind of procedure is in keeping with the status of the Senate. I feel that this point does make my question a question of privilege.

● (2230)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the procedure used in that special case is in keeping with the practices of the Senate. With Senator Tremblay, I attended the meeting of the committee. To attempt to answer his question, I want to place it in its context.

In the first place, we were expecting the arrival of Bill C-125. Under such circumstances, the Senate has adopted the practice whenever possible, and when time allows, to study the bill in advance, and thus gain time. This is exactly what we have done.

Secondly, during consideration of the bill, the minister appeared before the Senate Committee on National Finance. He explained the contents of the bill and the distribution of the $11 billion including $7 billion and $4 billion. He frankly said that discussions were then under way. He openly and respectfully explained to the senators what was at stake in committee. He told us that when the bill is introduced the amount may be lower than $11 billion.

Senator Flynn advised me about that possibility. I think that everybody was aware that some kind of compromise was being sought. I point out that in that special case, the issue was the $4 billion non-lapsing contingency fund. With all due respect to the Senate, the other place agreed to an amendment.

We now have a bill in accordance with the established plan. This is just what we expected. I think that according to my brief experience which is perhaps a little longer than Senator Tremblay's, but not as long as many other senators with all due respect for the practices and procedures of the Senate we now find ourselves in this situation.

Senator Tremblay: I shall conclude very rapidly. If I understand correctly what the Deputy Leader of the Government has just said, it is because of the discussions we had that day until noon or half past twelve—

Senator Frith: Not only because of them.

Senator Tremblay: —that the representations made to the Senate committee have brought about a change in the government's bill.

Senator Frith: Not exactly.

Senator Tremblay: I do not object to defining in this way the extent to which, under these circumstances, the views of some senators were respectfully received by the committee. To such an extent, in fact, that the bill was changed in the other place to cover not $11 billion any longer, but $7 billion. If such is the case, I am pleased. Under these circumstances, my question of privilege concerning the respect owed the Senate becomes one of congratulations for the celerity with which the Commons reacts to remarks made before a committee of the Senate. Indeed, in this case, the action was very quick, for the remarks were made around noon and the action was taken at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Senator Frith: I have said that was not exactly the point. As I explained in my speech, the changes with regard to the "non-lapsing" are the result of the study of Bill C-111 in the Senate committee. The principle was adopted in June.

With regard to the details of the changes now before us, the discussions that took place at the meeting last week certainly made a difference.

Senator Tremblay: If I understand correctly, particularly following the report of Senator Everett—I remember clearly that he was very critical of Bill C-111—if such is the case, then I must say that I can no longer congratulate the government on its speedy action, but must instead criticize its delay. It should have been taken into account in the original version of Bill C-125.

Senator Frith: We should celebrate that exchange of congratulations!

[English]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I shall not delay the Senate very long. My first comments are with regard to the problem of doing a pre-study on a bill in these circumstances.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Experience has shown that we sometimes go through the process of pre-study for nothing, because ultimately the bill comes to us in an entirely different form from that which prompted the pre-study. With regard to Bill C-125, we were discussing $11 billion in the pre-study, and now we receive the bill and it refers to $7 billion.

If I recall correctly, most of the discussion in the committee was on the so-called non-lapsing fund, the $4 billion in excess borrowing authority, and here I would like to correct what the deputy leader said. There is nothing in this bill that speaks of $7 billion in borrowing authority on a regular basis, and an additional $4 billion for the non-lapsing fund, and there is no question about that.

Senator Frith: No question at all.

Senator Flynn: I do not see where the deputy leader gets this idea of the non-lapsing fund. Such a fund may have been mentioned in other bills prior to this one, but it was certainly not mentioned in Bill C-125. The bill, as it was originally printed, referred to $11 billion, and, now it has been amended and refers to $7 billion. That is all; there is no other difference.

I have a query with regard to borrowing authority for the non-lapsing fund, and I would like the deputy leader to obtain a reply from the minister. When the legislation for borrowing authority is passed, it is permanent. The moment you have borrowed on that authority, you can borrow again to repay the bond issue when it comes due. Although it will probably be somewhat fictitious, I would like the deputy leader to tell me how much of the borrowing authority has been used. In other words, how much has the government borrowed up to now, including what is requested in this bill, in order to continue to borrow to replace bonds that become due? That is my first question.

My second question has to do with clause 2(3) which states:

(3) All borrowing powers that are authorized by section 5 of chapter 8 of the Statutes of 1976-77, section 5 of chapter 7 of the Statutes of 1977-78 and section 2 of chapter 53 of the Statutes of 1980-81-82 and are outstanding and unused and in respect of which no action has been taken . . . shall expire on the date of the coming into force of this Act.

How much borrowing authority is contained in these borrowing powers that apparently have not been used and which could have been used without even asking Parliament to do anything? I ask that because, apparently, these amounts were authorized by these bills and were not used and did not lapse. This goes back to 1976-77, 1977-78 and 1980-81-82. This is probably a bill that was passed at the beginning of this very long session, which I think is setting a record for length. The situation is rather strange because we were told, and told repeatedly by the minister that $3.5 billion was left with which to meet the deficit, as already forecast, of $10.5 billion. He said they were using this $3.5 billion. Surely there must be something else, something other than the borrowing authority referred to in clause 2(3), because that is something different.

I ask the deputy leader to ask the minister to clarify this point, and the deputy leader can either tell us in the Senate or tell us in committee, when the bill is referred to committee. Well, the matter is still before the committee, in fact.

Senator Frith: It is there in pre-study form.

Senator Flynn: In any event, the matter is still before the committee. If the minister appears before the committee, I hope he will be able to provide us with some clarification of this point. I want to know the total of the used authority—in other words, the ceiling of the national debt which would be the result of the total possible used authority and the authority provided in this bill. Together they would give us the ceiling of the national debt. I want to know why we are speaking of lapsing authority in clause 2(3), whereas we were told that we still had another $3.5 billion authority, as indicated by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, first on the question—

Senator Flynn: It is not necessarily a question-and-answer session.

Senator Frith: No, I understand.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Wasn't your question long enough?

Senator Flynn: I don't know if anybody else wants to speak.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I do, but not tonight.

Senator Flynn: It seems to me that the sponsor could wait to answer questions until he is closing the debate.

Senator Roblin: That is the appropriate time.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, I think we had better treat this as answering a question rather than as closing the debate, because there is something I would like to say about further debate at this stage.

Senator Roblin: Would it not be a good idea for my honourable friend perhaps to collect the questions and deal with them when closing the debate? That is the customary procedure.

Senator Frith: I appreciate that. I would just like to refer to the first question and explain the adjournment of the debate. The first question dealt with the fact that the bill makes no reference to a split between $7 billion and $4 billion. Of course, it is quite clear that there is no such reference. Bill C-125, as presented to the Commons, was for $11 billion. That was before the committee last week. We have before us now a bill for $7 billion, and we have the provision that deals with lapsing. So it is only by inference that one can come to a conclusion that there is a $4 billion contingency reserve for borrowing authority, as was referred to in the committee but which is no longer before us. Since the bill before us wipes out any non-lapsing in those three, you then have to add those factors in order to come to the conclusion that I expressed, namely, that the $4 billion is a reserve fund that is lapsing unless it is presented as non-lapsing, if ever it comes up later pursuant to the agreement in the other place.

With respect to further debate at this stage of second reading, I have only this to say: The committee has had before it the minister and his officials, and it has permission to meet tomorrow at 3.30 p.m. to study the bill. If it is referred to the committee tonight, the committee will be able to have before it tomorrow the minister and his officials. If the committee cannot study it until Thursday, the minister will not be able to be there but his officials will, as far as I am aware.

If Senator Roblin or any other senator wants to adjourn the debate on second reading at this stage, he is perfectly entitled to do so, and I am sure that all of us will support such a motion. However, because of the arrangements that have been made with the minister, I am asking that after second reading tonight the bill be sent to the committee for further study. The minister and his officials will appear tomorrow to answer any questions. The bill, if possible, would be reported tomorrow and we would continue debate on third reading after having had the benefit of questioning the minister and his officials.

For those reasons, I ask honourable senators to grant second reading tonight and to refer the bill to committee for further consideration. Then there would be plenty of opportunity for further debate at the third reading stage.

Senator Roblin: May I speak to the point of order raised by my honourable friend and tell him that I am not disposed to speak tonight, considering the hour and the temper of the house? Some on this side are getting a bit cranky. In adjourning the debate I do not think I am impeding any discussion that the committee might wish to undertake with the minister. After all, the subject matter of the bill is before the committee now. The minister has already been before the committee and has discussed it at some length. There is nothing to prevent his turning up at 3.30 tomorrow afternoon and continuing that discussion, no matter what we do in this house.

It seems to me that the desire of the deputy leader—maybe I am being unkind to him, but I will say it anyway—to hustle the thing along is not necessary in order to meet the convenience of the committee. The committee can meet at 3.30 and can hear the minister. The subject matter is before it. Let it do its duty in that way.

I would solicit the privilege of the house in adjourning the debate so that I may speak tomorrow. I do not intend to speak at any great length, though.

Senator Frith: I am not attempting to hustle the matter. I am just explaining what had been laid down. I see no difference, personally, whether Senator Roblin speaks on second reading tomorrow, before it has gone to the committee formally, or not. But that is his privilege. If that is the way he wants to do it, that is fine.

Senator Roblin: Well, does my honourable friend not recognize that the debate on second reading is on the principle of the bill? Certainly, members of this house have the right to debate the principle of the bill to borrow $7 billion. For him to intimate that it makes no difference is hardly appropriate. It may make no difference to my honourable friend or to some other members of the house whether I speak on the matter tomorrow, and that is fine with me, but I want to say something, and I think that the deputy leader, in particular, ought to recognize my right to say it without this quibble.

Senator Frith: I always recognize his right to say it, and I would recognize his right to say it tonight, tomorrow, on second reading, on third reading or whenever. But if he wants to do it this way, I simply say, "Agreed".

Senator Roblin: My friend is most agreeable. I thank him.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-122, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act (No. 3).

• (2250)

He said: As honourable senators will recall, the Small Businesses Loans Act was amended in July 1980 to provide a further lending period of two years ending June 30, 1982. Since the act was first introduced in January, 1961, it has been customary to renew the legislation from time to time to provide for further lending periods, normally of three years' duration. This extension of the current lending period that honourable senators are being asked to consider is one of nine months.

The purpose of this extension is two-fold: First of all, it will bring the Small Businesses Loans Act into line with other similar programs on a fiscal year as opposed to a calendar year basis, thereby streamlining the administrative process; secondly, it will enable the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) to refer the results of the recently concluded Small Business Financing Review to a select committee, such committee to report before the end of the year regarding recommendations and changes that should be made to the legislation to widen the legislation and improve its scope and make it more beneficial to the small business interests in the country.

Honourable senators are aware, I am sure, of the important role this program plays in the financial life of the small business community. The annual report, "Small Businesses Loans Act Annual Report, 1981", provides graphic and persuasive evidence as to the value of this program. As a matter of fact, this afternoon I asked for some detail regarding the loans classified by province and lending institution. I shall not burden honourable senators with all the details, but can give the following figures for 1981: British Columbia, $131 million; Alberta, $48.182 million; Saskatchewan, $29.9 million; Manitoba $14.8 million; Ontario, $103.8 million; Quebec, $148.384 million; New Brunswick, $9.52 million; Nova Scotia, $7.65 million; Prince Edward Island, $1.78 million; Newfoundland, $5.7 million; Northwest Territories, just under half a million dollars; Yukon, $1.831 million.

That is the total lending. The document also indicates the lending institutions involved in this program, and there are a great many of them. I commend the document to honourable senators who wish to measure the impact of the program in their respective provinces.

In 1981, over 17,000 loans amounting to some $503 million were guaranteed, an increase of 20 per cent over 1980.

I discussed with officials today the loss ratio, which is of interest. The loss ratio during the last calendar year—there is the hope to move to the fiscal year—was 2.4 per cent, which, under current economic conditions, is, I think, acceptable. During the entire life of the program, payments under the terms of the guarantee amount to only 0.8 per cent of the total of loans. That, I suggest, is a remarkable figure.

It might be appropriate at this time to remind honourable senators of some of the basic facts about the Small Businesses Loans Act. Almost every area of small business in this country is eligible to borrow funds from chartered banks and some 1,200 other lenders under advantageous terms and conditions for the purchase of equipment, machinery, premises and land. Without going into the names of the institutions, in many communities the local credit unions are involved, as are trust companies, mortgage companies and other lending institutions. Funds can also be used for the modernization of plant, equipment and premises. One of the attractive features of this important program is the modest level of public human resources required to administer it.

As the Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) indicated in the other place, a staff of six people, including support staff and a manager, are responsible for the entire program. This seems to me to be something of a record.

Furthermore, there is a minimum amount of paperwork required on the part of the lender—less, in fact, than is required in making a normal bank loan.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I urge that there be speedy approval of this bill so that lenders may continue to provide small businesses access to funds for the purposes set out in the act. This measure, I suggest, is particularly beneficial and very much needed at this time.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-92, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act".—(Honourable Senator Perrault).

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, in my capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which has been pre-studying the subject matter of the bill, I would ask the deputy leader what the expectation, or the hope, of the government is in relation to further work of the committee on that pre-study.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is a government bill, and the government would like the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, chaired by the Honourable Senator Smith, to continue its pre-study. The government would be delighted if the committee reported the bill without amendment by the end of the week, but all the government expects of the committee is that it continue its pre-study.

Senator Smith: I thank the deputy leader. I will not make any other response except to express my thanks to him.

Senator Frith: I would not expect you to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, July 28, 1982

The Senate met at 2.20 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem in the Chair.
Prayers.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN COMMENCEMENT OF SITTING

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could inform the Senate of the reason why rule 7(1) has been ignored. I hope that there is a good explanation for it. It seems to me that not ringing the bell until after 2.20 shows a certain lack of respect for this Chamber. I wonder if we could have the explanation.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that, from his long experience in the Senate, the Honourable Senator Molson realizes that it is a rare occasion on which the ringing of the bell is delayed for such a length of time.

Today there were a number of events, including the funeral of our late colleague, the Honourable John Connolly, and a number of matters relating to the business which must be dealt with prior to the end of the session, which caused this unfortunate and regrettable delay—a delay for which I offer honourable senators my apologies.

Senator Molson: I am glad the leader has apologized, because I found it difficult to understand why, if the sitting was going to be delayed for as long as 20 minutes, some word was not passed around, or we were not somehow informed. However, I thank the leader for his explanation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We will ask for more later.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE INSULATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-109, to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PARLIAMENT

SUMMER RECESS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has, in reply to the point raised by Senator Molson, mentioned that there were other problems tied to the adjournment of the session—I did not hear him say “prorogation”, which might be expected after two years and three months—for the summer recess, which is now going to be practically at the end of summer. I am wondering if he can tell us more about what was discussed during the 20 minutes that honourable senators waited for the bell to ring.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I recall that I used the word “business”. We were having discussions relating to the business which might be dealt with before the summer recess. I may be able to provide a fuller statement on this at an early opportunity.

• (1430)

Senator Flynn: You say “at an early opportunity”. In my opinion, it should be now. When shall we learn if we are going to adjourn either this week or next week? Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government has been negotiating, but I thought there was a meeting of government supporters who were going to decide on certain positions.

Senator Perrault: First, may I say, in amplification of my earlier statement in response to Senator Molson, that, of course, a notice should have been sent to honourable senators advising them of the delay. That delay had not been anticipated; nevertheless, a notice should have been sent.

Secondly, with regard to the business before Parliament to be dealt with before the summer adjournment, there have been many discussions held today, including a number involving supporters of the government. I have not had an opportunity to discuss with the house leader in the other place the details of these discussions—some of them, I understand, with the house leaders of the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party with regard to the business it is hoped Parliament may be able to accomplish before the end of this week. Some rather critical decisions are now under consideration as to whether it will be necessary to have Parliament sit next week. I shall undertake to communicate with the office of the house leader in the other place to determine what progress may have been made at those meetings.

Senator Flynn: With regard to the discussions with the house leaders in the other place, I do not think they had anything to do with the delay in calling the Senate this afternoon. The Leader of the Government mentioned that the delay was not anticipated. Does that mean that the discussion in the Liberal caucus took more time than was anticipated? Is that what he means?

Senator Perrault: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his continuing interest in the welfare of the party and the supporters of the government. I can say that we discussed matters which are in the public interest.

Senator Flynn: In any event, perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government can tell us now. If he cannot reply immediately, I cannot force him to give me the adequate answer he always gives, according to Senator Guay. He may not be able to give an adequate answer today, but perhaps he will be able to do so tomorrow. I know that we are to expect Bill C-124. Are there any other bills, the passage of which is required by the government before the adjournment for what is left of the summer?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my information at the moment is that the only additional bill, other than Bill C-124, that the House of Commons may send to us, that is part of the government's legislative program before adjournment, is the Canagrex bill. As has been the situation for a couple of weeks now, the basic package remains the same, namely, the two budget bills, C-124 and C-125, and the other three bills, namely, the Canagrex, UFFI, and Ports. We now have two-thirds of the latter, namely, the Ports and UFFI, and also Bill C-201.

Senator Flynn: Bill C-201 raises an interesting question. Is the position of the Deputy Leader of the Government still the same, that the bill has to be passed in its present form before the adjournment?

Senator Frith: That is our position. I would not say that it has to be passed. We can only propose, as can a private member, and the Senate disposes; but it is the government's wish that it pass in its present form before the adjournment.

Senator Flynn: Before the adjournment, but is it a condition of the adjournment that it be passed? For instance, would the Senate have to come back next week for only that bill?

Senator Frith: The package is as described. What parts of it are conditional or unconditional, I would not care to say.

Senator Flynn: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government. His response, although in appearance rather hazy, is quite revealing.

• (1435)

Senator Perrault: It is a very revealing haze.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Is there the possibility that the Senate will be sitting on Friday?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if it seems to us tomorrow that advantage can be gained, particularly with reference to an adjournment and not having to sit next week, I think we should sit on Friday. We will have to wait until we get a clearer picture on Bill C-124. As the situation stands, I believe that it will not get third reading in the other place until Monday. In that event, I would suggest that we not sit on Friday but, rather, that we come back next week.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I say to the deputy leader that I think it would be very difficult to obtain consent from this side to proceed with Bill C-124, in all its stages, on Friday if, for example, the bill were received on Friday afternoon.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not want to make a prediction as to what the Senate may wish to do under those circumstances, but I think what Senator Flynn has said is quite reasonable.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is in keeping with his usual reasonableness.

GRAIN

RAPESEED—FREIGHT RATES TREATMENT

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the government considering placing crushed rapeseed on a par with the raw product insofar as freight rates treatment is concerned?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Of course, the government is considering the Gilson report, but there is no immediate action, of which I am aware, in that regard.

Senator Balfour: Does the government not consider it discriminatory that shippers of the partially refined product must pay more than those who ship the raw product?

Senator Argue: I think the answer to that question could be "yes". This topic, of course, is the basis of Doctor Gilson's study and his report. I may say that Mr. Pepin and I had the opportunity to meet in Regina about a week ago with the rapeseed crushers. They are very concerned about the possibility of a large increase in freight rates on the crushed product coming into effect soon. Certainly, their concern was brought to the attention of the minister. However, the matter is before the Canadian Transport Commission, and I am not certain at all as to the action they may take. The rapeseed industry is in a difficult way for a number of reasons—the market is down and the availability of rapeseed is not all that great.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): "Availability"?

Senator Argue: The availability of the raw product is not that great, because production is down. Certainly, the crushers face difficulties, and a large increase in the freight rate would make it difficult for them, but the long term problem is under consideration.

TRANSPORT

MANITOBA—CHURCHILL—GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. On May 26 I asked the minister about the delivery of grain to the Port of Churchill. At that time I indicated my concern and the reason why I was asking the question in the month of May, which was to bring to the minister's attention the possibility of increasing the percentage of grain shipped through that port, which is very important to the people of western Canada, and particularly to those of Manitoba.

Because of the concern that still exists there and because we still do not know the outcome of this situation, I would like to ask the minister at this time—if he followed up on this very important matter to western Canadians—whether he has anything to report on the subject.

● (1440)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I share Senator Guay's concern that adequate supplies of grain be shipped through the Port of Churchill, which, as honourable senators know, relies almost solely for its operational existence on activities related to the handling of grain.

From time to time we have tried to interest private groups, and even the provinces, in using the port facilities, but it remains largely a grain port. Personally, I have always supported the Port of Churchill. It is essential to federal government plans for grain movement in the 1980s, as the industry gears up to meet the Wheat Board's 1990 export target of 36 million tonnes. In that respect I am pleased to report that for the 1982 shipping season we envisage the shipment through the Port of Churchill of some 561,000 tonnes of wheat and barley, being comprised of approximately 366,000 tonnes of wheat and 196,000 tonnes of barley. Those are relatively large quantities, and I must say that 1982, although it is not the best year, is certainly one of the better years for the Port of Churchill. Last year 438,000 tonnes of grain were shipped through the port, so we are already more than 25 per cent ahead of that. The year before that 289,000 tonnes of grain were shipped.

Having indicated the program that has been concluded for Churchill for this year, I should point out that the shipping season will actually get under way on August 2 or 3. Further orders may come in, but in any event the quantity I have indicated is assured. The Canadian Wheat Board uses Churchill related to market requirements. The government continues to put funds into the Herchmer line and into rehabilitation—$21 million to date—and the people of Churchill and of western Canada can be assured that the port is being used extensively this year for the shipment of grain.

Senator Olson: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not often have the chance to congratulate the honourable minister who has just spoken. I feel that I ought to tell him at this time that his efforts are much appreciated, because that is a substantial volume of grain and it will have a good effect on both Churchill and the province. For that I thank him.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—INITIATIVES TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Because there has been no real progress towards a peaceful settlement of the Lebanon crisis, I should like to know what initiatives have been taken by the Canadian government to play an active role in international efforts to secure a negotiated political settlement of the Palestinian question and to end the bloody war in Lebanon.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two updates on the situation in Lebanon from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which I am pleased to communicate to the Senate.

He has advised that following the bombing of the official residence we were in touch with the ambassador in Lebanon by telephone. All Canadian staff at the embassy are safe. Their number has today been cut again to the minimum of five or six. The ambassador has the authority to close down operations in the embassy the moment he believes that the members of his staff are running unacceptable risks.

I would recall to your attention that our embassy staff there can move quite easily from West Beirut to East Beirut and Junieh, up the coast where the situation is calm. We have no information on the shelling of Junieh yesterday, which came as a surprise, except to say that the residence is badly damaged. However, prior to yesterday's attack the ambassador had not been living in the residence for some time, and the embassy office is in a part of the downtown area which has so far not been hit by the Israeli attacks.

In the meantime, honourable senators, the embassy is carrying out extremely useful functions in reporting on the situation, making contact with local authorities, providing services to Canadians in the area and following the progress of humanitarian relief efforts in the country.

With respect to the violence taking place in Lebanon as a whole, we deplore the continuing violence there with its mounting total of casualties. We are especially concerned that the most recent Israeli attacks on West Beirut by land, sea and air are causing widespread death and destruction among civilians.

● (1445)

We support Mr. Philip Habib's efforts to end the bloodshed and find an accommodation among the parties. Withdrawal of Israeli forces in conformity with Security Council Resolutions 508 and 509 is imperative, as is the departure of all foreign forces from Lebanon. The Lebanese must be allowed to get on with the immense task of reconciliation and reconstruction.

Bearing today's date, another message from the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been received by me.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that our ambassador to Israel called on the Deputy Secretary General of the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs today to protest the most recent bombing of the official residence and the lack of response to our previous protest.

Mr. Bar-On conveyed the Israeli government's deepest regret for the damage to the residence and said that everything would be done to try to avoid a future similar situation, but that it was not possible to give assurances that such damage would not recur.

With respect to searches of the ambassador's car between East and West Beirut, Mr. Bar-On conveyed official regrets and apologies for any harassment suffered. Instructions have been issued to the IDF to stop these searches.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Is the Leader of the Government in a position this afternoon to comment on a press report that the Canadian government has forbidden our ambassador in West Beirut to carry on any talks with representatives of the Palestinian people?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I have not been advised of that fact by the minister.

FELICITATIONS ON TWENTY-SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY OF APPOINTMENT TO SENATE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to remind you that on this day 27 years ago my aging colleague to my right was summoned to the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lang: Along with him, twelve others were summoned to the Senate on that day, including my young friend, Senator McGrand, as well as Senators Inman, Cameron and Croll.

I hope that the initiative the Prime Minister of that day took in causing to be inducted into this chamber such a large group of talented people, will be emulated by the present Prime Minister.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Bird for the second reading of Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I have never received as much correspondence in respect of a single piece of legislation as I have relating to Bill C-201. In my case, without exception, all those who have written to me are in favour of retaining the term "Dominion Day".

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hicks: That, however, is not the reason why I oppose this bill, as I shall explain in the remarks I wish to make this afternoon.

I should say, though, that my correspondence contains some rather interesting observations. One distinguished Canadian—a resident of the city of Ottawa, as a matter of fact—is reluctant to see the ancient term "Dominion" dropped. He states:

I know of no other country which has such an inferiority complex that it has to use its own name to denote a national holiday.

Well, honourable senators, we learned from Senator Bird that Australia calls its national holiday "Australia Day."

• (1450)

What about this term "dominion"? In his speech of last evening, Senator Macquarrie recounted how the word was chosen. According to his account, Sir Leonard Tilley was the one who picked the word "dominion" out of the eighth verse of Psalm 72, which reads:

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

My recollection is, and my correspondent says the same thing, that it was a Nova Scotian, Sir Charles Tupper, who chose the word, but that is a small point and we need not quarrel about it.

In any event, one of the Fathers of Confederation picked this word. It was in no wise a word established by the British to denote any inferior state or description of a country. The fact that Canada chose it had nothing to do with the British Parliament or the British government. The fact that other portions of the Commonwealth chose to use the same term—Australia, New Zealand and South Africa come to mind at once—meant they were copying a Canadian idea and not a British, or imperial, or Commonwealth idea. The word "dominion" was a Canadian idea taken from Psalm 72.

I think that traditions are valuable and that we ought not to turn our backs on our heritage. Indeed, we should build our future on our understanding of the great accomplishments and the great episodes of the past. I am disturbed that all too often today we Canadians are turning our backs on our heritage and avoiding reference to those great episodes that made us the great nation we are. We have practically eradicated the word "royal" from all references to any of the activities or agencies in our country. It may very well be that our French Canadian friends thought that the royal epithet referred too specifically to the British monarchy—as, indeed, it did—and I have gone along with that, although with some reluctance, because it seems to me that an appreciation of the past is necessary to an understanding of the present and to a preparation for the future.

A week ago I received a message from the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais stating:

On the occasion of the official ceremony of the Patriation of the Canadian Constitution you received a commemorative nickel dollar packaged in a red velvet case.

This brilliant uncirculated coin will be offered to the Royal Canadian Mint's clients from September 1 to November 30, 1982. It will be presented in a similar case bearing a maple leaf instead of the armories of Canada.

Is this the beginning now of dropping the arms of Canada? I hope not. I say again that when we turn our backs on history, we lose something which can never be regained. I hope that we will not do that.

In view of the arguments that were put forward so well by Senator Macquarrie last evening, it is not necessary for me to say much more. In my opinion, the term "dominion" in no way connotes subservience. It relates to our past and refers to the activities of our Fathers of Confederation. There is no reason why we ought not to perpetuate Dominion Day.

I shall be content to close this brief intervention by quoting another great Nova Scotian. These words, by the way, were last voiced in the Senate by the late Senator Grattan O'Leary. In one of his last speeches here he quoted Joseph Howe as follows:

A wise nation preserves its records, gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures, and fosters national pride and love of country, by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, would Senator Hicks permit a question?

Senator Hicks: Certainly.

Senator Goldenberg: Did I understand Senator Hicks to say that Canada adopted the term "dominion", and so did Australia, New Zealand and South Africa?

Senator Hicks: It is my impression that Canada adopted it first, and then the other colonies when they became self-governing, used it. I do not know what exact technique or discussions were involved.

● (1455)

Senator Goldenberg: Is it not a fact that Australia never used the term "dominion"? It was, from the beginning, and still is, the Commonwealth of Australia, and that is set out in the Australian Constitution.

Senator Hicks: I certainly have to bow to Senator Goldenberg's more precise knowledge. Perhaps I was loosely referring to the fact that, for many years, Australia was included in the general reference to the "dominions" within the Commonwealth. However, I am sure he is technically correct.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are they not described in the Statute of Westminster by the generic term "dominions," and then specified by their peculiar titles?

Senator Goldenberg: That is correct so far as the Statute of Westminster is concerned, but the title of Australia has always been and still is "the Commonwealth of Australia," not "the Dominion of Australia."

Senator Roblin: There is no argument about that.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have listened to the excellent speeches that have been made in this debate, and it is quite apparent that there are great differences, largely emotional, on this issue, as there were in the debate on the Constitution.

Senator Hicks, who has just finished speaking has, I am afraid, said much of what I will be saying.

I am concerned that Bill C-201 is just another very small step in the process, which has been continued over the last few years, of downgrading tradition and obscuring our heritage. Some of these steps have taken the form of removing the word "royal" from the mail and from the armed forces such as the former Royal Canadian Navy, Royal Canadian Armoured Corps, and the Royal Canadian Air Force in which I was so proud to serve between 1939 and 1945.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: If anyone doubts the public interest in and support for the traditional appearance, at least, of the armed forces, let him only look at the lawn in front of this building between 10.00 and 10.30 every morning. He will find that the Changing of the Guard draws an audience that would compare not too badly in number with that drawn by the Expos, and certainly by the Argos.

The Constitution debate did as much to divide the country, in my opinion, as anything that has occurred since Confederation. It looks as though this bill to amend the Holidays Act will have the effect of keeping that pot boiling. It puzzles and bothers me. The government emphasizes unity, yet it seems it almost favours measures which divide us. I cannot believe it is intentional but, if one can be objective, it looks that way.

Whether the national holiday should be called "Canada Day" or "Dominion Day" is a decision that should be taken by the people of Canada and, particularly, by their representatives in Parliament. A decision on such a matter as this, affecting widespread emotions, should never be sneaked through by way of a questionable bill or motion.

The main, and difficult, problem with "Dominion Day" is that it does not translate into French, and the French perception of it is one of subservience or dominion by others. Senator Robichaud mentioned that, to him, it meant dominion by others. However, to me, and I think to many, "dominion" was chosen on a triumphal note to signal the escape from colonial status to one where the people of this new country had domination over their own land, laws and customs. To me, it mirrors the American choice of "Independence Day" as the name of their national holiday.

If the people of Canada want to call it "Canada Day," I am perfectly content to accept that. If they do not, I also accept that fact. What I cannot accept is a bill coming to us for the sober second thought for which the Senate was created, having gone through the other place without any debate and perhaps without even a quorum. This private bill now becomes a public bill because of its passage in the other place. Therefore, it is government-sponsored and, as usual, we will see the whips put on to avoid what, to this government, seems to be the most important thing to avoid—loss of face.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, as the situation stands, I cannot vote for this bill. I would like to repeat and emphasize, however, that if a bill comes forward in the normal way, if it is considered by a majority of the members of Parliament and is favoured by both houses, and if the public has the chance to express itself, I will quite happily support it. The present effort is quite unworthy both of this house and of the government of the day.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am glad to follow two such distinguished senators. In his speech last evening, Senator Macquarrie indicated that he was not going to refer to the incident in the other place—but I am going to.

Honourable senators, we have had many opportunities to carry out our responsibilities in this chamber in accordance with what the Fathers of Confederation envisaged to be our duties. Having looked through the Debates of the other place, it is evident that, some 35 years ago, the Senate did stop the passage of a similar bill to change the name "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day." It was moved by Mr. Côté from the riding of Matapédia-Matane. I give full marks to the honourable senators of that day who stopped the passage of that bill.

Honourable senators, I will not repeat the various incidents that gave rise to the opportunities for senators to stop legislation which was not in the best interests of Canadians of all regions of the country. As well, without reminding honourable senators of the number of times we have merely "rubber stamped" such legislation against our consciences, I will say that we now have an opportunity to stand up against a bill—be it private, public or whatever—a piece of legislation that will only fester the "sores" that are spreading throughout this Parliament and across the country.

Bill C-201 we do not need, honourable senators, and I appeal to every senator in this chamber to show his independence so that, once and for all, we can stop what can only be referred to as a mischievous act perpetrated by a dozen members of Parliament. These members have proven their lack of patriotism, certainly as evidenced by the fact that they knew what they were doing, by a lack of courtesy toward their colleagues in not giving them the opportunity to speak, and by their seemingly hypocritical attitude towards their oath of office and towards the wishes of their constituents.

Let me say, honourable senators, that I am aware that the passage of Bill C-201 was carried out in a manner which was technically correct. The Speaker in the other place, in not allowing any members to protest, was carrying out a procedure which, although technically right, was certainly not morally right. In fact, the entire exercise was not carried out in the Canadian way.

I ask honourable senators this question: Is it the Canadian way for a member who was present in the house at the time—who did not even know what he was voting for, much less what the house was voting on—to agree to the passage of the particular phase of the bill in question?

The mover of the bill, back in 1980, made a speech in which he referred to having written to the Secretary of State, the Honourable Francis Fox, about a bill that had been brought forward at that time. He said that the exercise was an example of the power of a very small minority that was strong enough to block the passage of legislation that could obtain all-party support and thus pass the house vote with an overwhelming majority. At that time he complained about the fact that half a dozen Conservative MPs who were vehemently opposed to the change could stop the bill. Honourable senators, that is what is called "the pot calling the kettle black." The honourable gentleman was against such a practice in 1980, yet, strangely enough, he was not against this practice, whereby 12 members of Parliament were able to pass a bill which so affects this country.

Again I ask honourable senators: Was it the Canadian way to use the authority to place the house into committee of the whole, with only 12 members present and not one question having been asked of anyone? Was it the Canadian way to agree to all clauses of the bill, to report back to the house, to read the bill a third time and to pass it, all of which took place in five minutes?

Honourable senators, bearing in mind everything that has gone on in the other place with respect to parliamentary reform, surely this is a perfect example of where that reform is needed. If 12 members of Parliament can collaborate and, in five minutes, can change the course of our history, seemingly untouched by their consciences and lacking knowledge of the feelings of the majority of Canadians they represent, then I suggest that honourable senators put a stop to this hypocrisy. I think that it is easy to recognize which end of the Parliament Buildings ought to undergo reform.

Honourable senators, I have no objection to a private member's recommending a change by whatever method he deems fit. That is his right as a Canadian member of Parliament. The method used in this case to get the passage of a bill through the other place, however, is one to which I object most strenuously. It can and should be stopped in this chamber. Surely there must be a sufficient number of us here who recognize that we can, as is our duty, send the bill back to the House and ask for a government bill to be presented in a straightforward and decent, democratic way. Let the critics have their say. This bill should be allowed a debate in the other place, whereupon it should be sent back here to be put through the same process. Let us not allow ourselves to be put in the position where we permit less than 3 per cent of the parliamentarians to collaborate in a plan to undermine and alter the traditions that used to make us the envy of the world.

Honourable senators, this is another attempt to undo the past, to rewrite history, to revoke and revise the few traditions we have left. Most importantly, however, it allows Canada to be changed without the consent of the people of this country. I ask honourable senators this question: What harm would we be doing to anyone by doing what is right?

Perhaps, honourable senators, a majority of Canadians do want our Holiday Act amended to change the name from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day." Why do it, however, in a manner that further embitters our citizens? As Senator Hicks has done, I will read from only two of the many letters I have received on this issue. A lady from Waterloo, Ontario, wrote:

I would simply like to urge, in the strongest terms, that the Senate give serious consideration to the cogent arguments for the retention of the present name. It is my feeling that Canadians have been seriously shortchanged and the historical and spiritual traditions of our country eroded by the swift passage in the Commons last week of the private member's bill to alter the name.

A man from Scarborough, Ontario, wrote:

Dominion Day is a part of the great historical heritage of this nation, taken as it is from Psalm 72:

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea.

The new Constitution has enshrined the term "Dominion" in the Constitution Act, 1867, section 3:

—the provinces . . . shall form and be one Dominion—

We are celebrating on July 1 the commemoration of Confederation and, thus, our independence. "Dominion" in no sense of the word is "colonial." Canada existed long before 1867, and the term "Canada Day" is surely neither meaningful of the present or future.

Honourable senators, with the greatest respect for Senator Bird, who opened the debate, I must disagree with her. In her speech she made mention of something that is very close to me—the Canadian soldiers who fought overseas. She said that they wore flashes bearing the name "Canada"; and I do not disagree with that. She failed to recognize, however, that a lot of the soldiers and servicemen also wore their provincial flashes. The North Shore, New Brunswick Regiment, for example, wore a badge which had "Canada" on it as well, as did the North Nova Scotia Regiment. I would like to remind honourable senators of the pledge that all members of the Canadian forces took, many of whom died overseas. Our servicemen still take the same pledge, which is:

I . . . do swear that I will be faithful and bear true Allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, her heirs and successors according to law, so help me God.

There is no reference to "Canada" in that pledge, which is, as I understand it, taken from the British North America Act.

What about the veterans who came back? What about the one million veterans who are the ones we should still look to for the reasons why Canada is such a great nation? What do they do across the country in their Legion branches? What are the words of the ritual they use every time they meet? The ritual goes like this:

● (1510)

Before we proceed to the consideration of the business which has brought us together, let us pause for a few moments to think reverently of those of our comrades who by sea, by land and in the air, laid down their lives for their Sovereign and country . . .

Honourable senators, that same Canadian Legion, when they write to me, do so in letters headed, "The Royal Canadian Legion". Most of the letters are written by the Dominion President or the Dominion Secretary. This is on their letterhead, which they are proud of. I am not going to say that there are Legionnaires who do not want Canada Day, but this is the sort of thing we should be looking at.

I was reading a letter I received from the Dominion Chairman of the Monarchist League of Canada. On the letterhead is also mentioned the Dominion Secretary. As a matter of fact, they were asking me for my dues, which I was late in paying, but here is what they said about the monarchy. They reminded me that:

Monarchy prevents the growth of power by denying ultimate power to any politician;

Monarchy assures that our freedoms and liberties depend upon an institution above politics, which endures above the partisan battles and controversies which may divide Canada;

Monarchy enables men to oppose the government's policies without being accused of disloyalty to the state, as it maintains separation between head of state and head of government;

Monarchy exemplifies the family life, which must be at the base of any stable society;

Monarchy stands for the moral order of the country, which endures whatever the trends of the day.

Honourable senators, many editorials have been written in connection with this matter, but I am not going to talk about the editorials in the famous national papers; instead I am going to go right to the far corners of little Newfoundland. For instance, I am sure that nobody has ever heard of The Coaster. This is published in a little town about 350 miles up on the northern tip of the peninsula. This deals with Canada becoming 115 years old, and points out that even though they were all in favour of Canada, and talk about how wonderful things were in Newfoundland after Confederation, they say that we should never forget something that happens every year in Newfoundland on July 1.

However, we must not allow the birthday celebrations to erase the memory of the Battle of Beaumont Hamel on July 1, 1916, during the First World War, when the Royal Newfoundland Regiment was decimated and the cream of this province's youth were killed. That disaster did not stop others from promptly filling their places, many of whom also paid the supreme sacrifice. It was the willingness of these heroic men to fight for what we today call democracy, that makes it possible for us to celebrate our freedom and our greatness as a nation.

Another editorial is from the southern part of Newfoundland, and is from a newspaper called The Gulf News. They finish their editorial by saying:

Canada is like a huge body. The Utopian concept would see us aiding each other and observing some sort of balance arrangement for the good of the nation.

They are discussing the fact that Canada was spending $5 million on celebrating Canada Day.

Instead some portions are shovelling the benefits in while others are starving and struggling to get to where there is full and plenty. This has been ongoing for some time and now the bloated areas are beginning to throw up the wastage. The five million spent July 1 is little more than a giant Rolaid. The situation persists.

"Ottawa: any millions of dollars or even thousands you have available for spending or wasting, please advise a community on the southwest tip of Newfoundland named Channel-Port aux Basques. When our problems are taken care of and this nation is on an even footing then there is time for celebration."

I have wondered over the years, honourable senators, and wonder now, what the changes that are today going on in our country are really destined to accomplish for the citizens of Canada. Was the country in such a mess prior to 1965 that we had to fight about a distinctive flag? We only have to ask ourselves what has happened to Canada in the intervening 17 years. Why did we have to rush into achieving a Canadian Constitution that further divided the country? Is Canada now better off? Are Canadians better off today? Are the poor any more capable of finding enough food or shelter or housing? Are the one and a quarter million Canadians who are out of work any surer of getting jobs? Can the youth of our country get a start in life? Can they begin a career and have a future? Is there unity among the provinces and in federal-provincial relations? Are Canadians happier than they were before we patriated the Constitution? Do the people love their government more? Is it not rather true that we are in a worse mess now than we ever were, with a government that is so blind to the realities of life that they are trying to bribe the citizens of Canada?

I say, if you want to have a Canada Day, have it. Have a Canada week. Have a Canada Month. Canada, however, is not a day, or a week or a month; it is 365 days a year of Canadians living together, it is hoped with leadership from a government that thinks of its people. But you cannot ram something down the throats of Canadians because you think it is best for them. You cannot bully people into doing something against their will, and you cannot bribe people with Canadian flags and balloons and pins, and money besides, because what is going to happen is what happened out in Belle Plaine, Saskatchewan, where a group returned a cheque for $1,250, with the words, "We don't want your money or trinkets. We want leadership."

No, honourable senators, you do not create unity by using methods that are underhanded. People are too smart. You do not legislate unity, in a country of 23 million people, by 12 members of Parliament sneaking through a bill without caring about the consequences. Canadian unity comes from the hearts of individual Canadians who care about their country, and they will celebrate it in their own way, without interference from those they have lost confidence in.

Finally, if you want to have a Canada Day, have it, but do it, I repeat, in the Canadian way, through the acceptable rules laid down by the Fathers of Confederation, who created the Dominion of Canada, which is good enough for me.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I should like to intervene very briefly in this debate. One of my reasons for intervening now is that my preference is that the matter be debated this afternoon and voted on, since I think that this is an issue that should be dealt with while we are all here, not with the idea of restricting debate, but with the idea of debating the matter now and bringing it to a vote as soon as everyone has had his say.

I want to speak principally because of the three speeches that were made today. There were aspects of those speeches that interested me very greatly.

Personally, I do not care whether we call this national holiday "Canada Day" or "Dominion Day." Perhaps I should care, but I just cannot find myself moved by the arguments on either side, although they have been, indeed, eloquent.

What I am concerned about, honourable senators, is the way in which this is being done. Senator Marshall and Senator Molson raised a very valid point, that here is an issue that deeply interests a great many Canadians, who have not had the opportunity to state their concerns, to debate the issue, or to appear before a parliamentary committee and make their input part of a general debate in either the Senate or the House of Commons.

The fact of the matter is that this is what should happen. I believe that what the Senate should do is refuse this bill. It ought to do so on the basis that the House of Commons must bring forward a proper bill, refer it to a committee, hear argument, have full debate, pass it, and then send it to the Senate for approval. If that is not to happen, then it is my belief that what we ought to do here is refer the matter to a committee, and undertake the process I have referred to ourselves.

• (1520)

So, honourable senators, I cannot add to the debate. All I could say has been said by others, and far more eloquently. I merely want to put on record the fact that I will vote for a referral of the bill to a Senate committee for proper hearing, or I will vote against the motion for second reading.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, this has been a difficult question over the years for many of you, and, no doubt, for many members in the other place; but it seems to me that, as a nation and as a Parliament, we have dealt with important and difficult questions in the past, all of which were part of our evolution as a nation.

Hon. David Walker: There was a vote of 13 out of 282. Have we ever done that before?

Senator Argue: It was unanimous.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Argue: It was done properly. The Conservatives were represented there too. I believe, from what I have read, that the leader of the Conservative Party, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, is in favour of this bill.

Hon. Raymond. J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): And Stanley Knowles, and Walter Baker.

Senator Argue: So it was done properly. It was done under the rules of the House of Commons. If one wishes to go back in history, one will find that it is not the first time that this was done in the House of Commons.

Senator Walker: Are you in favour of its being done in that way?

Senator Argue: Of this bill?

Senator Walker: Are you in favour of the way it was done in the House of Commons?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Give him time to finish.

Senator Argue: I am in favour of its being done in the form of a public bill in the name of a private member, and I cannot see why anyone, in either the House of Commons or the Senate, as an individual member of either house, should say, "The government has to do it; the government has to bring it in." Of course, if the government brought it in, then honourable senators opposite would say, "It's a party matter, a political matter; they are going to use their majority to shove it down our throats."

I was saying it is a difficult bill, a difficult subject. It is difficult for some people to decide whether or not July 1 should be called "Canada Day" or "Dominion Day". I was raised on the prairies—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You grew up on the prairies.

Senator Argue: Those interruptions are getting some attention from senators close to the honourable senator who leads the opposition, but not much from other honourable senators.

When July 1 arrived it was generally not known as "Dominion Day" but as the "July 1st holiday". Canada is evolving as a nation and in its national aspirations. I was in the other place when the Canada Citizenship Act was passed, and I have been proud to say I am a citizen of this country. I was on Parliament Hill when we decided it was okay for a Canadian to occupy the position of Governor General, and I believe that to have been a good move. I was not here at the time, but I followed closely the legislation adopting the Canadian flag. That was a difficult process and there was great division, not only as to whether there should be a distinctive Canadian flag but also as to what its design should be. I believe that Canadians today are happy that we have a Canadian flag, and most are happy with the design. We adopted "O Canada" as our national anthem, and I believe that Canadians are happy with that. Our Constitution is now home.

I forecast that this legislation will pass, and that when it passes, and we have adopted "Canada Day" and the debate is behind us, we are not likely to have private members' bills seeking to change the name once again.

Senator Walker: Can twelve people change it again?

Senator Frith: You will have your turn.

Senator Argue: If it is changed again, with the unanimous approval of the quorum, or whatever number there may be in the House of Commons, and that quorum is recognized by the Speaker, and the measure is given Royal Assent, then I believe that will be the proper and constitutional way to do it.

An Hon. Senator: Sleazy.

Senator Argue: How many Conservatives were in the House? I do not propose to cast an aspersion on the Conservative members in the other place. I have been around here since 1945. I sat for 18 years in the House of Commons. This discussion is not new. I believe there have been approximately 23 private members' bills over the years seeking to have this done—

Senator Walker: Not with a vote of thirteen.

Senator Argue: Back in 1946 a bill was presented by Mr. A. P. Côté of Matapédia-Matane. It was Bill No. 8, respecting "Canada Day", a public bill in the name of a private member. The date was April 4, 1946. It was a simple bill. The subheading that appeared in Hansard was: "Substitution of Word 'Canada' for Word 'Dominion'." The bill had a good deal of support. I could quote from views expressed by honourable members who participated in the debate. They sound similar to what is being said in connection with the present bill. Here is one quote:

To me the name Canada has music in it. To me it represents the greatest country on earth.

That was said by Mr. Daniel McIvor, the member for Fort William.

The debate continued and there were a number of votes taken on the question. It was moved by Mr. Tom Church, of Toronto, that the bill "be not now read a second time but this day six months hence." That motion was defeated. Another motion was moved that the committee rise and report progress, and that also was defeated. Then there was the vote on the bill itself. The yeas totalled 129, and the nays 59. So a bill, similar to Bill C-201 now before us, was passed by the House of Commons by a large majority on April 4, 1946.

Senator Walker: What was the wording of the bill?

An hon. Senator: There was good government.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Would he not agree that that bill was passed after a full debate in the other place?

Senator Argue: Yes, it was passed after a debate that took up a large part of a day. I guess that is a full debate.

Senator McIlraith: Would the honourable senator not agree that the earlier bill as well as the "O Canada" bill were passed after debate and referral to committee. The flag bill was examined at many committee sittings at which many representations were heard.

Senator Argue: This debate has been going on in Canada in many forms for 30 years. It has been going on in Parliament for 30 years. I have mentioned the debate held in 1946. It is interesting to note that the list of those who voted yea in support of the bill in 1946 includes the names Argue and McIlraith. I was in good company in those days, and, in connection with second reading of the bill now before us, I anticipate that I will be in good company again.

The Senate did not exactly cover itself in glory. I believe that back in 1946 it moved to send the bill to committee. I hope that in 1982 honourable senators will take a more progressive attitude and will not try to send the bill to committee, which, in view of the possibility that we may be adjourning in a few days, is likely, in effect, to kill the bill.

I believe the Senate is now really under the gun. I believe the Senate is being watched. I believe the Senate will do itself justice if it supports the bill and passes it. I take second place to no one in this chamber—and I do not want anyone to take second place to me—in believing I am a good Canadian. I believe that Canadians generally, by a growing majority, think that we should know July 1 as "Canada Day". I am pleased to repeat in 1982, when the opportunity arises, that I support the same kind of favourable vote for the same kind of bill that I voted for on April 4, 1946. My only hope is that in 1982 the Senate will act responsibly and pass the bill.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on what, I suppose, is a point of order. I do not intend to oppose the motion that the debate be adjourned, but I hope that honourable senators will remember that, as I said earlier, the government wishes this bill to come to a vote and to pass before the recess. It also wishes all honourable senators to have an opportunity to debate it. Of course, we do try to have, as we have had today, more than one or two interventions per sitting. I hope that honourable senators who wish to intervene in the debate will be ready to do so soon.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Flynn: I am sure Senator Walker is prepared to yield to anyone who is ready to speak.

Senator Frith: Yes, I am sure he is.

Senator Flynn: Then I do not see why the honourable senator intervened at this point.

Senator Frith: The reason I intervened is to inform honourable senators that I hope there will be many speakers tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: We have had enough for today.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Last night I asked the Chair for a ruling with respect to the relationship of Bill C-201 to Rule 93. I am wondering whether that ruling will come forward at an early date, or, at least, before the conclusion of the debate on second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: The Speaker will be here tomorrow, at which time he will give his ruling.

On motion of Senator Walker, debate adjourned.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday, the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for the second reading of Bill C-125, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we now have to make a complete change in our mental scenery. We are shifting minds from Bill C-201, which deals with the name of our national holiday, to the consideration of some of the mundane facts and statistics, mostly unpleasant, in connection with our economic situation, and in particular, Bill C-125. For the last little while we have been discussing a bill that has to do with one of the important national symbols of the country, and it is only natural that such a discussion should engage our attention and our emotions on a quite different level from the subject matter about which I propose to say a few words now.

Bill C-125 has to do with the power the government seeks to borrow money to pay the bills of the country. This capital loan bill is really, in effect, a crystallization of a trend in the public financing and public management of our economy that goes back over some period of time. It represents as well a climax in our economic affairs. It brings us to a point in connection with the fiscal management of the country which we have never seen before and, I feel sure, some of us wish we did not have to face today. However, the facts are different.

I want to make one minor comment before I get into the bulk of what I have to say. It has to do with the subject of lapsing. As I recall, the Deputy Leader of the Government, when speaking on his motion for the second reading of this bill, made a point to the effect that the government had given up the policy of carrying borrowing authority on beyond the end of the fiscal year, and that any unspent monies would lapse. That is what I thought as well, until I read the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): No.

Senator Roblin: He says no.

Senator Frith: It was not quite that way, but go ahead.

Senator Roblin: If I misunderstood what the honourable senator said, he can put me right. I would simply say to the Chamber that according to clause 2(2), any borrowing authority which remains unused by March 31, 1983 expires only to the extent that it exceeds $4 billion. The implication of that clause is clear, that if the $4 billion happens to be unencumbered at that time it does not lapse but carries on. I just wanted to make sure that point was not lost sight of in the discussion on the bill.

Let us get to the substance, which is that the government seeks authority to borrow $7 billion in the balance of this fiscal year. They first asked for $11 billion, but they found that they were able to climb down from that rather awesome perch in double quick time and reduce their requirement to $7 billion which, I think, amply confirms the advice given the Minister of State (Finance) who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the subject. Some of us then told him that this would be the best thing to do. However, to that $7 billion, which is sought in this bill, has to be added the $5.6 billion of presently unexpended borrowing authority. That means that when this bill passes, the government will have authority to borrow up to $12.6 billion between now and March 31, 1983. That is the largest sum of money that has ever been contemplated for a government loan in a period of eight months in the history of this country.

The request for this borrowing authority arises because we have a deficit. It arises because we have a cash flow bind which has to be met by borrowing. I am not dogmatic on the subject of government deficits, because there are times when it is useful to run a deficit—for example, in order to give the government some elbow room to improve the stability of the country in order to see that jobs remain open for people who want them and that the economy is kept on a more even keel. But that is only sometimes. It is not a good idea to have deficits all the time. That, in effect, is what we have had since the fiscal year 1969-70, which is the last year the budget was balanced. In every year since that time—that is, for some 12 years—there has been a deficit, and over the last few years that deficit has been growing bigger and bigger.

Apparently nobody involved with the financial management of the government saw fit to pay heed to the advice that Joseph gave Pharaoh when he told him to provide for the evil times when times are good. We failed to do that and, as a result, we have had deficits on our fiscal balance sheet for the past 12 years.

According to the November 1981 budget, the deficit was estimated to be $10 billion. The cash shortfall that had to be borrowed was $6 billion. Now, some six months later in the June budget, we are told that the deficit has doubled to $19 billion-plus, and that the borrowing requirement has just about tripled to $17 billion-plus. It is quite obvious that the estimates of the November 1981 budget were so far off the track as to represent, in my view, a triumph of wishful thinking over any reasoned approach to what the near future was likely to bring.

● (1540)

I want to discuss for a moment the burden that this policy will impose upon several sectors of our economy. What does borrowing all this money mean anyway? Is it just an exercise in financial gymnastics? Do the figures have any meaning for ordinary people? What harm does it do to the nation to indulge in borrowing of this kind?

Let me just deal with the burden on the economy in general, to begin with, and the effect of the borrowing on investment and growth in the country. In the fiscal year 1981-82 we borrowed approximately $9 billion for the federal government, which was 44 per cent of all the net new security issues floated in—dare I say it?—the Dominion of Canada. In the eight months that are left of the fiscal year 1982-83, leaving aside all the borrowing that went on in the first four months, with the passage of this bill we will be borrowing some $12.6 billion. That means that in all probability the government will mop up much more than 50 per cent of all of the savings made available to it by the people of Canada. In other words, it will mop up 50 per cent or more of all of the savings that have been accumulated and that are available to finance growth and development.

The public sector will probably crowd out the private sector, but, if that does not happen, either one or both of those sectors will abandon the Canadian market as being inadequate for their requirements and will be borrowing money abroad. Let's see what that does to the government's Canadianization policy.

The enormous impact of the federal government's borrowing call on the pool of savings in this country will not only crowd out the private sector but, and this is perfectly obvious, will prop up the high interest rates we are presently experiencing in this country. I will return to that point a little later.

In some financial quarters of the United States there is deep concern—almost panic, in fact, because the government in that country is going to have to borrow something over $100 billion. What would those concerned people think, if they had a borrowing requirement, or a deficit, of some $200 billion, which is the relative comparison between the Canadian and American situations? There would be panic concerning interest rates.

I cannot conceive how the government of this country—to say nothing of what the provinces need—can go into the Canadian pool of savings for over 50 per cent of what is there, without drastically affecting the interest rates in this country. It is simply a fact that those interest rates will rise, and, if there is any one factor leading to the high rate of inflation in this country today which bears so heavily upon all of us, surely it has to be the rate of interest. In my opinion, no other single factor bears as heavily on the economy of this country and the question of inflation as the rate of interest we have to carry, and yet the government, when it has to come to the Canadian economy for this kind of borrowing, is making sure that that interest rate is propped up.

Let us consider now what this borrowing means to the government's own position. I have said something about the economy in general, but what about the federal treasurer? Where does he find himself? I suggest he finds himself in a rather uncomfortable position. When this bill passes and we have to find the money to pay the interest on the total debt of this country, we will find that, of every dollar of revenue this administration takes in in this fiscal year, over 30 cents will be paid out in interest. That is not my calculation; that is the government's own figure—30 cents on the dollar. But is that for interest on debt and for retirement of debt? No such thing. It is for interest only. Thirty cents out of every dollar this government will collect from the taxpayers of this country will go to pay the interest on the national debt in this fiscal year. If that is the case now, project your minds ahead a year or so and ask yourselves what the situation will be then. How long can this go on before we find ourselves in a crisis that cannot be handled?

Honourable senators, I cannot overstate this point. We are going to have to borrow enough money in this one fiscal year just to pay the interest alone. The entire cash shortfall of some $17 billion-plus will be borrowed and will be needed to pay the interest on our debt alone, and on nothing else. Nothing will be left over for productive investment. It will be solely for running expenses, for the operating expenses of this country. How long can such a situation go on?

Let me give you another way of looking at the interest weight on Canadians. It is practically 5 per cent of the gross national product. Out of all the productive effort of every sector of our economy, 4.9 per cent—make it 5 per cent—goes to pay the interest on the national debt. That gives you some idea of the kind of situation in which we find ourselves today. There is just no room in which to manoeuvre.

At a time when, if ever there was a time, we should be able to look to the government to do something about unemployment, this government, by virtue of its own actions in days gone by, finds itself incapable of acting. It is like Gulliver, tied down by a thousand financial strings, unable to rise up to help the people of this country, as we would hope it could do.

That is the economy and that is what it means to government. What does it mean to private citizens? I will give you a few figures on that. For every citizen of this country, man, woman and child—all 22 million of us—it will cost $723 this year just to pay the interest on the national debt. There will be no investment in productive capacity and no great advantage for anyone in new production in this country. That $723 per person will be just to pay the running expenses of the government, and to cover the interest on the national debt.

We find, thus, a lockup of the savings of the country just to support the public debt, and that is for running expenses only and has nothing to do with investment, development, progress or the jobs that this country so desperately needs.

Honourable senators, surely we have to take into account these factors when we are trying to make up our minds about Bill C-125.

[Senator Roblin.]

Let me say something now about the trends in government policy, because I find those trends truly alarming. Obviously, trends are not an infallible guide to what the future may bring, but very often they provide us with at least a notion of the dangers we may face by continuing to pursue a course of action without a change in policy. I repeat that, in my opinion, the trends in government policy are truly alarming.

Just look at the period from 1969-70 to the present time. We see ever-increasing deficits culminating in this $20 billion deficit and this enormous borrowing demand we have before us now. But as far as one can tell, the government's main worry is how they will get the money. Will they tax for it or will they borrow it? Those are two options. There is a third option about which we hear very little, and that is the policy of restraint. Oh, sometimes we hear about it, admittedly. There is lip service to restraint, just as there is lip service to some form of control of government expenditures, but there is mighty little sign of either restraint or control taking place. In a day or so we will be talking about Bill C-124, which has to do with wages for civil servants. Well, how did those wages become so high? How did they reach a sum which we think we cannot support? It was because of negotiations between the government and the civil service unions. The government has to take the responsibility for that. You cannot put all the blame for that on the unions. As it is, we will be reneging on settlements which the government made with the unions, but it was their settlements and they are the ones who offered them.

What of some application of efficiency considerations to government activities in Canada? When Mr. Macdonnell was Auditor General, he told us all that the working effectiveness of the civil service of the country was measurable. He said we could determine how efficiently the civil service was operating. He said, "I am here to tell you that it operates at 60 per cent of capacity." That is a little better than half capacity.

I am not saying that the people in the private sector are all that wonderful, or that their productivity is 100 per cent. I don't think it is. I think you could go to any group in the country and find that the workers are not working to the maximum of their reasonable capacity in the particular jobs they have to do. So I attach no particular opprobrium to the civil service, if they have that problem, but to have it to the extent that 40 per cent of the work day is wasted seems to me to be somewhat extreme, and I would expect that, if the government had any concern about restraint, it might have tried to get that 60 per cent up to 70 per cent or better. That would certainly have avoided altogether the necessity of this 6 per cent world with respect to civil service salaries. It would have left all of us feeling much happier.

In terms of restraint, yes, you can say that the government will place a restraint of 6 per cent on some prices, but we are not just sure whose prices those will be, or whose activities will be affected. We can be pretty sure that the activities of the government itself will not be affected. There will be no 6 per cent rule there, and it will be somebody else whose prices will be affected by the 6 per cent rule. That is very handy, but it does not seem to do much for the restraint policy of the government. When the government implements its six per cent policy, I wonder how many jobs will be lost if that is really carried through without compensation to those whose net incomes are reduced.

● (1550)

What of the record of the government itself? In the three-year period ending in 1982, according to the Public Accounts, what happened to the expenses of the Government of Canada? Well, they went up, we all know that, but I am not sure that all of us know that they went up by 55 per cent.

Just roll your tongue around that number, if you will: a three-year increase in expenses of this government by 55 per cent. That indicates a trend that is certainly unsustainable, that cannot continue indefinitely.

If one wants another measure of government expenditures, one can take the percentage of government expenditures as they relate to the gross national product. The percentage of government expenditures as a percentage of the gross national product in 1981—and this figure is interesting because it is before transfers to the provinces, keep that in mind—was 17.4 per cent. In 1982, so far, they have gone up to 19 per cent, and in 1982, on a seasonally adjusted basis, after transfers to the provinces, they have gone up to 23 per cent.

The percentage of the gross national product that the federal government is consuming is rising. It is too high and ought to be reduced. It compares, in a rather ironic way, with the pledge offered to the Canadian people when this government sought election a few years ago, when it said that it was going to keep the increase in government expenditures down to the rate of inflation. I am happy to say that at no time over the past two years has the inflation rate been at 17 per cent, 19 per cent or 23 per cent, but government expenditures have.

Perhaps that is one of those "Whelan pledges". That is a new term that ought to be enshrined in the political lexicography of this country. The Minister of Agriculture made pledges during the election campaign, but has since had the candour—and I salute him for that—to say: "Oh well, that was just an election promise!" There are not many politicians who are as candid as that; nor, I hope, need all of them have recourse to such candour. It seems to me that the promise offered to the people of this country that expense increases would be kept down to the rate of inflation is a revealing comment on the situation in which we find ourselves today.

This trend is continuing. There is an interesting report relating to government and inflation that has not yet reached the desks of the members of this house. The report was prepared by Statistics Canada. No one dare say "the Dominion Bureau of Statistics," because that is neo-colonial: we have to say "Statistics Canada." In any event, Statistics Canada has prepared a report. I do not know whether it is a secret report. I know it has not been published. I know it has been leaked, and I know that it packs a punch, so I suspect we may not see it for some time.

That report endeavours to analyse what is happening with inflation in the public sector as compared to the private sector.

The figures are self-explanatory. That report advises us that in the private sector at the present time inflation is running at 9 per cent. It is at 9 per cent and, most interestingly, it is falling. In the manufacturing industry alone, it is at 6 per cent. That is a high rate, but it is falling. That indicates to me that the private sector has come to terms with some of its problems.

The figure for the government sector is distressing, because we are informed that the government sector inflation rate is not 9 per cent, but is double that: it is 18 per cent. Even that would not be so bad, but it is not at 18 per cent and falling; it is at 18 per cent and rising. That trend surely must give us cause for concern.

So, as far as inflation is concerned, while the private sector may have its problems, the real problem is in the public sector, and one has to ask oneself, when one compares these trends, the deficit, the cash requirements and this bill in front of us, whether or not the public finance situation is out of control. I hope it is not, but it is a basic problem and it is not something new; it arises from some 12 years of Liberal policies that have not been working very well insofar as the government sector is concerned.

In June, 10.9 per cent of the work force were unemployed. That has to be the number one problem. Sadly, the unemployment rate for young men under age 25 is 21 per cent.

One has to say that inflation with full employment is one thing. Then inflation becomes the number one priority. But inflation with massive unemployment is surely another thing. Then we must ask ourselves whether unemployment is not the number one priority.

Right now, the Conference Board of Canada, in its forecast for the balance of this year, tells us that the gross national product, in real terms, is going to fall 2.8 per cent; it tells us that unemployment will continue at over 10 per cent; it tells us that interest rates will remain in the stratosphere; it tells us that in 1983 there will be a continuing struggle to get any of these economic forces under control.

I do not know if the Conference Board of Canada is right. I know that a great many economic forecasts we receive these days are not right, and most of them seem to err on the side of optimism. I hope that that is not the case in this instance, but I am convinced that Bill C-125, and the money we authorize in it, does nothing for inflation, does nothing for interest rates, does nothing for unemployment; that all it does is pay the running expenses of this administration for another 12 months.

The C.D. Howe Institute had some not very complimentary comments to make about the government today. The C.D. Howe Institute is not divinely inspired either. It is just another institute staffed by men and women, but it has a wide constituency, it is widely based in the economic community of the country, and has had a reasonably acceptable record of dealing with matters of public economic policy.

I do not think the government will enjoy its judgment rendered yesterday. It describes this budget as an:

abysmal stewardship report for which the federal government must take full responsibility—

I quote from its observations, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of today's date.

Government policies since the early 1970s, it said, "have had the effect of encouraging Canadians to believe they were largely immune to the severe problems facing other national economies."

Isn't that the truth? Have we not done that? Have we not done it here when we manipulated the price of oil with our so-called "made in Canada" oil price, which turned out to be just as expensive as the non-manipulative prices in the United States?

Honourable senators can think of other examples to back up that sombre point of view.

The article goes on to state:

The institute, although conceding most of the federal government's past economic measures had been "well intentioned,"

I am sure that that is so.

—said many have been based on forecasts "that turned out to be quite wrong."

That is the truth. The article goes on to state:

Many more measures, it said, have been based on efforts to centralize power "for power's sake; or on a willingness to respond to pressures from certain groups whose advice has been based more on wish than reality."

"This kind of leadership," the institute said, "has placed Canada in a very serious economic predicament."

Of course, this bill bears out every word of that sombre judgment.

What to do? I do not intend to oppose this bill. I think it would be irresponsible to oppose this bill, because no matter what the reason is, the money must be made available to carry on the Queen's government in the country; and against all the evidence, and against all the experience, I, for one, think we must hope, and I, for one, say we must help, so that these matters may be brought under control, and so that during the months of office that remain to this administration something better can be developed than a borrowing program which makes it necessary for us to give approval to Bill C-125.

Something better must be done, something better must be devised to give the country a good lead that it can follow. Something must be done to reverse the unfortunate and counterproductive policy that this administration has been following over time. Something must be done to restore the confidence of the people of Canada that those in charge of its federal government know what they are doing. Something must be done to restore the confidence of our people in their country, their confidence in its future, and the things we can do together. No matter how much I may oppose this government on matters of policy, on the record of its administration, I say this: If they will bring in policies that will do something to restore the confidence of the people in the government, to reverse the trend in interest rates, to reverse the trend in unemployment and to get our productive machinery off the 66 per cent basis it is on now and make the country work, I promise my full support.

● (1600)

I will vote for this bill, but under protest, and I look forward, not with confidence but at least with some expectation that the government will see the error of its ways and will do better in the days to come.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, would Senator Roblin answer a question for me? I ask this question in all seriousness and not as a feminist. When he indicated the figure of unemployment among young men, was he speaking generically and including young women?

Senator Roblin: I think the question is well taken because I made the distinction myself in dealing with the matter. I was speaking entirely of males—young men. The figure for women is in the same order of magnitude. It may not be any better.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I have a few comments to make on Bill C-125. I think it would be interesting if one looked at this bill with the following story in mind. We could also keep this story in mind when we think of Bill C-111, which we passed a few weeks ago, and perhaps Bill C-103 where we gave the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources unlimited authority to borrow money for purchasing oil companies such as Petrofina. As we are dealing with billions and millions of dollars, I should like to relate this little story. A man said to his wife, "Here is $1 million. Go out and spend it at the rate of $1,000 a day and don't come back until you have spent it all." His wife was very dutiful and she spent the $1 million at the rate of $1,000 a day. She returned to him two years and nine months later and said, "I have spent it all, dear." He replied, "Very good. Well done. Now I am going to give you $1 billion and I want you to take it and spend it at the rate of $1,000 a day and don't return until you have spent it all." Off she went again. She returned 2,740 years later and said: "I have spent it all, dear."

My only question with regard to Bill C-125 is: Whatever happened to the Comptroller General?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators—

Senator Roblin: If Senator Frith would like me to stay to listen to him, I will be happy to do so. Otherwise, I will attend the National Finance Committee meeting.

Senator Frith: I can tell Senator Roblin very briefly what I propose to say.

Senator Roblin: Then I will stay.

Senator Frith: The first thing is that I was wrong in creating the impression that the $4 billion did not lapse. It is the unused authority up to now that is going to lapse. He is quite right.

The only thing that has been changed is that instead of $11 billion, of which $4 billion would have been the subject of clause 2(2), it is now $7 billion, a total of which $4 billion is subject to that clause. So I overstated the case. The principle of non-lapsing and the attitude of the committee that was taken with regard to non-lapsing was with regard to all previous unused authority, not the $4 billion contingency in the bill, and he is quite right about that.

The rest of what I propose to say will deal with the 6 per cent and 5 per cent, and he may not want to stay to listen to that. I will be making reference to his intervention with regard to his support of this bill under protest because he was not satisfied that any of the trends that gave rise to this requirement were being changed.

As he implies, this borrowing authority bill is a part of the budget proposals and, in a sense, is a companion piece to Bill C-124. The position of the government with reference to the present economic situation, and the steps it must take with regard to leadership in changing that direction, is that the restraint program that is provided for in Bill C-124, plus the steps that have been taken to implement it, are going to and, in fact, are now changing some of the trends Senator Roblin criticized, quite justly.

Put very simply, the government's position is that most of the economic ills can be traced to inflation in the following sense. Interest rates cannot come down until inflation comes down. If interest rates do not come down there will not be the needed investment. If there is no investment, there will not be any jobs. If there is no investment in production, productivity will not go up. That is the government's position and the philosophy, as I understand it, behind the 6 per cent and 5 per cent proposals. As to whether or not that is going to affect confidence in the country, there is certainly some evidence that it already has. Business leaders and, in some cases, labour leaders and other sectors have said that they support our objectives and plan. To that extent it has resulted in a significant measure of confidence. Mr. Sam Hughes, for example, said virtually precisely that just last week.

I do not think I can add anything further at this stage, honourable senators. In a sense, Senator Roblin and I agree that the borrowing authority has to be given, or ought to be given, to a government as a corollary to its economic program. I say it should be given to support what I think is a good program. He remains unconvinced about the program, but accepts that if the program is to be implemented the borrowing authority has to be a part of it.

I will make no further comments at this stage, but ask honourable senators to support second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault for the second reading of Bill C-122, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act (No. 3).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, due to the lateness of the hour and the number of orders yet to be dealt with, I will be very brief and indicate, on behalf of the opposition, that there is agreement that this bill ought to pass. I suspect there is no reason why it should be referred to committee, at least at this point.

I regret that so little is being done for so important a group, the small business community—a community that is in considerable trouble. Statistics Canada has shown that, in every part of what could be considered the small business community, bankruptcies have increased over the years 1980 and 1981. For instance, there is not a great deal of difference in the years 1980 to 1981, but there is a rather dramatic leap in the 1982 figures. Whether you are talking about construction, real estate, transport or trade, or even the old reliable insurance industry, there has been a tremendous failure rate.

As I said, there was virtually no change in the number of bankruptcies from 1980 to 1981, but from 1981 to 1982, in many of those sectors, the incidence of bankruptcy has increased by 100 per cent. I hope that the passage of Bill C-122 will shed at least one small ray of light for that group. As all honourable senators are aware, that group provides employment for fully two-thirds of the Canadian population.

While today the small business community and, indeed, the small businessman can reflect on Bill C-122 as being some small help, I am sure that, as well, they will not be pleased with the report released today by the C. D. Howe Research Institute, referred to by my deputy leader. Both the president of that institute, Carl Beigie, and the executive director, Wendy Dobson, have blamed Canada's economic predicament on a decade of federal mismanagement. I am suggesting to you, honourable senators, that that mismanagement has funnelled down in no small way to the small businessman, the backbone of this country.

I do not recall the section of that report that was quoted by Senator Roblin but, in reference to the two recent federal budgets, the report called them an "abysmal stewardship report for which the federal government must take full responsibility." There was reference to such measures in the federal government policy based on efforts to centralize power.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is a strange coincidence, but you have just repeated the exact quotation which Senator Roblin used.

Senator Nurgitz: That Roblin is a bright fellow. I just wanted to tell Senator Frith that great minds think alike—and I will not say what follows.

The report concludes that it is that kind of leadership that has put the country and, indeed, the economic community into an awful predicament.

I believe that Canadian small business deserves better. I am happy that this much is being done, so let us get on with it. I think we need other measures. We need a more welcome attitude not only to domestic but also to foreign investors. We need a change of climate for people who want to invest money in this country.

I wish the government would show the kind of persistence in a policy for small business as it shows, for example, in regard to changing the name of our national holiday to "Canada Day." Rather than be hung up about Canada Day, I would much sooner worry about Canadian small business and, what is more important than that, something that more than a million Canadians yearn for—a Canadian job.

With that, honourable senators, I conclude my remarks. As I said earlier, I do not believe this bill need go to committee, and there is no reason to delay it at this time unless some other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am authorized to intervene on behalf of Senator Perrault. Therefore, I suppose the rule would apply.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Frith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Perrault has not asked me to add anything substantial to what he said earlier. We have taken note of Senator Nurgitz's comments, which I think can be summarized as, "Half a loaf is better than none."

Since we are agreed on that concept, I ask honourable senators to support second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there seems to be no reason not to have third reading now, except for the general principle that could be called the "Flynn principle," namely, if we are not having Royal Assent today, why abridge the time in the rules? Therefore, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD ACT
GOVERNMENT HARBOURS AND PIERS ACT
HARBOUR COMMISSIONS ACT
CANADA SHIPPING ACT
FISHING AND RECREATIONAL HARBOURS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill C-92, to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the history of the bill now before this house goes back to the beginning of the sixties. Preparations involved various studies, many consultations and considerable discussions, which resulted initially in the tabling of Bill C-61 in the other place in July 1977. However, the bill died on the Order Paper shortly afterwards, because of the summer recess.

At the time, the aim was to submit a first draft to the shipping community and other organizations with an interest in port operations, which would then have an opportunity to consult and to comment on details of the new legislation. Consultations took place during 1977, and an improved version of the bill was tabled in November 1977 as Bill C-6. For various reasons, the second bill was not scheduled for second reading until May 1978. Because of the heavy workload in the other place, the second version of the bill died on the Order Paper as well.

During the last few months of 1978, the parties concerned started to wonder whether the legislation would ever be introduced again, but this did finally happen in March 1979 when Bill C-50 was tabled.

However, Bill C-50 went the same way as its predecessors when Parliament was dissolved. The bill had given rise to considerable controversy, because many people seemed to think it was too ambitious since its objective was to put all Canadian ports under one and the same administration. My honourable colleagues will appreciate that the diversity of our regional perspectives is such that it is far from easy to gain the approval of all parties concerned for a bill of this scope.

In the course of 1979 and into early 1980, it became clear that, in view of the time factor and the volume of priority legislation in the other place, and the widely diverging interests and viewpoints raised in connection with Bill C-50, it would be practically impossible to obtain the required priority scheduling in order to reintroduce the legislation and have it considered in committee. It was therefore necessary to consider the various concerns expressed across Canada.

• (1620)

In this connection, I may note that eastern Canada preferred the crown corporation concept, while western Canada seemed largely in favour of one harbour commission for all Canadian ports.

Considering various problems arising from Bill C-50, it was decided to capitalize on the obvious attraction of existing legislation, while at the same time correcting the weak points. As a result, the latter objective was borne in mind when preparing Bill C-92 which is now before the Senate.

I shall initiate consideration of this bill by referring first of all to the least complex part, namely, the harbour commissions. This concept served as the basis for Bill C-50, since the Canadian harbour commissions were generally satisfied with their legislation, although they did suggest a few minor improvements. Essentially, the harbour commissions legislation had remained practically unchanged since the 1964 legislation. At that time, the objectives and principles that were later repeated in Bill C-50 and which had met with a high level of approval across Canada, were introduced with the approval of the harbour commissions.

The basic concept of Bill C-50 was to achieve a greater degree of decentralization or autonomy for most Canadian ports and to have an improved system for the administration of public wharves.

As far as the public wharves are concerned, there are now some 550 small harbours in Canada which have been administered by three different pieces of legislation, namely, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Public Works Act, without provision for individual responsibility.

In this connection, it was agreed with the Department of Public Works and other federal departments to consolidate all provisions arising from the 1936 Government Piers Act and to make some improvements in the legislation that would assist the orderly development of government piers. This proposal found general acceptance. The major part of Bill C-92, as honourable senators are aware, deals with ports that are now being administered by the National Harbours Board of Canada.

My honourable colleagues will know that the National Harbours Board Act goes back to 1936, and was prepared against the background of the Depression and the resulting quasi-bankruptcy of some of Canada's major ports. As a result, the legislation was very centralized and rigid and gave rise to considerable concern, problems and even frustration on the part of some of Canada's major ports which have now matured and have become financially independent.

Some of the things Bill C-92 is intended to accomplish include substituting for the National Harbours Board, which consists of four members, a board of directors of seventeen members, and organizing the corporation as a crown corporation, but in such a way that the board of directors would represent all provinces and sectors of Canada. The bill is also intended to remove the restrictive clauses contained in the National Harbours Board Act. I shall give only one example, namely, the clause requiring approval by order in council for any contract in excess of $50,000.

In 1936, honourable senators, $50,000 was worth considerably more than in 1982. However, the $50,000 ceiling is still there in the National Harbours Board Act, and the result is that every contract in excess of that amount involves a tremendous amount of paper work and endless delay before the ports can proceed with the work.

In addition to the clause I have just mentioned, there is also a provision to create a local port corporation, with a local administration office. Furthermore, and this is aside from the present bill, the National Harbours Board, with the approval of Treasury Board, has been refinanced so that all ports that can be put on a sound financial basis can consolidate their existence as a local port corporation by freezing their existing debts, without repayment and without interest.

As part of the present bill, an attempt was made to either eliminate provisions or, in certain cases, maintain the status quo on controversial points that were raised in connection with Bill C-50, and in this connection, I would like to mention specifically the provisions regarding the police force. As you probably know, the National Harbours Board has its own police force, under a central administration. A provision in Bill C-50 would have decentralized the police force, which met with strong opposition from the provinces because of federal-provincial disagreements with respect to the application of the Criminal Code, and so, with the consent of all provincial solicitors general, it was decided to maintain the status quo as that was considered to be the most acceptable solution.

At the beginning of my speech, I said that the objective of this bill was to confer a greater degree of autonomy on Canadian ports. To this end, clause 24 of the Ports Corporation Bill stipulates that the corporation may:

(1) —invest any moneys not immediately required for the purposes of the Corporation in bonds or other obligations of Her Majesty in right of Canada.

(2) —transfer or lend to a local port corporation any moneys not immediately required for the purposes of the Corporation.

(3) —with the approval of the Minister of Finance, invest any moneys not immediately required for the purposes of the Corporation in bonds or other obligations of a person other than Her Majesty in right of Canada if the name of the Corporation is added to Schedule D to the Financial Administration Act.

Regarding Schedule D of the Financial Administration Act, I may add that, with the consent of Canada's ports, it was decided that the Canada Ports Corporation would be added to Schedule D of the Financial Administration Act. In this connection, perhaps I should remind honourable senators of the difference between a corporation under Schedule C and a corporation under Schedule D of the said act.

A corporation that is added to Schedule C becomes a crown corporation and is required to obtain government approval for awarding any major contracts and also for its operating and capital budget, while a corporation added to Schedule D, such as, for instance, Air Canada and Canadian National, has a higher degree of autonomy and requires government approval only for its capital expenditures program, and is not required to submit contracts for government approval.

The decision to add the corporation to Schedule C, while keeping the option of adding the corporation to Schedule D, was made for a number of specific reasons, first of all, because the government is now reviewing certain regulations governing Schedule D corporations. Thus, until the new regulations are published, preference has been given to Schedule C status.

The second reason is that a Schedule D corporation is subject to income tax, while a Schedule C corporation is not and can thus keep such funds for reinvestment purposes.

Finally, a Schedule D corporation is obliged to pay dividends, while a Schedule C corporation usually does not and can therefore keep such funds for reinvestment as well.

This is therefore a strategic decision, while if the board of directors of the Canada Ports Corporation finds it will be to the advantage of the corporation, it may, with the approval of the governor in council, add the corporation to Schedule D without having to amend the legislation.

Incidentally, adding a corporation to Schedule C or D requires only an order in council, pursuant to the Financial Administration Act, and thus no new legislation is necessary.

If honourable senators require any further information, I shall be very happy to oblige. In concluding, I would like to remind honourable senators that the bill was referred to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for preliminary study which started last week. However, at the end of the debate on second reading, I intend to propose to honourable senators that the bill be again referred to the Senate committee before proceeding with the third reading stage.

[English]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, there are just a few things I would like to say about this bill. I begin by saying that I do not rise to oppose it. However, there are some things to which I wish to draw attention.

Before proceeding to do so, I would like to congratulate the sponsor of the bill on his clear explanation of its major provisions. I agree with him that the bill has a long history of being worked upon before it reached the form in which we see it before us today. Before it got to the House of Commons, it was the subject of much debate among the people who were consulted and who were engaged in preparing it. It was the subject of much debate in the other place, and especially before its Transport Committee. I think it is fair to say that the Transport Committee of the other place deserves a good deal of credit, not only for the way in which it dealt with representations made to it but also for its readiness to consider amendments which not only improved the bill, in my opinion, but also brought agreement which, if not enthusiastic, was at least tolerant, from all parties in the other place.

The report may be found in issue No. 79 of the proceedings of the Committee on Transport, of July 14, at pages 5 and immediately following. This report, as of course it would need to do, mentions all the amendments that were accepted by the committee itself and, therefore, recommended to the other house. I do not propose to deal with all of them, but in looking through them it is apparent that these amendments were made to some ten clauses of the bill as presented to the other house and, therefore, not only were there ten amendments but also in fact several amendments to each of a number of the clauses, so that altogether, if one were to count each separate change that was recommended by that committee, one would find amendments greatly in excess of ten.

[Senator Langlois.]

Some of those amendments were considered to be very important by members of the committee, and, it seems to me, rightly so. One of them made it possible for the Auditor General to be the joint auditor of the financial affairs of the Canada Ports Corporation, and of the local port corporation for each of these Canada ports. I do not recall whether the sponsor mentioned how many of these ports there are, although he did deal with the different kinds of ports that we have; but my recollection is that there are some 15 Canadian ports under the jurisdiction of the National Harbours Board now, and that each of these ports is likely to become a local port corporation pursuant to the provisions of this legislation, if the appropriate action is taken to bring that about.

Another important amendment was that:

Every Report laid before Parliament under section 32—

Which deals with financial reports.

—and every direction under subsection 22.1(4) stands permanently referred to any committee of Parliament established for the purpose of reviewing matters relating to transportation.

So when any auditor's report, or, as I read it, any similar official financial report about the Canada Ports Corporation, or a local port corporation, is made to Parliament, then, without any further action, the committees of Parliament which are established for the purpose of reviewing matters related to transportation have the right to consider those reports as if they were a special reference to the committee.

Another amendment which I think is of considerable significance is to the effect that people appointed to the boards dealing with the local port corporations shall be residents of the vicinity of the port itself, which will ensure that those people who are appointed to these very responsible positions in relation to any of these local port corporations will be people with direct knowledge of the port and with a direct concern for its welfare because of their place of residence. That is, they would not be absentee management, which, to some of us who have in times past noted the effects of absentee management, is a matter of very considerable significance.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Positive concern.

Senator Smith: Yes.

There is another rather important financial transitional amendment which provides that the balance of money in the hands of any of the national harbours boards shall be paid not into the general treasury, or consolidated revenue fund, but to the Canada Ports Corporation.

There were some other matters introduced into the legislation, not by way of amendment on that particular occasion to which I have been referring, but in the development of the legislation, to which I want to make reference. One is what has come to be referred to by those concerned with the bill as the banking principle, which, as I read it, is to the effect that if any of the local port corporations are fortunate enough to create a surplus of money in their operations in any given year, that money should be paid not into the central revenues of the country but into the treasury of the Canada Ports Corporation, and credited in the accounts of that corporation to the local port corporation from which it came, and that it should be available on the principle of bankers lending money, and also available, and available only, for return to that local corporation or loaning out to some other local corporation, presumably on commercial terms, to assist in financing any particular improvement authorized to be carried out by that local corporation.

One other very important thing relates to the degree of autonomy of local port corporations as compared to the local autonomy of present National Harbours Board or port authorities. The legislation gives jurisdiction, provided certain conditions are met as to tendering and so on, to local port corporations to let contracts up to $10 million on their own initiative. The present authority in that respect, given to local authorities under the National Harbours Board Act, is $50,000. So the power of the local ports in this respect is increased from $50,000 to $10 million, which, it seems to me, should greatly cut down the paper work as between the local corporations and the Canada Ports Corporation, and will enable the local corporations to have much greater jurisdiction over the manner and timing of construction or improvement efforts in connection with their local port.

I believe the sponsor of the bill made some reference to police forces. From reading the Debates of the other place, and from early discussions before the Transport Committee in the other place, I understand it was a matter of considerable concern to a number of honourable members. However, after exploring the matter carefully, the organization regarding the police, whose duty it would be to look after the policing of the local ports, will remain much as it is at the present time, except that some national standards will be laid down in connection with the way in which the police conduct their affairs.

There is one other point that I should like to make. It is with reference to the appointment of the boards that will govern these corporations. The present ports, now under the National Harbours Board, will become local port corporations. There will be 15 of them, and so there will be 15 boards to appoint, as well as the board of the Canada Ports Corporation, which is the umbrella organization which has jurisdiction over not only those 15 ports but also the other classification of ports mentioned by the sponsor of the bill.

The bill provides that appointments to the boards of all of those corporations, including the Canada Ports Corporation, be composed of people whose experience and abilities qualify them for the management of ports; and while that entails a sort of subjective judgment in the selection of particular individuals for appointment, it is to be hoped that the provision in the bill will be carefully followed by the appointing authority, which, of course, is the government.

It seems to me, as apparently it did to members of the other place on all sides of the house, that the bill is an improvement over the present situation. It is not a perfect bill. As I followed the proceedings of the Transport Committee in the other place, and also the debate in that place, it seemed to me that almost everyone had a particular improvement that he was prepared to advocate; but, equally, almost everyone expressed the view that the bill is an improvement and that in its present form it is probably as good a bill as could be achieved and could find its way through Parliament.

Accordingly, I am pleased to support it, not on the basis that it is a perfect solution or that it is perfect legislation, but on the basis that it is an improvement on what now exists. Apparently it is acceptable to all sections of the country and to all parties represented in Parliament. I therefore intend to vote for the bill, and I agree with the sponsor that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—MOTION RECOGNIZING COURAGE OF CANADIAN EMBASSY STAFF

Hon. Peter Stollery, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, June 23, 1982, moved:

That the Senate of Canada recognizes the courage of the staff of the Canadian Embassy in Beirut for staying at their post to do their duty under very dangerous conditions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Explain.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the hour is growing late and that the subject matter is self-evident, I do not intend to speak at any great length, but I would ask honourable senators to consider the situation that our ambassador in Lebanon has faced for the past two months.

We have read with interest—I might say, rather nervous interest—of the events that are taking place in the city of Beirut as we sit here in the Senate. We are aware of the extreme danger that the staff of the Canadian embassy in Beirut has faced for a long time. According to press clippings in my possession, the Canadian ambassador is the only western ambassador who has stayed on in West Beirut, and it has been an act of courage on his part to remain at his post. I believe that the building next to the one he lives in was hit yesterday by a high explosive shell. More than 30 diplomats have been killed in Beirut since 1976. When I was there at Easter, I looked with great interest at the Iraqi embassy. While I have seen many civil wars over the past 20 years and many buildings blown up, and have been under fire myself on occasion, I have never before in my life seen anything like the attack on the Iraqi embassy in Beirut. The building, when it was standing, was a modern reinforced concrete structure of several stories. It is now a pile of rubble, the highest point of which would be no more than 10 feet. In other words, it is just a hole.

● (1650)

I would also point out that approximately a year ago the French ambassador was murdered, and that several other members of the French embassy staff were murdered approximately six weeks ago. So, as I have said, the motion is self-explanatory. I think that our ambassador and his staff deserve recognition for the position they have taken, that of staying at their posts in the part of Beirut known as West Beirut, when it has been under continual fire by a major military force for about 20 months. I hope that honourable senators will join with me in honouring the Canadian staff that has stayed on there.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: May I ask a question of the honourable senator?

Senator Stollery: Yes.

Senator Macdonald: Who makes the decision as to whether the ambassador and his staff stay? Is it made by the ambassador, by the Department of External Affairs, or by the ambassador in consultation with the department?

Senator Stollery: That question should be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I am quite certain that he would not ask an ambassador to stay on at a post if that particular ambassador did not think that he and his staff were safe. I suggest that the third possibility mentioned by Senator Macdonald is probably the correct one. I think that the decision would primarily be made by the ambassador and the heads of the mission.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we adjourn for the day, has the Deputy Leader of the Government anything to report with regard to any agreement in the other place as to the summer adjournment?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received no negative news. I left the chamber briefly in an attempt to find an answer to that very question, and I was told that it seemed very possible that Bill C-124 would be passed in the other place this week.

Senator Flynn: This week, yes; but will it be tomorrow?

Senator Frith: I mentioned to the individual, at the time, the observation made by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate regarding the leave that would be necessary to abridge the time provided for in the rules on second reading, two days' notice, and that it was very doubtful that he, quite reasonably, would be prepared to give such leave if the bill were dumped in our laps, expecting us to give it third reading within a matter of hours. That comment, however, did not seem noticeably to dim the possibility of our receiving the bill in time to deal with it on Friday.

We should be looking at the possibility of sitting on Friday and perhaps even on Saturday, but only in the event that we would clean up our work and adjourn for the summer.

Senator Flynn: And only if there is agreement forthcoming from the other side.

Senator Frith: Precisely. I informed the person in the other place, to whom I spoke, of our position in the Senate which, I think, is supported by most senators; namely, that we shall be prepared to sit longer if we see the possibility of completing our work by the end of this week. Otherwise, if we do not receive the bill within a reasonable time, in the context of its referral for pre-study to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, so that there is a substantially large piece of light at the end of the tunnel, to use the hackneyed phrase, we shall come back on Tuesday rather than go beyond our normal sitting times.

At the moment, I am not preparing a motion for adjournment tomorrow, in the hope that we will sit on Friday to that end; but I will have it in my pocket in case it turns out that we are not going to get the legislation soon enough to deal with it by Friday or Saturday.

Senator Flynn: I suggest to the deputy leader that if an agreement is reached before two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, we will be prepared to co-operate. But if there is no such agreement, it seems to me that the only reasonable course of action will be to adjourn tomorrow and to come back next Tuesday.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

Senator Frith: The only other comment I wish to make is that that is a reasonable position.

Senator Flynn: In any event, you know what it means.

Senator Frith: I thought I made it clear.

Senator Flynn: I just want to be sure that you understand what I mean.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, so that we all understand, and to put it in very clear terms—

Hon. Jack Marshall: And succinctly.

Senator Frith:—the eventuality that would give us an opportunity to finish would be, first, the receipt of Bill C-124, with a reasonable opportunity to give it third reading some time before the end of the week—depending on what we call the “end” of the week—and there will be no consent given to abridging the time provided in the rules for second reading notice unless we know by the beginning of our sitting tomorrow that we are going to get the bill this week, and that, otherwise, if we ask for an abridgement of the rules and for leave we will not get it. Is that clear enough?

Senator Roblin: It is very clear.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2.00 p.m.

THE LATE HON. JOHN J. CONNOLLY, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I have known Senator Connolly for more than 20 years, both inside and outside the Senate, and I was always most impressed by his desire to be helpful and by his kindness to everyone who consulted him. The speeches made by our Speaker, the Honourable Jean Marchand, by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Raymond J. Perrault, by my own leader, the Honourable Jacques Flynn and by all my colleagues who paid tribute to Senator Connolly certainly came as no surprise.

I had the honour of sitting with him on a committee whose existence may have escaped the attention of the Senate. About ten years ago, when the Archbishop of Ottawa, His Excellency Mgr. Joseph Aurèle Plourde, organized a diocesan council, Senator Connolly and I were asked to serve as spokesmen for the anglophones and francophones, respectively. We were assisted by the two auxiliary bishops, the chancellor and several other church officials. Senator Connolly was a wise man who rarely expressed an opinion until the other person finished what he had to say. Yesterday evening, Senator Croll confirmed that the senator was a very good listener, and I feel that the description was very apt.

His profound faith permeated his religious and political thinking, and he was untiring in his willingness to help others.

BORROWING AUTHORITY

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the subject matter of Bill C-125, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

July 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which was referred Bill C-125, "An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority" has in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, July 28, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Everett: With leave, now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think Senator Everett is referring to the report. I am about to make a motion in connection with the bill.

Honourable senators, I move that Bill C-125 be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

I believe that Senator Everett was asking for leave to have the report of the committee on Bill C-125 taken into consideration now. Is that correct?

Senator Everett: No—

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, before Senator Everett responds, may I have your indulgence to make a comment. I wonder if it would inconvenience Senator Everett if I were to present some reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications before he begins?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I had no intention of asking for leave to deal with the report now. I think it has been superseded by the fact that the bill has been reported without amendment. I was replying to his Honour the Speaker's question as to when the bill should be read the third time. I believe it is normal for the chairman of the committee to answer that question.

Senator Frith: I think not. I believe it is normal, in the case of a report, for the chairman of the committee presenting the report to state when it should be taken into consideration; but in the case of a bill, it is usual for the sponsor to move third reading.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HARBOURS

REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE
TABLED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on the subject matter of Bill C-92.

I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE (SEXUAL OFFENCES)

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-53, an Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, I do not think we should agree to give leave at this time. It makes no difference, because when we come back the motion will be on the Order Paper and we can deal with it at that time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted, honourable senators.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Good. You, on the government side, are just trying to push everything through.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, August 3, 1982, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before we leave Notices of Motions, and since leave was not granted on my first motion, it is understood, I hope, that I was giving notice of that motion according to the rules and without leave.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You mean the previous motion?

Senator Frith: Yes. I hope that was understood.

Senator Flynn: But we are dealing with the motion to adjourn now.

Senator Frith: I want to be sure that it is clear that on the previous one due notice has been given.

● (1415)

Senator Flynn: Am I correct that the motion to adjourn until Tuesday next at 2 o'clock is now before the house?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: In respect of that motion, then, can the deputy leader inform us of our prospects for next week? I gather we are still waiting for Bill C-124.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: On top of that, it seems we may have Bill C-53, if I understood the previous motion correctly. I further understand that there is the likelihood of our having to deal with Bill C-85, the Canagrex bill.

In the light of that, could the deputy leader explain to us why the motion for adjournment is for 2 o'clock, rather than 8 o'clock, next Tuesday? I am sure there are valid reasons behind that decision, but we would find it helpful to have them on the record.

In that it may be difficult for some honourable senators to be here at 2 o'clock next Tuesday, is it the intention of the deputy leader that the Senate also meet at 8 o'clock on Tuesday evening? If so, will he give us an assurance that, if there is to be a vote, it will not be taken until the evening sitting so that all senators can be present?

Senator Frith: Yes, I can give you that assurance. For the rest, the situation is much as it was yesterday, when Senator Flynn indicated to the Senate that he would not give leave to abridge the time provided in the rules for second reading of Bill C-124 unless I could tell him that, as of today, there was evidence of an agreement in the other place regarding adoption of that bill there this week. I can now tell him and all honourable senators that there is no such agreement. That is the reason I am not asking honourable senators to meet for the balance of this week.

With respect to Bill C-124, I believe, although I am not sure, that notice either has been given or is about to be given under the House of Commons Standing Order 75c for completion of the debate on that bill early next week. Next Monday is the expected completion date and we will probably receive Bill C-124 on Tuesday. That is one reason why I think we should meet at 2 o'clock. Another reason is that by that time we may have received the Canagrex bill, as the Leader of the Opposition said, in which case meeting at 2 o'clock might at least give the steering committee of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture the opportunity to plan how to deal with that bill. In short, honourable senators, I hope that we can get a head start on the week by meeting at 2 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

Just to repeat the assurance I gave Senator Flynn a moment ago, if there are to be any votes on Tuesday, we shall certainly not have them before Tuesday evening, at which time we can also deal with any matters left over from the afternoon.

In summary, honourable senators, the program for next week is much as I outlined it yesterday. We will deal with Bill C-124, if it is referred to us. We will have third reading of Bill C-125, the borrowing authority bill; perhaps Bill C-109, the UFFI bill; and Bill C-92, the Canada Ports Corporation Bill. If we receive the Canagrex bill, we would like to deal with it also.

With respect to the Holidays Bill, C-201, we would like to complete debate on that matter and have a vote on it next week, either on Tuesday or Wednesday, depending on how many senators still wish to speak on the matter. If it appears that we are able to have Royal Assent on Wednesday, obviously we will want to vote on Bill C-201 before then. If it turns out that we cannot have Royal Assent until later in the week, then there is no reason why we should not have a longer debate on Bill C-201, especially if there are other senators who wish to participate in it.

● (1420)

I thank Senator Flynn for giving me an opportunity to explain what the calendar looks like. If we get the right bounces, I think we have a good chance of adjourning on Wednesday of next week.

Hon. Martial Asselin: We had a chance of finishing this week, but that has not happened.

Senator Frith: That is right, but that is the way it is with chance.

Senator Flynn: For those who may not have heard correctly, I should like to have confirmation from the deputy leader that we intend to sit on Tuesday evening.

Senator Frith: That is right.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): As well as on Tuesday afternoon.

Senator Flynn: With respect to Bill C-201 receiving Royal Assent, it seems to me from what the deputy leader has said that that would preclude the possibility of that bill's being referred to a Senate committee. I take it that that is the intention, if I correctly understood what he said.

Senator Frith: That is correct. The government's position is that Bill C-201 need not be referred to a Senate committee.

Senator Flynn: Then the motion has been adopted?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

DECISION RE J.B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY OF CANADA LIMITED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has been reported that a company that has been part of the Canadian publishing scene for some 80-odd years will close shortly, and that 12 people will lose their jobs, as a result of the refusal of the Foreign Investment Review Agency to allow the company to be sold to a major U.S. publisher.

The current owners, Harper and Row Publishers Inc. of New York, appear to have been unsuccessful in their efforts to find a Canadian buyer for the J.B. Lippincott Company of Canada Limited, of Toronto, a company which FIRA decided in 1981 could not be owned by Harper and Row.

Honourable senators, this company has long been involved in publishing for the medical profession. Its sales have never surpassed $3 million or $4 million a year but, as the company has stated, there probably is not a doctor or nurse in the country who has gone through his or her training without having had the benefit of the use of some of its publications.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether the apparent changes to the Foreign Investment Review Act will allow a review of this decision so that another 12 Canadians will not become unemployed?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—SAFETY OF DIPLOMATS—ROLE OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. Martial Asselin: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the very difficult times now being experienced in Lebanon, the bombings and the increasing number of victims of these bombings, what is, basically, the reason why the Secretary of State for External Affairs has not recalled our ambassador to Lebanon, although his home has already been destroyed by the bombings and his life is certainly in danger, like that of the rest of the population of West Beirut?

What is the actual reason behind the position taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs for letting the ambassador decide for himself whether or not to leave his post in Lebanon? This morning, the minister claimed that the ambassador was there to safeguard Canadian interests. However, we have been given to understand that there are no longer any Canadians working in Lebanon at the present time. There must be another reason.

Could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate what the real reason is behind the decision of the department or the Secretary of State for External Affairs not to recall our ambassador and his staff?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Ambassador Arcand, his wife and his staff have demonstrated an immense amount of courage during this entire ordeal.

Senator Asselin: We know that. There is no doubt about that.

Senator Perrault: I know that the honourable senator does not dispute that point.

Senator Asselin: Not at all.

Senator Perrault: I am just underlining that fact. It is something for which he is to be commended.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has the power to ask any ambassador to return home, as the honourable senator knows. In this particular case the Secretary of State for External Affairs has, in effect, said to Mr. Arcand, "You are on the scene; you are in place; you determine whether or not you wish to return." Apart from that, there are a number of useful contacts being made in Lebanon. Both Mr. Arcand and the government are of the view that even under the present difficult circumstances useful work can be done by Canada's representatives there, and useful work can be done on behalf of Canadians who live in Lebanon.

The ambassador divides his time between West and East Beirut. He has had difficulty, of course, recently with car searches undertaken by the Israeli army. A protest has been lodged on this point, and Israel has promised there will be no more searches of the ambassador's car.

When in West Beirut, where the majority of his time is spent, the ambassador has, for the past month, been put up in the chancery, not his official residence. The chancery is in an area of downtown Beirut which has not so far been subjected to Israeli naval bombardment.

This reply is dated July 26, but there have been other bombings since. The ambassador's apartment, of course, has been destroyed.

[Senator Flynn.]

We are in daily touch with the ambassador to assess whether the level of safety for our skeleton Canadian staff is acceptable.

LEBANON—INITIATIVES TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regarding some of the work of the ambassador or, at least, Canadian representatives in Lebanon, a question was asked yesterday by Senator Haidasz concerning talks with representatives of the Palestinian people.

Up until this time the Canadian ambassador has only been forbidden to meet with members of the Palestine Liberation Organization but not with any other representatives of the Palestinian people. However, other staff of the Canadian embassy in Beirut can and do meet with members of the Palestine Liberation Organization on an "as needed" basis.

LEBANON—SAFETY OF DIPLOMATS—ROLE OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The essential question asked by Senator Asselin is why the ambassador is not called home. The ambassador has been told that he should decide whether, at some point, his services are no longer needed and he should return home.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. I would like to point out to the minister that if there were any victims among our Canadian delegation in Lebanon or the ambassador was wounded, our Department of External Affairs would be blamed for failing to take appropriate action to prevent such an occurrence. Could our ambassador not perform his duties just as well if he moved to East Beirut like the other ambassadors in Lebanon? They are doing their work just as well. My second question is: Are we to interpret the minister's answer as indicating that Canada is acting as a mediator between the Palestinians and Israel? Is Canada playing an official role, in addition to the one being played by the U.S. ambassador at the present time? Does our ambassador have the responsibility to represent Canada so as to enable our country to play an official role in mediating between the Palestinians and Israel?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there has been a reduction in the Canadian embassy staff as Senator Asselin may be aware. Canada continues to talk to both sides on an informal basis to this point in time.

Senator Asselin: Informal?

Senator Perrault: I will take the question as notice, and determine whether or not an official statement on the level of contact can be given to the Senate at the next sitting.

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, all of us must have seen our ambassador to Lebanon on CTV television last night.

I believe I am paraphrasing him when he posed the question, "Where is the Israel we once knew?"

Canada has been a long-time supporter of Israel, providing not only lip service but other services as well. In the name of God, in the name of humanity, is there nothing our government, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, can do to prevail upon the Government of Israel to ease off on this terrible slaughter, this blitzkrieg, that is going on, such as was used against the good Jewish people in Europe? Can something not be done?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in previous statements given to the Senate on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I indicated Canada's great concern with the actions by Israel in Lebanon.

The Canadian government has called on Israel to withdraw its troops to its own borders. In the initial stages, of course, the operation was designed to move beyond Israel's borders to mop up areas which, undoubtedly, contained very large stores of PLO military material, and so on.

Canada, together with almost every other nation in the world, has called for a withdrawal of these forces. As I stated in response to Senator Asselin earlier, it may be useful to have a statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicating the Canadian position as of now. Perhaps that can be brought to the Chamber at the next sitting.

LEBANON—STATEMENT BY YASSER ARAFAT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, by way of supplementary, I heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs at an early hour this morning on television alluding to some clarification that was, apparently, obtained from Yasser Arafat of the PLO with regard to previous statements concerning U.N. resolutions on the Middle East. Does the minister have an official statement on that matter?

Senator Perrault: On the Arafat statement?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Perrault: I do not have an official reaction to the Arafat statement available for the Senate this afternoon. However, the observation of Senator Murray will be communicated to the minister and may form part of tomorrow's statement.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

INDIAN ACT—DISCRIMINATORY PROVISIONS

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I have a question for either the Leader of the Government in the Senate or Senator Austin, Minister of State. Another session has virtually ended without the government delivering on its commitment to eliminate section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, which section the United Nations has found to be discriminatory against Indian women.

Would the leader or the Minister of State tell the Senate now when the government will act to remedy this gross injustice?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State): Honourable senators, I would draw the attention of Senator Bielish to the fact that the government has placed that question before a standing committee in the other place with authority to hear evidence while that chamber is in recess. The matter is ongoing and under active review in the other place by members of all parties.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

CHANGE IN FORMAT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question which I should like to direct to the deputy leader in his special role as custodian of the purity of our procedures.

While it was traditional for Senate Hansard to have a table of contents at the beginning of each daily issue, a few days ago I discovered that it is now at the end.

I rarely read this document because I am always in the chamber, but there are some who do read it carefully.

I wonder if this change is as a result of administrative absent-mindedness or some bureaucrat's dream of progress. Is it money-saving or is it emulation of the other place? Whatever it is, it is a practice which I would not altogether commend right now.

● (1435)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will see whether it is any one of the enumerated possibilities. Whichever one it turns out to be, I shall certainly check as to its procedural purity.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—STATEMENT BY YASSER ARAFAT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information which I would be pleased to communicate with regard to the Arafat statement that was made the other day.

The embassy in Beirut contacted a representative of the PLO last Monday evening, July 26, to ask about the Arafat statement. It is clear from the comments of this representative that the PLO cannot confirm that the Arafat statement represents a change in their policies.

Despite initial hopes, the PLO has not, by its statement, unequivocally accepted Resolutions 242 and 338, which include the right of Israel to exist within secure boundaries. The Canadian view is that, unless this right is recognized, along with the legitimate rights of the Palestinians, peace will be elusive in the Middle East.

Our embassy continues to have contacts with the PLO in Beirut and elsewhere concerning the Lebanese crisis. These contacts in no way reflect Canadian recognition of the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinian people, although we appreciate the importance of the organization.

In order to update honourable senators on the initial reaction of the minister to the Arafat statement, I shall quote him. He said:

I have seen the press reports about a statement signed by Yasser Arafat, which is said to read, in full:

Chairman Arafat accepts all U.N. resolutions relevant to the Palestinian question.

Mr. MacGuigan went on to say:

I cannot say whether he in fact committed the PLO to accepting the existence of Israel in a peace settlement.

He said that some U.N. resolutions, notably Security Council Resolution 242, clearly implies such acceptance—without mentioning the Palestinians except as “the refugee problem”—while numerous others which were passed by the General Assembly deal with the Palestinians directly but contain no indication whatever of acceptance of Israel. Further, they include formulations which are highly critical of Israel, which would seriously prejudice the shape of a settlement. The minister said that we should have further information from our embassies in Beirut, Tel Aviv and Washington in the course of the day.

The Canadian position continues to be that Israel's existence and legitimacy should be recognized, just as there should be recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to a homeland in the West Bank and the Gaza. Otherwise, peace in the Middle East will remain elusive.

If it were true that the PLO had unequivocally accepted Israel, a major and very welcome breakthrough would have been achieved. In such circumstances, we could see the PLO participating in the peace process for resolution of the Palestinian problem.

Canada has had informal exchanges with the PLO for some years and has had useful discussions with them in Beirut and elsewhere on the current situation. While acknowledging the importance of the PLO, we do not, however, recognize it as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinians.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA—MONTREAL-TORONTO—FARE REDUCTION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question which was asked by Senator Marshall on April 9, 1981. He asked about an Air Canada fare reduction between Montreal and Toronto.

The setting of fares is a complex and delicate matter which must take into account the needs and desires of the travelling public, rapidly rising costs, the frequency and size of equipment available, and competing services. If Air Canada is faced with excess capacity, it may decide to reduce fares on certain routes to attract more passengers during specific periods of time. Since it must also attempt to cover its costs, fare reductions may not be appropriate on all routes or at all times of the year. The specific situation described by the honourable senator is no doubt a manifestation of this fare-setting process.

I am not sure whether this reply satisfies the honourable senator, but at least the philosophy of the fare-setting procedure is there.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I cannot even understand it.

● (1440)

Senator Perrault: The question has been well considered.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Long considered!

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Asselin inquired on June 10 of last year and on February 17, 1982 about the sale of Nordair. In a question asked on February 17 last he referred to a letter from the Minister of Transport to the President of Air Canada, which was made public at the time.

The honourable senator's specific questions of February 17 are addressed in that letter. The situation has not changed materially since that time.

The Minister of Transport is continuing to explore options for the rationalization and improvement of regional air services in central Canada. It is in this context, and only under the circumstances described in the letter, that a merger of Nordair and Quebecair remains a possibility.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPLACEMENT OF RETIRING PRESIDENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Smith on February 3 of this year with regard to the appointment of a new CN president.

He inquired about a successor to Dr. Robert Bandeen as CN president, and asked whether the new president would come from within CN. As honourable senators now know, the new president is Dr. Maurice LeClair, who was formerly CN's senior corporate vice-president.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He was appointed about two months ago. That is pretty good.

Senator Perrault: I am sure that the senator's question had something to do with the appointment.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED CONVERSION OF MIRABEL AIRPORT TO CANADIAN FORCES BASE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Marshall on July 20, 1982, concerning the conversion of Mirabel airport into a Canadian Forces base.

Honourable senators, the Minister of National Defence informs me that no consideration has been given to this idea.

Hon. Jack Marshall: It is too good an idea.

AIR CANADA

DISCOUNT FARES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the matter regarding Air Canada. There was a second part to that question which I asked on July 20 last. It concerned low middle-of-the-week fares between different parts of Canada. I indicated that you could go from Ottawa to Halifax for $89 instead of $135, but not beyond that. It seems that there is a sort of Berlin wall from Halifax east.

Could I have an answer to that question, and an explanation of that kind of discrimination?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator can look forward with the utmost confidence to a reply some time in the future.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: With regard to unanswered oral questions and questions on the Order Paper, can we look forward to receiving answers before the Senate adjourns next week, whether they are a month old, or six months old, or a year old?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are doing our utmost to provide answers to as many of the questions as possible that have been on the Order Paper, in some cases, longer than we would have wished.

TRANSPORT

QUEBEC AIRPORT—STAFFING OF CONTROL TOWER

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was wondering if Senator Perrault has a reply to my question about the Quebec airport situation.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The reply has not yet come in, but is being prepared.

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board if he could look at my question that was asked on March 25, 1981 regarding the veterinary college in Atlantic Canada, and bring me an update.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Agreed.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 3)—THIRD READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-122, to amend the Small Business Loans Act (No. 3).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HOLIDAYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—SPEAKER'S RULING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-201, intituled: "An Act to amend the Holidays Act".—
(Honourable Senator Walker, P.C.).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before Senator Walker continues this debate, will you allow me to give my decision on the point of order raised by Senator Lang on this motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: On Tuesday, July 27, 1982, during the course of the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-201, An Act to amend the Holidays Act, the Honourable Senator Lang rose on a point of order and asked whether the Bill is a private bill within the meaning of Rule 93 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada.

Rule 93, which appears under Part VII—Private Bills reads as follows:

After its second reading, a private bill shall be referred to a committee, and any representations before the Senate for or against such bill stand referred to such committee.

I would like to quote the definition of private bills from Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, 4th Edition at page 558. The definition reads as follows:

Private bills are distinguished from public bills in that they directly relate to the affairs of private persons or of corporate bodies, and not to matters of general public policy or to the community at large. They pass largely through the same stages as public bills, but, at the same time must originate by petitions and be subject to certain special rules in both Houses of Parliament.

Bourinot states the following with respect to public bills at page 489:

Public bills may be introduced by members of the ministry as government measures when they are for purposes of procedure placed on the Government Orders after their first reading. Other public bills are those introduced by members of Parliament, not in the administration, and these, for purposes of procedure, are after a first reading placed on the Order Paper on what is styled "Public Bills and Orders".

So I have to declare that the point of order raised by the Honourable Senator Lang cannot be maintained.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I think we were all delighted yesterday when Senator Everett, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, got up and told us exactly what he thought about this bill, namely, that it should be dropped. He said that there are another 11 months in which to introduce a new bill; that such a bill, without the faults to be found in this one, should be introduced in the House of Commons; that it should be proceeded with stage by stage; that after second reading there should be referral to a committee; and that the bill should be perfected.

It would be very worthwhile to do that. To hear one of the leading Liberals make that suggestion is, to my mind, almost an inducement to bring about the adoption of such a recommendation. I would be entirely in favour of that being done.

What Senator Everett said, briefly, was that the Senate should refuse this bill; that the House of Commons must bring forward a proper bill, which must be referred to committee; that arguments should be heard in committee; that arguments should be heard on second and third reading; and that there must be a very full debate. The House of Commons must then pass the bill and send it on to the Senate for approval.

The reason we have not got anywhere so far is that the operators of the Senate over there seem to be in fear and trembling of what happens in the other place.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: We are here as a house of sober second thought to correct the mistakes that are made in the House of Commons from time to time. Usually the members of the House of Commons accept our corrections gladly. From the remarks that I have heard from members of the House of Commons they would be delighted if we would just forget all about this bill, and introduce another one when we get back from our summer holiday.

We know—and you have been told this before—that Bill C-201 is defective, inasmuch as it does not even have a title. A title is very necessary. I remember working with Mr. Driedger when I was a parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice. That gentleman has now written a book called The Composition of Legislation, and he points out in section 5, on page 162, that headings are regarded as part of the act, and should therefore be carefully prepared by the draftsman. Their language should be consistent with the language of the act.

• (1450)

It would be advisable, I believe—in fact, absolutely necessary—if the government proposes to continue in its attempt to amend the Holidays Act, to withdraw Bill C-201 and to proceed with Bill C-37. That would enable the government to save some time. Bill C-37 is an excellent bill, without any errors. It had its first reading in 1980, and no further action has been taken since that time. Why there should be this sudden flurry and haste is beyond me. We know that following second reading that bill will go to committee. If everyone protesting Bill C-201 is to be heard, it will take longer than next Wednesday to get through it. There is no way of cutting off, nor should we cut off, a subject as important as this, which is raising the hackles of so many people across Canada. We would start off, of course, with our illustrious former Senator Forsey as witness.

Regardless of what we do, it is impossible to proceed with this bill. Let us have a proper bill on the Order Paper for the fall, and let us then proceed with it with dispatch. This could have been done in any one of the 115 years since Confederation. Why are we trying to rush it through by next Wednesday? It must be because my friend, Senator Frith, promised the Prime Minister he would get it through by then.

Senator, I will do anything to please you—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It's very fishy.

Senator Walker: I am always trying to please the honourable senator—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And vice versa.

Senator Walker: —and we even used to help each other at the Bar.

Senator Frith: "At the bar", in both senses of the word.

Senator Walker: Let us admit it, you are a nice fellow. You are under pressure. You have your instructions. Come hell or high water, you think you have to get this bill through before we adjourn for our summer holiday. I would do anything to help you, except that. I do not believe in what you are asking.

Senator Frith: I have just the thing you can do.

Senator Walker: Tell me when I am through with my speech. That will be something to pep things up a bit. Senator Everett was annoyed, and I know that other senators were annoyed and upset, to think that members of the House of Commons, who speak so well of themselves—and I am sure they are as good as they say they are—should ever forget that the Senate is the place of sober second thought. However, not all the members in the other place forget that. At least eight members have said to me, "I hope you will undo the harm that we have done". That is what I am trying to do in my humble way today.

I heard someone laugh there, and I am glad he did. There are 282 members in the House of Commons, all of whom we would expect would be on the job that day, vitally interested in any proposed change in the name of our national holiday commemorating the formation of the Dominion of Canada on July 1, 1867. The thing was a slick operation. They waited until everyone was tired out. It was about 4 o'clock, time to go out to get a drink—of coffee.

Senator Flynn: At the bar.

Senator Walker: Everyone had gone, all with a clear conscience. They had laboured all day, and then this slicker, whoever he was, counted the number in the House. He must have thought 13 was a lucky count, and he went after this bill just as fast as he could.

I see a senator leaving the chamber. Don't go, senator. I would like your criticism. Come back, won't you? That member in the other house waited until they had all gone, and he then pulled a trick, and it is important that it should be on the record. We know the story from then on. Before they could get 20 members, the minimum necessary, the thing was slipped through.

However, I am not going into that again. It has been gone into many times. No one intervened. One Tory member came in and asked "What's going on here?" It was 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and the bill went through. Now we have to take our lumps, because of that horrible debauch of the rules of Parliament.

There are, of course, many defects in the bill, which I shall not go into today because it is not necessary. It was hurriedly drafted. No notice of its presentation was given to anyone, and, after the bill was passed by a total of 13 members in the other place, we are now informed by the Deputy Leader of the Government that the bill has to go through without amendment.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Shame.

Senator Walker: That is not like my old friend.

Senator Marshall: He is a nice fellow.

Senator Walker: I do not believe he has been spoiled by power. I am asking: Is there something behind this smart MP, Herbert?

Senator Flynn: Say it in French.

Senator Walker: Is this another trick of Mr. Trudeau's? Is he saying, "To save a lot of trouble we will get rid of 'Dominion Day' and we will have 'Canada Day' in its place"? If he is, we reply that we will not get rid of that historic title of "Dominion Day" which has been honoured for 115 years.

"Canada Day", to me—I do not wish to criticize meanly, so I shall not be mean today—

Senator Marshall: Tomorrow?

Senator Walker: But let us look at "Canada Day". Honestly, it is a subject of mirth. Every Canadian holiday is a "Canada Day", is it not? Canada declares holidays for Canadians, and only Canada can do that. What is unique about calling the greatest day in the history of our country, from the time of the French occupation to the present day, "Canada Day"? What is the use of calling it "Canada Day" when every holiday we have is a "Canada Day"? Every stranger coming to Canada will wonder what "Canada Day" is all about if this legislation is passed. There is no indication of what it is about—none at all. "Canada Day" might mean anything. But the present title means a great deal. The title "Dominion of Canada" is now 115 years old.

[Translation]

I would like to speak in French, but I cannot. I want to describe to the Senate the role played by French Canadians in the history of Canada.

[English]

That was a terrible effort.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

[Translation]

You are free to give it a try and I am proud of you.

Senator Walker: You are a nice boy.

Senator Flynn: I agree.

[English]

Senator Walker: Monsieur Maurice Laliberté and the Leader of the Opposition tried to teach me: "Qu'est-ce que c'est? Je ne comprends pas." At one time in the House of Commons, I could answer questions in French, but I have really forgotten a lot of the language since.

● (1500)

As an English Canadian, speaking to my friends, the French Canadians, I would think that most of them would be more than satisfied with the word "Dominion". Why? It was picked by the Fathers of Confederation. Why? Because every French cabinet minister agreed with that choice. It is true that the reference to Psalm 72 was found by Sir Leonard Tilley, but the French cabinet ministers agreed with that too. Why would French Canadians in that cabinet not agree to it? After all, "Dominion" is an old and ancient word.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Oh, oh!

Senator Walker: Please bear with me my friend, and do not start talking to someone else because this is an important point for you to consider. The title "Dominion of Canada" was picked by French Canadians and by English Canadians and incorporated at the time of our Confederation in 1867. We have heard the word many times. Upon researching the word "Dominion", I learned that it is old French, meaning "puissance" which translates to power or sovereignty. It is a lovely thing to be able to combine into the name of our country a French word, "Dominion" along with the name "Canada." I hope those wonderful people in Quebec appreciate this fact.

I pay tribute to the people of Quebec. I never had a better time in my life than during the summers I spent in Ste Croix-de-Lotbinière. I can remember touring the province as captain of the Ste Croix tennis team. During that tour I met a chap named Taschereau who became the Chief Justice of Canada and who, at that time, was the captain of another tennis team. As he passed my seat one day in the performance of his duties in this chamber as Deputy Governor General—and he was almost at death's door at the time—he leaned over and said to me, "Hello, David, how about a game of tennis?"

My father, a former British Army officer, often reminded me of how the French saved Canada in 1775. We had been invaded by the Americans, and they were beating the hell out of us. They had captured Montreal and they were moving on Quebec City. What a licking they got there. In fact, their leader, General Richard Montgomery, was killed. Of course, the British Commanding Officer, Sir Guy Carleton, knew that he could not win without the French. In order to enlist their support, he went to the priests of Quebec, the monsignors, the bishops, and so on, and asked for and received their complete co-operation. He then went to the seigneurs, who were very important in those days. I would point out here that Senator Beaubien's people were seigneurs going back 300 years. With the support of the French, the Americans were given the worst licking they ever had just outside Quebec City. General Montgomery was killed, and the army fled.

Then in 1812 once again the French repulsed the Americans in the Battle of Châteauguay.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: And that was the last time before Vietnam that the Americans were defeated.

Senator Walker: Senator Tremblay says that that was the last time the Americans were defeated before Vietnam. That is something to be proud of. Of course, I am proud of anything that the French Canadians do well, because I have had such a happy association with them.

It was a little more than 50 years later when they stood up and indicated their support for Confederation and for the belief that "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth". The Fathers of Confederation believed in that passage. They liked the fact that it was from the scriptures, and particularly from the Psalms. The word "Dominion" cannot be said to be Anglo-Saxon; it is an old French word. I repeat again that every national holiday in Canada is a Canada Day. So why, in the name of heaven, take away from us the one day we English Canadians, and I really hope French Canadians, love more than any of our other holidays—Dominion Day? We must ask ourselves whether we are willing to make this change, and we do not have long to make up our minds.

"Canada" is everywhere in our legislation, our literature and our thoughts. So, in talking about the greatest holiday in our year, Dominion Day, surely we can think of a better name than "Canada Day" to replace it. What Canada Day? Every national holiday is a "Canada" day. I say to those who support this legislation: When you search your conscience, as I am sure you will—and it is a matter that is above partisan politics, and I know that those on the other side do rise above party politics and that at the long caucus meeting they held yesterday those supporting the retention of the name "Dominion Day" almost won—and when the vote is actually taken, I hope you will support retaining the name "Dominion Day". Certainly you will be assisted by us.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Oh, oh.

Senator Walker: I love to hear my honourable friend interrupt, because what he has to say is usually very sensible.

Why is it being said that French Canadians do not like the name "Dominion Day," when in the good old days the people of Canada, including French Canadians, were proud to be free of Britain and to be part of the Dominion of Canada? Why are they angry? Why should French Canadians object to this name?

We have been told that Australia has a holiday named "Australia Day". Well, they have nothing to boast about. It does not mean anything to them. They have no battles, Fathers of Confederation or Confederation to commemorate. So, in that light, it is perfectly proper for Australia to have an "Australia Day". Of course, that does not mean that they were not magnificent fighters in two world wars. But was the founding of their dominion dramatic? Did they have a Quebec Conference? Did they have the Fathers of Confederation? Did they unite two sovereign nations, as Canada has done? Of course not, so please do not compare us with that wonderful country of Australia.

France does not have a "France Day"; they recognize their country on "Bastille Day". "Bastille" is a romantic word meaning a great deal to the people of France, and it is associated with the capture of the Bastille and the beginning of the revolution. People are thrilled upon hearing of such holidays as Bastille Day. I happened to be in Paris one year when the holiday was being celebrated. There was a big parade which was a wonderful sight, and it was all very inspiring to the French, just as Dominion Day is to me. The same can be said about Independence Day in the United States. They are inspired because it reminds the people of that country of the day they obtained their independence from Britain, and that is a wonderful thing. So let us in this esteemed chamber, where there are more brains than in any other legislative body on this continent—

Senator Flynn: In the world.

Senator Walker: No, I will not say that. I will let you say that after you have had your fourth drink—but, then, you never have more than one! Let us beware.

● (1510)

Honourable senators, we are dealing with Bill C-201 today because of a trick played by 13 members out of a total of 282 members in the other place. We should not be here today. We ought to have finished our consideration of legislation. When you consider that what was done in the Commons in respect of Bill C-201 was so wrong as to be almost dishonest, it is pathetic that we should find ourselves still hanging around when we should be on holidays. Having said that, I wish everyone a very happy holiday.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. My thoughts are now clear with respect to the nature of this bill.

An Hon. Senator: Finally.

Senator Lang: Since it is not a private bill, I assume it is a public bill and, therefore, a government bill.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Not necessarily.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Lang: There are only two kinds of bill under our rules, either private or public.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but government bills are something else again.

Senator Lang: This is not a private bill; therefore, it has to be a public bill, being a government bill.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: No, that is not so.

Senator Lang: Well, I suggest that you re-read your rules.

An Hon. Senator: You read them yourself.

Senator Lang: Let me refer you to rule 46(a). It reads as follows:

46. No notice is required of the following motions:
(a) by way of amendment to a question;

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Lang: In the light of rule 46(a), I move, seconded by Senator Bell:

That the Bill be not now read the second time but that it be amended by adding after subsection 2(2), the following new subsection:

"(3) Canada Day may also be called 'Dominion Day'.

Honourable senators, it is my hope that with this amendment we will be able to obviate the ridiculous situation in which we find Parliament today, namely, debating a matter of such utter triviality. Personally, it doesn't matter to me whether the holiday is called Dominion Day or Canada Day, but at least a choice would leave it open to people to use whichever of the two expressions they prefer.

I dislike matters that cause divisiveness and dissension. Surely we can get together on this question and leave aside the stupid arguments we have been hearing.

The people of this country need symbols, not labels, and perhaps they want their own symbols. Let me have my symbols and let the Québécois have their symbols.

An interesting aspect of the amendment I have proposed is that it would make unnecessary the multitude of consequential amendments that would necessarily flow from the change of name proposed in the bill. Those consequential amendments would no longer be necessary because the two names would be interchangeable.

Honourable senators, I will not plead my case other than to say that those who wish to create tensions may continue to create them, but, frankly, I find that distasteful. I doubt that most of those who have been involved in the debate on this matter have been really willing participants; rather, they have been coerced into debating an issue that is more likely to divide than to unite. It is my hope that this amendment will be a means of enabling our two founding races—I hate that expression, because it smacks of racism—to continue to work together, as they have always done in the past.

Thus, I put the motion in amendment to you in the hope that the Senate will consider it a means of obviating the problems that have arisen in respect of this proposed change of name. I hope you accept this amendment:

Canada Day may also be called "Dominion Day".

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, may I also rise on a point of order to suggest to the honourable senator that, whether it is seconded or not, a motion made on a point of order is entirely out of order.

Senator Flynn: That is true, but I don't think Senator Lang really meant to rise on a point of order. I think he misspoke.

Senator Frith: Yes, he did say he was rising on a point of order, but he was wrong. He was not.

Senator Flynn: The substance of what Senator Lang had to say really had nothing to do with a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Just to clarify the situation, honourable senators, in my opinion, Senator Lang was not speaking on a point of order but was simply debating the question. In doing so, he moved a motion in amendment which was seconded by Senator Bell. He had the perfect right to do that. That motion in amendment is now before the Senate, and I will put the question.

It has been moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bell:

That the Bill be not now read the second time but that it be amended by adding after subsection 2(2), the following new subsection:

"(3) Canada Day may also be called 'Dominion Day'".

Are you ready for the question, honourable senators, or do you wish to speak to the amendment?

Senator Frith: I assume that Senator Bell will want to speak on the amendment, since she seconded the motion.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I seconded Senator Lang's motion because I believe the proposed amendment will solve the current problem and at the same time keep everyone reasonably content. I, too, am of the opinion that we should stop being divisive and start attending to, and attempting to solve, the real problems the Canadian people are facing at the moment.

In my opinion, honourable senators, it is extremely irresponsible of us to entertain Bill C-201 at this particular time in our history. I am convinced of that partly because of my own thinking and partly because of the public reaction to the bill in my part of British Columbia. I have never seen such a response to a bill introduced in the House of Commons as there has been to this particular bill at this time.

Let me give you an example to illustrate what I mean. After the bill was passed in the other place, an editorial by Stanley Burke appeared in one of the leading newspapers. It is headed "Canada Day—is it really us, or another con job?" Underneath that there is a coupon that can be clipped out of the paper. It is in the form of a letter addressed to me, and it reads as follows:

Dear Senator Bell,

I (approve) (do not approve) the government's move to change Dominion Day to Canada Day as the name of our national day.

I (approve) (do not approve) of the government's action in passing this bill without thorough debate.

[Senator Robichaud.]

And then there is a space for a signature, followed by "(Signature optional)."

I was astonished at the number of these coupons or letters I received through the mail in response to this editorial by Stanley Burke. I was absolutely overwhelmed at the response. Hundreds and hundreds of coupons came in, in separate envelopes. Of that enormous stack of mail, only four responses were in favour of changing the name "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day". In the main, people were terribly upset at the suggestion that they would lose more of their heritage.

Honourable senators, if you accept this amendment, I believe Canadians will no longer feel that they are losing yet another part of their heritage. For that reason I hope you will support the amendment.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Williams, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-28, intituled: "An Act establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill S-28 was adjourned by my colleague, the Deputy Leader of the Government, in the hope that other senators would speak on the bill. I am of the opinion that no other honourable senator wishes to speak, so I should like to close the debate on second reading of Bill S-28.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I moved the adjournment of the debate, and I do not wish to yield at this time to Senator Williams.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do you agree, Senator Williams, that the debate be adjourned to the next sitting of the Senate?

Senator Williams: To keep harmony in the family, I will accept that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The adjournment was moved by Senator Frith.

The Hon. the Speaker: I simply asked Senator Williams because he talked about adjourning the debate. I am asking him if he is making a motion to that effect.

Senator Flynn: He did not.

Order stands.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE INSULATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-109, to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

He said: Honourable senators, I know that all honourable senators are concerned about the problems of some Canadians who insulated their homes with urea formaldehyde foam insulation, and there are many of them. I know that all honourable senators want help for those who may already have been affected by the so-called UFFI.

A number of honourable senators have met with victims of urea formaldehyde foam insulation. I have had a number of meetings with people residing in my region, and one can only be profoundly sympathetic. Today I am pleased to be able to move the second reading of this proposed legislation, because it will provide needed assistance to those affected.

The bill is simple and straightforward. The regulations, of course, are going to be of great importance. The bill will allow Parliament to appropriate funds needed to assist those suffering from the effects of this type of insulation, and I am sure that all honourable senators will agree that those people require our prompt assistance. None of us wants to force them to wait over another summer and another fall for a meaningful aid program to be implemented. Some live in trailers in their backyards in order to escape the fumes which they allege come from the insulation in their homes.

I should like to review briefly with you what the government has done and what it will do. There are three main objectives of the bill, the first being to restore confidence in the value of UFFI homes. A number of Canadians installed this material confident that it was a good insulating material which had been approved by the authorities. Having used this type of insulation, some owners have experienced buyer resistance when they have attempted to sell their homes. Some potential buyers, when they learn of the use of urea formaldehyde foam insulation, immediately lose all interest in the purchase of such homes. The second objective is to reassure the public regarding health aspects. And, most important, the third is to help immediately those with health and housing problems caused by the use of this material.

One of the first steps the government took was to establish the UFFI Information and Co-ordination Centre. The centre has served as a focus for the government's broad program by providing advice and information to tens of thousands of concerned homeowners. The centre has carried out a national testing survey involving houses from coast to coast. This has provided a scientific basis for the proposed legislation.

As the first country in the world to ban this material, we are breaking new ground in science, engineering and technology. This centre has helped to bring to bear the combined resources of various federal departments and agencies, and private organizations. In fact, other countries which need information to deal with similar problems are now coming to the Government of Canada as the authoritative source.

I should like to speak now on the three main objectives of the bill I mentioned a moment ago. First, to restore confidence in the value of UFFI homes, the government is providing for:

free tests, on demand, to show whether the formaldehyde is above the acceptable level; free professional advice on solving problems; a list of qualified contractors; and money to help pay for work to remedy the problems.

Second, to reassure the public in health-related matters, the government is providing for: comprehensive research and development to find new and more effective remedial measures; long term medical research; spot checks on UFFI houses in the future; money to help finance independent associations of urea formaldehyde foam insulation homeowners; a UFFI advisory council of homeowners.

Third, to help immediately those people with health and housing problems, we are proposing the speedy passage of this bill to provide funds to carry out this program.

Based on the information gathered in the national testing survey conducted in December, the government announced the assistance program for UFFI homeowners. More than 32,000 homeowners have registered at the UFFI Centre and have been sent application forms. As of Wednesday last, approximately 26,000 homeowners have returned completed forms to the government.

The UFFI homeowner is offered a screening test using a dosimeter, a device for measuring gas levels in the home. Over 24,000 dosimeters have already been distributed. As well, other actions are being taken to help these homeowners.

The aim of the remedial measures is to reduce the formaldehyde concentration to well below the level of 0.1 per million of formaldehyde in the air in the homes, which is a standard set by Health and Welfare Canada. If the test indicates a level of formaldehyde in the home higher than 0.1 part per million, or the homeowner is suffering health problems, the homeowner is to be offered full-scale testing and advice on remedial measures. When the necessary information and professional advice have been prepared, the work is carried out. After inspection, the homeowner receives a cheque, which could be as much as $5,000.

● (1530)

You may well ask the question: If the homeowner is suffering health problems, how do we judge them? Is there some standard which demands that the homeowner and his family be examined by a government appointed doctor? Only a declaration that that person has had to seek medical help is sufficient to establish that point.

The test results may show a reading below 0.1 part per million, but the occupants of the home may be suffering physical health problems just the same. In that case, this homeowner is also to be offered further testing and advice on remedial measures, and any work required is carried out.

The Government of Canada has taken the initiative on a broad front and has tried to be as responsive and as responsible as it can be when homeowners have asked for help. We have urged the provincial governments and the companies involved in the manufacture and installation of UFFI to be equally responsive. The people of Canada expect all of those involved in this unfortunate situation to take action, not on technical grounds or on legal grounds but on humanitarian grounds. Homeowners need information; research must be done; remedial work must be carried out; and assistance must be provided to people who are ill. It is not going to help those people who are suffering to have various levels of government discussing and debating who has the ultimate legal responsibility. People are having medical problems. Some people are living in their backyards during the cold winter months and during the wet winter months which we have in some parts of our country. We have to act to meet their needs, and this bill provides for such swift action.

I should like to give you some additional information on this subject because there are a number of misconceptions about urea formaldehyde foam. There has been the suggestion that the government approved the substance and, in effect, endorsed its installation in homes across the country. There have been other suggestions that we have been lagging behind the rest of the world.

I should like to put these facts on the record. Canada is leading the world in taking responsible action to help these homeowners. UFFI is still available in the United States; only two states have banned it. The product is still available in leading countries, such as Germany, the United Kingdom, Sweden, Italy, Switzerland, Spain, France and South Africa. They are still insulating homes with this substance in those countries. The government did not promote the use of UFFI over any other product. Formaldehyde-based products were only 6 of 140 possible insulation materials for which CHIP grants were available. Consumers made their own choice of product.

Another point which should be made is that the federal government does not accept legal responsibility for any problems caused by UFFI. The government is now acting, as I stated, on humanitarian grounds to respond to health problems associated with UFFI.

Based on testing of over 2,000 homes in Canada, 90 per cent of homes, on average, have less than 0.1 part per million. The vast majority of homeowners should not experience health problems below this level. However, some people are allergic to formaldehyde, just as some people are allergic to certain foods and materials in almost minuscule amounts. For these people formaldehyde in their homes may be a problem even if the level is less than the 0.1 part per million standard. In these cases, reducing the level as much as possible must be the target.

To keep the issue in perspective, the outside air commonly has between 0.0005 to 0.05, which is half the recommended level, because this material is to be found in nature. Outside air can be much higher. These are only average figures. If allergy problems persist below outside air levels, people may wish to consult their doctors.

Of the 10 per cent of homes tested which have levels of 0.1 part per million or over, most can be helped by sealing and caulking, ventilation techniques and other methods evaluated by the National Research Council.

[Senator Perrault.]

Manufacturers had the responsibility of ensuring that the product was safe. Under legal principles of product liability, manufacturers are principally liable if a product is unsafe for the use it was intended for. This is often written into provincial sale of goods acts.

When the product was given an acceptance number by CHIP, the acceptance was conditional. The manufacturer was required to train qualified installers, among other listed quality control requirements. Generally, these conditions were not met. Much of the difficulty came about as a result of improper installation. Those are the findings of the committees.

The provinces have jurisdiction over regulating the insulation industry and licensing the installers. Most severe problems are due to poor installation. The federal government is acting now, given the absence of provincial initiatives, out of its general concern for the health of Canadians.

Formaldehyde gas—I am referring to another aspect of the factual record—is naturally occurring in other forms. The health risks from living in a home with the 0.1 part per million of formaldehyde is the same as smoking one-third of a cigarette a day. Cigarettes also contain formaldehyde. Many other common products in the home contain formaldehyde, such as carpets, drapes and cooking oil on electric stoves.

For severe cases, where the sealing and ventilation techniques are not sufficient, more drastic action may be required, and in such a situation legal recourse may be the only answer. The federal government grant, however, should help in the majority of cases. This offer is as much as $5,000.

Honourable senators, as I said at the outset, the bill is a simple one. It is not going to meet all of the problems of all of the homeowners. There will still be requests for further action. Some people will feel that the grants should be larger. I think this is an excellent program, deserving the support of honourable senators. If questions are asked during the course of the debate, I will do my best to answer them.

Homeowners need information; research must be done; remedial work must be carried out; and assistance must be provided to people who are ill. With this bill, the Government of Canada is attempting to meet their needs. Prompt passage of this bill will speed aid, comfort and financial assistance to those needing help from us. On behalf of all Canadians, I ask the support of the Senate for this measure.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Would the honourable senator permit a question? In discussing the question of what the federal government did, he made the statement that it had been suggested that the federal government had given its approval for this material. Is it true or not that the federal government approved this material?

Senator Perrault: The federal government agencies, acting on the recommendation of an advisory committee involving the industry, involving the provinces and involving many other agencies across the country, put this on the approved list of those substances qualifying for CHIP grants. The suggestion that this was a unilateral federal decision, in which the government endorsed the product, is not true. I would be pleased to read a list of the organizations which formed the scientific panel which stated that it would be a satisfactory material for use in the home.

● (1540)

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I compliment the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Raymond Perrault, who sponsored this legislation, Bill C-109, in this chamber. He spoke with eloquence and forcefulness, but he did not convince me that this is a good piece of legislation, although we all agree that it will be of some assistance.

Honourable senators, Bill C-109 provides the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with the power to pay sums of money, to be fixed by regulation, to persons as compensation for problems arising from the insulation of their dwelling places with urea formaldehyde foam. Persons seeking such compensation must apply for it and must qualify under regulations to be prescribed.

As the leader said, the maximum payment is $5,000, and eligibility will be determined on the presence in the dwelling of above-standard levels of urea formaldehyde gas or a statement by a physician that the applicant has suffered health problems as a result of the presence of the gas, even if it exists at lower levels than the standard established.

All payments are non-taxable and the Cabinet is authorized to make necessary regulations regarding eligibility and level of payment.

The total spending authority provided for between the date the bill is to be proclaimed and December 1, 1982, is $55 million. If more money is required, Parliament must appropriate it through another piece of legislation.

Acceptance of a payment under this bill does not prevent persons from suing the government for damages they believe may be the responsibility of the government in respect of urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

The minister is also empowered to carry out and fund whatever training, inspection, testing, advisory and auditing services as are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of the act.

There it is, honourable senators, this government's answer to the urea formaldehyde foam insulation problem.

There are 200,000 to 300,000 Canadians who have suffered, are suffering and will continue to suffer from the effects of urea formaldehyde foam insulation, and the Government of Canada comes up with this as an answer to their problems. As the leader said, these people have been made physically ill, some of them seriously ill, and all have suffered economic setbacks as a result of this monstrous error, but all the government can provide is this pathetic excuse for a solution.

The bill, which we are now asked to pass, does not spell out who will be entitled to the aid being offered, inadequate as that aid may be. Surely the department concerned has had adequate time to draft the criteria that will apply to the selection of those to be helped and the degree of help to be offered them. Why have we not been made privy to that information since it is crucial if we are to judge properly the fairness of this whole exercise?

As is customary for this administration, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has tried to blame everyone else for the problem that this bill fails to solve. He has blamed the media, the provinces, the manufacturers and the installers. He has even tried to blame the opposition parties in Parliament.

The real culprit is the federal government. It was guilty of inexcusable carelessness and must accept full responsibility for the nightmare that has been visited upon 80,000 to 100,000 Canadian households.

This government was warned as far back as 1974 that urea formaldehyde foam insulation might present a health hazard. The Department of National Health and Welfare as asked to look into the toxicity of the foam. Was it done? If not, why not? If it was, what were the results, the recommendations?

In 1978, Dr. Richard Viau, head of the Chemical and Fire Safety Program of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs warned of the dangers to health of using this kind of insulation. Still the government kept promoting the use of urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

Today it tries to absolve itself of guilt by blaming the manufacturers and those responsible for installing the foam. This, in spite of the fact that scientists have told us that it is the foam itself that is unstable. This, in spite of the fact that the Department of National Health and Welfare has recommended a complete ban on the use of this chemical.

What we have here, honourable senators, is big government and big bureaucracy at its worst and at its most dangerous. What we have here is an administration more concerned with promoting a handout program than it was with the safety of Canadians. What we have here, apparently, is a compliant bureaucracy frightened into silence by its overbearing political master.

What happens? One hundred thousand families are victimized; 100,000 families invest a good part of their earnings in energy conservation and end up with a veritable time bomb which jeopardizes their physical and economic well-being, and this bill does nothing to defuse that time bomb; it offers no solution. It just throws a few crumbs to people who are ill; to people who are stuck with houses they cannot live in and cannot sell.

The minister says we have to be careful; we cannot waste the government's money; we have to be sure that we do the right thing. What is the right thing? He does not know, but he is confident that some day we will find an inexpensive solution to the problem. In the meantime, those who are suffering can only learn to exercise patience.

● (1550)

Would it not have been simpler to look long and hard at the home insulation program before it was promoted at the cost of millions of dollars? Would it not have been simpler to check out those warnings about the effects of urea formaldehyde before recommending it?

Honourable senators, this bill is an aspirin for a dying man. These people are desperate. Some have lost their health; some have lost their homes; some have lost both. Some people have been forced to live in their garages; others, in Vancouver, have used bulldozers to destroy their homes and have only recovered the price of their lots. This government, which got them into this mess, can only offer a maximum amount of $5,000, and they are not even guaranteed $5,000—it may be less. When one thinks that the average cost of removing the stuff from the walls is three, four and more times the sum being offered, one realizes the inadequacy of the solution.

In closing my remarks on this catastrophe, I return to the subject of the regulations surrounding this legislation. Why are they not available? This bill has been “in the mill” for months. I cannot conclude other than that the government is trying to pull a fast one on us.

Once again, these people are going to be victimized—as though they have not suffered enough. This government wants to pretend to help, but when it comes right down to it, my guess is that those regulations, which are not being shown to us, will be so drafted that a lot of people will not be helped at all, while others will get much less than they have been led to believe.

What help will be given to those who have already spent thousands of dollars removing urea formaldehyde foam from their homes? What help will be given to those who become ill several months or years down the road? What help will be given to those who have removed the foam and who still cannot sell their houses at a reasonable price?

Honourable senators, this bill is inadequate. It does not offer enough help and it leaves too many matters unaddressed. We could and should do better because the people affected by this catastrophe deserve help. The government led them into their predicament; it therefore has the responsibility to lead them out of it. It has not, with this bill, lived up to that responsibility—quite the contrary.

We on this side of the chamber view this bill as a charade, an exercise in self-absolution. We support it only because it is better than no help at all for those suffering from the effects of urea formaldehyde foam insulation, but it is certainly nothing to be proud of.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government):
Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that, if the Honourable Senator Perrault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there are some points raised by our respected colleague, Senator Bélisle, to which I wish to reply. He may be unaware of the full extent and implications of this program, and I can quite understand that, since he may not be in possession of all of the information regarding it.

The following changes were made to the aid program following recommendations of the National Advisory Council of UFFI Homeowners. Previously, only those homeowners whose results showed levels of formaldehyde over 0.1 parts per million, or who presented evidence of medical problems or illnesses that could be attributed to UFFI, were eligible for assistance. The federal government recognizes the principle of “universality.” This regulation has been changed such that all owners of houses insulated with UFFI are eligible for assistance of up to $5,000 under the federal government’s assistance program. If the amount of assistance is less than $5,000, it would only arise under those unusual circumstances where the costs of removing the insulation are less than $5,000.

For example, for a small dwelling where most of the insulation could be removed for $3,000, the government is not about to pay the full $5,000, or $2,000 more than the cost of the work. Therefore, all owners of houses insulated with UFFI are eligible for assistance, whether or not there is a high level of gas; the sole condition is the existence of UFFI in the house.

In order to be eligible for assistance in the past, the homeowner had to carry out the corrective measures recommended by CMHC. CMHC decided whether removal was necessary. The choice is now the homeowner’s. The homeowner has the option of removing the insulation or of taking other corrective measures. In either case, he is eligible for up to $5,000 in government assistance. It is suggested, however, that UFFI Centre advice be sought, because removal, if improperly carried out, can be dangerous. Therefore, certain prerequisites apply.

Previously, only those homeowners who had removed the insulation prior to the December 23, 1981 announcement of the federal assistance program were eligible for assistance without being registered at the UFFI Centre and without following the procedures that will come into force with the adoption of Bill C-109. This has now been changed so that a larger number of those affected by this problem are now eligible for federal assistance. Registered homeowners who have removed the insulation, or who are in the process of doing so, are entitled to assistance of up to $5,000.

Previously, priorities were established according to the level of formaldehyde—that is, over 0.1 parts per million—or the severity of the illness in a house insulated with UFFI, even if the level was less than the aforementioned standard. Now, the difference is that people suffering ill health will be given priority. Other criteria will be established in conjunction with the homeowners’ representatives.

Previously, homeowners were not encouraged to take the training course which is run by the government to instruct contractors in remedial measures. The question of taking such courses was never really raised, and homeowners had to pay the same fee as the contractors. This has been changed so that the courses and examinations are free to owners of houses insulated with this material.

Honourable senators, these are just some of the improvements that have been made to the UFFI aid program. Previously, homeowners had to pay $100 for CMHC inspectors to do the assessment for remedial procedures. Greater accessibility in this regard has now been provided for homeowners. Those who have already paid will be reimbursed. The $100 fee for assessment has been lifted. CMHC will continue to do inspections of work for those who conform to the program's requirements.

A question was asked earlier by Senator Donahoe concerning the responsibility of the federal government with regard to the approvals that were given to this material. I have in my hand, honourable senators, a copy of the document issued by the Canadian General Standards Board, document 51-GP-24M for December of 1977. It is entitled "Standard for: Thermal Insulation, Urea Based, Foamed in Situ." The document reads:

This standard applies to urea based thermal insulation for use in walls in building construction.

The government sought scientific advice from numerous organizations before it listed the material—a responsible action to take. The names of the organizations forming the Committee on Urea Formaldehyde Insulation are as follows: Alberta Labour; Department of National Defence; Leger Insulation Inc.; National Research Council of Canada; Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; Order of Architects of Quebec; Copeland Laboratories; Craston Industries and Enterprises; Department of Public Works of British Columbia; Roblee Enterprises Ltd.; Cantor Heating Insulating Ltd.; Centre de recherche industrielle du Québec; Rapco Foam Inc.; A. C. Wild Ltd.; Underwriters' Laboratories of Canada; Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; Ontario Hydro; Department of Public Works; Alberta Housing Corp.; Borden Chemical Co. Ltd.; and the Canadian Government Specifications Board.

● (1600)

All of these organizations sent a scientific representative. They formed a committee on UFFI. The standard was approved, the date on the document being December 1977. Only after receiving the recommendation from this committee of very respected authorities was approval given by the federal government to put this material on the list of those substances which could be approved for CHIP grants. There is a great deal of other very technical information, honourable senators, I will not take the time of the chamber to read it.

I just want to say that the record states that the federal government, without any clear legal responsibility to do so, has gone beyond the measures taken by any other government in the world to help people affected by this substance, and they do not deserve, I believe, with all due respect to Senator Bélisle, the criticism which has been directed at them this afternoon.

Senator Donahoe: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. Can the honourable senator tell us if any of the organizations he has listed, and which he says share the responsibility for recommending UFFI, are contributing anything to the sums of money being made available to those who took their advice? In other words, is any part of the $5,000 to be paid by any organization other than the federal government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that is an excellent question. To this time they are contributing only by the tax route, as corporate taxpayers.

There is a possibility, however, honourable senators, of future legal action against those companies, or against the federal government. We are not standing in the way of legal action on the part of any of those homeowners; indeed, we are taking express action to leave the court route open to those who have used this substance.

Frankly, we were in this sort of position. One organization would say, "It is your fault." Somebody else would say, "No, it is your fault." Provincial governments would say to the federal government, "We are not involved." They are supposed to supervise the installation standards, but they said, "No, that is not our responsibility." That is not of one bit of use to somebody who has a sick youngster in their home. We got tired of the buck passing. We said, "We have to make a start some place, and let us get some money in the hands of those people. Let us get some advice and some financial and scientific assistance to these people, and then squabble legally down the road if we have to."

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the honourable leader? He said it is quite possible that I am not too well informed. That is certainly quite possible. I may not have all your information. I read all the speeches that were made in the other place, however. I also read the comments of the minister, as quoted in the newspapers. On top of that, I requested the Library of Parliament to prepare for me a paper on the subject. Then I called the department and asked for more information. I asked them, "When will the regulations be out?" They said, "We don't know. It is a Cabinet decision."

If you had information you would probably have been well advised to supply us on this side with the information, privileged or not, that you did have, and that we did not have.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that too is a good question. What we have done is establish an advisory committee which is helping to set up the regulations. It is not a matter of the Cabinet or a subcommittee of the Cabinet meeting and saying, "These will be the regulations, and let us try and minimize the exposure of the federal government to demands under this program."

Already, we can see now $110 million in payments under this program to those affected. By our own approximate measurement, that is what the demand is going to be. We have asked the committee to report their views. We have had a report this week from the committee, in fact, and the regulations are going to be developed as a result of the recommendations which the committee has put forward. The advisory groups are representative of the country from coast to coast.

Senator Bélisle: You mentioned $110 million, but in the bill, at clause 8, it refers only to $55 million.

Senator Perrault: That is over a two-year period, at $55 million a year. The total program is over two years.

Senator Bélisle: But it does not say that here.

Senator Perrault: Nevertheless, it is $55 million a year, up to a total, over two years, of $110 million. That is the figure we can see now.

Hon. David Walker: I just want to say, honourable senators, that my honourable friend did very well.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the honourable leader a question that he could perhaps pass on to the Indian Affairs people. What bands are involved with insulation in reservation houses?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to provide that information, if it is available, on third reading. I do not have that information on my desk at the present time.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask of the Leader of the Government regarding this particular substance. The government has apparently recommended other substances that have been used throughout Canada, and yet we hear nothing about those other substances, though some of them could become dangerous also, which would put the government on the spot.

My question, however, is, why has urea formaldehyde been so popular right across Canada—apparently, more popular than any of the other insulation substances? Was a big campaign conducted to promote this particular material?

Senator Bélisle: Millions were spent to promote it.

Senator Perrault: The substance has been very popular from a cost standpoint. It is considerably lower in cost than some of the other materials. Furthermore, I am sure that many homeowners were aware of the fact that such prestigious organizations as the ones I mentioned at least approved of the material and the installation standards connected with it, and felt they could proceed with confidence to invest in this type of insulation.

Senator Donahoe asked a question with regard to what the manufacturers were doing. I have here a note to the effect that to date more than 35,000 of the estimated 80,000 UFFI homeowners in Canada have registered in the federal assistance program. Beyond the immediate financial aid which will be made available on the passage of Bill C-109, their interests are also served by the research efforts of such organizations as the National Research Council and Health and Welfare Canada. More than 30 different investigations of various aspects of urea formaldehyde foam are under way. They are proceeding quickly, but many could proceed more quickly if those responsible for manufacturing UFFI offered their cooperation in solving a problem which, in fairness, they helped to create.

So far, in such areas as supplying their chemical formulae for UFFI to federal government researchers, the manufacturers have not been forthcoming. In the long run, this information could become available to us through the courts, but many UFFI homeowners do not have time for the long run. They want and need help now. Co-operation rather than confrontation is required. Ignoring the problem will not make it go away. The industry, both manufacturers and installers, should help. The federal government is doing its part; the private sector should follow suit.

There has been a notable lack of co-operation on the part of at least some members of the private sector, I am sorry to report.

Senator Yuzyk: One further question. I think it was about two weeks ago that there was a report in the press that a certain person in Winnipeg had discovered that the use of ammonia could neutralize the harmful effects of urea formaldehyde. Has the government looked into this matter in order to give aid to those who need it most?

● (1610)

Senator Perrault: Yes, honourable senators. In meeting with departmental officials yesterday, I expressly asked the same question. The scientist in Winnipeg is operating on a federal government grant. We are providing grants to scientists across the country to try to find answers, and I have been advised that under laboratory conditions the introduction of ammonia gas, under certain circumstances, does have a neutralizing effect on urea formaldehyde. What is yet to be determined is whether the new chemical compounds created by the chemical action between ammonia and urea formaldehyde might in themselves cause certain health problems of a different sort.

The process is in the experimental stage. It has not gone to large-scale testing, as such, but at least it is most encouraging. But we do not want to wait for another six months of testing before we get some money into the hands of those who have been affected. At least some money now will help.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, August 3, 1982, at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT-MATTER OF BILL C-125, TO PROVIDE SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY

July 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-125, "An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, July 20, 1982, examined the said subject-matter and now reports upon the same.

On Thursday, July 22, and on Wednesday, July 28, the Committee held meetings attended by the Honourable Pierre Bussières, Minister of State for Finance, assisted by Mr. Bernard J. Drabble, Associate Deputy Minister, Mr. G. W. King, Director, Capital Markets Division, Mr. C. Georgas, Chief, Fiscal Forecasting and Budget Analysis and Mr. R. G. H. Miller, Chief, Securities Markets and Debt Management.

The Minister opened with an account of factors explaining the need for the additional borrowing authority beyond the $6.6 billion already provided under Bill C-111. He noted that there were two main causes: a very significant decline in revenue due mainly to the slow-down in the economy and some increases in expenditure. Specifically he provided the following information.

A. Reduction in revenue:

| | | |
|--|-----------------|-----------------|
| — reduction in tax receipts | $4,500 million | |
| — decline in oil revenues due to fall in international price and lowering of energy taxes | 1,500 | " |
| — modifications in tax proposals since the November 1981 budget (limit on taxation of interest income) | 410 | " |
| | | $6,410 million |

B. Increased expenses

| | | |
|---|-----------------|-----------------|
| — increased cost of debt service | $1,100 million | |
| — energy related costs due to delay in passage of legislation | 1,100 | " |
| — job creation projects | 300 | " |
| — fiscal arrangements adjustments | 150 | " |
| | | $2,650 million |
| Total | | $9,060 million |

Previously the financial needs of the government had been calculated at $10,000 million, which had been covered by $6,600 million authorized in Bill C-111 and $3,500 million which had been carried over from previous years. Of the $11,000 million authority requested in Bill C-125, $7,000 million represented the anticipated requirement in 1982-83 and $4,000 million represented a contingency for 1983-84 until new borrowing authority had been provided.

Several members of the Committee expressed concern at the size of the borrowing authority being sought. Given the extent of the error in the calculations of need since the November 1981 budget, as had been made clear in the Minister's opening statement, they suggested that it would be preferable for the government to reduce its current request and to make a further request late in the autumn or over the winter for the contingency funds needed for 1983-84. By that time, requirements for the next stage could be made more precisely.

In the course of attempting to respond to this broad argument, the Minister and officials identified three principal reasons why the government needed authority to borrow large sums of money:

a) To cover the regular operations of government. The need for authority for this purpose was more regular and predictable, but the Committee could not secure any projections of need on a month-to-month basis. It was suggested that a major requirement was to support large bond sales and the annual autumn sale of Canada Savings Bonds, to the extent that such sales went beyond a rolling over of previously authorized borrowings.

b) To support intervention in the foreign exchange markets in order to defend the Canadian dollar or to cushion violent shifts in the dollar in either direction. The need for borrowing authority for this purpose was quite unpredictable, and could involve large amounts. All but $44 million of the $3.6 billion contingency authority had been utilized in the spring 1982 operation to defend the Canadian dollar. Even if stand-by authority to borrow funds had been negotiated with foreign banks, parliamentary approval of borrowing authority was needed before any funds could actually be borrowed.

c) A contingency authority to carry over into the next fiscal year, to be available in case of need until such time as Parliament had passed a new borrowing authority. There could be delay if an election were being held or other parliamentary business had intervened, as had happened earlier this year. It was not possible to borrow under Governor General's warrants.

In response to the suggestion that the Committee might find the request for borrowing authority more acceptable if the total amount were to be segmented and apportioned to the separate needs, the Minister and his officials argued that this would reduce flexibility and could in certain circumstances lead to higher costs for borrowing. They did agree that it would be possible at the end of April to provide complete and detailed figures on the state of the contingency borrowing authority as of the fiscal year end, but they could not predict need in the following months.

The Committee made it clear that parliamentary approval of borrowing was a necessary part of the control of the executive by the legislature. It was not sufficient to claim that Parliament already exercised control through the approval of expenditure estimates. Parliament also traditionally considered the government's proposals for raising revenue including the authority to borrow.

There was some discussion of the extent to which the size of the government's money needs might serve to keep up the rate of interest. The Minister claimed that in 1981-82 the government had only taken up 38 per cent of funds raised in the market. Against the argument that the government's needs in 1982-83 were much greater than in the previous year, he stated that private sector demand was reduced this year and that personal savings rates in Canada had risen from 12 per cent in 1981 to 13.3 per cent for the first quarter of 1982. He contrasted these figures with a personal savings rate in the United States of 5 per cent in 1981.

The Committee noted that Bill C-125 took account of its earlier criticism of Bill C-111. In the past, the contingency borrowing authority in the amount of about $3.5 billion had been carried over for several years without being revised or renewed. The Committee observed with satisfaction that Bill C-125 cancelled all previous outstanding borrowing authorities as of the end of the fiscal year. The bill as reviewed by the Committee at this point sought a new contingency borrowing authority of up to $4 billion for the next fiscal year, treating it however as part of a larger request for $11 billion borrowing authority. Members of the Committee objected to this linkage and suggested that the government make a separate request later in the year for the necessary contingency borrowing authority for the next fiscal year.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT-MATTER OF BILL C-92

Thursday, July 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-92, intituled: "An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act", has, in obedience to its order of reference of Wednesday, July 21, 1982, examined the said subject-matter.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE I. SMITH,
Chairman.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON PRESENTATION BY THE CANADIAN RAILWAYS EMPLOYEES' PENSION ASSOCIATION

Thursday, July 29, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications which was authorized to receive a presentation from representatives of the Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association with respect to certain issues relating to the Canadian National Railways Pension Trust Funds, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of June 17, 1982, examined the said matter and now reports as follows:

In the course of its study, your Committee heard Mr. Earl White, President of the Canadian Railways Employees' Pension Association and Mr. James J. Chester, Vancouver Assistant Manager of the Association. The Committee examined various aspects of the Pension Funds and Administration of the Pensions of the CP and CN particularly in matters relating to retired employees with a fixed pension without indexation.

Your Committee is informed that the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport has recommended that it be authorized to undertake a further study of this matter when Parliament resumes after the summer recess. The Committee feels that it is not necessary at this time to duplicate the efforts of that Committee but intends to closely monitor the matter.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE I. SMITH,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, August 3, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE LATE HON. JOHN J. CONNOLLY, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, unfortunately, I was unable to be present when the Senate was paying tribute to the late Senator John Connolly; nor was I able to attend his funeral. Because of that I ask your indulgence so that I can relate a brief but beautiful experience I had with the senator during my illness.

It is never a pleasure to be sick, and that is especially true of someone like me—a coward when it comes to matters of health. It is not easy to lie in hospital for three weeks awaiting so-called major surgery. Nevertheless, I consider myself fortunate in that during my three weeks in the National Defence Medical Centre—that great, beautiful and wonderful place—I had the occasion to spend a good deal of time with Senator Connolly.

The very day I was admitted to the hospital, Senator Connolly was returned from the intensive care unit to take his place on the same floor as those of us who were either waiting to undergo the ordeal or who had already gone through the ordeal. Prior to that, I had known Senator Connolly because of our association with the Liberal Party. As a young man, when I started out in the party, I came to know Senator Connolly when he was the president. I also remember when he was executive assistant to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services during the last war.

● (1405)

Those three weeks in hospital gave me an opportunity to get to know Senator John Connolly better. Those three weeks were a learning experience for me. He talked to me about politics, humanity, the church, his country, his city and the Canadian people. One could feel the great love he had for all of them.

At 9 o'clock in the evening, when everyone was supposed to be in their beds, I would go to Senator Connolly's room or, after he started walking again, he would come to my room. I enjoyed the discussions we had, but I did not want to tire him out, so, since I was in better health than he, I told him that I would go to his room at any time, providing he sent for me. I did not want to impose on him. Senator Connolly told me that I was more than welcome, and that when he got tired he would let me know.

During those three weeks I not only got to know Senator Connolly better, but also got to know his wife and his two sons. I felt it an honour to have been able to spend the last few weeks of Senator Connolly's life with him. He was full of courage and hope. When I was discharged from the hospital, Senator Connolly was in the intensive care unit. The doctors told me that he was fighting hard, so I was deeply moved when I learned of his death, and I regret being unable to attend his funeral.

Honourable senators, I should like to relate a particular incident. One afternoon I walked into Senator Connolly's room while he was on the telephone. When he hung up he told me that he had been talking to one of his grandchildren, a three-year-old grandson, who told him that everyone was asking him—the grandson—to ask little Jesus to make Senator Connolly better. Senator Connolly told him to keep asking little Jesus to make him better, and with that, his grandson said, "Yes, but nobody will give me his telephone number." At that point I told John that if he did not know the number, nobody did.

CRIMINAL CODE (SEXUAL OFFENCES)

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend to seek leave to move that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and tomorrow, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

There is a motion already standing in my name on the Order Paper, namely, Motion No. 3, which asks that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee be authorized to study the subject matter of Bill C-53, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate.

Because the two motions are so linked, I wonder if Motion No. 3 can be brought forward so that we can deal with it now. Unless that is done, my other motion will not make much sense.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not believe we have any objection to that, although I have to confess that I cannot see the wording of the motion on the scroll. Perhaps it appears in the Minutes of the Proceedings. However, I, for one, would be willing to have the Deputy Leader of the Government move both his motions seriatim if he so wishes.

Leave having been given to proceed to Motion No. 3:

Senator Frith, pursuant to notice of Thursday, July 29, 1982, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-53, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and the protection of young persons and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I ask the Senate to support this motion because I have been told that agreement has been reached in the other place respecting a vote on this bill tonight, which means we shall receive it tomorrow. What we do with it is another matter, but the committee feels it would be useful to have the opportunity to pre-study the bill to assist the Senate to decide on its disposition.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend please enlighten us as to the time factor he sees in connection with Bill C-53. Offhand, it would appear that we might just as well wait until we get the bill, debate it on second reading and refer it to committee in the usual way. I am at a loss to understand what advantage there is in adopting a motion for a pre-study of the subject matter when the bill itself is almost upon us.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is a reasonable question. I discussed with the sponsor of the bill, and with some members of the committee, whether there is any advantage in having a pre-study, in view of the fact, as Senator Roblin has pointed out, that the bill will be before us tomorrow. The answer I received was that it would be useful to have a preliminary discussion on the bill—in effect, from a steering committee point of view—to determine how much time could be saved by planning for dealing with the bill, as distinct from its clause-by-clause study.

The committee wishes officials to be present to explain what is involved in the bill and what would be involved in a pre-study. Accordingly, the committee has tentatively scheduled meetings for this afternoon and this evening for that purpose, and that is why I would like them to have the authority to prepare themselves to consider the bill in that way.

Senator Roblin: Based on the honourable senator's explanation, I do not think I would have any objection to the procedure, but I do hope that we will give this important and lengthy bill the serious consideration it deserves and that we will not skimp on our efforts because of the pressure of time. I am sure there are other methods the honourable senator can suggest by which we can preserve the integrity of this bill and, at the same time, the integrity of the Senate.

Senator Frith: I agree with the honourable senator.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Roblin.]

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this motion is really corollary to the motion we have just adopted, to the explanation given and to the observations made by Senator Roblin. Therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and tomorrow, Wednesday, August 4, 1982, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, some senators have had and are having difficulty reaching Ottawa in time for our afternoon sitting, so I suggest that we postpone Question Period until eight o'clock this evening.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this matter has been canvassed between the two sides of the house, and we agree that it is the sensible thing to do.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1420)

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PERSONNEL

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I realize that Question Period has been deferred until this evening, but I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he has any new information in answer to the question I asked him about housing for Canadian Forces personnel who are having difficulty in finding accommodation commensurate with their positions but still in line with their pay.

Has the Minister of National Defence announced any plans to deal with the problem, or has any element of that ministry been delegated the responsibility of providing that accommodation? In short, has any progress been made?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as of 2 o'clock this afternoon I had not received any information from the minister with respect to Senator Marshall's question. However, a reply is being prepared.

UREA FORMALDEHYDE INSULATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-109, to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, unfortunately, I was not in the chamber when this bill received second reading. Had I been I would have said that I was extremely pleased that the Government of Canada had resorted to this device to assist those people who, having insulated their homes with urea formaldehyde, now find themselves suffering from various consequential ill effects.

I hope the bill will be administered and implemented in such a way that it will be of the utmost help to those people. Although their choice was based upon the best information available at the time, it was unfortunate that they did choose to use urea formaldehyde foam insulation because it turned out to be harmful to some of them and very disturbing to many others, particularly because of the adverse influence it has had on property values.

Honourable senators, this is good remedial legislation. As I say, I hope it will be administered sympathetically and effectively in the interests of those whom it is calculated to assist.

An Hon. Senator: Don't hold your breath.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HON. L. NORBERT THÉRIAULT

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): May I draw to the attention of all honourable senators the presence in the chamber of Senator Norbert Thériault, who has come through a very difficult ordeal in hospital.

Senator Thériault appears in radiant good health today and we are pleased to have him back.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I sincerely thank the Leader of the Government for expressing to me the good wishes of the Senate. I should also like to thank all my friends on both sides of the house for their expressions of sympathy during my illness. While I was in hospital it was heartwarming to realize that so many could find time to phone me or drop me a card. That sort of thing makes a person feel good, and I just want to say thank you very much.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-125, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THIRD READING

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-92, to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HOLIDAYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-201, intituled: "An Act to amend the Holidays Act"; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bell, that the Bill be not now read the second time but that it be amended by adding after subsection 2(2), the following new subsection:

"(3) Canada Day may also be called "Dominion Day"."—(Honourable Senator Asselin, P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Asselin will be here this evening to continue the debate on this amendment. I know that he would be glad to yield to any honourable senator who might wish to speak this afternoon. If this item appears on our Order Paper this evening, I know there will be one or two speeches from this side.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to speak to the amendment. Before doing so, I will assure Senator Roblin that it is my intention, when I am through, to suggest that the debate be adjourned until later this day so that it will appear on the Order Paper this evening.

Honourable senators, I am intervening at this stage to explain, as succinctly as I can, my understanding of why the government is supporting this private member's public bill, and why it is not supporting the amendment.

Because it is necessary for me to explain why the government is supporting the bill in its unamended form, I wish to speak to three points: first, on the substance of the motion itself; secondly, on the question of why the government is supporting this private member's public bill, having in mind, as has been pointed out, the manner form in which it was passed by the other place; and, thirdly, on the problem on consequential amendments to the bill—that is, the amendments that would consequentially flow from the private member's public bill but which are not contained in that bill, although they are contained in the government bill that appears elsewhere on the Order Paper of the other place.

First, as to the substance of the bill itself, I have nothing to add to what Senator Bird has said. The government supports the substance of the bill which, simply put, is that a holiday now known as Dominion Day will hereafter be known as Canada Day.

● (1430)

Therefore, I endorse all the reasons in support of the motion put forward by Senator Bird.

I will now deal with the question of why, when the government had introduced a similar bill in the House of Commons, it supported in that house, and is supporting here, this private member's public bill. Putting the matter as simply as I can, honourable senators, as we have heard in debate, the idea of Dominion Day being known as Canada Day has been around for some 30 years in varying legislative garb. It has been the subject of private members' bills before. In fact, as I understand it, this very private member's bill before us has taken one full tour around the private members' hours. It was talked out, made a re-entry, and finally arrived the week before last at the top of the Order Paper.

To put it in what might be too light-hearted metaphorical terms, although I hope not, the government, many parliamentarians and, I am sure, many Canadians liked the idea of naming this day Canada Day, and when this bill appeared on the Order Paper of the other place, we got a lucky bounce. The ball bounced into our arms, perhaps unexpectedly, but the idea having been around for more than 30 years, and the government having clearly said that it supported the idea, it was not about to say, "Oh, I guess that bounce was a little too lucky," and hand the ball back to the referee or the other side.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: An Argonaut bounce.

Senator Frith: As Senator Molson says, "an Argonaut bounce"—or, at least, as it used to be.

Honourable senators, as frankly as I can put it, it is that simple. I do not think it is our business to discuss the procedures of the other place. It is our business to discuss their legislation. We now have their legislation which has come to us, luckily, after 30 years. We are within reach of the goal line now, and that is why the government is supporting the motion as it stands and is not supporting this motion in amendment or any motion in any amendments. If the bill is amended at this stage, it will have to be sent back to the other place, and the chances of it coming back into play are not at all good.

It is our opinion, and the opinion of legal scholars, that these consequential amendments, while desirable, are not absolutely necessary. The substance of the bill is contained in its form as it appears before us, and those consequential amendments are simply unnecessary.

I believe that the Leader of the Government in the Senate, understanding senators' concern, is going to give us an official undertaking that the consequential amendments will be presented to Parliament in due course and, certainly, before July 1 next, which the government hopes will then be known as "Canada Day".

Honourable senators, for those reasons, which I hope explain the government's position on this private member's public bill and its position on the motion in amendment, I will be voting against the motion in amendment and asking other honourable senators to follow suit.

As a postscript, I would also ask honourable senators to support this suggestion, that we vote on the motion in amendment this evening after honourable senators have had a chance to speak to it, and then vote on the motion for second reading tomorrow.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Frith: Certainly.

Senator McIlraith: I should like to deal with the early part of his remarks prior to his reference to the subsidiary or auxiliary parts of the bill.

Honourable senators, did I understand the thrust of Senator Frith's argument to be that the government is supporting this bill without amendment; that the government is not making it a government bill although it is supporting it; that the government is also rejecting the amendment, because if it accepted the amendment, and the amendment were passed by this house, the government would have to take the responsibility—which is inherent in responsible government—of submitting it to the elected representatives of the people in the other place? Is the deputy leader saying that, if it were defeated in the other place, this is a matter upon which the government would not go to the country?

Surely that is a pretty dangerous argument. Was that the thrust of the argument on that point? I have never heard of a government wholeheartedly supporting a private member's bill and rejecting incidental amendments and, at the same time, declining to make it a government bill, since the government stands or falls on the consequences of action by the elected representatives of the people. As I understood the argument of the deputy leader, he was saying that the government did not want an important amendment like this to go before the elected representatives of the people. I should like clarification as to the argument of Senator Frith on that first point.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I would like to know whether the honourable senator is now speaking on the amendment or whether he is asking a question.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I think it is apparent from my remarks that I was asking a question and seeking clarification on what I regard to be a very important argument which was made on behalf of the government and which, indeed, goes to the very root of our system of responsible government. I hope that Senator Guay will come to appreciate that when he reads my remarks.

Senator Guay: I still have my doubts.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suppose the best way to answer the question is to repeat the position of the government, which, as far as I am aware, is this: the government does not consider that its position strikes in any way at the roots of responsible government. It seems to me that it is reasonable to ask the government's position on a private member's bill, in a case where the private member's bill has been adopted in the other place before a government bill, which, in effect, expresses the same principle, goes through the same process. It is also reasonable to ask whether government support makes the private member's bill a government bill. The government is simply saying, "No, we are not making it a government bill."

The honourable senator is now asking the government's position on this private member's bill. The government is simply saying—which I think is consistent with responsible government—"We are in favour of it."

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would like to pursue the question raised by Senator McIlraith, because it does seem to me that this presents something new in my experience. It is not customary for the government to take a position with respect to a matter of policy on a private member's bill in this way, which, in effect, is equal to adopting it, and covering it with the shield of government approbation, followed up—judging from the statements made by the leader of the house previously—by a government three-line whip, or whatever those things are called in the Canadian system.

I would simply like to have the honourable senator explain to me just how it is that the government can adopt a private member's public bill and not make it a matter of confidence or government policy, as he appears to have done.

● (1440)

The deputy leader then comes along, and, if I understand correctly the statement he made, says, for reasons best known to himself, that although the bill is defective in many respects, although there are consequential amendments that must be considered and passed—and I think he is right in that, since the Law Clerk of the Senate advised us on this point—and instead of amending the bill now, which would have been the proper and usual way to proceed he proposes not to do that but to adopt a defective bill with the undertaking—from the government this time, mind you, if I understood him correctly—that the government will, at some time between now and July 1, 1983, produce a bill which amends this one. Well, if they are going to have some trouble with this bill, what makes them think they will not have trouble with the amendments?

It seems to me that the Senate is owed an explanation as to why it is sound policy for the government to adopt a private member's public bill, make it government policy, and then refuse to amend it, as it should be amended if it is to pass at all, so that the contingent aspects of the matter are properly covered.

I ask my honourable friend to explain to the Senate just why he does not follow this sensible and logical course.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, both Senator McIlraith and Senator Roblin seem to want me to use, or say I am using, words that I am not using, such as "adopt".

The government is in favour of this bill. The government says to Parliament that it is in favour of Parliament's supporting and passing this bill. It is not adopting it. It is not making it a government bill. I was asked if it was making it a government bill, and the answer is, "No, it is not." The government is simply being frank with Parliament and saying, "As far as we are concerned, we are in favour of the principle of this bill because some time ago we introduced a bill ourselves that embodies the same principle; we therefore want to reinforce and restate the fact that we are in favour of the principle, and of that principle's getting its expression in this bill."

As to the consequential amendments, I did not say that the bill is defective. The opinion we have, and the opinion I have, as a lawyer, is that it is not defective; it is effective. If the matter ever came before a court the court would, in my opinion, say that the consequential amendments should be taken as part of Parliament's intention in passing the substance of the bill. The consequential amendments, therefore, are not something that must be made, they are something that it is desirable to make. The government is simply saying that while it is not absolutely necessary to make those consequential amendments, because the combination of the Interpretation Act and the general rule as to the intent of Parliament would carry them anyway, it is desirable that they be made, and, therefore, it undertakes to see that they are, in fact, made. However, the bill will be effective and take effect without those consequential amendments.

On the two points, therefore, the government is not adopting the bill, but it is simply and frankly telling Parliament that it is still in favour of the principle, as it has been for some 30 years, and that it is in favour of that principle gaining legislative realization through this bill.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, the deputy leader said that they got a "lucky bounce", and that that is why they are supporting the bill and expect it to go through. I wonder if the deputy leader would say whether it is the Canadian way that 12 members of the House of Commons could get a private member's bill, particularly one which is going to change the whole tradition of Canada in the form of a name that has been in existence for 115 years, through by the luck of the draw and a lucky bounce, as the deputy leader described it. There might be a majority of people in Canada who would support this change of name, but the deputy leader does not know that. Certainly there is a large minority in Canada that does not support such a change.

Does the deputy leader feel, in all sincerity, that it is the Canadian way to change the history of Canada by a lucky bounce?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, again I do not like to quibble about words. I did not say the government was in favour of passage of this bill because it got a lucky bounce. I said it was in favour of the principle of this bill, and has been for 30 years. It is, therefore, not a matter of saying, suddenly, that because it got a lucky bounce it is against 115 years of tradition. The principle has been around for 30 years. It was purely a matter of taking advantage of a good break, as it turned out, in order to give effect to a principle it has been in favour of for at least 30 years.

I do not know how much confidence Senator Marshall has in polls. He says he thinks there might be a lot of people against it. I understand there is a Gallup poll that shows that 70 to 80 per cent of the people, in every region of Canada, are in favour of July 1 being called "Canada Day."

I know the problem with polls. One man's opinion is as good as anyone else's. Any person, not just a parliamentarian, can stand up and say, "The people out there want . . ." or, "The people out there don't want . . .", or, "They are afraid of . . .", or "They wish for . . .", or "They don't wish for . . .".

Of course there is no ultimate, totally scientific way of measuring that sort of thing, but to the extent that polls do indicate public opinion, my understanding is that at present they indicate an overwhelming cross-Canada, pan-Canadian, support for this bill. That is why I do not feel that there is any disrespect for the popular will in the government's position when it wishes this private member's public bill—which is now, of course, a House of Commons bill, since it was passed there—to be given effect.

Incidentally, I should say something, parenthetically, about that.

Senator Marshall: Passed by how many?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: It was passed according to the rules.

Senator Frith: Not only that. I think honourable senators should know that this is the bill's second time around on the Order Paper. It came to the top, two full days' notice was given to the house leaders that it was coming up, it was posted in the caucuses of each of the parties for two whole days prior to its coming up, and those who did not show perhaps had good reason not to do so. It is simply not correct to say that it was slid through by a piece of trickery. Things just did not take place that way.

I want this to be clear, however. I agree with Senator Walker's criticism to the effect that this was not done in as perfect a way as possible. It does not seem, though, to be correct for me to talk about the procedure followed by the House of Commons. I am only giving honourable senators the facts that I have just mentioned, namely, the length of time this private member's bill had been around, and the fact that everyone knew for two whole days that second reading was to be moved. They could have packed the place if they had wanted to. They could have had 100 per cent attendance. They knew it was coming up. For whatever reason, they did not show up. I do not suggest that it would not have been better if they had had 100 per cent flag-waving in the other place, but that, it seems to me, is not our affair.

I thought it only right, however, since criticism has arisen as to how they dealt with the matter, to make sure that we know what the facts are, and do not misrepresent them. Those, I understand, are the facts.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, it is a fact, though, that 13 members of the House of Commons passed it. It is a fact, too, that a quorum is 20 members. Why in the name of heaven, if the deputy leader is so sure that a bill like this would pass, was it not presented in the regular way? It still is not too late to present it in the regular way. Senator Everett, in his speech the other day, very ably outlined how that could be done.

Canada is a noble place, inhabited by a noble people. It does not seem right to me that the name of Canada's national holiday should be changed from Dominion Day to Canada Day in what would appear to the public, in any event, and to a lot of the members of the House of Commons who were not there, to be a sleazy way of doing it. There is no advantage now in pushing this through today and tomorrow with that background. There are eleven whole months in which to get it done before the next Dominion Day. Why do you not withdraw this bill instead of building your house on crumbling rocks in what appears to be a very suspicious manner?

I am not taking exception to what you are saying but, to anyone who studies the bill, it certainly does not look right, and it is not right. The rule demands a quorum of 20, and because there were not 20 members in the chamber the bill slipped through; and, to make sure that no one would raise any objection afterwards, a member asked for "unanimous consent that the clock now read five o'clock," when, in fact, it was only 4.10 p.m.

Those are the things that do not look well. I shall not go into it again, because Senator Everett explained the situation in such a splendid manner. To have it said, "Oh yes, 'Canada Day'—we got that on a lucky bounce," does not seem right. The Deputy Leader of the Government—who is an able person and one I like very much—is the last person in the world, it seems to me, who would bring this in with a certain amount of glee, saying, "We have this on a lucky bounce. We are not going to give it up again; we are going to stick to it. There were only 13 members present. Sure, there should have been 20, but no one objected at the time and it went through. And to make sure it went through, we adjourned the House." That does not sound like you, my friend. As far as I am aware, in the past you have not supported tactics of that sort.

I will not try to wax eloquent, but that situation hits me right on the nose, as I believe it does many other honourable senators. I beg of the Deputy Leader of the Government, for the sake of the reputation of Parliament, that he not proceed to a vote on this bill. We are likely to be here for only a couple of days. The subject can be raised next year, or at any time the Deputy Leader of the Government wishes, but let us have it dealt with in a proper manner.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am grateful to the honourable senator, who is an able person and one I like very much—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith:—for having raised this question.

Earlier today mention was made of dangerous procedure, and I am glad to have the opportunity to explain why I do not believe we should debate how the other place passed a bill. If we do, and it becomes a natural part of our procedure not only to look at the legislation that comes before us, not just to study the debate that took place—that is a different matter, and I believe it is relevant to study the interventions that are made in the other place—but also to criticize their procedure, to say that they did not proceed properly in bringing forward legislation, if we add that to the lexicon of parliamentary study—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith:—then, what will happen when we pass a bill, as we have done many times, with less than a quorum? At times an important bill has been passed with less than a quorum. Why? Because we were careless? Because we were negligent? Because we did not care about people? Because we did not care about the principle? No. There was a history as to why we gave second or third reading to a particular bill when less than a quorum was present. It was because we happened to know—which the press seldom gives us credit for—that before we had received the bill, in some cases under the chairmanship of Senator Hayden, we had studied its subject matter in committee for three, four, five, six or seven months; but, as far as the public was concerned and as far as the House of Commons was concerned—

Senator Marshall: They criticize us.

Senator Frith:—they could have said: “My goodness, look at those senators; what a careless, negligent bunch. This bill was sent to them and it came right back. There wasn’t even a quorum, yet they gave it second reading. Then it came up for third reading, and there wasn’t a quorum but they passed it. We can’t put up with that sort of thing. That won’t do. Any time the Senate sends a bill here, we have to be sure they had a full attendance, that everyone who was invited to the party came to the party”—which happened in the other place, because an invitation went out to everyone. It was mentioned in the caucuses. Everyone knew the “party”, was going to take place soon because they could see that the bill was nearing the top of the order paper. Are we going to decide that we have to study how the other place proceeded in passing legislation, and then give them a lecture on how to do it? If that is what we are going to do, then we will be adding to the volume of our work. I believe that course would be dangerous and unnecessary, because, then, when we send a Senate bill to the other place, they would adopt a similar approach. I consider that to be an unproductive and dangerous way to proceed.

I believe this is desirable legislation. I believe the people want it. I believe that many members of the other place want it, some who participated in the debate and some who did not. And I believe that many honourable senators want it.

That is why I do not believe that we should be embarking on this course. It sets the dangerous precedent of considering how legislation came to us, and of criticizing the other place and saying, “We shall deal only with certain legislation, namely, legislation that we believe is the subject of proper procedure in the other place.”

Honourable senators, let us look after legislation coming from the other place and our own legislation. Let us look after our own procedure, but let them look after theirs.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to clarify my position. I am sure that the Deputy Leader of the Government has no intention of placing me in any category other than the one I am in in relation to this bill.

The purpose of my earlier question, after the deputy leader had concluded his remarks, was to clarify one point that concerned me greatly, namely, the proposition that the government of the day strongly opposes—I believe those were his words—the amendment now before the Senate with respect to this bill.

In his presentation of the government’s position—I believe it was inherent in his remarks that it was not being made a government bill—the Deputy Leader of the Government went on to say that they did not want the bill to be returned to the other place with amendments.

I was questioning his argument on that, because the proposition that the government could strongly support a bill and yet not be answerable to the elected representatives of the people was not one that I could accept. However, my question had nothing to do with the internal procedure being followed by the other place. I would not wish to be included in the Deputy Leader of the Government’s current criticism.

My position is that I am opposed to the bill in its present form, although on an earlier occasion, and in other circumstances, I voted in the House of Commons for a similar bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can put the record straight on that. I understood that in his earlier intervention Senator McIlraith did have some criticism of the procedure followed in the other place. However, there is no doubt that the essence of his question today was not the procedure followed in the other place but the category in which one places a bill when the government supports a private member’s public bill—

Senator McIlraith: Exactly.

Senator Frith:—and also what the consequences will be if the government is against an amendment to the bill.

Senator McIlraith: Exactly.

Senator Frith: I understand what the honourable senator believes would be the consequences, and I tried my best to explain why I thought those consequences did not so flow. We disagree on that point, but I willingly verify that he was not raising the other point in his question.

Senator McIlraith: I am not seeking to deal with the internal procedures followed in the other place.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government is evidently a good lawyer—

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Marshall:—but he is forgetting the realities of life when he mentions that we are creating a dangerous precedent; that if we sent a Senate bill to the other place we would have to watch to see that the bill was sent forward in a correct manner. The realities of life are that this is the house of sober second thought; that if bad legislation comes to us that is not in the best interests of Canadians or for the protection of the rights of individuals or regions, then we are the ones who should be amending the legislation, sending it back, and saying, "Correct it".

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: If it is bad legislation.

Senator Marshall: This is bad legislation, so let us send it back.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would perhaps have to check how it appears in Hansard, but as I listened to the honourable senator today I agreed with every sentence, with every comma and with every period of Senator Marshall's.

● (1500)

What I thought the honourable senator said was that it is our duty to send back bad legislation, if we think it is necessary. But we do not think this is bad legislation: we think it is good legislation. The distinction that we cannot seem to get across is that there is a difference between bad legislation and what some people might think is a bad way to arrive at good legislation. We are saying that this legislation is good legislation, that we are in favour of it, and that we do not think it is up to the Senate, for example, to look into whether or not the procedures used in the other place were proper. If, for example, we were dealing with a motion for reconsideration of a bill in the Senate, which would require consent and so on, because the procedures we followed were not proper, then, of course, we could be critical of our own procedures. But when legislation, whether it be good or bad, comes to us, our job is to give it sober second thought, study, concern and improvement, not to give the other place lessons on procedure.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, may I ask a question, because I always find everything the Deputy Leader of the Government says very persuasive? Is it the government's position that it is clearly not adopting this bill, but it is clearly, in advance, rejecting any reasonable amendment?

[Senator McIlraith.]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it seems to me an irresistible corollary to the statement I made on the very first day the bill came before us and we were asked the government's position, that it wishes the bill, as passed by the House of Commons and now before the Senate, to be passed in its present form. It seems to me that I cannot avoid that corollary expressed by Senator Cook; namely, that that position means we would accordingly be against amendment.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I am seeking the direction of His Honour the Speaker. When I first spoke in this debate, it was before Senator Lang had moved his motion in amendment. I am wondering whether I have the right to speak on the amendment itself.

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes.

Senator Roblin: Before Senator Everett speaks, I have some unanswered questions I would like to put to my honourable friend the Deputy Leader of the Government. I hope Senator Everett will accept my apologies, but I would like to proceed with these questions before I lose the opportunity to do so.

Senator Everett: I have always enjoyed the thought of coming after Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: I shall not be speaking to the amendment, but shall be dealing with the points of order raised by the deputy leader, because some of them have some interesting consequences.

I am surprised to hear him say, as he appears to have said, that we cannot take into account what happened in the other place in considering what we must do here. When it comes to criticizing the procedure of the other place, however, my honourable friend may be on sounder ground because I do not want to criticize the procedure of the House of Commons, nor do I want the House of Commons to criticize the procedure of the Senate. But criticizing the procedure of the House of Commons is one thing, and explicating the facts of what happened in the House of Commons is another matter which is entirely different.

I think we are fully entitled to take into account the facts of what happened in the House of Commons when we receive a piece of legislation, even though I think we should restrain ourselves in criticizing the procedure they followed.

Senator Lamontagne: Okay, go on.

Senator Roblin: You are with me so far, and that is good. I do not understand why the deputy leader should feel inclined to say what he said and then proceed to defend the procedure in the House of Commons, which he did by referring to the two days' notice. I simply want to say, based on what I heard from some members of the House of Commons, that the two days' notice was entirely ineffective. I know that if someone posted on my bulletin board a bill with regard to holidays, I might not link it up with the Canada Day or Dominion Day holiday. In any case, the information I have is that that two days' notice was defective in many respects.

But I agree with my honourable friend, and I do not want to criticize the procedures in the other place. That is their business and we should restrain ourselves from criticizing on those grounds. But, the facts of what actually transpired are pertinent and germane. I think Senator McIlraith was quite right in raising the points he raised. I do not think we should allow this matter to be dealt with in this house accepting the obiter dictum of the Deputy Leader of the Government that we are therefore barred from considering the facts as to what happened. Perhaps he will say that that is not what he meant and, if so, I shall be satisfied.

With respect to the procedures that the deputy leader has laid down for us, he has told us that some time in the future the government intends to introduce a bill to amend this legislation. Will that be a government bill? I would ask the deputy leader to tell us, because I think it has some relevance to what we are being asked to do here today. It seems to me quite wrong that the government—having accepted the responsibility for voting for this bill in the house, as it says it is going to, and, therefore, accepting the responsibility for recommending to their supporters that they support this bill—should try to dodge the responsibility of seeing that it takes proper form. I do not see that it can and at the same time discharge its duty properly. I ask my honourable friend to explain why that should be the case.

Also, I say to the deputy leader, if he is so certain about his Gallup polls, and perhaps he is right—I am not going to dispute it because I think that might be the case—why is it that the Senate will not be allowed, as I take it from what he said, to send this matter to committee? Then we would hear those who wanted to talk to us about it, and if there was such overwhelming support for the bill we would have an opportunity to register that fact. I ask my honourable friend, if he has taken note of the several questions I have put to him, to give us an answer as to how we may expect to see this matter proceeded with in the near future.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I shall try. First, I shall deal with the question of procedure versus what actually took place. I do not think the honourable senator and I differ on that. There must be some misunderstanding, if he feels I think that senators are barred from discussing what took place in the other place. As far as I am concerned, they are not barred from discussing what took place; nor are they barred from discussing procedure. I just don't think it is a good idea, and I am expressing my views as to why.

It seems to me that the answer as to the procedure followed in the other place can be found in a very short passage in Commons Hansard, when the question of due process in the other place was raised for a ruling by the Speaker, and the Speaker ruled that everything that had taken place was in order. I do not think we should go behind that, because it was due process and the bill was properly passed.

On the question of adverting to what in fact did take place, I think Senator Roblin is right. It is not consistent for me to say that we should not go behind the due process ruling and then proceed to go behind it. I can only say in my defence that the reason I did so was because I felt that if other senators did want to go behind the due process followed, which they are not barred from doing, then they should know the facts, as I understand them, in terms of what took place and the notice that was given.

As far as the amendments are concerned, the government, in stating that it supports the adoption of this bill in its present form by the Senate, is taking the position that the bill is in proper form, that it is correct and effective legally, and that the consequential amendments that appear in the other bill and that appear to many to be desirable are really a matter of form rather than substance. The amendments are desirable, but not necessary, and, because they are desirable, the government felt that it ought to give an undertaking that those consequential amendments, for the sake of form and order, would be made.

On the matter of referring the bill to committee, the government—as a corollary to the fact that it would like the bill to receive Senate approval in its present form before we adjourn—does not feel that the bill should go to committee because it fears that the bill will not be adopted before the adjournment.

Senator Lamontagne: But that is for us to decide.

Senator Frith: That is for us to decide. All I am doing is indicating our wish. There is nothing to stop us from staying here all summer to debate the matter, if honourable senators are prepared to do so. But I am trying to be frank and simply say what the government's wish is, namely, that we support the bill. I am not suggesting any form of closure, because there is no such provision in our rules.

● (1510)

Senator Roblin: In connection with the matter of the committee, when this matter was raised before, the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that he would await second reading debate and then determine, after discussion with the Leader of the Opposition, whether it was appropriate to refer the bill to committee. May I ask the Leader of the Government whether those discussions have taken place?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Discussions have been held with the Leader of the Opposition on the subject, yes.

Senator Roblin: Well, Senator Flynn will be here tonight, and he can speak for himself.

Senator Marshall: If I understood the deputy leader correctly, he said that this bill would not go to committee. In other words, he is contradicting what he said before, that we should not question what happens in the other place. And yet here is the government saying, "Don't send it to committee, for fear that something will happen; we want it passed." So the government is not allowing us to take up our responsibilities, and the deputy leader is going along with that. It is a funny kind of justice.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not sure I clearly understood Senator Marshall's point, but I think he may have misunderstood what I said. I said that I thought it was reasonable for honourable senators to ask the government what its position is on various matters before the Senate. This is our position. I am not saying the bill will not go to committee. I am saying that the government thinks it is not desirable for the bill to go to committee, and it will ask honourable senators to support it in not referring the bill to committee. However, it is up to honourable senators to decide whether it should or should not be referred to committee.

Senator Marshall: Thank you.

Senator Roblin: Is the deputy leader then telling us that there will be a free vote on this matter? That is the inference I draw from what he has just said. Will there be a free vote on the government side with respect to this matter?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, my understanding is that all votes in the Senate are free votes, but I did want to make the government's position known to those who want to know and who might wish to support the government in this matter.

Senator Roblin: Has the government asked its members to support it on this vote?

Senator Marshall: Of course it has.

Senator Frith: Not in any way that all members of the Senate have not heard.

Senator Roblin: Yes, that is right, because we certainly heard it. Even before anyone had a chance to speak on this bill my honourable friend had laid down the law. Before this bill was even introduced in the Senate, he had told the Chamber what the outcome was to be—and a grosser insult to the independence of the members of this house I have seldom heard. Not during second reading, not during any other stage of the bill, but before the bill had even been introduced in the Chamber he laid down the law, and his words were quite clear:

The government is supporting that private member's bill and wants it passed in its present form before the summer adjournment. I wish that to be very clear and unambiguous. The government is supporting this private member's public bill and wishes it passed in its present form before the summer adjournment. I am not giving an opinion; I am making a statement of the government's position.

Well, nothing could be clearer than that. Even before we opened our mouths on the subject he had laid down the law, and the government members had better take heed that if they do not vote for this measure they will have to answer to the honourable leader of the house.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, my friend has made a neat rhetorical jump. Because we are so often accused of being ambiguous and not clear in our answers, I gave a clear, open and unambiguous statement—not an opinion—as to what the government's position was; but the jump from that to "laying down the law" is, in the first place, not logically sound, and, in the second place, is pragmatically and realistically fallacious.

Senator Everett is a Liberal senator. I cannot lay down any law to him. You heard what he had to say. Senator McIlraith is not exactly what you could call an NDPer. If anyone in this chamber has a history in the Liberal Party and in Liberal governments, it is Senator McIlraith, and he has been unambiguous and clear in his statement that he will vote against the bill.

There would appear to be two possibilities—either Senator Roblin is wrong in saying that I laid down the law, or it is obvious that I have no power to do so, because it is quite clear that not all members of the Liberal Party in this house will necessarily vote for this bill. A nice try, but I didn't make it.

Senator Roblin: Well, if my honourable friend is right, I am wrong; if I am right, he is wrong. We will just have to wait to see what happens. However, the natural conclusion of his little essay on the item of independence would be to declare a free vote. If he did that, then we would know if there was any pressure or if it was a matter of the genuine, uninstructed opinion of those taking part in the discussion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think my statement was clear and unambiguous. I hope it was. As I have said, in my opinion every honourable senator is just as free in this case as he is in every other case to draw his own inferences from the statements that have been made.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, although I may at the same time have something to say about the bill itself, I want to address my remarks to Senator Lang's amendment, which reads as follows:

That the Bill be not now read the second time but that it be amended by adding after subsection 2(2), the following new subsection:

"(3) Canada Day may also be called 'Dominion Day'".

As honourable senators are aware, I have already expressed my opposition to the passage of this bill. Although I should have liked to, I find that I just cannot vote for Senator Lang's amendment. I am not sure just what Senator Lang's strategy was in moving this amendment. Perhaps it was to neutralize the bill; but in my opinion, if the bill and the amendment were to pass, a great deal of confusion would follow with respect to what is, in fact, the name of a very important day in Canada. I find myself, therefore, in the position of not being able to support Senator Lang's amendment, although it is my intention still to vote against the bill.

The deputy leader has told us that the government had a "lucky bounce." Well, honourable senators, I am not certain that a change in name of this important holiday from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day" should be based on a lucky bounce.

He says that he does not want this bill to go back to the other place. What I do not understand about that position is that, if he can say that the Gallup poll, and the other polls that have been taken, indicate that the public overwhelmingly wants this bill, then why is he afraid to let it go back to the other place? Why is he talking about "lucky bounces"? If this change in name is so desired by the public, then let the government bring forward a bill and let it be passed in the normal way. Let us not fool around with "lucky bounces." Let us return it to the House of Commons and let the House of Commons properly debate the matter, taking evidence from the many organizations and people who have expressed concern about this change, and then let the bill come forward in the normal way.

The deputy leader says there was no trickery in the House of Commons. Well, that is very interesting, but I do not think it is important in the consideration of the bill. It is not a matter of whether there was or was not trickery. What is important is that the bill be properly considered.

He says that we should not criticize the procedure of the other place. Well, I think it is clear that the function of the Senate is to make sure that legislation from the other place has been properly considered, that it does represent the will of the public, and that it has gone through a proper process in the other place; and I think it is equally clear that, if it has not, we must refuse it and send it back to the other place.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): How would you do that?

Senator Everett: How would we do what?

Senator Flynn: How would you return the bill to the other place, as you are suggesting?

Senator Everett: All we need do is simply not pass it. It will then go off the Order Paper. The other place, if it chooses to, will then be in position to bring forward a bill and debate it in the proper way.

Senator Flynn: You mean the other bill.

Senator Everett: No, the other place.

Senator Flynn: But you mean the other bill, Bill C-37; not this bill.

● (1520)

Senator Everett: It could be the other bill; that would be perfectly valid. What is really important is that the bill receive proper consideration.

Hon. Charles McElman: Are you speaking to the amendment?

Senator Everett: I am speaking to the amendment and, as I said when I started, to the bill. I have already spoken to the bill—

Senator McElman: How many times will you speak on the bill without being granted permission?

Senator Everett: As many times as others have today.

Senator Walker: Be quiet!

Senator Everett: It seems to me that everyone has had an opportunity to speak on this several times. I will, if you wish, put my remarks in the form of questions to the deputy leader, as others have done. That is a clever ruse and one I am prepared to utilize.

Senator McElman: They were points of order.

Senator Everett: I do not think they were points of order. Their remarks formed substantive arguments, as far as I could tell. The answers the deputy leader gave sounded substantive to me as well, but I will put my remarks in the form of questions, if you wish.

Senator Roblin: Carry on.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on a point of order—and I do not think anyone wants to be too technical about it—speaking on an amendment frequently requires one, in order to speak fully to the amendment, to make reference to the motion itself. I think that that is quite in order, but Senator McElman's concern, perhaps, is that Senator Everett in this case started by saying, "I am against the amendment". Then he spoke to the amendment and said that he was not in favour of the amendment. He then seemed to start speaking on the motion again, which I suppose, technically speaking, he is not entitled to do having already spoken on it.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I am not raising any objection. You will notice that I did not raise a point of order, but what has gone on for the past three-quarters of an hour, I must say, leaves me beautifully confused. I wonder what has happened to the rule book. However, I am not objecting.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, why did my honourable friend, Senator McElman, zero in on Senator Everett? It seems to me that the other speakers on this legislation were obviously more out of order and contravening the rules than Senator Everett was.

Senator McElman: Senator Hicks, I am not zeroing in on Senator Everett at all. I am simply trying to find out how long, dear God, we will proceed without any reference to the rules.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in fairness to myself and other senators, what took place before took place as a result of questions being posed. I think that that was in order.

Senator Roblin: Yes, honourable senators, because when one receives an expanded answer, as we certainly received in some instances, one can certainly expect expanded questions. I think it is contrary to the spirit of this house that we should be too strict on this matter.

Senator Flynn: That is right.

Senator Roblin: There is a reasonable limit, and Senator McElman thinks we have gone beyond that limit—and perhaps he is right, and I am not going to debate that—but I am anxious to hear what Senator Everett has to say. I think that his remarks are perfectly in order.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Everett: I thought what I was listening to earlier was not so much questions on the matter. I thought, indeed, that the answers given by the deputy leader were so expanded on that we had got into a debate.

Senator Roblin: A Committee of the Whole.

Senator Everett: I think that indicates that this particular bill does concern people a great deal. That is why this situation has arisen.

If it is clear that in our judgment the other place has not properly considered this bill, we have the right to not pass it. If that were to happen, and the government wanted the bill passed, it could then re-introduce it, have it given proper consideration in full debate, and if the House of Commons passed it we could then consider it.

If that does not happen, then it seems to me that we should accept that obligation ourselves, and refer this bill to a Senate committee—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett:—where it can receive proper consideration.

What I just cannot understand—the thing that really bothers me—is this argument that we have had a lucky bounce. Changing the name of this most important holiday in Canada from “Dominion Day” to “Canada Day” is not a matter of lucky bounces.

Senator Frith: After 30 years?

Senator Everett: Personally, I do not care whether it is called “Canada Day” or “Dominion Day”. What I am concerned about is that the change not be based on lucky bounces, but on mature debate and public representations.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I want to confine my remarks strictly to the amendment.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, before Senator McIlraith proceeds, and since we have some breadth of movement within our rules today, may I put a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government at this point?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Cook: That’s out of order.

Senator McElman: It is out of order indeed; it is in the same category as the other questions put to the deputy leader by other honourable senators.

Senator Roblin: You should have spoken before.

Senator McElman: I have not spoken before, and I am not speaking to either the amendment or the bill. I may have the opportunity to do that later. If you wish to raise an objection, do so now, because I am about to put my question.

Senator Roblin: Go ahead.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, there is provision in our rules allowing us to rescind a decision taken by the Senate. There is also, very clearly, such provision in the rules of the other place. I understand that a point of order was raised in the House of Commons with respect to what happened on this bill, and that a decision was taken that what took place was in order. Since, under the rules of the other place, it is open to any member to move a motion to rescind third reading, to your knowledge, Mr. Deputy Leader, was any attempt made to rescind third reading or was it the wish of the members of the other place to leave things as they were?

Senator Roblin: The other place does not have that provision.

Senator McElman: Yes, they do. If you look at rule 47(2) of Rules of the Senate, you will see that we do. Of course, the House of Commons has the same provision as well.

Senator Flynn: I object to that question being put to the deputy leader. He has no more authority than anyone else to reply to that.

Senator McElman: I simply ask whether that occurred.

Senator Flynn: Why do you ask him? He is not the one to answer.

Senator McElman: That is as germane as the other questions put to him this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps, and if he thinks he has the authority to answer it, let him.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I suppose that depends on what we mean by the word “authority”. I did make reference in debate earlier this afternoon—before Senator Flynn came in—to some information I had as to what steps were actually taken in the other place. Perhaps that is the reason why the question was asked.

In any event, the answer to the question is very short. To my knowledge, no such motion was put.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

Senator Roblin: On the point raised, surely the deputy leader should tell us that there is no provision in the House of Commons to rescind decisions of the sort mentioned by Senator McElman. I do not believe the House of Commons has any power to rescind. If so, I would be glad to hear the authority. There may be that power in this house.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, if I may resume my remarks on the amendment to the bill. The amendment, I must say, caught me by surprise, but it seems to me that there is something in it in that it may alleviate the concern of some people who may be opposed to the change of the name of our national holiday to Canada Day. If there is something in the amendment, it deserves our attention, and acceptance or rejection on its merits.

That proposition is simple enough, but what really concerns me about the amendment, and caused me to rise today, were the remarks made by the Deputy Leader of the Government when he made it very clear that the government wants the Senate to pass this bill without amendment, but at the same time is not making it a government bill. He made himself quite clear on that point. Then he went on to his second point, saying that the government—he used a strong adverb qualifying the verb—wanted the Senate to pass this bill as is. He then dealt with the amendment and said that the government wanted us to reject the amendment, an amendment which was moved in this house and never raised or considered in the House of Commons. The reason he gave for appealing to all honourable senators to reject the amendment was that the government would not have it go before the House of Commons.

● (1530)

I do not accept the doctrine that a bill, which the government regards of such importance, should not go back to the House of Commons if we see fit to amend it. I will not accept the proposition that the government is unwilling to have a vote on an amendment if the result is that the bill will go back to the House of Commons.

I am still naive enough to believe that the bedrock of our system of government is that it is government by the people themselves, and, basically, it carries with it the proposition that the government of the day is always answerable to the people through their elected representatives. I will not vote for a proposition at the request of a government that is asking me to vote that way in order to prevent elected representatives in Parliament from dealing with this or any other measure that is of any importance. That is the proposition that arose in the discussion earlier this afternoon that I cannot accept.

I realize that that is not directly related to the bill itself. I believe it was Senator Argue who pointed out how I voted in 1946, I believe it was, for a change of the name of this great national day—a day that means so much to me and to all Canadians—from Dominion Day to Canada Day. My concern was earlier expressed when the bill first came here. I was careful not to discuss the details of internal procedure in the House of Commons.

The reason given for the government's asking us, and particularly those of us who are Liberals, to vote against the amendment, is not acceptable to me. I am a Liberal and I am proud of it. I have argued as a Liberal throughout my life, but the very basis of that liberalism was the constant answerability of a government to the elected representatives of the people for their actions. I am not willing to deviate from that. As I say, that necessarily means I will have to vote against the bill when it comes to a vote. I believe in the democratic process and the careful observance by governments of the conventions and traditions on which Parliament operates.

The Hon. the Speaker: There was a question put to the Deputy Leader of the Government by Senator Roblin as to whether or not he wanted to adjourn the debate until this evening. I am not sure that that question has been answered.

Senator Frith: I did say that I thought we should adjourn the debate until later this day in the name of Senator Asselin. The Order is for the resumption of the debate on the motion in amendment, and it stands in Senator Asselin's name. Senator Roblin—and Senator Flynn had told me earlier—said that Senator Asselin would yield. He did yield to me, and, as it turned out, to Senator Everett and Senator McIlraith. I think we should now ask that this Order stand until later this day in the name of Senator Asselin.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Williams, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-28, intituled: "An Act establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand. I have had one discussion with Senator Williams about it, and I want to discuss it further with him.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ROBLIN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before Question Period is called, I have two points of privilege I would like to be allowed to express.

The first is a personal one. Just before we rose, Senator McElman and I had a word or two together as to whether or not rescission is provided for in the rules of the other house, and I was quite sure it is not. However, Senator McElman was good enough to put me right on that point. He was able to point to the section in Beauchesne, which is to be found at page 157, which proves that he had the correct grasp of the situation. I should like to indicate my error in that respect.

The second question of privilege has to do with a comment made by the Leader of the Government this afternoon when we were in the midst of a reasonably heated exchange on the question of "Canada Day". He said several times that the Senate had moved second and third reading of bills with less than a quorum. It may be true that that has been done, but I must say that it has not been done in my experience. I consulted with those who are far more knowledgeable than I, such as my leader, and he could not recall any occasion when that had happened.

I do not want to be too precise or too nice on this point, but I really do not think that we have passed bills in this chamber without a quorum. If the Leader of the Government considers that I am wrong, then he should produce the evidence.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will check to see if I can.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You should have done that before making the assertion.

Senator Roblin: I consider it quite important. While I believe we have, quite properly, a self-denying rule here that we do not criticize the other place, at least we need not inculcate ourselves in a rather serious breach of the rules. Since the deputy leader's remarks will appear in Hansard, the small minority of Canadians who read it might come to the conclusion that we really were passing bills without a quorum in this chamber. I would appreciate it if my honourable friend would clarify the point, and if he finds that he has no evidence on the point, then it should be made clear for the record.

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators. I wish to make one small point. I do not believe it is in breach of the rules to pass bills, or to deal with business before the Senate, when numerically there is a lack of quorum, because under the rules we can proceed unless someone calls "Quorum". However, that does not change the main point raised by Senator Roblin, and I will check to find out if, in fact, we have ever moved second and third reading without a quorum.

Senator Flynn: Not in the past 20 years or so.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on this point it may be relevant for me to state that on the occasion in question, which has generated so much criticism of activities in the other place, Stanley Knowles was present. He has often been described by members of all parties as being a master of parliamentary rules and procedure and someone who has great respect for parliamentary tradition. Walter Baker, the house leader for the former Conservative government, was also present, as was Mark Rose, the chairman of the NDP national caucus. Are we really suggesting that those members have less respect for parliamentary tradition, and the way in which matters should be conducted in Parliament, than those of us in this chamber? It is rather significant.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I really must protest. That intervention was entirely uncalled for. No one in this house, in this interchange, at any rate, was criticizing the procedures in the House of Commons. This afternoon I particularly made the point that while we could take notice of what transpired there, we had no business casting reflections on their procedures, or on what they were doing, and I believe everyone in this chamber agreed with me. No one was criticizing what happened in the House of Commons, particularly in this interchange. What we are concerned about is our own conduct and whether in this house we have been in the habit of dealing with the second and third reading stages of bills without there being a quorum present. That is the point I wanted elucidated.

Senator Perrault: I want to make it clear that, of course, the honourable senator was not critical of the other place. However, many of his colleagues were, including Senator Marshall. But we can debate this later.

Senator Roblin: The point is, that is not the point of privilege I was raising, and I take exception to my honourable friend's dragging in that red herring to confuse the issue. It is a typical ploy so far as he is concerned, but I, for one, do not intend to let it pass without comment.

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, speaking on the point of privilege, I have been the whip of the party on this side of the house for approximately the past 18 years, and I have always been very careful to count the house when a bill has been passed. There have been a few times during the course of a debate when, for a few minutes, there might not have been a quorum until my opposite number brought members in, but never, in my recollection, have we given second or third reading to a bill without there being a quorum present.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am impressed by what Senator Macdonald has just said—

Hon. Jack Marshall: He is always right.

Senator Frith: I have never known him to be wrong. He is probably right in this case and, if he is, I owe the Senate an apology, and I fully intend to give it. However, I would first like to have an opportunity to check to see whether I was totally wrong.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Just 99 per cent.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate also apologize with respect to his remarks on the question of passing bills without a quorum?

Senator Frith: That is what we are talking about.

Senator Riley: I am asking if the Leader of the Government will also apologize.

Senator Perrault: I am not apologizing for anything. I never made any such statement. Therefore, why should I apologize to you or to anyone else? I made no such charge at any time. My remarks related to events in the other place and some statements which were made earlier by other members in the opposition party. So I have no apology to make to you or to anyone else.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: You are being nasty to a maritime senator, a great man.

An Hon. Senator: A Liberal!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RELOCATION OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the surprising move of the naval reserve headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Marshall: Many hodge-podge answers have been given in the other place. There could be some justification for the move, and I am wondering whether we can obtain some information as to that justification from the point of view of its being a strategic move, or from any other point of view, other than the fact that it has been done for a political purpose. Would the government leader explain whether there is justification for the move. There could be justification for part of the naval reserve to be in Quebec City.

I understand that recommendations were made by experts in the Department of National Defence that the proper course to follow would be to place two naval reserve units in Quebec City. Can we obtain clarification concerning justification for the move with a view to undoing the great harm that is being done across this country?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, apparently in recent hours the honourable senator has had an opportunity to survey opinion across the country and has enough evidence on hand to determine that great harm is being done by the announcement. It is true that Quebec City, as I have been advised this afternoon, has the largest navy cadet involvement of any community in Canada. That is a not insignificant consideration, but so far as the larger question is concerned, it will be taken as notice and a statement brought to the Senate.

Senator Marshall: I also spoke to Senator Langlois, who is the President of the Naval Cadet League of Canada and a most knowledgeable person. That is why I tempered my first reaction to the announcement with the comment that there might be some justification for the move. However, I believe it should be clarified once and for all, because if the country is being divided for no purpose, then someone should tell the Parliament of Canada in order that the public can know.

Hon. Eric Cook: It is being divided on the basis of language.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let us call a spade a spade—

Senator Cook: It is being divided on the basis of language.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator says it is being divided on the basis of language—

Senator Cook: Yes.

● (2010)

Senator Perrault: It is a classic case of: "Don't confuse me with the facts, my mind is made up." I would ask honourable senators to reserve their judgement until they get the facts and not start exchanging slogans suggesting that this action is divisive and doing great harm. It seems to me that at this particular time in our history, we should try to find ways to unite this country, rather than divide it. The honourable senator may do all the semaphoring he wishes—

Senator Cook: Blah, blah, blah!

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Ask the Haligonians.

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if there is to be no further attack upon the distinguished Senator Cook, I would like to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board if he now has the information for which I asked approximately one-half or one-third of a year ago about the veterinary college in the Atlantic region, which has brought such very fine statesmanship from the Atlantic premiers and which now awaits positive reaction from the federal government.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): I expect to have the information for the honourable senator tomorrow.

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is quite obvious that we should terminate this session as soon as possible, before the house catches fire, so I would appreciate it if the Deputy Leader of the Government would tell us about the situation concerning the summer adjournment. We know about Bill C-124, which will be passed tomorrow at 5.45 p.m., according to the order made in the other place. But what is the position with regard to Bill C-53? Is it coming to us after third reading in the other place or will it stay there?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the last information I have on that bill has clouded the screen again. We thought we had a pretty clear picture when I spoke to the leader of the opposition this morning by telephone, and reported to him what seemed to be at least a fairly readable screen though not necessarily a desirable one. However, the last I heard is that there is no longer an agreement in the other place respecting either Bill C-53 or what we might call that hived-off Bill C-blank, which I do not really understand but which I have heard spoken about. What I do understand is that the government has removed parts from the bill and put them into another bill which has not yet been numbered, in the hope that they can get agreement in the other place. The last word I have is that there is no agreement on anything. So there is a chance we might not get that bill at all.

If that is so, and if I can take this occasion to summarize what I understand to be the legislative picture, then the two bills the government would like to see dealt with before the adjournment are Bills C-201 and C-124.

Senator Flynn: Assuming that Bill C-53 does reach us, is it still the position of the government that the Senate will not be expected to deal with it before the summer adjournment, as was expressed to me earlier today by the deputy leader?

Senator Frith: Because of the fact that there is no longer any agreement, I have no information on the subject. From what I have just said, though, I think it is a reasonable inference to think in terms of what the Leader of the Opposition has just said.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I would like to clarify one point with the Deputy Leader of the Government. It is my understanding, until we know the exact situation, that we will proceed this evening with the study of the subject matter of Bill C-53 which we started this afternoon, as the Leader of the Opposition knows. We plan to continue tonight if that appears to be in order.

The acting chairman, Senator Stanbury, is not present in the chamber at the moment, and I just wanted some clarification on the committee's intention to go ahead this evening until we receive some word from the other place.

Senator Flynn: That is a different matter. I expressed my view in the committee this afternoon, that it is not very practical for dealing with such an important bill to have only a few meetings of the committee and then to pass it. In any event, the Senate was not expected to pass the bill before, let us say, a few days before we return in the fall for formal prorogation and the beginning of a new session. I expressed my reservations on the situation because I do not think the timing is proper. Only Senator Robichaud was eager and ready to deal with the bill in a few hours, and to have it passed in record time. I simply do not think it is the kind of bill that should be dealt with in this fashion.

My point is that I would like to be sure that the government's view, as expressed by the deputy leader this morning, is still that it does not expect the Senate to deal with Bill C-53 immediately before the summer adjournment.

Senator Frith: I simply cannot say, because I have not been told.

Senator Flynn: I was told by the deputy leader this morning that the government was not expecting us to deal with Bill C-53 at this time.

Senator Frith: I don't think I said that. I think I said that the government would be pleased if the bill did get—Senator Flynn: It would be pleased if it had passed last week.

Senator Frith: Precisely. As I understand the conversation, it was with regard to the technical difficulties in approving the bill which, in view of the importance of the bill, seemed, at that stage, insurmountable. I am not really trying to avoid anything; I just have not received anything since the change I mentioned a few moments ago.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I say that I had a discussion with the Minister of Justice this past weekend, and he stated that the government had received very strong representations from across the country expressing support for the measures proposed in the bill. He expressed the hope that the Senate, should negotiations proceed smoothly with the opposition in the House of Commons, would at least entertain the possibility of giving approval to the bill before the summer adjournment.

[Senator Frith.]

He said that he realized that the House of Commons had been deadlocked on this bill for over four months, and that it would be expecting a great deal of honourable senators to ask them to give their support to a measure after just a few hours of debate.

He stated, however—and perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will wish to check into this—that there was very positive support on the part of the Conservative opposition for early action by the Senate on this measure and mentioned, in particular, the name of Flora MacDonald. I merely convey this information to honourable senators as an accurate reflection of the discussion that we had. I am sure that honourable senators will agree that we have not been pressing the idea that the bill should be passed by tomorrow evening if it comes here tomorrow afternoon. We have not suggested that for a minute. There are representations abroad, in the land, from people of all political persuasion, suggesting that some of the measures in the bill are of such importance that they deserve early action.

Senator Flynn: I would like to remind the Leader of the Government that this bill has been under discussion for several months, if not years. I would like to check the date of the introduction of Bill C-53. To expect such a bill to go through this house in a few hours, I think is entirely unreasonable. That is my view, and I would like the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government to tell us that they will not press us to take such action. I do not think that we can do a proper job in that time. If the government is satisfied with our merely going through the bill as a matter of routine, then that is its business, but I will not be a party to such a process.

● (2020)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there seems to be a belief that, were the Senate to follow the normal procedure, committee hearings would be advertised in newspapers across the country, and could run to two or three weeks, before there was a report with recommendations and proposed amendments.

Senator Flynn: Is that something different?

Senator Perrault: No, I am just saying that that would be the normal process. I have discussed it with Senator Goldenberg, the chairman of the committee.

The Leader of the Opposition may wish to discuss with the leadership of his party in the other place just what their views are on the subject. Undoubtedly, we shall do the same.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, while listening to the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Government I have noted what I consider a wholesome change of mind and a change of strategy. That is an important change. Is there any hope that that attitude will carry over to Bill C-201 and that that bill will be referred to a committee, thus giving the people of Canada, particularly those essentially interested and widely informed, an opportunity of expressing their views? It seems to me that that would be a natural consequence of what has just been stated with reference to the other piece of legislation.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think Senator Frith expressed the view of the government extremely well this afternoon. Over the years we have been engaged in a prolonged discussion of this proposal. It is not something new; it is not exotic; it is not complicated; it is straightforward; the question and the issues are well known to the Canadian people in all provinces, who say they want this change to take place.

Some Hon. Senators: No, they do not. Not at all.

Senator Perrault: The view of the government is that the measure does not require a reference to committee. It is quite straightforward and representations have been made by many organizations. Therefore, that remains the position of the government.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, in the light of what the Leader of the Government has just said, I suggest—

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The subject matter of Bill C-201 will come up for debate in due course. Surely it is not a matter for debate in the Question Period. I find that incredible.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): That is quite right.

Senator Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I assert my right to ask questions of government members on matters relating to the procedures of this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: That is my role.

Senator Robichaud: The matter is coming up for debate.

Senator Macquarrie: I have the right to ask the question, and I ask it again.

The Hon. the Speaker: You may be entitled to put the question, but they are not obliged to answer.

Senator Macquarrie: Well, Mr. Speaker, they are certainly not entitled to interrupt me in my normal, proper, procedural practice of asking a question.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: I have heard about certain events which have caused certain alterations in government policy. It is not at all improper for me to ask in reference to another piece of government legislation, "Has there not been some change?" I am now making an inquiry which is combined with a reasonable, decent suggestion with respect to orderly procedure in this important chamber, the Senate of Canada, and I respectfully request an answer.

Senator Frith: No, honourable senators, there has not been a change. That is the answer.

Senator Macquarrie: All I can say is that it may be a long, hot summer.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. I believe he stated that Bill C-124 would likely clear the other place by some time tomorrow. Has he any idea of how that bill will progress through this house and through committee?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, I do have an idea. It will be up to the Senate to decide, but, recalling that the committee has done a pre-study of Bill C-124 and has reported with respect to that pre-study, I feel—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No, it has not presented a report.

Senator Frith: I thought it had presented a report. Is that not correct?

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: No, we have studied the subject matter of the bill, but the report is only tentatively ready. As we did with Bill C-125, we are holding the report until we receive the bill. Again, as we did with Bill C-125, we will report on the pre-study and the bill at the same time.

Senator Frith: Quite clearly, honourable senators, in that case, if it seems appropriate to the chairman of the committee and accords with the wishes of the Senate, we will refer the bill to the committee. It can then deal with Bill C-124 as it dealt with Bill C-125.

We will not receive the bill until 8 o'clock tomorrow evening. In that respect I am happy that Senator Everett raised the question as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, because it is now obvious that, if we follow the procedure of referring the bill to his committee and having it present a combined report on the subject matter and the bill tomorrow, it will be necessary for the committee to meet tomorrow evening.

Senator Everett: Well, honourable senators, I assumed that the matter would come before the Senate tomorrow evening, and would be debated tomorrow, and referred to the committee. Consequently, I have tentatively called a committee meeting for 9.30 Thursday morning. However, the committee can meet at another time if the bill is referred to it before then. It was our thought, however, that, if the bill were debated on Wednesday evening and referred to committee, the committee would consider it on Thursday morning with the President of the Treasury Board.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there was some hope in the other place that we could adjourn tomorrow evening. If the committee is not able to report the bill, or if we are not able to have all three readings tomorrow evening—and I can understand why that might be difficult—then clearly we will have to adopt Senator Everett's suggestion. We will not be able to complete our business by tomorrow night, because, as I have said, the government would like Bill C-124 assented to before the adjournment.

Of course, the various steps I have enumerated will require unanimous consent. If the bill comes to us tomorrow evening, and there is not unanimous consent, we will not be able to deal with it on second reading until Friday. If, in the light of the pre-study that has been done, however, and if the bill passes all three readings tomorrow evening, assuming we find a way of doing that consistent with the procedures described by Senator

Everett, then the intention is to have the House of Commons also sit tomorrow evening so that the bill can receive Royal Assent. If it turns out that that is not possible, then events will evolve as they must.

Senator Everett: I assume, then, that we will sit tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock, and that very likely we will be dealing with the bill. I did not mean to indicate that the decision to have the committee meet on Thursday morning was crystalized. I suppose, if the Senate gives leave, it is possible that the committee could meet tomorrow evening and deal with the bill at that time, having already done some pre-study on it.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is right, honourable senators. The reason we expect to sit tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock is that the order in the other house calls for a vote on Bill C-124 at a quarter to six. We expect to sit tomorrow evening in the hope that we will receive Bill C-124. We will then see what can be worked out.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RELOCATION OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, as a supplementary to the question asked by Senator Marshall, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if I understood correctly that he is prepared to make a statement tomorrow respecting the rationale behind the move of the Naval Reserve headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Minister of National Defence is being asked to provide a statement which can be brought to the chamber for the edification and information of honourable senators. That was the proposal.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be kind enough to ask the minister to include in his statement the total cost of that move? Could he also give the Senate some information on the strength and locations of the Naval Reserve units across Canada?

Senator Perrault: I will bring to the chamber as much information as possible. Certainly, there seems to be a misunderstanding on the part of some Canadians that this constitutes a relocation of Maritime Command (Eastern) to Quebec City. That is not the case.

An Hon. Senator: It is the first step. It is the thin end of the wedge.

• (2030)

Senator Perrault: That is not the case.

Senator Balfour: That is clearly understood across the country.

Senator Perrault: I hope that some of these questions are motivated entirely by an interest in national defence and not other issues, such as language and culture.

[Senator Frith.]

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Marshall: I should like to ask a supplementary question to Senator Macquarrie's question regarding Bill C-201. Did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that the government would not refer that bill to committee? If I heard him correctly, what is the basis for that reasoning?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I stated that, as far as the government is concerned, it sees no reason for referring that bill to committee.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Perrault: It is an uncomplicated bill; it is a straightforward bill; it has been debated extensively over a long period of time; and many groups have made representations on this subject over a 30-year period. It is not the kind of measure that requires the type of detailed scrutiny for which committees have been established. That is the view of the government.

Senator Marshall: The deputy leader indicated today that 70 per cent of the people were for the change—

Senator Perrault: Of those young people under 30 years of age, 80 per cent are in support of the measure; 70 per cent of the Canadian population generally, with a substantial majority in each of Canada's regions, are in support of the measure.

Senator Marshall: If the figure is 70 or 80 per cent, is it not right that the other 20 or 30 per cent—you might find it is the other way around—have the right to appear before a committee to make their views known? They had that right when we dealt with the Constitution. Everybody was allowed to appear before that committee.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I am shocked to hear that this is another gung-ho effort to push this thing through Parliament come hell or high water. First of all, they pulled this stunt when the house was nearly empty.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Oh, come on!

Senator Walker: Never mind "Oh, come on!". You come on! It would be a change if you did. You have not said anything intelligent over the past three years.

Senator Guay: On a point of order—

Senator Walker: You have always been a point of order.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I was in the House of Commons long enough to know that nobody called for a quorum of members of Parliament when similar bills were passed. I am also well aware of the fact that—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is your point of order?

Senator Guay: —Mr. Baker and Mr. Deans agreed that everything was in order and were in favour of the bill's being passed, yet we hear all this talk about the procedure being out of order. It was not out of order in any form, and I think you ought to know that that was the case.

Hon. C. William Doody: What is your point of order?

Senator Walker: That was the first thing. For a nice fellow you can really get angry, can't you? Secondly, when it got 13 votes the next order of business was to shut things up so that no further action could be taken. The final thing is happening now—we are being shut up.

You will hear about this for years to come because of the manner in which you have attempted to ram this thing through the Senate. It is simply incredible.

I have our first witness lined up, a great Liberal, Eugene Forsey.

Senator Guay: Oh, oh.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He is a Liberal no more. He quit the party.

Senator Walker: The government is not adhering to any rules of parliamentary procedure. Something as important as this should be referred to a committee.

You people are becoming quite arrogant in attempting to push this thing through, something you call an unimportant and simple piece of legislation. I can tell you that we are ready to produce any number of witnesses if the bill is referred to a committee. Our first witness will be thorough and will answer all of your questions and will bring you around to the realization that you are wrong. Perhaps that is why you do not want it to be referred to a committee. He is the most brilliant man you have on your side, and he is ready to appear before the committee at 9.30 tomorrow morning.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: He resigned from the party.

Senator Walker: Pardon me?

Senator Benidickson: He resigned from the party.

Senator Walker: Well, it is nice to see you here. How are you?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): What is the question?

Senator Walker: I do not think I should have to put the question.

Senator Frith: We are in Question Period.

Senator Walker: That is correct.

My question is, in view of the two very arrogant acts that happened in the other chamber, will you, in justice and fair play, which you believe in and which the Leader of the Government believes in, allow the committee to go into the intricate matters connected with this bill?

This matter may not be important to other people, but it is important to many of us who believe in this, and believe in it deeply. We do not mind losing this, but we hate to be pushed around and we hate to have you tell us that the bill cannot be referred to a committee.

So, would you please give this some consideration? You have lots of time to do so. We are ready to act at any time you suggest the committee proceed with its consideration of the bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I tried to make the position of the government on this matter clear this afternoon. I did not expect that everyone would agree with it, but I thought I made it clear that it is not the government's position that it cannot be referred to committee. That is not what I said, of course. If the Senate decides that the bill should be referred to committee, it will be referred to committee.

What I said this afternoon was simply that this is a chamber of debate and people have different views and opinions. We simply tried to make ours clear—at least, I tried to. Our position is as I explained this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to refer again to Bill C-124. Does the deputy leader know that the order in the other place is for the House to sit until 10 p.m. and that if at that time Bill C-124 has not passed in this place they will adjourn until Thursday afternoon? I just wonder if the deputy leader knows about that, and that because of that we might have to deal with the bill in two hours—

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Flynn: —if we want to adjourn tomorrow. Otherwise we will have to follow the scenario outlined by Senator Everett.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am aware of that. Of course, I only suggest that it is still possible for us to deal with it in that time because of the fact that the committee has conducted a pre-study. However, I think things will have to take their course. I should like to see a decision made on this tomorrow evening, and if it seems we cannot deal with it in that time, that is it. I am simply saying we should do our best, and if we cannot complete it, we cannot.

Senator Flynn: I think that we will have to have meetings during the day so that we can sort out the calendar.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A few moments ago he said that 80 per cent of young people under 30 are in favour of a change. Without asking him what 80 per cent of the old people under 30 are thinking, I would like to know—

Senator Frith: It is “young people”—comma—“under 30.”

Senator Nurgitz: —the source of those statistics and whether they were collected by a scientifically conducted poll.

Senator Perrault: They were collected by a scientific poll, a Gallup poll, in December 1981. The accuracy of the poll is within a four-point range—two points on either side.

Hon. Eric Cook: What was the question?

Senator Perrault: During the course of the debate, because we will have a debate, as Senator Robichaud has pointed out, I would be pleased to read the contents of the document into the record or have that done by one of the other participants in the debate. Seventy per cent of the population as a whole, and 80 per cent of the population under the age of 30, support this measure. Those over 50 provide most of the support for the retention of the words "Dominion Day."

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RELOCATION OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have been struggling to be recognized to ask a question relating to Senator Marshall's question on a supplementary asked by Senator Balfour. I understand the Minister of National Defence will be giving a statement tomorrow to clarify the government's position on the projected change for the Naval Reserve headquarters. Could the Leader of the Government tell us where he is going to make that statement? Will it be in the other place or elsewhere?

Hon. Eric Cook: In Quebec City.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Cook may feel that he is answering questions here this evening but—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Do you have a better answer?

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: He is doing pretty well.

Senator Perrault: I would appreciate the opportunity to be allowed to say a word or two.

Senator Cook: As long as it is only a word or two.

Senator Perrault: The Minister of National Defence is being asked to provide a statement which can be brought to this chamber for the information of honourable senators explaining the rationale for the move. This information has been requested. I understand a statement is to be made in the other place, and it will also be part of a public speech in one of the leading Canadian cities.

THE ECONOMY

EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We had almost forgotten him.

Hon. David Walker: I thought he had resigned.

Senator Bosa: I am flattered at the attention I am given by honourable senators opposite every time I rise to ask a question.

Hon. Martial Asselin: I didn't say a word this time.

Senator Bosa: I was referring to your colleagues.

[Senator Perrault.]

Could the minister inform the Senate as to what the trading rate of the Canadian dollar was today vis-à-vis the American dollar?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Can't you read the papers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sure that both Senator Bosa and Senator Murray would like to know about the fluctuations that have taken place respecting the Canadian dollar in the last few days. Certainly Senator Murray has displayed enormous curiosity about this subject.

Senator Flynn: Do you have a prepared reply?

Senator Olson: No. Yesterday the dollar fluctuated somewhat, and at one point it was at 80.11 cents U.S.

Some Hon. Senators: Hurrah!

Senator Asselin: What about today's rate?

Senator Olson: It closed at 79.96 cents U.S., so the dollar is currently about two cents higher than it was at the beginning of this month, after you take into account the fluctuations involved.

Hon. David Walker: You deserve a lot of credit for that.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The minister used to say that the decline of the Canadian dollar was due to the fact that the U.S. dollar was getting stronger. Will he admit now that the increase in the exchange rate of Canadian dollar is due to the fact that the U.S. dollar is weakening?

Senator Olson: The matter of weakening or strengthening is always relative to what it is measured against. If the Leader of the Opposition would like a serious reply to his questions, it is probably because there has been—

Senator Flynn: I would like to have it from someone else.

Senator Olson:—a reduction in interest rates in the United States.

ENERGY

GRANTING OF OFFSHORE OIL EXPLORATION PERMITS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he explain to us what the process is now for the awarding of offshore oil permits? I understand that the Government of Canada has seen fit to award arbitrarily a substantial group of permits worth a great deal of money without tender and without bidding. Could the minister give us an explanation on that as it does not seem to fit precisely within the terms of what is accepted as good business procedure for government at this stage?

Hon. Eric Cook: What about the Canadian embassy?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the procedures followed were quite proper and within the law. Any potential development of this kind is assessed on its own merit. I am sure the honourable senator is not suggesting any impropriety on the part of the government.

Senator Doody: The honourable senator was suggesting that it was being done properly to the extent that it was done within the law. It certainly was not done within good business practices and procedures. The fact that the minister has the right to arbitrarily award millions and millions of dollars' worth of contracts behind closed doors, and not let the taxpayers have a look at these procedures, may very well be within the limits of the law, but it certainly exposes the weaknesses of that particular law which were pointed out when it was passed by Parliament a short time ago. I am asking the minister if he will tell me if this is the sort of procedure that the Government of Canada is going to follow in its future distribution of largesse among the business community of Canada.

Senator Perrault: It is rather surprising that the honourable senator seems to adopt such a negative attitude with respect to this very exciting development. One would think the senator would rejoice over the prospect of a major development of this kind. The government exercised proper authority within the law, but I will ask the minister responsible for this decision for a statement which can be brought to the Senate for the appraisal of honourable senators.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable minister. I think it would be very healthy if that sort of thing were exposed. It would certainly take away a certain amount of bad taste that is in the mouths of the Canadian people and, particularly, the business community when they see that sort of thing going on.

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. C. William Doody: While I am on this particular subject, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development to tell us if he is yet ready to indulge in another bit of in-house legerdemain, namely, the report supplied to government by a group of consultants who arrived at the ridiculous price that the government agreed to pay for the shares of Petrofina. The question has been asked time and time again. The last time the minister brought in an answer he said it was proprietary information, and that it was not available to the public. After all, it was only the public's dollars that were being used and they had no right to know why those dollars were being used in that fashion.

I am asking the minister in the name of all that is just and fair in this society to produce for us the basis on which the decision was arrived at for the unholy price that was paid for these Petrofina shares.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, Senator Doody may not agree with the answers that are given. In fact, I would be surprised if he ever did agree with an answer that was given.

Senator Doody: I have not had an answer.

Senator Olson: Oh, yes, you have had an answer, and a very clear one at that.

Senator Doody: I had a refusal.

Senator Olson: I do not think I have anything to add to that answer at this time.

Senator Doody: As a supplementary, would it be fair to ask the minister if he absolutely refuses to justify the price that was paid for these shares, which it has been stated were as much as three or four times their market value at the time.

Hon. R. James Balfour: There is no possible way he can.

Senator Doody: The minister refuses to try to justify this absolutely disgraceful misuse of the public purse.

Senator Olson: That is the terminology that my honourable friend likes to use. The fact remains that the minister responsible has already given an explanation and, therefore, justified that. Whether my honourable friend accepts it or not is his business.

Senator Doody: The justification that the minister gave was that he refused to give any justification.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

NEWFOUNDLAND—SUBSIDIZATION OF FISHING INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, several months ago I asked if the minister could justify, or, at least, explain to the public, the policy of the Government of Canada regarding financial help for fish companies in the province of Newfoundland. A great deal of help was given to one individual company that was bailed out of an unfortunate situation which happened to be in a particular political or geographical location in Canada, and certainly in a political or geographical location in Newfoundland.

• (2050)

I would ask the minister to explain to me, so I can pass it on to my friends in Newfoundland, what the criterion is for such help. The minister undertook to try to find a public policy to that effect but, to date, I have not heard anything from him. Would the minister tell me now what the policy is for the bailing out of fish plants in trouble in Newfoundland?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I did give some of the reasons why the government undertook to assist financially not only one but, indeed, several fish plants in Newfoundland. If I gave an undertaking to come back with further details, I will look that up and see what undertaking I gave, and I will certainly reply.

However, it is completely unjustified for my honourable friend to make the kind of comments that he has made that no explanation was given as to the reasons why financial assistance was given, not only to one particular company but, indeed, to a number of other fish plants that are operational in Newfoundland now because of the federal government's action of about seven or eight months ago.

Senator Doody: The people who live in that area are forever grateful, but that has nothing whatever in common with the great many other plants which have problems in Newfoundland.

I asked for some common denominator so that we can explain to the people, and that has not been forthcoming. The honourable minister did come in with information. He told me about the ice conditions in that particular part of Newfoundland. Part of his information was accurate, and a lot of it was not. I forgive him for that because I do not expect him to know all that much about it. I do thank him for coming in with that geography lesson, but tell him that it was really superfluous.

Talking about the criteria for help for companies in trouble in Canada, how big does a company have to be before it qualifies? How deeply in trouble does it have to be? As an example, I would mention the international trucking company that was bailed out just a day or so ago. Is that the new standard? It does not necessarily have to be a resource company. Does it depend on the number of employees, or is it the size of the debt?

There are companies crumbling every day of the week in Canada, some of which do not have many employees. Some are large American companies, which might account for their problems. Many of them are confused and many of them need some guidance as to how they can approach government for help. What doors should be opened; how should they knock; should they knock at government's door, or should they go obliquely to some other corner of this country to try to find help? Perhaps the minister can explain the policy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my friend may be as confused as he appears to be, but I doubt that he is, in reality.

I gave a perfectly reasonable, logical and sensible explanation—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): If you say so.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Excellent too.

Senator Olson: —regarding one of the fish plants, namely, St. Anthony. I also gave him a further explanation of some financial assistance that had been offered, some months before that, to a number of other fish plants. All of that is logical, sensible, reasonable and, I think, in keeping with the responsibility of the government.

My honourable friend now tries to throw in other kinds of criteria that he may, in his convulsions, think are reasonable, but they do not fit in with the logic that we use.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

RUMOURED REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF STATE

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, the minister is making some pretty wild statements here this evening, particularly those where he is patting himself on the back. Perhaps honourable senators ought to buy him a machine that would do the job properly. Obviously, no one else in this chamber pats him on the back. Very few people in the chamber have use for him.

[Senator Olson.]

I would ask him a question which I have heard over and over again: Is it correct that he has been asked for his resignation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): No, honourable senators, I have never been asked for it by any responsible person, and that is one criterion that would be needed.

Senator Walker: I am not in a position to do so, or I would.

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question following upon the incisive interrogation by Senator Walker, who is much more brilliant in asking questions than I, as a non-lawyer, could ever be.

I would address my question to the deputy leader, for whose erudition I have the highest respect and to whom I listened with great care this afternoon when he referred to Bill C-201. In very simple terms, and paraphrasing the expression, "Something funny happened on the way to the forum..." I would ask him what has happened to a private member's public bill in the other place that now, in this chamber, has become so sacrosanct that we must pass it in due and proper form at the earliest date otherwise the nation will fall all to pieces.

Why is there some barrier in the democratic process to a decent inquiry through a Senate committee to hear people such as Senator Forsey and the people of Canada who feel strongly about the name given to this holiday? What is, in essence, the reason for this enormous hurry? Why should we have to rush in the summer heat to get this through?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to what I said earlier today as to why the government is asking that the bill be voted on, before the adjournment, in its present form without going to a committee. What I said was obviously unconvincing to some, but I can say nothing more.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am sorry to be among the unconvinced; we always feel that we are select. I am wondering if the honourable senator, who is a very brilliant man and at his best when he is not speaking for the government, if I may say so—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is a rare occasion.

Senator Frith: Since I am never allowed to, that is a pretty backhanded compliment.

Senator Macquarrie: —will realize the accommodation that is being asked of this place; it is enormous. It is quite sufficient to deal with many necessary bills rather than pushing, pushing and pushing a kind of unnecessary accommodation on a private member's bill. I would ask him to consider that.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, of course I will always consider anything that is suggested by Senator Macquarrie, but, obviously, at this stage we disagree. I do not think that what is being asked is enormous.

We started the debate by saying we wanted all honourable senators to have a chance to participate in the debate. We answered the question as to what our position is so far as referral to committee is concerned. I think it is clear, although it is obviously not persuasive to Senator Macquarrie and some other senators, that that is democracy. We are clear in our position, but I will consider what he has said. At the moment, I am as unpersuaded by what he has said as he is by what I have said.

Senator Macquarrie: I have asked my question because I think I recall emanations from the other side to the effect that public expressions would be entertained by a committee. If I am wrong in my understanding, I would ask the people across there to correct me.

Senator Frith: I do not think we ever said that. We said we were considering the question of committee and would want to hear debate on second reading, which we have heard. Having heard that, we made the statement that we made today. That is as far as we ever went on the question of a committee. We did not want to take a position until we had heard further debate, which we have. That is why, today, I tried to put forward our position as clearly as I could.

Senator Macquarrie: I appreciate what the honourable deputy leader is saying. He is a most excellent man. All I can say is that, as one who is very sensitive to the heat, July heat in Ottawa is far worse than August heat. We shall see what emanates.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. I wonder whether he could make a policy statement before the end of this session on the situation in Lebanon. It seems that the Canadian government's position is becoming increasingly unclear. Last week, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that our ambassador was free to leave or to stay, and now we have just heard yesterday that he has ordered the ambassador and his staff to leave West Beirut.

There seems to be a split in the Liberal caucus on recognizing the PLO. The Chairman of the External Affairs Committee of the House of Commons, Mr. Prud'homme, has risen several times in the House to ask the government to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization. So it would seem there is a split in the Liberal caucus. I would like to know what the Leader of the Government thinks about this and what his position is on this important issue.

I should also like to know what the government's position is on the withdrawal of the PLO guerillas to other countries.

I also would like to know whether the government is in favour of a peace-keeping force and which countries should be asked to participate. Should it consist exclusively of member countries of the United Nations or should only one country be responsible, as requested by the guerillas? In this case, France would be responsible for the peace-keeping activity or for this international position.

Finally, I think it is very important that the government should take a stand and inform us what its position is on this extremely important issue.

At a press conference, we were told by the minister that he could not take any sanctions against Israel because our allies were not doing so. However, I think it would be of interest to know the government's position before we adjourn for the summer recess, in order to avoid any confusion in this respect.

● (2100)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Asselin stated that he suspects that there is a split in the Liberal caucus. We are a democratic party and there are differences of opinion from time to time on a number of issues. We regard this as a strength rather than a weakness. As the Honourable Senator Olson has pointed out, such differences of opinion may tear other parties apart, whereas they tend to unite our party.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Only the power unites your party.

Senator Perrault: We find the comparing of diverse opinions a good process.

Senator Flynn: I would like to see your party after a few years in the opposition.

Senator Perrault: With respect to the closing of the Canadian embassy, the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that, on his instructions, the Canadian ambassador to Lebanon has closed the embassy office in West Beirut and has moved the remaining six Canada-based staff members to Junieh, which is a coastal town located 15 kilometres north of the capital. Dependents and non-essential Canadian staff members have been in Junieh since the early days of the crisis.

Although a ceasefire prevails at the moment and the area around the chancery has been relatively free from attack so far, conditions in the city have deteriorated substantially over the past week. The increased danger, along with difficult living conditions and increasing interruptions in communications, prompted the decision which was taken on the basis of reports from the ambassador and elsewhere.

The closing is only temporary and the embassy can and will reopen as soon as conditions improve. In the meantime, embassy personnel will be able to provide some services in Junieh.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs praised the work of the ambassador and his staff during the eight dangerous and difficult weeks of the Beirut crisis, and expressed the hope that the tragedy unfolding in Beirut would soon be brought to an end.

Honourable senators, as far as the policy of the Canadian government is concerned, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated that he has decided to protest the latest bombing again to Israel. He added:

I had left the decision to the ambassador as to whether or not he felt he should leave at any time. He did not exercise that discretion. But as a result of the heavy bombardment over the weekend and the fact that our staff there has been subjected to pressure for so long, plus the difficulties we are now having communicating with them—with electricity and other services unavailable, it was very difficult to get through—I felt that the time had now come to ask them to close the embassy in West Beirut and to operate as effectively as they can for the near future from the suburb of Jounieh.

Honourable senators, I have a statement with respect to the U.N. Security Council call for a ceasefire in Beirut. If honourable senators would like that information to be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings, I would be pleased to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The statement follows:)

Security Council resolution 516 unanimously adopted Sunday August 1, 1982 calls for a ceasefire in Beirut to be monitored by U.N. observers. No new U.N. military observers would be required. With the acceptance of the ceasefire by all parties involved, the U.N. Secretary General would propose to deploy U.N. military observers currently assigned to the U.N. Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO). UNTSO, established in 1948, is composed of approximately 300 officers, including 20 Canadians, drawn from 17 U.N. members. It cooperates with and assists other U.N. peacekeeping operations in the Middle East, specifically in southern Lebanon (UNIFIL) and on the Syrian Golan Heights (UNDOF), and has ten officers already serving in Beirut on the U.N. Israel/Lebanon Military Advisory Commission (UNILMAC) with other officers in Damascus and at its Headquarters in Jerusalem.

The Secretary General has the discretion to deploy UNTSO personnel to the Beirut area. As yet there is no indication that such a deployment will take place until the ceasefire has been accepted by all the parties, nor whether Canadian personnel would be involved.

Senator Perrault: We have received a report that a locally-engaged Lebanese employee of the embassy in Beirut has been killed. We have asked the ambassador to urgently pursue confirmation of this very sad news.

We fully support the Security Council resolution calling for an end to the blockade of West Beirut by the Israeli Defence Forces. We appeal to Israel to comply with this resolution and to take immediate action to allow the dispatch of emergency supplies to the civilian population of Beirut.

Honourable senators, I will be pleased to request a statement of the minister before the summer adjournment.

Senator Asselin: Could the minister tell us whether the Canadian government is ready to recognize the PLO, as has been urged many times by some members of the Liberal Party in the other place?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, no such decision has been taken and no such statement has been made. However, I will ask the minister to comment on that subject in the statement which I hope to bring to the Senate chamber.

The minister has said that he has seen the text of the statement on the results of the two-day meeting of the Ministerial Committee of the Arab Foreign Ministers Emergency Conference on the withdrawal of the Palestinian Forces from West Beirut. Such a statement seems promising.

The minister went on to say that he hoped that it represents a positive step toward the resolution of the problem in Lebanon. He will have to have more details on the six-point plan as well as the reaction of other parties before he can judge whether a breakthrough has taken place.

That is all the information I have, honourable senators, with respect to the situation.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can expound on the latest news report to the effect that the Canadian ambassador to Beirut, Mr. Theodore Arcand, will be returned to Canada shortly?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Mr. Arcand may be returning to Canada shortly. As some honourable senators are aware, he will be posted to Hungary in the near future as the new Canadian ambassador to that country.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—IMPACT OF MODIFICATIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Balfour on July 20 with respect to the financial impact of the modifications contained in the National Energy Program Update. Since it is a fairly long answer, and if the honourable senator is agreeable, I propose that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

With reference to a petroleum industry claim that benefits under provisions of the National Energy Program Update, announced on May 31, 1982, will be $600 million lower than the $2 billion federal government estimate, I can say that this difference is due almost entirely to the lower allowance made in the industry estimate for benefits that will become available as a result of the Small Producers' PGRT Exemption. An annual credit up to $250,000 against the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax (PGRT) liability of corporations, on their production revenue (as determined under Division 1 of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act) will be available.

The industry estimate cited was prepared by the Canadian Petroleum Association on an assumption that the eligible group of companies would number no more than 700. The federal government has data which indicate that companies eligible for the Small Producers' PGRT exemption would be at least double this number.

While it is difficult to be precise about the total number of taxpayers who are eligible and will take advantage of this exemption, nothing that industry has presented in support of its claim would indicate a more accurate way of estimating benefits available under the NEP Update in total than that employed by the government for its $2 billion estimate.

TRANSPORT

QUEBEC AIRPORT—STAFFING OF CONTROL TOWER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question which was asked by Senator Flynn on July 27 concerning the staffing of the control tower at the Quebec airport.

Senator Flynn was accurate in his description of the situation at the Quebec airport on Sunday, July 25, 1982. The situation occurred due to a misunderstanding. There was a shortage of overtime funds which consequently resulted in restrictions in air service for one day. The problem has been resolved, and will not recur in the future.

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)

CHANGE IN FORMAT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sorry to see that Senator Macquarrie is not present in the chamber because I have been eager to give him this information. He will, however, be able to read it in today's issue of Hansard.

On Thursday last, Senator Macquarrie asked whether the placement of the table of contents at the end of each daily issue of Debates of the Senate resulted from administrative absent-mindedness, some bureaucrat's dream of progress, or an attempt to save money.

I am informed that it results from none of those attributes; nor is it intended to be emulation of the practice of the House of Commons, although that may be its effect.

Its purpose is to facilitate the production of Hansard, and the earliest possible delivery of Hansard to senators' offices.

The table of contents cannot be completed until the typesetting and page make-up of the body of the Debates are finished. If it is to be placed at the beginning, no printing can commence until it is ready. By putting it at the end, the printing of the early pages can be commenced, while the typesetting of those that follow is proceeding. The longer the sitting of the Senate, the more evident this time-saving feature becomes.

Mr. Baker, the Editor of Debates, does not particularly like this change, but when it was suggested to him by officials of the Canadian Government Printing Bureau, he agreed to put it into effect for the balance of the session and await the reaction of senators. However, he stresses that, being a servant of the Senate, he will take directions from the Senate.

In addition, Mr. Baker points out that since this practice was adopted on July 20, Senate Hansard, in both English and French, has been delivered by approximately 10 o'clock a.m.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I would like to point out, honourable senators, that Senator Macquarrie was present in the chamber just a few moments ago.

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, I am aware of that.

HOLIDAYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Bird for the second reading of Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act, and on the motion in amendment thereto of Senator Lang.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would much rather speak to the main motion. I think that we are now debating the amendment motion and if I were to speak to the main motion now, I would be out of order. I think I will let the Senate vote on the amendment motion and I will speak to the main motion later on, with leave of the Senate, of course.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not know what will happen after the vote on the amendment motion; we will see then. But if the Senate agrees at this time not to proceed in such a way as to prevent the senator from speaking—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think that Senator Asselin is relinquishing the floor to Senator Lang on the amendment motion. If no one wants to pursue the debate on the amendment, the Speaker will put the question and Senator Asselin will continue the debate once we have disposed of the motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): For your information, honourable senators, I spoke to Senator Lang and told him that the vote on the amendment will probably be held this evening. In his absence, therefore, we should not propose something of which he is not aware.

Senator Flynn: He is aware.

Senator Frith: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., that this bill be read the second time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bell, that this bill be not now read the second time, but that it be amended by adding after subsection 2(2), the following new subsection:

"(3) Canada Day may also be called 'Dominion Day'."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: The amendment is defeated, on division.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the main motion?

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, on several occasions I hesitated to seek the floor on this bill because, in my mind, it stirs too much emotion and sentimentality. But, since so much significance has been given to this bill, it would be difficult for a Quebecer who has always fought for Canadian symbols to remain silent. That is why I will tell you very briefly what I think about it.

Not unlike other senators who have spoken in this house, I did not like the way the bill was introduced and adopted in the other place. I was a member of the House of Commons for 12 years and I think it is exceptional that a bill of whatever importance be adopted in such a short time, but that is not our responsibility. It is the responsibility of members of the other place and they have made their decision. Whether they had a quorum or not is none of our business. Here we have to decide if we are to accept this bill as it is or amend it and send it back to the other place. I was not here this afternoon when the Deputy Leader of the Government spoke, but apparently he gave the impression that this private bill adopted by the other place would somehow become a government bill since the government, through its spokesmen here, has decided to support the principle of the bill as drafted.

[Senator Frith.]

I respect those who are against the bill and I accept the reasons they gave in this house. It would seem that the word "dominion" has, for some of our colleagues, a historic past which must not be forgotten, which must be preserved. For them, it represents a historic tradition and they cannot live in a country which is renewing itself without that word being in our statutes.

I respect their views and I can understand that in certain regions of Canada the disappearance of that word has an extremely significant connotation. We should not forget that the expression "Canada Day" has, in other regions of Canada, an equally significant connotation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: How can we reconcile viewpoints which are different but not contradictory? Of course, certain senators will do that until the end of the debate.

We have been told that the word "Dominion" recalls our historical past, as I said earlier. However, if this can reassure my colleagues who would otherwise oppose this bill, they have to remember that if the government does not correct the irregularities next year by introducing an omnibus bill, and as long as it does not do so, the word "Dominion" will remain in our statutes. The only thing that will change is that the designation "Dominion Day" will be changed to "Canada Day". This is all that will happen.

The word "Dominion" which appears in our new Canadian Constitution will not be changed if this bill is passed, it will remain there, and I emphasize that as long as the government does not introduce a bill in the other place to correct the irregularities contained in our statutes, the word "Dominion" will be included in our laws.

Therefore, we should not say that the word "Dominion" will completely disappear from our statutes. It will simply disappear as far as the designation of our national holiday is concerned. As for me, I do not care to recall a whole historical past involving the word "Dominion"; as you did yourself, I studied the history of Canada. During the recess last year, I read about the beginnings of Confederation under Macdonald, and I would much rather look to the future and think about the great social, economic and political potential of our country. I am much more interested in the future of my country than in its past. I believe that, in the last year and a half, we have undertaken the renewal of the very fabric of our country and that, in the last few years, we have attempted to redefine the sovereignty of our country by adopting purely Canadian symbols. This is a matter of national pride. It is not a matter of past history; we have to look to the future and see how we must rebuild, remake and renew the very structure of our country. Someone said this evening, and I agree, that the young generation of Canadians would prefer the designation "Canada Day". I do not think I would be wrong in saying that over 80 per cent of young people in Quebec applaud this change and I would not be surprised if the proportion of young English-speaking Canadians who support this change were nearly as high. As I said at the very beginning, there are still those a bit older who remember our historical past and want to preserve it, but this generation should also think that what they are now doing for Canada, they are doing for the young people because our own generation is on the way out. We are building for those who will come after us.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: We are not in any hurry to go.

● (2120)

Senator Asselin: Senator Lamontagne says that we are not in any hurry. We are certainly not!

No one is in a hurry to go, but I believe that our efforts and our work to renew our country are aimed at the young generation, in which this country puts all its hopes. Young people support these initiatives enthusiastically in my opinion, and I am convinced—

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Agreed.

Senator Asselin: I am convinced that they will applaud the decision of the Senate if we agree to this designation. I also wonder why the Senate should not innovate in this area. We would perhaps greatly disappoint our young people if we voted against this bill and let it die in some way, either by amending it or by referring it to the other place. I believe that this would simply postpone its passage. I was among those who voted against the principle of patriation, but not because I was against the fact that this document should come back from England and finally become a Canadian document. I objected mainly to the way the government tried to get patriation of the Constitution passed unilaterally. I opposed patriation in that particular regard because I felt, like many other Canadians, that the government should patriate that constitutional document only with the unanimous agreement of the provinces.

I fought against the unilateral aspect of patriation, just as I fought for all those symbols: patriation of the Constitution, bilingualism, simultaneous interpretation in the other place. With regard to the latter, I fought precisely because I wanted anglophones and francophones to be able to communicate with each other. I remember the days when I was a young MP in the House of Commons. In 1957 or 1958, when the fellows from Quebec first came to the House of Commons, they had a hard time expressing themselves in English. There was no simultaneous interpretation in those days, and we could not communicate with our English speaking colleagues.

Through the initiative of our party, simultaneous translation was set up thus bringing both founding groups closer. I think that both groups which make up this country, the English-speaking and the French-speaking were proud about that. I was proud then and I am still today when I see that we are proceeding a little further in our quest for political autonomy. I think that Canada Day, as it appears in the bill, provides another indication, as it is the climax of our gratitude for having achieved our political autonomy.

I feel that Canada Day is a new extension of that achievement. Those who voted for it should do it again and those who voted for patriation of the Constitution should continue to accept those changes of symbols to be better Canadians. They will be demonstrating their judgment by voting for the bill and trying to be consistent.

Today at a business meeting attended by the members of a board of directors, I met people from Toronto and Quebec City. At such meetings, businessmen often ask us what goes on in Parliament these days. I told them that the debate on that symbol was carried on in the Senate. I can tell you quite frankly that several were quite surprised because they thought that such an extended debate would only delay the passage of the bill under consideration. They would have been surely less surprised, if we had been dealing with budgetary matters for weeks.

It is a fact that our country's structures are still being questioned, but because of the deep-rooted differences which still exist between anglophones and francophones, we should avail ourselves of every opportunity to demonstrate to French-speaking Canadians that there is room for them in this country. It is through these symbols that we will be able to say to them: Here, come with us, there is room for you and you can get along with your English-speaking fellow Canadians.

I think that we should follow the lead of those who, through their actions, are trying to make this country more Canadian, by accepting symbols such as the one we find in this bill, in order to further develop among our fellow Canadians the notion of Canadian pride and nationalism which I feel are the cornerstone of Canadian unity.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): First, honourable senators, may I ask if, in the meantime, other honourable senators would like to take part in the debate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Certainly.

Senator Frith: As Senator Murray has proposed the adjournment, I wonder if he would give other honourable senators who would like to take part in this debate the opportunity to do so.

Senator Flynn: There are none.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

[English]

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, this bill profoundly disturbs and angers me. I want it to be recorded that I approve the principle of the bill—that is, “Canada Day”—however, I shall vote against its passage in the Senate because I firmly believe that the method of its passage in the other house was improper, undemocratic and unworthy of the respect that Canadian citizens should hold for Canada Day.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: My active participation in the celebration of the centennial of Canadian Confederation in 1967, and subsequently in the celebrations of Canada's birthday on July 1, has convinced me that the large majority of Canadians favour “Canada Day”.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: Personally I consider that "Confederation Day" would be more appropriate, because on July 1, 1867, Canada was founded as a Confederation of the first Canadian provinces with the B.N.A. Act as the Constitution of the new nation.

Having been a member of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Centenary Council in 1965 and 1967, a member of the National Board of Canada's Birthday Celebrations in 1979 and 1980, and President of the Canadian Folk Arts Council since 1975, a national body representing the founding peoples as well as the other ethnic groups of our country in cultural activities, whose administrative expenses are financed by the federal government, I believe that I have a good knowledge of the attitude of Canadians in this sphere.

I should state that I have participated as an organizer of many of the events of those celebrations in all of the provinces, and often as a speaker in the provincial capitals on July 1. Three years ago I spoke at the celebration of Canada's birthday in St. John's, Newfoundland, on July 2, since July 1 in Newfoundland has been designated and is celebrated as Memorial Day.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (2130)

Senator Yuzyk: For several years these birthday celebrations were held under the name of Canada Week, culminating in the celebration of July 1, the highlight. Never has Canada Day or Dominion Day been officially mentioned, as the leaders were conscious that this matter must be decided by the Parliament of Canada. However, in conversations with many of the hundreds of performing groups across the country and in the local press and media, Canada Day was often mentioned, while Dominion Day was sometimes mentioned in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Furthermore, Dominion Day is not meaningfully translatable in French, the Slavic languages and other Canadian languages.

My assessment, based on experience, is that the consensus in Canada favours Canada Day, most notably in Quebec and the western provinces. This is confirmed by the Gallup poll of November 7, 1981, which showed that 70 per cent of the population prefers Canada Day and 23 per cent Dominion Day, with 7 per cent undecided. By mother-tongue, 63 per cent of the English prefer Canada Day and 31 per cent Dominion Day; of the Francophones, 85 per cent prefer Canada Day and only 6 per cent Dominion Day, with 10 per cent undecided; and of the other Canadian languages, 73 per cent chose Canada Day and 22 per cent Dominion Day, with 5 per cent undecided. It is obvious that Canadians want Canada Day, which should be applied to Canada's birthday celebrations on July 1, 1983.

I believe that Canada Day does reflect our nationhood and the high ideals of freedom, democracy, unity and peace as well as the most worthy aspirations of our bilingual and multicultural nation. The enthusiastic spirit of loyalty and brotherhood and, for that matter, sisterhood, that is manifested in the celebrations of Canada's birthday on July 1 is proof that Canadians love their country and support the unity of all segments of the population. To make this important day more vital for all Canadians it is absolutely necessary that parliamentarians of both houses who represent them should enact the legislation with an overwhelming majority in both houses, as was done with the Official Languages Act in 1970, the resolution on multiculturalism in 1971, and the Constitution Act this year.

Honourable senators, we all know how Bill C-201 was introduced, processed and passed in the House of Commons last July 9. A private member's bill, with the backing of the government, in the late afternoon when only 13 of the 282 members were present, which is much less than the quorum of 20, was rammed through second reading, the committee of the whole house, and third reading in a few minutes—perhaps the fastest passage of a bill in the history of Parliament. This is certainly an item for the Guinness Book of Records. What a mockery of democracy! I cannot understand how a government, which pays at least lip-service to democracy, would condone this devious ploy and support this as a public bill. How can manipulations of the government foster the confidence of the citizens in the celebration of Canada Day?

Senator Perrault: Manipulations of the government—garbage.

Senator Yuzyk: How can citizens have confidence in the elected house?

If the Senate passes this bill, it will mean that we shall be condoning a devious, undemocratic method in the legislative process. It will also mean that a stigma will be forever attached to Canada Day. In the name of sincere, honest, law-abiding Canadian citizens, I protest in strongest terms this undemocratic method of legislating.

I appeal to honourable senators to rise above party considerations and, in the best interests of the Canadian people, defeat Bill C-201. Let us remember that the government has a much better bill on the Order Paper. Bill C-37, which would make Canada Day official, should be brought forward, if not in this session then in the next, as there is plenty of time. Debate would be allowed in the other house, and presentations from the public would be made in committee. I believe that such a bill would be passed by a large majority in both houses of Parliament. The large majority of Canadians would then be happy that Canada Day was achieved according to the best democratic traditions.

Canada Day should be the pride and joy of all Canadians of every origin. I would, therefore, like to see Parliament enact legislation in the normal way, and thus ensure that the celebration of our national day is held as a great manifestation of our love of country and Canadian unity.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Did I understand the Leader of the Government in the Senate to characterize some of the remarks of my colleague, Senator Yuzyk, as "garbage"?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I may make a contribution to this debate tomorrow.

Senator Balfour: Were those your words?

Senator Perrault: I do not believe that many of the sentiments expressed by Senator Yuzyk accord with the facts, and they are not high quality parliamentary merchandise.

Senator Balfour: Did you use the expression "garbage"?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Is that unparliamentary? I tried to have "baloney" withdrawn once, but I lost.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): "Baloney" is parliamentary.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I did not intend to participate in this debate tonight, but I am prompted to do so by some of the comments that were made. I want to say, first of all—and I think it was pointed out by my colleague, Senator Doody, and perhaps by others—that as I interpret the reaction in Newfoundland, the people there are not too concerned with this matter, either one way or the other. The reason, of course, is that July 1 has always been of great significance to Newfoundlanders, a day of great sorrow and grief and, at the same time, commemoration.

The grief and sorrow goes back to July 1, 1916, the opening day in the two greatest battles in the long and sad history of human warfare. It was in the early morning of July 1, 1916 that the Newfoundland Regiment, which opened the battle, was annihilated, and I am using my words judiciously. Every home in Newfoundland lost either a relative or a friend, and from that day to the present July 1 has been a day of mourning and of commemoration to all Newfoundlanders.

Having said that, I will add—and I am sure once again that I speak for most Newfoundlanders—that we will be only too happy to be included in that vast number of Canadians who will, if this bill is adopted by this chamber, commemorate July 1 as a day of celebration, a day of joining together of all Canadians, whether they live in Newfoundland or the Yukon.

While I hesitate to tread into this field, there is another point I would like to make. I have been a life-long student of history, but I do not pose as a constitutional expert. It seems to me, however, to extrapolate from what Senator Yuzyk has just said—and others have made the point, too—that we may be on pretty dangerous and slippery ground if we take it upon ourselves to dictate to the other place or admonish them for their behaviour. We can hardly tell them what methods to follow in dealing with legislation. It is hardly appropriate for us to suggest to the House of Commons that they should have had more than a quarter of their number present when the bill was passed, or that they should have spent more time deliberating rather than passing the bill in such short order. Can we take it upon ourselves to suggest to them that they should have spent two weeks on that bill? That is the inference I draw from what has been said.

Personally, I resent that kind of criticism when it is made about this place. I don't like hearing members of the other house expressing criticism, in some cases even ridicule, of the actions we take here. My reaction to that sort of thing has always been: "Look! Mind your own business. We will look after ours here." I think that has to work both ways.

As I say, I can't speak as an expert on this matter, but, frankly, I do not see how we can take it upon ourselves to tell the members of the other place how they should handle any particular piece of legislation. It is none of my business how the House of Commons handles a piece of legislation. Presumably it is satisfied with this bill because it has taken no further action. It is not my place to tell the members there that there should have been more representation; that they should not have passed the bill in the way they did; that they did it in a sneaky way, or that they took advantage of the situation. I don't believe I have that right. By extension, I do not believe any senator, or the Senate collectively, has the right to admonish the House of Commons in that way.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, fears have been expressed by a number of senators about the diminishing of our heritage and, in particular, the loosening of our ties with the old country. I am proud to say I come from Newfoundland, and that at one time we were the most "British" people in the world. Ninety-nine per cent of our people were of Anglo-Saxon and Celtic descent. They were either born in Britain or they were descended from British stock—English, Welsh, Irish and Scottish. I believe, today, Newfoundland is still the most "British" place in the world in that context. Our British descendency is something in the order of 96 per cent. Despite all that, I do not believe for one moment that changing the name from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day" will affect the heritage of those people one iota. I cannot see its lessening, for example, Senator Doody's interest or concern in his Irish heritage. It certainly won't affect my interest or concern in my English heritage.

I believe what I have said about Senator Doody and myself applies equally to all Newfoundlanders, and, again by extrapolation, I think I can say the same about all of Canada. I believe in the long run this change of name will have a unifying effect.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment of the Senate, I would remind you that we would like to have a vote on this motion tomorrow. Obviously, we do not give notices of votes in this house, because the Senate itself decides when it will have a vote. We hope that there will be many interventions in the debate tomorrow. Certainly, anyone who wishes to speak should do so.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

REPLY TO STATEMENT BY SENATOR ROBLIN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before Question Period is called, I should like to speak to a question of privilege raised yesterday by Senator Roblin on a statement I made during an intervention on the Holidays Bill. I said that we have "often"—I believe that is the word I used—given bills second or third reading with less than a quorum.

If you will indulge me by way of a prelude to what I have to say, honourable senators, I should like to tell a story about H.L. Mencken, who was known as "the sage of Baltimore." I am sure that many of you will remember that he was a bit of a cynic.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: A "bit" of a cynic?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is a bit of an understatement. For example, Mr. Mencken was the author of the statement that no one has ever lost a nickel underestimating the taste of the American people. He was also a great agnostic and believed that one could never know whether there was a God. On this topic someone once asked him, "H.L., supposing that when you die the first thing you see in front of you is Jesus and the twelve apostles, what will you say then?" He replied, "I will say, 'Gentlemen, I was wrong.'"

Well, honourable senators, I was wrong. For one thing, there is no way to prove whether I was right or wrong, and that is what made me so wrong. Since there is no record as to whether or not there was a quorum at that particular stage, there is no way that I could know whether we have passed legislation under such circumstances. There is further concrete evidence to prove that I was wrong, and that is Senator Flynn's general recollection and Senator Macdonald's specific recollection that they always count for a quorum at the time of a vote, though not necessarily during a debate.

Hon. Jack Marshall: But he may not count right.

Senator Frith: I hope, honourable senators, that when you re-read my intervention and strike out the part that says "We often give second and third reading without a quorum" you will find that there remains some force in the argument I advanced at that time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

RESTRICTIONS IMPOSED BY HUMAN RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government, but I am not quite sure how to word it.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Try.

Senator Molson: I shall wait until Senator McElman has asked his question.

Hon. David Walker: McElman, pay attention!

Senator Molson: I hate to call Senator McElman to order because yesterday he called us to order with great effect.

● (1410)

Hon. Charles McElman: I apologize. I thought you were speaking to the government leader.

Senator Molson: I was, but I think the deputy leader also has to receive a bit of the fallout from these questions.

As I said a moment ago, I am not quite sure how to ask this question. I think I should ask the Leader of the Government whether it has come to the attention of the government that problems have been created by the Canadian Human Rights Act which we passed in 1977. In my opinion, that act has created some difficulties, and I should like to say why I am raising this question.

When I was overseas with the RCAF during the war, there were 26 members in my squadron. There are now six survivors. The other day I received a letter from a former air force person, a pilot in New Zealand, who wanted to know the names of the survivors of our squadron. I replied with a friendly letter, and sent him the names and addresses of five of those survivors. The address of the sixth I was not able to send because I did not know it, but I told him I would find out and send the information to him.

In the light of that I tried to obtain the one remaining name and address from the records of the RCAF. I found that those records are now in the archives. I called the archives and was told that they could not give me any address because that would be an invasion of privacy under the Canadian Human Rights Act. I told them that this would not really invade this chap's privacy, because I simply wanted to get in touch with him for a good and valid reason. They replied that they were very sorry, but they could not give me his address without his consent. "How," I asked them, "can I possibly get in touch with this old friend of mine?" They told me to write him a letter and they would send it on to him, and they repeated "But unless he gives his permission, we cannot give you his address."

Well, honourable senators, I could hardly ask his permission if I didn't have his address, and did not know how to get in touch with him. It occurred to me that the air force records might be located somewhere else, so I called the minister's office and recounted the history I have just related of trying to find this ex-officer, who, incidentally, was in the permanent force for about 25 or 30 years. The minister's office looked into the situation and then gave me the same answer: To give me the address of a wartime member of my unit, which I wanted for a quite legitimate purpose, would be an invasion of privacy.

Honourable senators, if that is a consequence of our having passed legislation such as this, then I think we may be running into serious trouble. The result is so far out, so far beyond anything reasonable, as to imply a sort of police state attitude.

My question is: Has any trouble of this sort been reported to the government? Is there any trouble contemplated? Have any representations been made to the government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have not previously been made aware of this particular type of problem. The question will be taken as notice, and further information will be obtained.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to respond now to a question I was asked yesterday concerning Lebanon. I have received two pieces of information bearing today's date.

On August 3, acting on the instructions of the U.N. Secretary General, ten observers with the U.N. Troop Supervision Organization, known as UNTSO, were deployed to West Beirut. They have established the U.N. Observer Group, Beirut, UNOGB, as authorized under Security Council resolution 516 of August 1, which called for a ceasefire to be monitored by U.N. observers. Additional UNTSO observers will be sent to West Beirut as conditions permit.

Following a meeting which was held early on August 4, the President of the Security Council indicated that the council approved of the action taken by the Secretary General and called on all parties to accept resolution 516.

To date, Lebanese and PLO authorities have done so and have agreed to co-operate fully with the UN observers.

Israel has yet to make a decision on this issue, which is expected to be considered at an Israeli cabinet meeting scheduled for tomorrow.

● (1415)

While Canada has 20 officers serving with the 300-man UNTSO, none has yet been deployed to the Beirut area. This could occur at any time as the Secretary General has discretion to deploy UNTSO personnel as he sees fit. Recognizing the dangers of the situation in Beirut, Canada has confidence that the U.N. in deploying its observers, possibly including Canadians, will try to minimize any risks they may face in carrying out their duties.

Honourable senators, it has unfortunately been confirmed that Mrs. Rima Dagher, a Lebanese immigration program officer at the Canadian embassy in Beirut, was killed on August 2. Mrs. Dagher and a friend were struck down by unknown assailants from a passing vehicle while driving in a car after a family dinner at a restaurant about 10 p.m.. The tragic incident took place not too far from the United States embassy.

No motive has been established, but there is no reason to believe that there was any connection between the killing and Mrs. Dagher's employment at the Canadian embassy. The funeral was held August 3. The ambassador has personally conveyed the minister's sympathy to Mrs. Dagher's husband.

Although Mrs. Dagher had only been with the embassy since last September, she was a highly valued employee.

Technically, the embassy in West Beirut is still functioning because another local Lebanese employee elected to stay behind and continued to work in the information office. We have not had contact with this employee since yesterday, and we have no way of knowing whether she, in fact, has been at the office. The reason could very well be safety, because the most recent bombardments have hit buildings only ten yards from the Canadian chancery.

Fighting at the crossing points between East and West Beirut seem to have prevented any exit from West Beirut for the time being.

The general situation in Lebanon is that the Israelis are in Lebanon in violation of the United Nations Security Council Resolutions, which Canada supports.

As far as the current situation goes, we have received reports that the Israelis started an advance today at dawn, Lebanese time. There are no further details at this time because of the closing of the Canadian embassy in Beirut.

Canada does not recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization as a state. However, Canada accepts that the PLO is a group which represents some Palestinians. We have contact with the PLO from time to time as we think is useful.

On the point Senator Asselin made concerning the evacuation of the Fedayien from West Beirut, it is not our position to comment. We do support the efforts of U.S. Special Envoy Philip Habib to arrive at solutions to the conflict and bring peace to the area.

Insofar as a multinational force is concerned, again it is not for Canada to say whether such a force should be composed of one or several countries. We have stated, however, that we would consider participating in a United Nations sponsored peacekeeping force acceptable to all parties in the dispute, but we are not interested in making up part of an ad hoc force.

We continue to believe that sanctions against Israel would not be an effective way of resolving the dispute.

Canada has not been involved in the negotiating or peace-making process, but we have had official contact with both sides.

We contacted the PLO for clarification of Mr. Arafat's statement concerning the U.N. Resolutions, and we have had official contact with Israel to protest the bombing of our ambassador's residence in Beirut and, as honourable senators know, the general bombing of Beirut itself and the harassment of our diplomats.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PERSONNEL— PURCHASE OF F-18A AIRCRAFT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to a question posed by Senator Marshall on July 27 concerning accommodation for Canadian Forces personnel, I have received a letter from my colleague the Minister of National Defence. The minister states:

This is further to the questions from Senator Marshall in the Senate on 27 July 1982 concerning accommodation for Canadian Forces (CF) personnel in Ottawa and the purchase of CF-18 aircraft.

CANADIAN FORCES—ACCOMMODATION FOR PERSONNEL

Currently, there is no accommodation allowance for Ottawa and area. It has been below national average until recently. However, in the last little while the average cost for Ottawa has crept up and the national average has gone down slightly thus giving ground for a possible consideration for accommodation allowance.

The following initiatives are implemented when personnel are posted to Ottawa:

(1) An officer from the organization to which the individual is posted is appointed to provide direct liaison in regard to accommodation hunting;

● (1420)

(2) a list of available accommodation from personnel posted out of Ottawa is kept for reference;

(3) personnel are encouraged to make direct liaison;

(4) listings from nationally represented real estate companies are made available and are brought into contact with personnel posted into Ottawa;

(5) the individual is given the opportunity for a paid house hunting trip into the Ottawa area; and

(6) posting dates are generally finalized only after the individual and his family have confirmation of accommodation.

Honourable senators, the reply is much longer than that, and I suggest that the remainder be taken as read.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, in that reply is there any information available regarding initiatives taken by anyone to provide accommodation, to provide an apartment building or any such accommodation?

Senator Perrault: There is the possibility of adjournment for the summer recess this evening and we are awaiting a message with respect to our negotiations, so perhaps I should read the complete answer.

The letter continues:

There are 750 Married Quarters (MQs) in the Ottawa area. However, by far the largest majority in these quarters are other ranks (mostly of lower rank, i.e. privates, corporals, etc.).

There appears to be little problem for personnel to find suitable accommodation in the Ottawa area and this is best illustrated by the relatively short interim lodging requirement in Ottawa. Under regulations, personnel and their families have an entitlement of being paid up to 21 days interim lodging (hotels and meals). Any additional interim lodging has to be applied for. In Ottawa, this 21 day interim lodging period is seldom exceeded.

CF-18 AIRCRAFT PURCHASE

The Government of Canada is firm in its determination to re-equip the Canadian Forces with the modern weapons systems necessary to maintain Canada's domestic and international defence commitments into the 21st century. The acquisition by the Canadian Government of the CF-18, the world's most advanced fighter aircraft, is clear testimony to that on-going commitment.

On 10 April 1980, when the Government of Canada gave its approval for the CF-18 programme, the Department of National Defence embarked on the largest single military project in Canada's history. The program has been a total success. Not only is Canada obtaining one of the best possible aircraft available in the world today, but we are doing so both on schedule and within the Treasury Board approved budget. Furthermore, the project has already brought to Canada a wealth of economic benefits. It has provided work for approximately 5,900 skilled people in Canadian industry, and has resulted in significant transfers of important technology to Canadian business. To date, the performance of McDonnell Douglas in terms of the level of direct industrial benefit accruing to the Canadian economy has exceeded contractual obligations.

It is without question the world's most advanced fighter aircraft of its class; a state-of-the-art machine that will perform the many roles that Canada requires of a fighter aircraft—sovereignty protection, the interception of manned bombers and tactical operations with our NATO allies. When selecting this aircraft, our first concern was, of course, to give the best to our pilots and to assure their security. I am confident that the sophistication of the CF-18 is their best life insurance policy. By providing our pilots with the best means available to defend themselves; through that superiority, we may well deter others from possible aggression.

We know that this aircraft will provide that superiority because the CF-18 has been subjected to and passed the most vigorous flight-test regime of any aircraft ever built. It has been matched up against a variety of other aircraft in simulated combat exercises and has performed extremely well.

Clearly, the recent news that the Spanish Cabinet of Ministers have approved the recommendation of the Defence Council of Spain to purchase 84 F-18's, combined with the fact that the Australians have ordered 75, and that the US Navy has reaffirmed its order for 1,366, supports not only the enthusiasm of our pilots but also our initial decision. Canada is, more than ever, pleased with its choice in this aircraft.

I remain confident that both Canada and the United States will continue to profit from this historic undertaking, that will enable the Canadian Armed Forces to contribute more effectively to our national security and to the collective defence of the NATO alliance and of NORAD.

The CF-18 will be key to Canada's defence and security network in the years ahead. Together with our other improvements in equipment and capabilities, the Canadian Forces will be ready to meet its challenge.

The letter is signed by the Honourable J. Gilles Lamontagne, Minister of National Defence.

• (1425)

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I do not want to belabour the point, but I should like to revert to the question of accommodation for the Canadian Forces.

The leader has provided us with much information, but I am still concerned about the housing arrangements that have been made for troops when they move into the Ottawa area. Has any initiative been taken by the minister responsible for housing, or the Department of National Defence, to attract suitable accommodation, since there is a shortage of that type of shelter for the troops? Is anything in the works? If the Leader of the Government cannot provide an answer today, perhaps he would take the question as notice.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice, since I have not been provided with that specific information.

RELOCATION OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I asked the Minister of National Defence to provide information about the Halifax to Quebec City move of certain naval facilities. I have just received a letter from the minister in this regard, which I should like to read into the record. The letter states:

My dear Colleague:

It is my understanding that you were questioned by Senators Marshall, Balfour and Phillips with regard to my announcement that the Headquarters for the Naval Reserve would be relocated from Halifax to Quebec City.

Proportionally, the number of francophones in the Navy is lower than within our population as a whole and, indeed, within the Canadian Forces. The percentage of francophones in the Canadian Forces as a whole is 26.5 per cent. Within the Navy only 13.8 per cent of the lower ranks are francophones, and among officers it is even lower, where only 9.7 per cent are francophones. The Navy attributes this situation, in large part, to a lack of opportunity for francophone members to live and serve, at least for part of their careers, in a truly francophone environment.

The Navy has long recognized the difficulties which are imposed by geography in providing opportunities for its members to live in a truly francophone environment. Given the Department's ever limited resources and the geographic and seasonal limitation which would be imposed by stationing operational ships in the Province of Quebec, there has been considerable difficulty in developing meaningful initiatives.

The Naval Reserve Headquarters, which is responsible for the co-ordination and control of naval reserve training across Canada, is a unit within Maritime Command which can be relocated with fewer implications than other units. In fact, the Naval Reserve Headquarters were located in Hamilton from 1953-57, Ottawa 1957-70, Halifax 1970-82 and now Quebec City.

It has been in four different locations. The letter goes on to state:

The relocation to Quebec City will significantly increase the Naval presence in Quebec and will hopefully result in an increase in the francophone participation rate. Initially the move will be co-ordinated by a project team of nine which will ensure the smooth phasing-in of the Headquarters by August of 1983. At present, the staff complement of the Naval Reserve Headquarters is 42: 13 officers, 17 NCOs and 12 civilians. It is not anticipated that these numbers will increase.

The project team will be concerned with establishing the Headquarters and determining their site location, organizational structure, and support requirements. Unfortunately, until these requirements are defined it is impossible to determine the actual cost of implementing this decision. In terms of staff salaries, however, the transfer of Naval Reserve Headquarters will bring approximately 42 personnel to Quebec City, with total salaries estimated at over $625,000 annually.

There has been criticism that in this time of restraint this move is unnecessary. Well, I am unable to accept that the measures which we have been talking about "don't really need to be done"—the navy tells me, the Chief of Defence Staff tells me, and I fully agree, that this sort of initiative is long overdue.

The recommendation came from the Chief of Defence Staff himself and the navy. The letter further states:

Yes, the Government and the Department of National Defence are exercising fiscal restraint but one must realize that as with any organization, if changes which need to be made are not made in a timely manner then stagnation follows. It is the future of the navy and the Armed Forces that is at stake and unless we find ways of attracting and retaining sufficient recruits from across the entire Canadian population then that future may be in jeopardy. I believe that the measures which we have been talking about are sensible, necessary and are long overdue.

I trust that this information will assist you in responding to Senators Marshall, Balfour and Phillips and I hope that you will continue to rely on my co-operation, whenever possible, in the future.

Honourable senators, I have now quoted the two letters I have received from the Minister of National Defence.

● (1430)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question arising out of the statement that was just read by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I must say that I am surprised that a decision of this nature was taken without any consideration having been given to the cost involved. Officials in the Department of National Defence have advised me that the minimum cost will be about $30 million. Would the minister advise us if the approval of Cabinet was requested before the decision was announced?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not wish to comment on the amount of $30 million, except to say that I think it is an excessive estimate. I have asked for the figures, as can be seen from the letter wherein it states that it is impossible to determine the actual cost of implementing this decision. I feel certain that the $30 million figure is grossly inaccurate, but we will see how the numbers develop.

In answer to the other question, of course a decision of that kind has Cabinet support.

Senator Phillips: I have a further supplementary question, honourable senators. Has a decision been taken on the transfer of the three frigates to Quebec City?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no information on that point.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—ISRAELI INVASION—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, in the minister's reply to Senator Asselin's excellent questions with respect to Lebanon, I noted his saying that the Canadian government would be maintaining contact with the PLO. Having seen Ambassador Arcand on the television last evening, and having observed how very shaken he was by having to move, I was prompted to think that he believed that Canada has an important role to play in these matters.

I think it is significant that, years before Mr. Andrew Young was dismissed from his post, our then Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated to a committee that there was nothing to prevent our personnel from discussing matters with members of the PLO, who were then moving into the U.N. as observers. Perhaps future historians will think it strange that Mr. Habib, as he seeks a solution to the Palestinian problem, travels to Cairo, to Syria, to London and everywhere else, but will not spend the half-hour to travel to meet the PLO in Lebanon.

I am wondering if the move of our distinguished ambassador in any way militates against the policy which has been established for many years by the Canadian government, that policy being predicated upon the idea that to discuss things with people and to recognize countries does not imply moral approval, but simply indicates a reasonable, pragmatic means of obtaining information and, possibly, of influencing events. In that policy, of course, Canadians differ from the Americans, who often have the Wilsonian idea that recognition implies approval.

I would hope that this conceivably important role for Canada might not be lost because of the recent events in Lebanon. I believe that many people are now convinced that the Palestinians and the Israelis must ultimately recognize each other. I notice that the distinguished Canadian, Edgar Bronfman, the president of the World Jewish Congress, made that statement not long ago. I repeat that I hope Canada will not lose her capacity to do something toward that end.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I know that all honourable senators appreciate the suggestions advanced by Senator Macquarrie, who has had a long period of distinguished service in matters of foreign affairs. It would be made infinitely easier for Canada and many other nations to talk to the PLO leadership freely and openly if the PLO would make a firm pronouncement now that it does recognize the right of Israel to exist within secure boundaries and frontiers.

● (1435)

The statement that arose out of the meeting with the congressmen the other day, when analyzed, does not constitute a basic change in PLO policy, as I stated the other day in the Senate. If Mr. Arafat and the PLO leadership would say, "Yes, we realize the need for Israel to live within secure frontiers," that would make it possible for a whole new range of negotiations to open up. Canada has been pressing for this for a long time. Other nations should at this time exert even more pressure in that direction. Such pressure may well trigger a favourable response from Israel itself, with the result that a new peace process may begin.

Senator Macquarrie: In that connection, honourable senators, I presume it is our government's view that the recognition would be a mutual process.

Senator Perrault: Yes. The ideal situation would involve recognition by Israel of the Palestinian right to exist on the West Bank and in Gaza, in a state, an area, a jurisdiction, of their own; and in return for that, as the Honourable Senator Macquarrie has stated, the right of Israel to feel that it has the recognized right to secure frontiers would be acknowledged. That has been the entire thrust of the Canadian initiative.

LAW OF THE SEA TREATY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while we are on delayed answers, the leader will recall that I asked him a question a few weeks ago with regard to the United States position on the Law of the Sea Conference, and the reasons why they did not sign the treaty. I wonder if he has any up-dated information in this regard, especially in view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has had discussions with Mr. George Shultz, the new United States Secretary of State. I should also like to hear more about the difficulties with regard to the east coast fishing boundaries.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not yet received any detailed memorandum from the Secretary of State for External Affairs following his meeting with Mr. Shultz. Consequently, I do not have any information on that point, and the question will be taken as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RELOCATION OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS FROM HALIFAX TO QUEBEC CITY

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to revert to what the Leader of the Government in the Senate had to say on the transfer of the Naval Reserve headquarters to Quebec City. Can the minister tell us whether the Cabinet, or the minister, or the Prime Minister, has yet given any consideration to what function of the navy will next be moved to Quebec?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Well, honourable senators, I do not believe that the question was asked in any serious spirit. Again, it is that kind of question, with that kind of anti-Quebec edge to it, that is a tactic used, unfortunately, in some parts of this country. There are moves made from point to point in this country, all the time. Some moves are made—

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege. I object to having it said of me that I am in any sense anti-Quebec. I represent the constituency of Halifax, and I am pro-Halifax. I would be as much concerned if they had moved the Naval Reserve headquarters to Toronto, or Victoria, or anywhere else in Canada. I am not anti-Quebec. Of all the senators I am perhaps as much pro-Quebec as anyone you can find who is not a francophone. I wish to have those words, to the effect that I am evincing anti-Quebec sentiment, withdrawn.

Senator Perrault: It would have been helpful, honourable senators, if the senator had framed his question differently and had asked what facilities will be moved to another province.

Senator Donahoe: I referred to the fact that Quebec is the province to which the facility in question has been moved, and it therefore seemed logical to me that, if Quebec is the right place to put one function, it would be the right place to put another, in some minds.

Senator Perrault: Information will be provided, as it becomes available, about possible moves of any government department, anywhere in the country, whatever the province. As far as the general question is concerned, decisions will continue to be made, assessing moves not on a geographical basis but on the basis of whether such moves clearly serve the national interest.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government has taken note of the strong criticism of the transfer of Naval Reserve headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City expressed by the Leader of the Nova Scotia Liberal Party, Mr. A. M. Cameron. He stated, in particular, that one does not build up the economy in one part of the country by robbing another part of the country of such a facility.

● (1440)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we all have to be careful about criticism of various industries or government departments locating in certain provinces. The province of Nova Scotia, for example, has been the recipient of hundreds of millions of dollars of government aid in the process of establishing a tire factory there. That was a good move for Canada. Other provinces might have asked, "Why is Nova Scotia being favoured over other provinces? Why is a grant being made to the Michelin Tire Company there?", and so on. But that was clearly in the national interest.

Grants are made to other provinces for worthwhile endeavours, including the province of New Brunswick. The province of Newfoundland has received millions of dollars, and other provinces could well say, "This is favouritism on the part of the government; it is unfair."

So, let us keep things in perspective. If we want to get into this game of attacking a government decision every time one is made, on the basis of some hidden motive or reason, that somehow it is a political boondoggle or there is a racist or language reason, we are in a losing proposition, and I would appeal to honourable senators to refrain from doing it.

AIR CANADA

CANCELLATION OF SCHEDULED FLIGHTS

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, on July 21 I asked the Leader of the Government a question concerning the cancelling of scheduled flights by Air Canada. I wonder whether he has yet had an opportunity to obtain an answer.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I replied to a question on Air Canada a few days ago, which gave some information from the Minister of Transport to the effect that certain flights had to be cancelled from time to time for economic reasons. I do not believe that, as yet, I have a specific reply to the question asked by the honourable senator, but in the official record there is an answer with reference to scheduling, to which the honourable senator may wish to refer.

Senator Everett: May I take that as an answer to my question, or is the Leader of the Government intending to provide me with further details?

Senator Perrault: The reply is still under preparation.

Senator Everett: I am wondering what happens about questions which remain unanswered when we adjourn, for instance, for the summer. The replies cannot be given to the Senate. Are they mailed to senators?

Hon. Jack Marshall: They die on the Order Paper.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is anticipated that at some point in time we shall adjourn for the summer recess. However, the session will not come to an end this week. It is possible that we shall be back at some date in October, if certain conversations and negotiations succeed, and it is hoped that many of the replies can be prepared during the coming weeks and can be available later in the fall.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

RESTRICTIONS IMPOSED BY HUMAN RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government concerning my earlier question on the application of the Canadian Human Rights Act—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The Privacy Act.

Senator Molson: —and I thank my friend, the deputy leader, for the suggestion.

In view of the fact that the adjournment appears imminent and that there will then be a fair hiatus before we resume, if any information becomes available to the Leader of the Government I wonder if he could communicate it to me and not wait for his formal reply to the Senate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I would certainly agree to that suggestion. I would similarly agree with Senator Everett's request that he be given information as soon as possible on Air Canada's schedules. Any material that becomes available will be sent to honourable senators. We are avidly in pursuit of the freedom of information concept.

[Senator Everett.]

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on March 25, 1981, regarding the location of the veterinary college in Atlantic Canada. I am prepared to request that it be taken as read, and I am also prepared to read it into the record.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question pertaining to this matter. Could the minister at least tell us if the federal government is now prepared to put up its contribution so that this project can go ahead?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, perhaps I should read the reply, which is not particularly long, rather than give my interpretation of what it says.

Honourable senators, the provinces of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have agreed on Charlottetown as the site for the proposed Veterinary and Aqua Marine Centre. Regrettably, it has taken them a long time to agree on a location for the college. The federal government had money committed for the project but those funds could not be held indefinitely while the provinces were unable to agree on a location. But there is finally agreement on Charlottetown as the site, which incidentally was the site recommended by the independent Howell Report. This project is a necessary addition to the agricultural industry in Atlantic Canada and it is imperative that this co-operative venture proceed.

I have been informed by the Minister of Agriculture that he is awaiting a commitment from the Government of Nova Scotia to indicate that it agrees to the same terms and financial support of the project as Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

The Minister of Agriculture communicated his position to the Premier of Nova Scotia last week and I quote from his letter:

What I need from your Government is that you will agree to the same terms and financial support as Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Surely you can't expect me to give preference to your province financially over Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick . . . While no funds are currently committed I will seek funding for 50 per cent of the capital costs of the facility after I have received your agreement as outlined above.

It is up to Nova Scotia to accept its financing responsibilities so that this project can proceed without any further delays.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I hope there will be no protest from other honourable senators that this facility is being located, at some cost to the federal government, in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Don't be too provocative.

GRAIN

VOMITOXIN CONTAMINATION OF 1981 ONTARIO AND QUEBEC
WINTER WHEAT CROPS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Haidasz on June 30, 1982, on the use of the pesticide captan. I ask that the reply be taken as read.

(The answer follows:)

I am advised by officials in the Department of Agriculture that captan is not used to control the fusarium fungi which produce vomitoxin. However, captan is being used for other purposes in Canada and elsewhere. It is used extensively worldwide to protect crops from various disease organisms, particularly fruit crops.

AIR CANADA

CANCELLATION OF SCHEDULED FLIGHTS

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, may I return to my question to the Leader of the Government concerning an answer to my earlier question regarding Air Canada's scheduling? We shall shortly be in recess until approximately October 25. The reply I seek is not a complicated one. Given that an answer could be received within the next week, I wonder if it would be possible to have it mailed to senators?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, while the honourable senator was out of the chamber for a brief period, I undertook precisely that commitment, to send the information to the honourable senator as soon as it was received.

Senator Everett: I apologize for being out of the chamber. I was trying to arrange a committee for later this afternoon.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), I move:

That notwithstanding any Rule of the Senate, the following Bills be disposed of as follows:—

1. That if the debate on any stage of the Bill C-124, intituled: "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada" has not been disposed of before nine-thirty o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, 4th August, 1982, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and all questions necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the said Bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

2. That if the Bill C-201, intituled: "An Act to amend the Holidays Act" is committed to the Standing

Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, it be an instruction of this House that the Bill be reported back to the Senate on Monday, 25th October, 1982, and that not later than six o'clock p.m. on that day, any proceedings before the Senate shall be interrupted and all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said Bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

3. That if the proposed Bill, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof" is committed to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, it be an instruction of this House that the Bill be reported back to the Senate on Monday, 25th October, 1982, and that not later than six o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, 26th October, 1982, any proceedings before the Senate shall be interrupted and all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said Bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

Honourable senators, if leave is granted, I will have a word or two to say about the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I would like to hear the second portion of the motion which refers to Bill C-201.

Senator Frith: I will hand the honourable senator a copy of the motion, and he can read it while I make my comments.

Honourable senators, what I am about to say is in addition to the information given earlier on the same subject. With regard to Bill C-124, if it is adopted and although we will not receive it until later today, I will propose that its subject matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance so that it can be studied in its present form and so that the committee can report at eight o'clock this evening. If the order is adopted, it will mean that we will proceed through all stages of the bill this evening and have Royal Assent at 9.30 p.m., whereupon we will adjourn until October 25, which is two days before the House of Commons returns.

With regard to Bill C-201, because of what might be called the chicken-before-the-egg problem, we must have the order first, after which I can say that Senator Murray will be moving that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study, with instructions that it report by October 25—the day on which we return—and that we will vote on all stages of the bill on October 25 by 6.00 p.m. I will second Senator Murray's motion to that effect. I want it understood that if we get the order it is on condition that I give the undertaking that, although the order says "if the bill is referred", it will be so referred.

As to Bill C-126, it is not absolutely clear whether we will get it. This is the bill that has been hived off Bill C-53. It deals with sexual offences. If we get that bill I will move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, again with instructions that the committee report on October 25, and we will pass it through all stages by October 26.

That is the essence of the motion, and it has to be taken in conjunction with the undertakings I have given with regard to the referral to committees because, it will be noticed, the motion says "if they are referred".

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Well done.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I simply wish to confirm that the motion conforms with the discussions we on this side of the house had with the leader and the deputy leader. The only question I would put to the deputy leader is: Would it not be more convenient to have the question put at 10 o'clock in the evening instead of at 6 o'clock. October 25 is a Monday. I do not see any problem with 6 o'clock if we are ready, but if perchance we need a few hours more, then that time would be available. If the deputy leader is agreeable to that suggestion, I would suggest that the phrase "6 o'clock p.m." in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the motion be amended to read "10 o'clock p.m.".

Otherwise, the motion conforms and meets generally with the wishes, objections and considerations that have been expressed up to now on both sides of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, as for referring this bill to committee, I have no objection, but I simply want to point out to this House that the same senators will be sitting on both committees. Now, it is up to the committees, not to the Senate, to schedule their work, but before we leave for the summer recess, we ought to know when this committee is going to sit. I realize we will be told later on when we meet in committee to determine our meeting times and dates, but I do not think the committee should sit before October 1, because honourable senators probably have other commitments for August and September. Personally, I will be away for twenty days during the month of September, but I would like to attend the committee meetings. I would appreciate it if the Deputy Leader of the Government would give us the assurance that the dates of committee meetings will be determined in advance, so that committee members will be able to schedule their personal business accordingly.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I can assure Senator Asselin and other honourable senators that the committee is scheduled to meet at around 3.45 this afternoon, when, I believe, this point will be discussed.

[Senator Frith.]

Without wishing to anticipate the committee's decisions, I have the impression that the purpose of this meeting is to schedule committee meetings for October. In any case, the decision lies with the committee. It will be meeting this afternoon under the chairmanship pro tem of Senator Stanbury and will probably have to elect a vice-chairman, because Senator Goldenberg will turn 75 before our return in the fall.

That is how I see the situation. I could check to make sure, and perhaps Senator Neiman could provide confirmation.

[English]

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, it is true that the National Finance Committee has arranged a meeting for this afternoon. Notices were sent out this morning to the effect that it is to be held at 3.15 p.m. However, the committee meeting can be delayed. According to my understanding, it is simply an organizational meeting to discuss the concerns raised by Senator Asselin and others. We should arrange a proper timetable that is suitable to the honourable senators who wish to attend either one or both of the committee meetings, because we may be able to hold them concurrently or on the same day and save time and travelling expenses.

I might say that as of the moment it is planned to hold those meetings early in October. I would be pleased to have the attendance of all members of the committee at the meeting so we can discuss what has been raised by Senator Asselin. It will take only a few minutes.

Motion agreed to.

HOLIDAYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND--SECOND READING-- DEBATE ADJOURNED
SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL REFERRED TO LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-201, intituled: "An act to amend the Holidays Act".—
(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I had prepared notes for a brief and, as might be expected, non-controversial speech on this subject, the burden of which was that the bill had come to us from the other place in a hasty and ill-considered fashion and that the least we might do in this place was to refer it to a committee.

As the house has now heard, although it is not an order of the house, there is a disposition on the part of the leadership in the Senate to refer the subject matter of this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I simply wish to express my entire, personal satisfaction with that procedure and to congratulate the leadership on both sides of this house for the good sense and the spirit of compromise shown in reaching that accommodation. The committee will now have an opportunity, if it desires, to propose amendments to the bill and to hear representations from Canadians concerning its subject matter.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I move:

That Bill C-201 be not now read the second time, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report, pursuant to the order adopted by the Senate earlier this day.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I add just a brief procedural footnote concerning the referral of a bill to committee during second reading? There is no question that such a referral can be made with the unanimous consent of the house, as is the case with Bill C-201, but I feel I should point out for future reference that there is some question whether such a motion is otherwise in order, because at page 231 of the Debates of the Senate for March 27, 1947, the Speaker made a ruling holding that such a motion was out of order. I discussed that point with Senator Flynn, who pointed out that he had found precedents indicating the contrary. Therefore, I emphasize that there is some question whether it is in order to refer a bill to committee during second reading as opposed to after second reading. As I have said, there is no question that it can be done with unanimous consent, as is the case with Bill C-201.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That's right.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to this point because I feel strongly, and have for some time, that some bills should be sent to committee before they are given second reading and approved in principle for the simple reason that we do not know whether we should approve them in principle until a committee has considered and reported on them. For instance, several years ago a private member's bill was presented to the Senate concerning the incorporation of some kind of solar energy research society. My memory of the details is a little vague, but, as I recall, I moved that that bill be referred to committee before second reading because I was interested in setting a precedent that to do that was in order. We debated the motion fully at that time and there was certainly no suggestion then that such a motion was out of order. In fact, I believe the motion was voted down by a narrow majority on its merits, and the bill went to committee after second reading, where it died.

I thought at that time we had thus firmly established the principle in this house that it was in order, if appropriate, to refer a bill to a committee before second reading. Sometimes that is done in order to kill a bill, and in order to make sure the bill will come back, and that the purpose of the motion is not to kill the bill, you add to the motion an instruction to the committee that it report back to the Senate after considering the bill.

I just wanted to put that on the record in case there were any doubts in this case as to whether we are following the correct procedure. I don't think there are.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, I just want to clarify one point. It has always been the view that private bills should be sent to committee before the principle is approved. We are now dealing with a private member's public bill, which is slightly different, and I acknowledge that difference. The only doubt that existed had to do with public bills, with respect to which it was formerly held that the principle had to be approved before a bill could be sent to committee. That principle has now been varied by amendment to the rules in the other place. There is now a combined motion there for second reading and referral to committee.

In any event, as Senator Frith has indicated, the whole matter with respect to Bill C-201 is fully covered by the unanimous consent which was given a few moments ago, and there is no doubt at all that that particular bill has been properly referred to that particular committee.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Frith raised this point only as a means of preserving his right to raise an objection with respect to some other matter on some future occasion. Bearing that in mind, I should like to draw to the attention of His Honour the Speaker, and of the Senate generally, that citation 668 of Beauchesne's is applicable. I mention that for future reference.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is even possible that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders will want to look at the subject as well.

Senator Flynn is quite right in suggesting that I am only raising the point in the context that he has given, and, obviously, we will use the same procedure with respect to Bill C-126, assuming we receive it, and everything we say now with respect to Bill C-201 will apply to Bill C-126 mutatis mutandis.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I hope those who are absent this afternoon will not return in October only to suggest that we were out of order and did not proceed properly.

An Hon. Senator: There is unanimous consent.
Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rules 45(1)(e) and (a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-124, intituled: "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada"

as adopted at the report stage in the other place, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the said Committee have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: This motion is being made notwithstanding the fact that we have not yet received the bill and on the understanding that the committee can be requested to report the bill or its subject matter, if at all possible, by 8 o'clock this evening.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have just received information that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance can meet in room 256-S at 4 o'clock, at which time the President of the Treasury Board will be the witness.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, unless Senator Macdonald disagrees, I believe that all remaining orders stand.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): And Motions and Inquiries.

Senator Frith: As Senator Roblin has stated, and subject to what Senator Godfrey might say, that applies also to Motions and Inquiries.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Written Questions are always stood.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hesitate to bother you with more procedural nit-picking, but I must do so. Let me explain. It is about the order regarding Bills C-124, C-201 and C-126. The situation is not really too complicated, but it is a little esoteric.

The order says, with regard to Bill C-201 and Bill C-126, that if the bills are referred to committee, "then the following shall apply..." With regard to Bill C-201, we did not refer the bill, we referred the subject matter. The same is liable to happen with regard to the other bills, although we will not, for example, be referring Bill C-124—

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is too late now.

Senator Frith: —or Bill C-126.

What it boils down to is this infernal business of whether we can refer a bill at second reading to a committee unless we have, in effect, adopted the principle of the bill. We do not want to have it said that we have adopted the principle of the bill until it has gone to committee.

May I have it understood that the order that we adopted earlier can contain either the words "if the bill is referred" or the words "if the subject matter of the bill is referred," and that the direction to the committee be to report the bill, or to report, period. If we can agree to that, then the order will apply. Otherwise we are really back to square one.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I do not agree, honourable senators, that we are back to square one at all. It seems to me that the bill and the subject matter of the bill, in this case are the same. It would take a rather curious interpretation to distinguish between referring the bill and referring the subject matter of the bill, under such circumstances, but let us say that whatever change in wording is required is deemed to have been adopted, and that is all; but I would challenge anyone to give this narrow interpretation of the decision that we made earlier today.

Senator Frith: So it is agreed?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-124 PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the subject matter of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada, including the report of the committee on Bill C-124 as amended and passed at the report stage by the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I ask that this report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-126, to amend the Financial Administration Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SECTOR COMPENSATION RESTRAINT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved the second reading of Bill C-124, respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to give a brief introduction to Bill C-124 and review, albeit very briefly, some of the reasons for the measure, referring, also very briefly, to some of the amendments that have been made, which are well known to those members of the committee who studied the subject matter of the bill. If honourable senators wish to ask more detailed questions later, I will call, first on the chairman of the committee, Senator Everett, to give some additional explanations.

I can also advise honourable senators that there are two officials from the Treasury Board here. We can make arrangements for them to come into the chamber so that honourable senators can question them, but I understand that in those circumstances we would have to resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole. If that is necessary, of course, it will be done.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of Bill C-124, an act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada. Serious economic problems facing the country make it imperative that the rate of growth in wage and salary increases in the public sector be restrained. Bill C-124 is intended to provide compensation restraint mainly in that part of the Canadian economy which is directly under the control of the Government of Canada, either as an employer or as an owner, as in the case of crown corporations.

The measure has an even more important purpose than that of restraining public sector wage increases, and that is to have it serve as a strong, clear signal to all participants in the Canadian economy to bring wage and price increases back into line with those of our major trading partners. Much of the viability of the Canadian economy depends on its ability to compete in export markets. Almost one-third of Canada's gross national product is generated by trade in goods and services. Canada's consumer price index is increasing at a rate of more than 11 per cent, as compared with a year ago. This is

4 to 5 percentage points higher than in the United States, and some 6 to 8 percentage points higher than the rate of increase prevailing in Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany. Wage settlements in Canada averaged more than 12 per cent in the first quarter of this year, about 5.5 per cent higher than those of our largest trading partner, the United States. That country accounts for approximately two-thirds of our imports and exports, and the consequences of such a divergence in our wage and other cost components are abundantly clear. We simply cannot expect to compete on world markets once the world recession recedes unless we align the increases in our cost of production and our rate of inflation with those prevailing in our major markets.

Bill C-124 must serve as an example that all Canadians, employers and employees, individually and collectively, must follow if we are to reduce inflation and maintain our trade position.

Bill C-124 is an extraordinary measure necessitated by the extraordinary economic times in which we live. It is an essential part of the government's anti-inflation program. It is not an attack on the public sector of Canada. Across the country in recent months scarcely any employer in the private sector has not been forced to take action to curtail wage costs. Employees, including those in top management, have been laid off. So it has gone through the whole sector. Wage cuts have had to be made. Pay increases, in many cases, have been deferred. Public employees have been largely exempted from such restraints in their working conditions, and to this extent they represent a privileged community within the country.

Bill C-124 is not introducing a regime of layoffs and staff cuts in the federal public sector. It is simply proposing that public employee wage rates be subject to more moderate increases.

Employees in many crown corporations, and other agencies of the federal government, are similarly isolated from the forces of the marketplace. In others, those forces operate, to some extent, as in the private sector. In all cases those corporations provide a service to the Canadian public, and thus they are being subjected to the same restraints as the public sector per se.

The restraints program also covers parliamentarians and their staffs, members of the judiciary, employees and directors of crown corporations, Governor in Council appointees, and members of the RCMP and the armed forces.

The restraint program applies to a group of employees for two years from the date of entry. Date of entry is determined from the expiry date of the collective agreement or compensation plan in effect on June 29, 1982, or the next scheduled wage increase in such agreement or plan.

The bill contains a provision that an increase which is 6 per cent or less on an annualized basis will not trigger entry into the program. Without this provision the wage bills of certain employers would have been increased for the current year.

For the first year of application, wage rates are allowed to increase by up to 6 per cent; for the second year, by up to 5 per cent. Except for parliamentarians and their staffs, the program does not reduce wage rates or take away terms and conditions of employment already in place on June 29, 1982.

Collective agreements and compensation plans would be extended for the two years of application. In consequence, all compensation conditions other than wage rates would remain unchanged for the duration of the application of this program.

Clause 7 of the bill was amended in the other place to provide that parties to collective agreements may amend the non-monetary terms and conditions of their collective agreements by mutual agreement.

A further provision was incorporated into the bill to allow the parties voluntarily to enter into a collective agreement which embodies the 6 per cent and 5 per cent principle of Bill C-124, and which is binding on those parties for the two years in which the program would have applied to them.

The Governor in Council may terminate the application of the act to those parties, since the parties by their own agreement have achieved the objectives of the act. At the same time, the parties will be able to achieve these objectives on their own terms, tailored to their own situation, incorporating improvements or changes within the 6 per cent and 5 per cent limits, such as maternity benefits, health and safety provisions.

Transitional arrangements are provided in the bill for collective agreements or compensation plans which terminated prior to June 29, 1982, and were not renewed before that date. For the 12 months following the expiry date, wage rates may be increased by not more than 9 per cent, and the Treasury Board may authorize improvements to other terms and conditions so that they reflect current standards. Treasury Board has no authority to roll back existing terms and conditions.

The transitional provisions of the bill make it clear that they allow the parties to collective bargaining to voluntarily conclude an agreement under the prescribed limits. But if they fail to do so, the Treasury Board determines the terms and conditions. Without the provisions, impasses could only be resolved by extending the expired terms and conditions, including wage rates, for a period of, I believe, 12 months without change, thus subjecting transitional groups to three years of restraint. That was never intended. A transitional group's 9 per cent a year is followed by the two program years of 6 per cent and 5 per cent.

The first wage rate increase of tentative agreements in writing, reached prior to June 29, will be honoured if implemented without change. This also includes tentative agreements reached before that date which provide for first wage rate increases effective after that date. Those groups enter into the program on the day following the termination date of their compensation plans, or on the effective date of the second wage increase provided for in the agreement or plan.

The program provides for a modification of the second year's 5 per cent limit, where it is in the public interest to do so, on the grounds of labour shortage. The Treasury Board and its secretariat will administer the program.

Several other amendments were made to the bill during its passage through the other place, and I would like briefly to describe them for senators. However, in doing so I have to plead that there are perhaps other persons, particularly the chairman of the committee, who may be more familiar with some of the details of those amendments; therefore, if further explanation is required, I hope honourable senators will allow me to ask the chairman to participate in those explanations.

Clause 3(1)(b) was amended to make it clear that the bill is intended to apply only to the subsidiaries of crown corporations which are under federal jurisdiction. Subclause 3(4) was added to the bill to extend its application to cover the railway system operated by Canadian Pacific Limited and those other railway companies which, along with the Canadian National Railways, engage in industry-wide collective bargaining.

The effective date of the program was changed from June 28, 1982 to June 29, 1982 so that tentative agreements signed on June 28, before the reading of the budget speech, could be honoured in the manner now contemplated in subclauses (4), (2) and (3). Clause 6(1) was amended to make it clear that the application of the "equal pay for work of equal value" provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act would not be interrupted by this bill.

Subclause 6(4) was added to the bill to make it clear that it is not the intention of the bill to prevent work-sharing agreements from being entered into between employers and employees' representatives. Clause 6(5) was added to the bill to restrict salary increases of employees, whose salary range maximum, as of June 29, 1982, is equal to or in excess of $49,500 per annum, to not more than 6 per cent and 5 per cent during the two years of application of the program, and such employees shall not receive any merit or incremental increases or performance awards during that period.

The amendment contained in clause 13(1) requires the President of the Privy Council to table an annual report in both houses of Parliament containing the names and salary ranges of senior government or Governor in Council appointees.

● (2020)

Finally, amendments were made to Schedules I and II of Bill C-124 to correct inaccuracies contained in the bill as it was originally tabled in the House of Commons.

The objective of Bill C-124 can only be achieved if all Canadians make a concerted effort to break the pattern of escalating cost increases within our economy. The program that the government has introduced requires a modest sacrifice, I think, from public sector employees in order that those Canadians who have suffered most at the hands of inflation may continue to be helped. As a major trading nation, we cannot permit our economic future to be jeopardized by cost and productivity performances which price us out of the markets. If this is allowed to happen, our foreign trade surpluses will disappear, our current account deficit will increase and our standard of living will drop dramatically. The end result will be even greater inflation. We will be trapped in a vicious circle from which it becomes increasingly difficult to extricate ourselves.

These are the unwelcome but, nevertheless, real circumstances we face if we fail to act. The whole purpose of the program contained in Bill C-124 is the exercise of restraint in the matter of wage increases within the federal sphere of influence and, secondly, to set an example for other sectors to follow so that all Canadians are doing their part to restrain their demands on the economy. If everyone plays his or her part, Canada's economic recovery will be assured and everyone will gain by having adopted the achievable targets of 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I hope that every member of the Senate, regardless of his or her party affiliation, will support this important piece of legislation for the good of all Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is not often that the Senate of Canada, to say nothing of the general public, has an opportunity to watch the gestation of an idea fully exposed in a public arena. It seems to me that in watching the progress of this bill through the House of Commons, we have been privy to just such a development, and that this piece of legislation must clearly be regarded as one that was produced under a degree of pressure insofar as the government is concerned. Certainly, there is an element of "ad hockery" which is clearly recognizable in the way in which this bill has been submitted to the other chamber and dealt with in its various stages in committee and in the house. I suppose one has to recognize that, having come up against the hard realities of life when the budget was brought down last June and knowing the necessity of giving some kind of a lead to the Canadian people, production of a bill of this sort was clearly something that was required by the circumstances.

I do not intend to deal with all the amendments that have been made to the bill, except to say that they have been formidable, and that we have seen, step by step as this bill was dealt with in the other place, stones overturned, difficulties exposed, the objections of the opposition incorporated in the bill in some instances and amendments brought in. I suppose we ought to be grateful for that, because the process of amendment, if it improves the bill, is not to be despised.

However, it is quite remarkable that we have had such a series of amendments, some of which I will refer to briefly. I think the series of amendments expanding the area for collective bargaining are good and healthy. I do not think they go too far; in fact I think they could have gone a little further. Certainly, they represent welcome second thought on the part of the government with respect to the collective bargaining process in the public service. For example, we see that, provided the 6 per cent and 5 per cent rule is not breached, certain negotiations can take place under that ceiling between the employer and employees with respect to how that money is to be distributed. Of course, the example the minister gave this afternoon is a good one—the question of maternity leave can be negotiated, provided that the monetary impact of these changes is encompassed within the six-and-five rule which the bill provides.

It has also been gratifying to learn that there has been a relaxation of the rule with respect to non-monetary items, that certain selected ones among them can be dealt with by the ordinary collective bargaining procedure. These items do not affect the thrust of the bill or the ceiling that has been placed upon it and, therefore, perhaps should have been included so that the normal procedure might be followed from the very beginning. I am glad that they are in there now.

There is another area where the collective bargaining system has been restored in a small way. That has to do with the clause of the bill that allows the government to release any particular group of employees from the impact of this legislation, provided that before that time they have entered into a collective agreement with their employer to comply with the conditions that the government considers to be necessary. That is another way in which employees may reinstate themselves to a degree in the collective bargaining arena, which was not available to them when the bill was introduced. I have to admit that these changes would not satisfy anybody on the union side of the bargaining table, but I do think that they are an improvement. I am glad to see them and, to that extent, I am pleased that the government has responded by allowing the bill to be amended.

There is another clause which I would have preferred to see amended, and that is clause 12. Under this clause the government takes unto itself the power to disallow any wage bargain or agreement that is entered into by the people covered by this bill after their 6 and 5 per cent regime is over. The idea is that the government wants to prevent any group of employees from making some kind of an arrangement to catch up on the losses they may feel they suffered under the six-and-five rule. That is an understandable point of view to take, but the wording of the bill indicates that this particular power appears to be without limit. It says "at any time".

It is my contention that it would have been wiser to have limited that power so that it was not wide open, as it is now. It was observed in the committee, by men of some knowledge whose opinions I respect, that maybe this clause is unenforceable anyway because the problem of definition under it is very difficult indeed. That may be. I have to leave the matter there, but I did want to raise the concern I have, that the ambit of this bill allows the minister to cancel wage agreements for an indefinite period—no time limit—after the six-and-five regime is over. That seems to me to be an unnecessary power and one which really ought not to be conveyed. I can only hope that the minister will exercise that power with a degree of discretion.

There is another amendment, one which came in the last series of amendments we received only today. It has to do with creating a new category of employees to which this particular set of rules applies. As I think honourable senators will know, this new category is comprised of those people who are regarded as political employees of politicians. The idea is that those members of the staff of members of the House of Commons who are selected by their bosses and are paid out of their bosses' allowances should be subjected to a more rigid regime than the one which is suggested for the men and women who are civil servants in the ordinary way. I am not sure that that is a wise move. For the 2,000 or so research assistants and other staff assisting members of Parliament—and, at first glance, assisting members of the Senate—this is a much tougher formula than the 6 and 5 per cent program which applies to most of the civil service. In fact, their wages are being rolled back on exactly the same principle as the indemnities of the members of the Senate and the House of Commons.

While one has to admit that that is not the major principle of the bill, I found it at least a matter which required a little explanation. In fact, in committee, if I may express my opinion, we found that the officials who had drafted the bill had no idea that those who help us here in the Senate are not in the same category as the employees who assist the members of the House of Commons in their labours. By the plain wording of the bill, all those on the secretarial staff and on staff assisting members of the Senate were included in the same overall blanket clause which caught those people who work for the members of the House of Commons. Perhaps the minister can be excused because he has a good many things to look into, but it is quite clear to me that the officials did not realize that the situation in the Senate is different from that in the House of Commons. Although the plain wording of the bill, in my opinion, requires the imposition of this rollback on our people as well, the minister did give us an undertaking, which the chairman of the committee recorded in the report of the committee, to the effect that they will recognize the special status of those who help senators so that they will not be included in this special rollback category.

I do not like the rollback category for a small group of civil servants, particularly as the minister, when asked this afternoon why it was done, said it was necessary in order to underline the credibility of the government's policy. "Credibility" was the word he used. Well, I really do not think that that is a sufficient reason for taking this step.

An Hon. Senator: Certainly not.

Senator Roblin: I am quite in agreement—indeed, I am reconciled to the fact—that the persons concerned ought to be treated in the same way as any other member of the civil service with respect to the 6 and 5 per cent rule. But that they should have a special category devised for them and have their wages rolled back in the same way as our indemnity is rolled back, seems to me to be painting the lily. I almost committed the solecism of saying "gilding the lily." Heaven forbid! If Eugene Forsey or my friend opposite, Senator Godfrey, ever heard me say that, I would never hear the last of it. It is "to paint the lily." I think we are doing a little more than we need to in that respect. While I think there is much in the bill that can be supported, nevertheless, when I close my remarks I intend to move a resolution in connection with that particular matter.

[Senator Roblin.]

Before I do that, I want to say a word about the main thrust of this bill. Apart from the details, what is the bill trying to achieve? Is it a good measure? Will it serve the purpose for which it was designed?

Let me offer a few observations on that aspect of the matter. The clear, leading feature of the bill is that it is a gesture of restraint, a measure of restraint. It is an indication that the government is interested in showing restraint in public expenditures and wants to give a lead to the economic community in this country in respect of this question of restraint. One has to say that that is a commendable feature. It may be said that what the government is really doing is buying itself a little time until it sees how things turn out, and that may be the truth, as we shall probably find out a little later this year. However, I think it must be said that, regardless of the goals of this bill, one has to have some concern lest the impact of the bill be of a transitory and palliative nature rather than going to the root of the problems facing us today.

The savings that are to be made in this year of grace, when this bill is in effect, are considerable. They amount to $250 million in the fiscal year 1982-83. That is no small amount of money; it is a considerable economy. I do not overlook that fact.

My honourable friend the Minister of State for Economic Development stated in his remarks that wages are an engine of inflation. I have some doubt about that. Perhaps wages are an engine of inflation, but I am more convinced that rising wages are the result of inflation rather than a cause of inflation, although as the wheel goes round the result becomes the cause, as we have observed in the case of productivity and the cost of production. I certainly recognize that there is that relationship. However, my real feeling is that in the beginning inflation is not caused by increasing wages but that higher wages are the result of inflation.

To repeat, then, we find in this measure a relatively important financial saving of a quarter of a billion dollars, but, as I shall indicate in a moment, that cannot be the main effect of the bill, if it is to be useful. Surely, the main intent of the measure will only come into being if the bill produces a ripple effect throughout the economy. If it does act as a catalyst with sufficient force to encourage restraint in all aspects of our economic life, then this bill will do some good. But, surely, it would have done a lot more good if it had been accompanied by some undertakings on the part of the government to use restraint in its own affairs, as distinct from the affairs of everyone else in the country.

The restraint on the wages of the public service is not great when considered in the light of the whole aspect of government policy. If the government had applied the 6 and 5 per cent rule to its own expenditures, I would have been impressed. If it had limited itself to a 6 per cent increase in this year of grace and to 5 per cent in the next year, I would have been most impressed. I admit that for the government to have done that would have been difficult, but for the government to limit its effort in restraint to this rather ineffectual measure may simply prove to be a problem for us as we go through the year.

After all, there is one quarter of a billion dollars being saved directly; there is the ripple effect, the consequences of which are either uncertain or unknown. We can only hope that the effect will be significant. I certainly hope that that will be the case, but I know that in the last two or three years the government's own expenditures have gone up 55 per cent. That doesn't exactly sit well beside the 6 per cent and 5 per cent universe we keep hearing about.

The money we will have to borrow this year, just to pay the interest on the debt and nothing else, is some $17 billion. The deficit is $20 billion. The forecast for unemployment is daunting: 10.9 per cent now and not much better expected in the next fiscal year. The question of unemployment, as I have said, is a major problem in the country today. The forecast for inflation in Canada leaves us with grave concerns. It is difficult to expect interest rates to fall to the extent that we would all wish in the next short period of time.

There is some doubt in the minds of some of us whether this restraint bill, even with the widest ripple effect one could wish for, will produce results capable of alleviating the problem we have at hand.

Until the government itself is ready to consider restraint akin to the restraint it is imposing on its civil service today, we may find that we have not approached the root or the source of our problem.

I want to leave you with one consideration. The minister who spoke on this bill made an important point that should not go unremarked. On the question of productivity he explained to us that there was a need to keep the wage rate in Canada—and I presume other expenses as well, although I am not sure that he mentioned them—as far down as possible in order to retain the productivity of our labour force and our economic machine, so that when good times come or when opportunities arise in trade on this continent at least, we will be in a competitive position vis-à-vis those in the United States with whom we do trade. I have to agree with him that that is an important, valuable and desirable goal and that we must all do what we can to achieve it.

● (2040)

I cannot help but point out to him that I am not sure he is diagnosing the cause of the problem. He talks about inflation generally, and that kind of thing, but the fact is that this report from Statistics Canada—which has been made available to some of us by means of a leaked document, and which I am hoping to see in the flesh before too long—deals with this—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): A document in the flesh?

Senator Roblin: Well, perhaps that is a lapsus linguae.

Senator Frith: Poetic licence.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps it is a mixed metaphor, but I am so enthusiastic about this topic that perhaps my thoughts outrun my tongue, although some of my friends say that that is almost impossible.

Senator Frith: I had the same problem yesterday.

Senator Roblin: In any event, I am waiting for Statistics Canada to be permitted to produce this document so that we can all have a look at it.

Hon. Lowell Murray: It was produced for the Cabinet.

Senator Roblin: It was produced for somebody else besides those in Cabinet because it is now in the public domain.

The gist of that document is this: It reports that the rate of inflation in the private sector is 9 per cent—not 11 per cent, but 9 per cent—and falling. "Falling" is the significant word; the rate of inflation in the government sector is 18 per cent and rising. That is the nub of the problem.

I do not in any way want to downgrade an effort on the part of government to approach the problem of restraint; I do not in any way want to minimize what may be a helpful ripple effect, a helpful effect in economic leadership in the country that this bill may provide. I want to give it the benefit of the doubt; I do not want to be negative or pessimistic at this stage, because if it does not work there will be plenty of time to talk about that later. In the meantime, we have to hope that it works, but I cannot refrain from expressing to the Senate my opinion that when inflation in the government sector is at 18 per cent and rising, as opposed to 9 per cent in the private sector and falling, and there is no vigorous, all-encompassing restraint program on the part of government itself, there is a missing link in the puzzle, a piece of the jigsaw puzzle is missing.

While I am prepared to vote for this bill this evening, particularly if my amendment is accepted, which is problematical, I think the government has not yet approached this task with the sense of urgency and iron in its soul that is needed if we are to get the public accounts of this country into order and good shape so that the leadership all Canadians expect is given to the private sector.

I must say again that we have to hope it works, we have to hope it does some good, but I am convinced there is much more to this job if we are really going to break the back of inflation and secure the productivity the country requires.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I must say that, like all other senators, I was enormously impressed by Senator Roblin's speech. First of all, I should like to congratulate him, and thank him for his generosity to the government for stating that the amendments that have been made have improved the bill. Indeed, I think that that is right; I think that that is what parliamentary democracy is about. We bring forward measures and listen to criticisms, and the minister, who exposed himself to those criticisms and amended the bill, ought to be congratulated.

I refer to Senator Roblin's remarks concerning clause 12 of the bill. It is, indeed, a difficult clause. What clause 12 attempts to do is prevent agreements being made during the restraint period that do not appear as part of the written agreement but have the effect of causing a catch-up after the restraint period has been terminated.

Obviously, that is a difficult thing to legislate, and while the clause may well be imperfect, and if challenged may not stand up in a court of law, it is probably the best that can be put together, and gives notice that the government is not about to permit the 6 per cent and 5 per cent restraint to take place and then find, after the restraint period is over, that certain agreements had been made clandestinely during the restraint period.

Senator Roblin referred to the restraint on employees of ministers and members of Parliament and said that he thought that this was unfairly placing an onus on certain people. Well, I suppose that that is true. The government was criticized for the increases that were given certain people employed by ministers and members of Parliament prior to the restraint period. It reacted to that and there has been a roll-back, as there has been in the salaries paid to ministers, senators and members of Parliament.

I think it is unfortunate that this must take place, but the fact of the matter is that the government must somehow point the way that there has to be restraint in wage demands.

When Professor Courchene appeared before the National Finance Committee he said that he was against wage and price controls, but thought that the public sector was the one area in which controls would have to be applied. He said that there was no alternative to that, that public sector personnel would not lose their jobs and would not be under the constraints people in the private sector were under, and, therefore, they would be relatively free to ask for increases far above those that would likely be given in the private sector.

The government was put into the position of having to concentrate its fire on one particular part of the wage area, and while that is unfortunate, it is necessary.

I think Senator Roblin's point that the government is not restraining itself, but is asking other people to restrain themselves, is patently untrue. If one looks at the budget figures that were presented in the estimates, and takes out the transfer payments to people and provinces, the public debt charges and expenditures for national defence, the portion of the budget over which the government has direct control, is less than 20 per cent of the total budget. That portion has been under harsh restraint over the past period of time. The man-years of employment in government have gone up very little.

The real problem of government expenditures has been related to two areas, and they are largely in the transfer payments of $34.5 billion. We index most of the transfer payments made to the provinces and to individuals. In addition to that, at the suggestion of the Conservative Party, by the way, we indexed tax receipts, and that is basically where the problem has been.

We are indexing the income of the government so that it is reduced by the amount of inflation, and we are indexing the transfer payments, the vast part of the expenditures of the government, so that the expenditures are increased.

In that area where the government has direct control there has been incredible restraint, and I think that is something that should be recognized generally.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Everett: This government has taken a hard line in fighting inflation, which has not been a pleasant thing to do. I am sure it has hurt us badly in the Gallup poll.

● (2050)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is not the only reason for the Gallup poll.

Senator Everett: I think that is probably the main reason. This government has taken a very hard line on bringing inflation under control. I think it is doing an exceptionally good job. As a matter of fact, Senator Roblin was saying, if I heard him correctly, when he was referring to the report of Statistics Canada, that the rate of inflation in the government sector is going up and the rate of inflation in the private sector is going down. Senator Roblin will, however, remember that when the President of the Treasury Board was before the National Finance Committee he said that since 1978 wage increases in the government sector have been less than wage increases in the private sector. Therefore, it does not really follow that the government is not keeping its costs under control. Of course it is.

I agree with Senator Roblin that wages do not create inflation. Inflation creates a demand for higher wages. Inflation arises out of an increase in the money supply, and the main thrust of economic policy over the medium term has been that the increase in the rate of growth of the money supply has been brought under control. This is a matter that has been criticized by the opposition on many occasions. As I said in my speech at the time of the tabling of the report on the estimates, that policy has been very successful: the economy has slowed down; inflation is being drained out of it.

Senator Flynn: Hah!

Senator Everett: Well, if you were in charge of the economy—

Hon. R. James Balfour: That is what the people of Canada want.

Senator Everett:—I understand that you would have lower interest rates; you would not have monetary restraint; you would not have wage controls in the government sector, and what would be the result? The result would be absolutely runaway inflation. If you think the dollar is low at 80 cents U.S. you would have it down close to 60 cents U.S. So you cannot have it both ways; you have to have it one way or the other. Either you accept restraint, squeeze inflation out of the economy and get back to real growth, which is exactly what is going to happen as a result of the policies of this government, or you do what the Conservatives want to do, which would lead us into higher and higher inflation, lower and lower productivity and an eventual cracking-up of the economy. This government is doing the right thing—

Senator Murray: What was the rate of inflation when you took over?

Senator Everett: —it is doing the tough thing; it is doing the hard thing; and it is being successful.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: That is very good.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Lamontagne just said it was all right, but not so long ago I heard him make a speech in which he severely criticized the government's monetary and economic policies. Perhaps he will rise a little later to explain his change of heart and to tell us why he now agrees with Senator Everett.

As for Senator Everett's speech, I had expected the chairman of the National Finance Committee, which considered the bill, to give a strictly objective and dispassionate report on the committee proceedings in which he might have pointed out that, on several occasions, the minister had not been very convincing. However, he chose to defend the government's policy and the situation it is now trying to correct and for which it was responsible in the first place.

This is not really the right time to review all our problems, because we could spend three hours on Canada's economic situation, and we could—

Senator Lamontagne: What a bore.

Senator Flynn: I am certainly not going to be as boring as you would be.

Senator Lamontagne: You are always asking me to speak.

Senator Flynn: I know, but it is just because I wish you would say what you think all the time, and not just when it suits you. Sometimes you do make a good speech, but because of your unconditional allegiance to the Liberal Party you cannot afford to contradict the government directly, and so you keep quiet. Does Senator Langlois have anything to say?

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Unconditional allegiance is contagious.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but we on this side would have to remain in power longer. It becomes catching if you spend enough time in power.

In any case, I was explaining that this is not really the time to discuss Canada's economic situation. However, if I were to quote all the experts who have commented on it and all the opinions given recently by knowledgeable people, we would see that at least nine out of ten would criticize the government, and hold it responsible for the problems we are facing at this time. Only Senator Olson—Senator Perrault never has any doubt about it—is convinced that the government is right and can never make a mistake. The government has introduced a bill because inflation has reached 12 per cent. But it did not happen overnight. Why is it that this action was not taken before today?

During the 1980 election, the government ridiculed our proposed energy policy and restraint of government expenditures. The Prime Minister said: "We shall do much better than that as far as restraint is concerned." However, he did nothing. He put aside all the programs which we were in the process of implementing and which would have given us better control over financial management. He completely ignored these proposals.

As for the energy policy of the government, we know that it has gobbled up billions of dollars. We are all aware of the disaster of the mega-projects, those major projects which Senator Olson has listed many times. This was all due to the big lies told during the 1980 election campaign.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: I will not labour this point. As I was saying, you brought forward these pieces of legislation today because you had no other choice. The time had come for you to realize that you had made mistakes and that you could not delude the public forever. The results of the Gallup poll released today clearly indicate that two out of every three Canadians are anxious to get rid of you, and it is certain that the economic recovery would be made a lot easier if the government had some credibility, something which would be possible only if there were a change of government. Under these circumstances, you will certainly not dare go to the people and ask them to judge your policies.

In any case, I return to this bill. As Senator Roblin was saying, if this bill can achieve the results you hope for, fine; we are going to leave you alone for the next three months—in fact, a little less than three months—so that you may devote them to periods of silence, reflection and reshuffling of the Cabinet, as well as repent and mend your ways, and when the time comes for the Speech from the Throne, you will not bring forward totally improvised programs such as those in the budget of June 28. Definitely ad hoc programs, as Senator Roblin said a while ago. We are going to let you think about it.

I am not talking about Senator Lamontagne who will be concerned about the major issues, who will give sound advice to the government, who, I hope, will let the Canadian people know his views on economic and monetary matters, and who may better assist the government in the preparation of its programs, especially those legislative or fiscal in nature, for the next session which is scheduled for this fall. We are going to pray all together and hope that the government will bring forward something useful. But the essential fact remains that Canadians feel the government could not succeed and that it should be replaced.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: Alas, it will not be for some time because of the dedication of its troops, especially in the other place. One would hope in vain for an election in the near future.

● (2100)

Anyhow, those bills are being referred to us too late; they could have come to us much earlier.

I heard that there was some difficulty with the sound system. You do not know what you are missing. Anyway, I am sure that Senator Denis understands me.

Hon. Azellus Denis: I did not say a word. Make your speech and refrain from making personal remarks if, as you say, you have such good arguments. Deliver your speech without indulging in personalities.

Senator Flynn: Since we are going to adjourn, I hope it will be without bitterness and I would like you to listen to me almost religiously.

Senator Denis: Mend your ways.

Senator Flynn: Do not get angry like that, I wish to make it up with you; I did not mean to upset you.

Senator Denis: I do not mind, I did not say a word.

Senator Flynn: I deeply regret having disturbed Senator Denis.

Senator Denis: I do not disturb you. Leave me alone. Make your speech.

Senator Flynn: I would rather have you disturb me from time to time.

Senator Denis: No, you are only a clown.

Senator Flynn: It is good to clown from time to time, it is good for the senators to laugh. It would surely be good for Senator Denis, and I would like him to learn again how to laugh as he used to.

Now, honourable senators, to return to the bill. Senator Roblin pointed out the problem of the amendment made at the report stage in the other place to reduce the salaries of the political staff of the members of the House of Commons. The minister told us it would not apply to the Senate staff, more specifically to secretaries and other personnel, but only to political appointees. So, I asked him why he had chosen to place that particular group in the same situation as members of Parliament and senators whose salaries will be cut, starting July 1, by 5 or 6 per cent, which fact we accept willingly.

Those people are being treated the same way, the only ones in the civil service to be dealt with in this manner. It seems the change occurred by accident. The matter was discussed in committee, as Senator Everett can confirm. When I told the minister he was not very convincing, he was at a loss for words or, in any event, he did not say anything.

I fail to see why that group was chosen and put in the same category as parliamentarians, MPs and senators, when every other civil servant's salary increase will be reduced only when the time comes for another increase, for instance on April 1, 1983.

[Senator Flynn.]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, for that reason, I move, seconded by Honourable Senator Roblin:

That the bill be not now read the second time but that it be amended by deleting subclause 3(3) of Part 1.

Honourable senators, this amendment would have the effect of putting this group of so-called "political staff" of members of the House of Commons on the same footing, and giving them the same treatment, as the rest of the public service.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., that this bill be not now read the second time but that it be amended by deleting subclause 3(3) of Part 1.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

confidence that the government will keep its side of any bargain.

Feeling as I do, I am not in favour of this bill.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Time is up. The bell saves us from your speech, Senator Olson.

The Hon. the Speaker: I want to remind honourable senators of the motion the Senate adopted this afternoon:

That if the debate on any stage of the Bill C-124, intituled: "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada" has not been disposed of before nine-thirty o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, 4th August, 1982, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings and all questions necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the said Bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

● (2130)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, His Honour the Speaker has quite correctly drawn attention to that order, and therefore I ask that the motion for second reading be put, to be followed by the motion for third reading.

Hon. David Walker: It was a real break for us.

Senator Flynn: Saved by the bell.

Senator Frith: Unkind.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Lucky boy.

Senator Olson: You are the losers.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Olson: With leave, now.

Senator Flynn: Leave is not necessary.

Senator Roblin: Leave is not required.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, that this bill be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Macdonald: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

[Senator Macdonald.]

RIDEAU HALL OTTAWA GOVERNMENT HOUSE

August 4, 1982

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 4th day of August, 1982, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved the second reading of Bill C-126, to amend the Financial Administration Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, this is a simple bill—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Oh no, no.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Don't say that.

Senator Argue: It is an important bill to amend the Financial Administration Act. It provides that financial institutions, members of the Canadian Payments Association other than banks—but including banks—will be able to accept government deposits. The credit unions have been labouring under great disability because the government is unable to leave deposits with them. As a result, last fall, at the time of the Canada Savings Bonds issue, within two or three weeks approximately $750 million was scooped out of credit union accounts and many credit unions were in danger of bankruptcy.

In addition to credit unions, the bill will include, for government deposits, trust and loan companies and other financial institutions, including the Montreal City and District Savings Banks, the Alberta Treasury branches and the Ontario Government Savings Office. I should add that the bill passed unanimously in the other place this afternoon by all-party agreement—

Senator Asselin: That was not the reason for it.

Senator Argue: It was announced by the Prime Minister on March 19 that action would be taken, and in the other place Mr. Walter Baker introduced a private member's bill. I am pleased that the bill is before us because of unanimous consent given in the House of Commons. It received all-party support and I recommend the bill to the Senate on the basis that it corrects an anomaly that has caused a great deal of injustice. It brings these other financial institutions into competition with the banks for government business, and that is a principle that should commend itself to honourable senators.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this bill may not be a simple one, but it is clear. Senator Argue, in explaining it, said that the bill passed unanimously in the other place and that it had the support of all parties. I have made sure that it was dealt with in a manner different from that which was the case with Bill C-201, and because of that I do not hesitate to say that this bill should get second reading now, to be followed by third reading, so that it can receive Royal Assent tonight. It helps credit unions, caisses populaires and similar organizations to benefit from the possibility of holding accounts on behalf of the Receiver General, and things like that. It has been especially recommended to us on this side by Mr. Walter Baker, a well known member of Parliament, which provides us with another assurance that we can proceed with it without any fear of making a mistake.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear. A great speech.

Hon. Daniel Lang: Honourable senators, co-operatives are really not within my realm of knowledge. I am always suspicious of any amendment to the Financial Administration Act under which so many things can be done without members of Parliament realizing what exactly is happening—including section 17, I might add. I am not sure what the minister meant when he said savings were “scooped out” of co-operative funds to buy Canada Savings Bonds. I do not know what “scooped out” means. It sounds to me like a suggestive description. Does the minister mean that members of co-ops cannot freely take their money out of co-ops and put it into Government of Canada Bonds? It should be the prerogative of anyone who puts money into a co-operative to remove it at any time he wishes.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, if my words were subject to that interpretation, then they were not the right words. As I understand it, a co-operative member who buys a Canada Savings Bond will issue a cheque to pay for that bond, and the Government of Canada, in cashing the cheque, cannot leave the money in the credit union. Therefore, there is a transfer of funds, because of this action, from deposits in credit unions into the chartered banking system. It is a complaint of the credit unions that when their members buy Canada Savings Bonds, immediately their savings are transferred by the government to chartered banks, because until now the Receiver General, by law, has not been allowed to have deposits with credit unions, caisses populaires and some other financial institutions.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Does that imply that every time the government raises money, it has to leave it with some institution in Canada, such as a trust company, a bank, or anything else? I believe the government has a perfect right, when it raises such money, to put it in the account of the Receiver General. Why should it leave it with the co-operatives, trust companies, banks or anything else? It seems to me an aberration of our normal financial institutional practice.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Argue: With leave, now.

● (2140)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Lang: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

CRIMINAL CODE (SEXUAL OFFENCES)

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-127, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, pursuant to the understanding and the motion moved earlier this day, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill C-127, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof", pursuant to the Order adopted by the Senate earlier this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, by way of explanation, this motion has particular reference to paragraph 3 of the motion moved earlier this day.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think the motion should mention that the committee has to report according to the order.

Senator Frith: As Senator Flynn has pointed out, paragraph 3 of the order provides that the committee is to report back to the Senate on Monday, October 25, 1982 and that no later than 10 o'clock on Tuesday, October 26, 1982 the vote will be taken.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, does that mean that the Senate will be resuming on October 25, while the House of Commons will be resuming on October 27?

Senator Frith: As we discussed earlier, the Senate will adjourn until October 25 and proceed to implement the order it passed earlier. The House of Commons returns on October 27.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like to make one short observation and that is that a bill of this sort should go to committee.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

EFFECT ON PURCHASERS OF WHOLE LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked on March 30, 1982 by Senator Nurgitz. I ask that the answer be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The honourable senator gave an example of a particular life insurance policy and has asked what is to be the basis of the calculation of the tax on accrual for this policy and other whole life policies. As a result of the budget of June 28, the policy cited will be exempt from tax on accrual, as will most regular whole-life policies purchased for protection and paid for by premiums over 20 years or more.

The honourable senator has also asked if the government distinguishes between death benefits and accumulated cash values in its taxation of life insurance policies. Indeed it does. The minister's statement of June 28 uses the relationship between the death benefit and the amount accumulated by the insurer for the policy, which is essentially the cash surrender value, in order to define which policies are primarily for protection and should be exempt from tax on accrual. Provided that the amount accumulated relative to the death benefit falls below the limits set out in the press release, the policy is exempt.

FINANCE

TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE INDUSTRY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have information relating to a question asked on April 6, by Senator Roblin. I ask that the answer be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The question that has been asked is whether the taxation of life insurance policies is to be referred to a committee which would be empowered to hear witnesses.

As the senator knows, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has considered the matter and has heard witnesses. As well, the Minister of Finance's release on June 28, 1982 made significant changes to the original proposal to address concerns that had been raised. Most regular whole-life policies purchased for protection and paid for by premiums over 20 years or more will be exempt from tax on accrued income under the new rules.

HON. H. CARL GOLDENBERG
HON. GUY WILLIAMS

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that a number of us realize that two of our most distinguished colleagues may not be with us when we meet again in October. I refer to Senator Carl Goldenberg and Senator Guy Williams, both of whom have served with distinction in this chamber. Of course, there is always the possibility that, due to some unanticipated event, we will meet once again before they have their birthdays but, in due time, they will reach the mandatory Senate retirement age later this year.

When October arrives, I know that all honourable senators will wish to express their tributes in proper form and in a more appropriate fashion, but I felt that I should at least draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that these could be their last few minutes in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, it is with mixed feelings that I rise to express my thanks to honourable senators on both sides of the chamber for making my 11 years in the Senate memorable ones. I thank you all for your co-operation.

Coming from the province of British Columbia, where there are over 50,000 of my people, the first citizens, I hope that it will not be too long before another representative of those first citizens replaces me here. Once again, I thank all of you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday, October 25, 1982 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, before dealing with the adjournment motion, may I ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is your question on the motion?

Senator Molson: It is on a point of order, if I must clarify it. I would like to know when it was decided that Bill C-126 would be considered by the Senate this evening. The motion, as I heard it discussed last night and today, included Bills C-124, C-201 and so on, and then I witness Bill C-126 being dealt with here in two and a half minutes. As far as I am concerned, I heard no mention of Bill C-126 before our sitting this evening.

I have no particular objection to the bill, except that I do hate being taken by surprise in this manner. Either I am at fault in not knowing of the situation, or else I received no advice on the matter, as I should have. I would like an explanation before the Senate adjourns for the summer.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Molson is quite right. The bill came as somewhat of a surprise to all of us and was not referred to in earlier discussions. I learned earlier this afternoon that we might receive it. We received no message on it. In the meantime, discussions took place as to whether or not it would be possible to have it passed before we adjourned and, therefore, become the subject of Royal Assent. Since the general consensus, not only among parliamentarians but also in the financial community across the country, was favourable, there was agreement.

● (2150)

I always try to avoid surprise and to give sufficient warning. In this case I was just not able to do so. For that reason, I am glad that I have had the opportunity to apologize for our having, in effect, "sprung something" when we tried so hard not to. I apologize for more or less springing it on the Senate this evening.

It was only today that we learned that we might receive the measure, and I was waiting to hear whether we would, but when the message came we had already said that if we received the message we would try to pass the bill. That is the only answer I can give.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Will the deputy leader admit that he was wrong?

Hon. Jack Marshall: It will be the third time today.

Senator Frith: I think in this case, no, I was not wrong. I did my best but it may be that Senator Lang thinks my best is not good enough.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Railway Act

An Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act (No. 3)

An Act to provide for payments to persons in respect of dwellings insulated with urea formaldehyde foam insulation

An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority

An Act to amend the National Harbours Board Act, the Government Harbours and Piers Act, the Harbour Commissions Act, the Canada Shipping Act and the Fishing and Recreational Harbours Act

An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada

An Act to amend the Financial Administration Act (No. 2)

An Act to revive E.G. Klein Limited and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act

An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of The Grand Lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the Dominion of Canada

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

● (2230)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, I want to say that several honourable senators have been kind enough to express their satisfaction with the way the Senate dealt with the outstanding legislation before it which resulted in the order made earlier today. I thank them for doing so, but I would like to emphasize that the meeting that led to agreement on that order was at the initiative of Senator Flynn and Senator Roblin. It was their proposal and we worked at it in a co-operative way. I want to give credit to them for their role, and to ask honourable senators, who still feel satisfied with the disposition of that legislation and the order, to express their appreciation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: I know that I speak for everyone on this side, and perhaps for all honourable senators, when I say that I am sure we wish each other what we consider a well-earned and, I hope, revitalizing holiday before our return on October 25. With that date on my lips and in your minds, I propose that the Senate do now adjourn.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may, I also want to thank the Deputy Leader of the Government. I believe that, in the last few weeks, we have succeeded in establishing a modus vivendi which was generally to the advantage of all senators. On behalf of senators on this side of the house, I would like to wish everyone a happy holiday, or at least a pleasant time away from this house until our return in October.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, October 25, 1982, at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-124, RESPECTING COMPENSATION IN THE PUBLIC SECTOR OF CANADA

August 4, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-124, "An Act respecting compensation in the public sector of Canada", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto has, in obedience to its Orders of Reference of Tuesday, July 20, and Wednesday, August 4, 1982 examined the said subject-matter and now reports upon the same.

The Committee met on July 21 to examine the subject-matter of the Bill and again on August 4, to examine the subject-matter of the Bill as amended and passed at the report stage by the House of Commons. The witnesses in attendance on both occasions were the Honourable Donald Johnston, President of the Treasury Board, Mr. J. L. Manion, Secretary of the Board, Mr. G. Orser, Assistant Secretary, Staff Relations Compensation, and Mr. R. Cousineau, General Counsel, Legal Services.

At the hearing on July 21, the Minister explained in general terms why the government felt the bill was necessary and reviewed with Committee members the major provisions. Discussion took place in Committee as the review proceeded.

The Committee inquired whether civil servants would also receive wage increments within different wage categories in addition to the proposed 6 per cent and 5 per cent wage increases allowed under the legislation. The Minister informed the Committee that employees at levels below the executive levels would receive these increments up to the job rate. At the executive levels these increments, sometimes known as merit increases, would not be allowed during the two year period in which the Act was in force. Only the 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases would apply.

In reviewing clauses 5 and 10 of the legislation, the Committee inquired about the allowance of wage increases of up to 9 per cent for employees whose compensation plans had expired before June 28, 1982. The Minister explained that this was being allowed as a transitional arrangement so that these employees would be permitted to reach the same levels as other employees prior to the start of the program. The 9 per cent increase was approximately the level of settlements granted in the period immediately prior to the budget.

The Committee was interested to compare wage settlements in the private and public sectors during recent years. Considerable discussion took place about the measurement of the wage settlement rates and particularly about the impact of cost-of-living clauses in contracts. The Minister provided the Committee with tables prepared from Department of Labour statistics since 1978, showing the relative wage settlement rates in the private and public sectors, with COLA clauses and without. The Minister stated on the basis of these statistics that the settlements in the public sector had been somewhat lower than those in the private sector since 1978.

The issue of applying the wage restraints at the 6 per cent and 5 per cent levels across the board at all salary levels was raised by several members of the Committee who were concerned about its acceptance by the Canadian public. The questions were asked as to the reasons for not being more generous at lower pay levels than at higher pay levels. The Minister responded that this issue should be and is dealt with, through the taxation system. He also thought it was important to maintain adequate wage differentials between different categories of employees in the public service. Finally he noted that wage restraints are being applied more severely and for a longer period of time at the executive level.

Considerable discussion also took place regarding clause 12 that is aimed at preventing the negotiation of catch-up wage increases at or beyond the end of the program period. The Committee felt that this clause would be unenforceable in the courts and that the Minister should attempt to strengthen it. The Minister recognized this problem and stated that they had already spent considerable effort in attempting to strengthen it. The Committee raised their concern about the expression "any compensation plan established at any time" in clause 12 and felt that it implied an indefinite period of control over such plans. After considerable discussion the Minister indicated that he would review this wording, which might lead to unintended difficulties in the future. He also undertook to review wording related to the salaries of Members of Parliament to make clear that no subsequent catch-up should apply to their salaries.

At the hearing on August 4, the Minister reviewed the amendments that have been made to the Bill since the hearing on July 21. They are as follows:

1. An amendment to clause 7 which provides that the parties to collective agreements may amend the non-monetary terms and conditions of their collective agreements by mutual agreement.
2. An amendment by adding a new clause 16 to allow the parties to voluntarily enter into a collective agreement which embodies the 6 and 5 principle of the Bill and which is binding on those parties for the two years which the program would have applied to them. The Governor in Council may terminate the application of the Act to those parties, since the parties, by their own agreement, have achieved the objectives of the Act. In so doing, the parties will be able to achieve those objectives on their own terms, tailored to their own situation, incorporating improvements or changes within the 6 and 5 limits such as maternity benefits and health and safety provisions.

3. An amendment to clause 6 to ensure that, while the emphasis is on the parties to voluntarily enter into a collective agreement, where they are unable to do so, the Treasury Board determines the terms and conditions. Without such a provision, impasses could not have been resolved except by extending the expired terms and conditions including wage rates for a period of 12 months without change. This would have subjected groups subject to the transitional provisions to three complete years of restraint. This had never been the intention.
4. Amendment to clause 2 by adding subclause (3) providing that the wage rates for employees mentioned in 3(2)(a) and research staff of a political party represented in Parliament be established at 106 per cent of the wage rates in effect on March 31, 1982. This is a reduction from the 11 per cent increase granted to staffs of Members of the House of Commons and the 10 per cent increase granted to staffs of Ministers of the Crown effective April 1, 1982.

In respect of this amendment, the Minister clarified the operation of the Bill with respect to Senate Secretaries:

"The Secretaries of the Senators are provided from the staff of the Senate. Such employees are not subject to the roll-back provided for in subsection 2(3) of Bill C-124. They are included under Part 1 of Bill C-124 by virtue of subsection 3(1)(f), and thus are subject to the restraint program provided for in the other provisions of the Bill."

The effect of these undertakings is to treat Senators' Secretaries as all other federal civil servants are treated. Accordingly, because Senate Secretaries are not appointed by Senators, they will not be treated in the same manner as staffs of Ministers and Members of the House of Commons who are directly appointed by the Minister or Member. This means that Senate Secretaries will not be subject to the roll-back provisions of the amendment, but will be subject to the restraint program that applies to all federal civil servants.

5. An amendment to clause 3(1)(b) to make it clear that the Bill is intended to apply only to wholly-owned subsidiaries of crown corporations which are under federal jurisdiction.
6. An amendment by adding subclause 3(4) to extend the Bill's application to cover the railway system operated by Canadian Pacific Limited and those other railway companies who, along with Canadian National Railways, engage in industry-wide collective bargaining.
7. The effective date of the program was changed from June 28, 1982 to June 29, 1982 so that tentative agreements signed on June 28 before the reading of the Budget Speech could be honoured in the manner now contemplated in subclauses 4(2) and (3).
8. Subclause 6(1) to make it clear that the application of the "equal pay for work of equal value" provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act would not be interrupted by this Bill.
9. An amendment by adding subclause 6(4) to ensure that the Bill does not prevent work-sharing agreements from being entered into between employers and employees' representatives.
10. An amendment by adding subclause 6(5) to restrict salary increases of employees whose salary range maximum as of June 29, 1982 is equal to or in excess of $49,500 per annum to not more than 6 per cent and 5 per cent during the 2 years of application of the program. Such employees shall not receive any merit or incremental increases or performance awards during that period.
11. An amendment contained in clause 13.1 to require the President of the Privy Council to table an annual report in both Houses of Parliament containing the names and salary ranges of senior Governor in Council appointees.
12. Amendments to Schedules I and II to correct inaccuracies contained in the Bill as originally tabled in the House of Commons.

Their was a wide ranging discussion with the Minister and his staff on the amendments. The members of the Committee sought additional clarifications from the Minister on the meanings of the provisions in the Bill and their application. Answers were provided to the satisfaction of the Committee.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT
Chairman

THE SENATE

THE SENATE

CABINET APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think I should say a few words about the changes we have noticed today in this House. First of all, we have a new Leader of the Government, since the former leader has been given responsibility for amateur sport. Senator Austin now has a new title, and Senator Argue will keep the one he had, since there was no alternative but to leave things as they were in his case. The others were given what I would consider a demotion, which of course could not be said to apply to Senator Argue, unless he had been relieved of his duties. As for Senator Olson, who was considered to be the government's ace on economic policy, his services are now no longer required, although his competence and insight have been generally acclaimed, and he will now have exclusive responsibility for leading the government in the Senate. We wish to congratulate him on taking up his new duties. There is at least some consolation in the thought that he will have less work. However, if the public was right in praising him as an expert on economic matters, I do not think the government was well advised in making this change.

As for Senator Perrault, he is not with us today, but I imagine he is looking into the conflict that has arisen as a result of Quebec's decision to get into certain kinds of sports lotteries. He will certainly have plenty of work, especially since he will have to forego the services of Senator Frith, who will be assisting the new government leader for a short period. In any case, Senator Perrault deserves the Senate's gratitude for the services he has rendered as leader in the Senate. As for Senator Austin, who had a series of varying responsibilities, he has now been given the title of Minister of State responsible for Social Development. If I am not mistaken, this title was first conferred on the Honourable Jean Chrétien, in addition to his responsibilities as Minister of Justice. During his two and a half years as Minister of State for Social Development, I do not remember Mr. Chrétien ever making a decision or expressing any comments in that capacity. I am not sure whether the title involves any duties other than being chairman of a cabinet committee. In any case, Senator Austin will probably wish to explain exactly what his new title involves and who will now take care of the many matters for which he was responsible until now.

In any event, now that these changes have been made, as far as this side of the house is concerned, we shall try to adjust.

For the time being, I simply wish to note these changes and offer the assurance of our full co-operation to the new incumbents.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to Senator Flynn's comments, which I believe were a form of congratulation.

Senator Flynn: In part.

Senator Olson: I am a little more confident, however, that, if he expressed good wishes, he also indicated he would assist us in carrying out the functions of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: You need it.

Senator Olson: All of that I appreciate quite sincerely.

Without going into any great detail at this time, I should indicate that, at least in the initial stages, there will, with respect to the activities that take place in this chamber, be some changes in emphasis and perhaps in the nature of those activities, and it is our hope that in putting those changes into effect we will have the support of the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues. It is anticipated that such changes as we have in mind will enhance the capability of the Senate to perform its essential public service.

I will have more to say about this matter later, when there is more time to discuss the structures, assuming there are structures, and the related details.

Honourable senators, I think it is only appropriate that at this time I take a moment or two to pay tribute to Senator Perrault who, for a long period of time, occupied the position I am now in. He did so during both relatively easy and relatively difficult times. Certainly, on this side of the house—and I am sure my colleagues on the other side of the house join me in this tribute—we recognize and appreciate the tremendous amount of hard work performed by Senator Perrault and the good results that flowed from that hard work to this chamber during his period as leader.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I shall not say anything further on the subject of leadership, except once again to thank Senator Flynn for expressing, in his own inimitable fashion, his congratulations and goodwill. One has at times to be exceedingly perceptive to distinguish in his comments remarks of a congratulatory nature, but one nevertheless appreciates them.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not intend to comment on any changes that might have taken place in the membership of the Senate.

[Translation]

I merely wish to welcome all senators back after the adjournment.

THE HONOURABLE GUY WILLIAMS

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to two of our colleagues who have recently retired from this chamber. Since we last met, Senator Guy Williams and Senator Carl Goldenberg reached the mandatory age of retirement from this chamber.

Senator Williams was summoned to the Senate on December 9, 1971, and retired on October 7, 1982. He was born in Kitimat, British Columbia. I am advised that he will be retiring to the west coast, where he now lives, and will spend his time doing a combination of some of the things that have been of lifetime interest to him. Undoubtedly, he will be involved in fishing and in furthering the promotion of fishing, as he did so well in this chamber. Also undoubtedly, he will be doing that from the perspective of the native peoples of that part of Canada. In my view, honourable senators, from that perspective Senator Williams made an important contribution to the debates in this chamber.

His interests encompassed a much wider range than just the fishing industry. I know, for example, that he took a great interest in agriculture on behalf of his people, and regularly attended, as a member, meetings of the Agriculture Committee. He took the time and made the effort to ensure that certain aspects of agriculture policy were reviewed and changed. That was true whether it was in terms of the activities of the Farm Credit Corporation or other matters of particular, and in some cases unique, significance to the people in this country who try to farm the land on Indian reservations. Indeed, as a result of his efforts some important amendments were made to the Farm Credit Act and other pieces of legislation dealing with agriculture.

● (1410)

My point is that Senator Williams took a broad interest in the well-being of his people, and of Canadians generally. We are richer as a result of his contributions and will miss his wise counsel, particularly in committee, where he played such an active role.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I join with the Leader of the Government in underlining and praising the noteworthy contribution which Guy Williams made to the deliberations of the Senate.

No one had a more profound understanding of the problems of native Canadians, and certainly no one could articulate them as clearly and with greater feeling than the senator from British Columbia.

Guy Williams was a noble and effective representative of his people. He made clear to us the desires and aspirations of native Canadians and impressed upon us the urgency with which certain matters should be addressed.

The last speech I can recall his making dealt with the important matter of the Constitution, and how we should make an effort to ensure that, once patriated, the document be refashioned to provide a better deal for our native community. We know that in accordance with the text which came into force on April 17 last that the next federal-provincial conference should address the problem of native claims and other native problems. Some people are very skeptical, but let us hope that they are wrong.

Senator Williams has much to be proud of. His contribution to his country, his province and the welfare of his people has been significant. We wish him a thoroughly enjoyable retirement.

THE HONOURABLE H. CARL GOLDENBERG

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like now to take a few minutes to pay tribute to Senator Goldenberg, who retired from this chamber on October 20 last.

Senator Goldenberg was summoned to the Senate on November 8, 1971. He came to this chamber after having already achieved a great reputation as one of Canada's leading constitutional experts, not only in terms of the Canadian Constitution, but in terms of any legal matter respecting not only relations between the federal and provincial governments, but also relations between provincial and municipal governments. I know of many occasions when he took on these tasks as a special adviser, and served with distinction.

He has also served on many royal commissions, and, in addition, has acted as arbitrator in many labour disputes. Even in his retirement he is working on the Vancouver port situation.

I recall that he was a constitutional adviser to the Prime Minister from 1968 to 1971, and served on the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution. He was Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Senator Goldenberg's expertise, which he had developed before he was appointed to the Senate, enabled him to make a major contribution to the work that went on in committee.

● (1415)

Senator Goldenberg will be missed, because people with his expertise and wide-ranging experience are few in number in this country. The manner in which he employed the wisdom he had acquired was a great contribution to this chamber.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the occasion of the retirement of Senator Goldenberg on October 20, the Montreal Gazette reported that at the age of 14 he had written to the editor of the Montreal Star outlining a 10-point program for Senate reform. He was then worried about the Senate's having an absolute veto and looked upon the system of having senators appointed by the federal government as undemocratic. Young Mr. Goldenberg felt that in a democratic society a legislative body which was not accountable to a constituency had no credibility.

Though many of us today would agree with Carl Goldenberg that the Senate should be an elected body, certainly all of us—including Carl Goldenberg, more than likely—are thankful that his suggestions of 1921 have still to be acted upon by any government.

Today that allows us, as members of this exclusive club—a term which has been mentioned on several occasions—to bid farewell to Carl who, for 11 years, dazzled us with his brilliance and granted us the privilege of his friendship.

This institution, and the legislative work which is its prime responsibility, have benefited immensely from Carl's fine intellect and vast erudition. Few have sat in this place who were more gentlemanly, more charming and more pleasant to deal with than he. He was ever willing to listen, always disposed to help and, invariably, kind, patient and gentle in expressing his point of view.

It is surely these inestimable qualities of intellect which have long made his contributions to the field of labour arbitration so sought after and of such remarkable success.

As Canadians we can rejoice that, although Carl has retired from the Senate, he does not plan to retire from the profession of law or the practice of labour arbitration.

Of that work which will occupy him for many years to come, I can only think of saying: Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God—and shall never be unemployed.

On behalf of the Progressive Conservative caucus, I should like to express to Carl Goldenberg the heartfelt wish that he enjoy a long, healthy and active retirement. He has reason to be very proud of the exceptional contribution he made to the work of the Senate. We should also like to send greetings at this time to his charming wife.

THE HONOURABLE CYRIL B. SHERWOOD
THE HONOURABLE L. NORBERT THÉRIAULT
THE HONOURABLE JOSEPH A. SULLIVAN

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is another noteworthy happening this day that I should like to mention. I know that the Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that the offices of Leader of the Government and Leader of the Opposition seem fairly important at times, but there is one other office on both sides of this house which at times is equally and sometimes more important and that is the office of Whip. Today we have the return of Senator Petten, our Whip, who was absent for a number of weeks before the summer recess. I understand he has been fully repaired and is on his way to full recovery, and I am sure all of you join me in welcoming him back to the chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a note also to welcome Senator Petten back to the chamber, and I join with the Leader of the Government in saying that we are very happy to see him looking so well.

I should also like to welcome back Senator Sherwood who has been away for quite some time and who now looks very well and fit. He was absent for reasons similar to those of Senator Petten.

● (1420)

Senator Thériault, who was in attendance for a few days before we adjourned in August, has also gone through the same experience and I am glad to note that he also looks very well.

Honourable senators, I would be remiss if I did not mention the presence of our good friend, Senator Sullivan, who also appears to be in good health. We are very pleased to have him here with us today.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I join the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming Senator Thériault, Senator Sherwood and Senator Sullivan, and in expressing the hope that their recovery will be complete.

THE HONOURABLE H. CARL GOLDENBERG THE HONOURABLE GUY WILLIAMS

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM SENATE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I cannot let this occasion go by without paying a brief tribute to a gentleman who has been a long-time friend, and I refer, of course, to Senator Carl Goldenberg who has just retired.

It is my privilege to have known Senator Goldenberg since my days as a student at McGill University. That goes back a long time—perhaps almost too long in the eyes of Senator Flynn.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We are about the same age.

Senator Buckwold: Even at that time, Carl Goldenberg showed the kind of wisdom and leadership that has made him famous across the country. He was an impressive young man, and ever since that time he has been outstanding in all the things he has done.

For me it was a happy coincidence that we were summoned to the Senate on the very same day. Senator Goldenberg, Senator van Roppen and I were summoned to the Senate on November 4, 1971. It was an honour to be a member of that group. It was from that time that I developed an even closer relationship with Senator Goldenberg and, even more so, valued his friendship.

This is an opportunity to express my admiration for this gentle man who, in his own way, had a unique method of chairing a meeting, arbitration or conciliation. He seemed to have that ability to allow people to talk out their problems and then, at the right moment, move in and bring them together. We saw him do this at many committee meetings, even when the subject under review was difficult.

I agree with what has been said, and am sure we have not seen or heard the last of Senator Goldenberg and the contribution he will continue to make to this country. He is probably one of the most youthful-looking senators who has had to retire because of the age limitation. He could be described as getting older every year, but younger every day.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I also would like to join the other senators who have commented on the retirement of Senator Goldenberg. I recognize the valuable contribution he has made to the Senate, to the Government of Canada and to our country. I wish him a long and healthy retirement.

I would also draw attention to the fact that Senator Graham was in hospital for a while during the recess. I am pleased to see him back in his place and looking healthy.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I would be negligent in my responsibilities to the Senate and to my native province if I did not, at this time, join in the tribute to both honourable senators who retired in recent weeks. As it happens, both of these gentlemen have had intimate connections with my province of Newfoundland, and this is a good time for me to make a brief reference to that. There is also a sentimental tie between Senator Williams and myself, as there is between Senator Buckwold and Senator Goldenberg. Guy and I were introduced into the Senate on the same evening in December 1971.

● (1425)

I have said this before and it will bear replication: Senator Williams is, in my view, a remarkable Canadian. Whenever he spoke, it was with the voice of reason, the voice of moderation, a voice totally devoid of any prejudice. His retirement constitutes a loss to the Senate.

I have also referred to the fact that Senator Williams had an intimate connection with the province of Newfoundland. At one point, when he was probably the leading milk rancher in all of Canada, he invested half a million dollars in the province of Newfoundland. I have his permission to make reference to this investment. In fact, I believe that I have referred to it before. I will not comment upon the outcome of that investment except to say that Senator Williams accepted the results philosophically.

For a number of years, Senator Goldenberg was a constitutional and financial adviser in federal matters to the Government of Newfoundland. During the crucial years when, as a new province, Newfoundland negotiated with the federal government, Senator Goldenberg sat by our side as an adviser at various federal-provincial conferences. I had intimate experience with him at that time since I was a member of the Government of Newfoundland. During the years when I was Minister of Finance, there were times when we relied on his advice and help almost daily.

On behalf of all Newfoundlanders, I would like to express our sincere appreciation of the role that these two gentlemen have played, both here in the Senate and in respect of the province of Newfoundland.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ATTEND LAUNCHING OF ANIK AT CAPE CANAVERAL, FLORIDA

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to send representatives to the launching of Telesat Canada's Satellite Anik in Florida.

By way of explanation, I may say that this will be the second launching of a Canadian Anik satellite, that the invitation has been extended through the appropriate United States and Canadian authorities, and that the budget of the committee seems to be in sufficiently good health to respond to any expenses that may be involved if the motion is agreed to. I am informed and believe that some six or seven senators have expressed their intention of attending this event, which is scheduled to take place on November 11, 1982.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe the honourable senator needs leave to present a notice of motion. This will now appear under "Motions" tomorrow.

Senator Smith: I was actually asking for leave to move the motion now, so that it could be dealt with in one bite. However, I have no objection to its being taken as notice, and my moving it tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Everything that the honourable senator has said sounds reasonable. Perhaps we shall have an opportunity to think about it overnight and then deal with it under "Motions" tomorrow.

Senator Smith: That is perfectly satisfactory.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it seems to me that the Leader of the Government should tell us at this time what are the intentions of the government with regard to what is expected of us. When we adjourned on August 4, the understanding was that we would return today to deal specifically with Bill C-201, and, tomorrow, with Bill C-127. The idea was that both bills would receive royal assent, if passed, on Wednesday next, after which there would be prorogation of the present session, which began, as everyone knows, in April 1980—over two and a half years ago—and that a new session would begin on Thursday. It now seems that the government's plans have been changed, or that the government does not know whether a new session will commence on Thursday. It would be helpful to all honourable senators if we could obtain some clarification from the Leader of the Government.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the clarification sought in the first part of the question was stated several weeks ago. We hope to complete our consideration of Bill C-201 today, as has been provided, and, when we get to the matter under Orders of the Day, I will offer some suggestions with respect to deferring the votes to certain specific times.

● (1440)

Tomorrow we will deal with Bill C-127. Of course, there is also an order of this chamber that that bill should come to a vote no later than 10 o'clock tomorrow night. It may be that, if we complete the debate on second reading of Bill C-201 earlier today, we could get to Bill C-127 and begin the debate then. However, we can discuss that later.

The next thing is that we will have Royal Assent on Wednesday, as was known several weeks ago. I think Royal Assent ought to go forward as was arranged.

The Leader of the Opposition then asked whether or not this Parliament would prorogue and a new session begin either later that day or the following day. I can give some indication of the situation as of now, although I cannot give a precise articulation of what will follow, because negotiations are going on now between officers of the House of Commons to see if a measure of agreement can be reached with respect to the disposition of some very important bills that are still on the order paper of that house.

For example, there are a number of bills that flow from the June budget. I believe that there are two bills left flowing from the resolutions of the November budget that really ought to be dealt with. The question that has to be taken into consideration is: How much progress can we make with a few more days? Whether the period is two weeks, three weeks, a month or any other period is not for me to say, but we do know that there are approximately 26 sitting days left between now and when we normally adjourn for the Christmas and New Year's recess.

Senator Flynn: Is that in the Senate or the House of Commons?

Senator Olson: That is in the House of Commons. It is something like that. Of those 26 days there are a fairly significant number that are opposition days of one form or another, so we must subtract those days from the time that would be spent on the government bills left on the order paper.

Until the negotiations are complete, I cannot answer as to exactly what the procedure will be. But insofar as the first part of the Leader of the Opposition's question is concerned, and insofar as the commitment and arrangements for the time as to when votes will be taken on these two bills leading up to Royal Assent are concerned, there has been no change.

Senator Flynn: What is quite clear, however, from the long reply of the Leader of the Government, aside from the fact that up to now he has emulated his predecessor, is that there will not be a new session beginning Thursday. So my very practical question is: Will the Senate adjourn on Wednesday?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think we should have some discussion on that matter among ourselves and between both caucuses. I say that because there are a number of items on the Order Paper, and it seems to me that there may be an opportunity for some senators, if we have extra sittings, to debate the items that are on the Order Paper or, if you like, that have been postponed from one day to the next. If, however, there is something less than enthusiasm or desire to have some of those debates, then I think we could give consideration to an adjournment.

Senator Flynn: I think, in most cases, those honourable senators who have items on the Order Paper expected them to die with the end of the session on Wednesday.

Senator Olson: I think my friend has the right to make that assumption, but in keeping with the spirit of the democratic process to which I am accustomed, we should provide an opportunity for honourable senators to indicate whether they would like some time in which to debate those matters. Perhaps their hopes would be raised with the indication that their items on the Order Paper were not going to die. If that is so, then we would have some time to accommodate those honourable senators, quite apart from the priority given to government business.

Senator Flynn: Is that an indication of a new order of things?

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a supplementary question. Since, apparently, Parliament will not be prorogued on the day after tomorrow, October 27, the reason for the order passed on August 4 is no longer valid. Would it not perhaps be sensible today to introduce a motion to have that order set aside, to allow the Senate to debate the two bills before us in the usual manner in which the Senate is accustomed to deal with legislation? I am referring to Bills C-201 and C-127.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the house order does not make any reference to prorogation. I know that there was a view that this Parliament may prorogue. The other flaw in the preamble to the question, that "apparently there will be no prorogation", I think is that it is slightly at variance with what I just said. I, for one, do not know there will be no prorogation on Wednesday. So on that basis I think we should proceed according to the motion agreed to by this chamber.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the point raised by Senator Bell—a point with which I agree. Part of the agreement to come back on October 25 was that the bill would be referred to committee until October 25. The reason for coming back on October 25 was that the session would end in the following few days. Now it is not going to end and the report has been presented. Many people in Canada have not had an opportunity to make representations to the committee. What would it hurt if we sent the report back to committee and told them to study it further and allow people, whom we are supposed to protect in Canada, to appear and make their voices heard, instead of railroading the bill through?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is absolutely no question of railroading, or any other term that may have a similar connotation. Rather than repeating myself, I will say that what I said in reply to Senator Bell only a few moments ago completely answers the question raised by Senator Marshall.

Senator Marshall: Then, I ask a question of Senator Neiman, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The report of that committee, a copy of which has just been placed before me, says:

—if the bill is passed by the Senate in unamended form, the Government would, at the earliest opportunity, introduce an appropriate amending Bill.

What in the Lord's name does that mean? Does it mean that we will pass this bill and then bring in a better bill later? Why not satisfy, once and for all, our responsibility in this Senate, stop this mischievous act by 12 members of the other place and send the bill back to committee where the people of Canada can be heard. The Senate will then have before it the proper bill, and it can be passed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not a question of the government or anyone else bringing in a better bill. The substance of this bill is well known. There are, however, some consequential amendments to other statutes that are required. I believe there are three of them, one of which is the Bills of Exchange Act. If I could find my notes, I could tell you precisely what those changes are. In any event, the Minister of State has given an undertaking that a bill, sponsored by the government, will be introduced respecting those consequential amendments. They are rather limited. I will repeat that undertaking today, that the government will introduce a bill which provides for the consequential amendments. So there is no question at all that those amendments will occur. We will do that forthwith.

● (1450)

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to address a supplementary question to Senator Neiman regarding the lack of advertising of the committee's hearings. For just about all other parliamentary committees every newspaper across the country has an ad, paid for by either the government or the department concerned, asking people to make submissions.

Even though, according to a poll, some people might be in the minority on a particular issue, I think those citizens of Canada in that minority should have an opportunity to be heard. Since we are the ones who are supposed to protect minorities, surely we should have put advertisements in the newspapers soliciting submissions, letters or appearances before the committee.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Senator Marshall, when the subject matter of the bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on August 4, the committee held a meeting at which both sides of the house were fully represented. There was an almost full attendance at the meeting that day. At that time the committee unanimously decided—and this is the kind of decision that it is up to a committee to make—not to have any general advertising. One of the principal reasons behind that decision was that there had already been a great deal of publicity in the papers across Canada with respect to the bill, and there had been subsequent publicity about the fact that the Senate would be holding special hearings on it.

It was the members of the committee who decided that day that it would be sufficient advertising if the senators themselves were to assume the responsibility of advising those who they felt might have an interest in the bill and those who, therefore, might wish to make representations. At the same time the committee took the decision not to hear individuals, but only to hear national organizations. Those were decisions taken by the committee as a whole that day.

Following that, I can assure Senator Marshall that some of the members of the committee, as well as some senators who are not members of that committee, were most assiduous in informing the people in their own communities and informing organizations with which they are associated. For instance, Senator Donahoe took on the responsibility of writing to all the newspapers. He did that himself. Senator Bell did the same thing in the west. Senator Lang was also very active, I know. I, too, spoke to a few people representing organizations. I found that some people said they would have nothing to add to the debate one way or the other.

Altogether, we had a tremendous response as a result of that activity. I might add that we accepted all submissions from national organizations, and consequently we had a full hearing on this measure on October 13.

Senator Marshall: Would the chairman of the committee then tell me if the decision taken by the committee at that time was unanimous.

Senator Neiman: I have already said that to the best of my recollection it was. I do not have a copy of the minutes here, but I do not think there was one dissenting voice, when we decided we would not have advertising.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, as deputy chairman of the committee, I want it clearly understood in the Senate that I was not among the members of the committee on the day that these decisions were, as the chairman says, taken. Had I been, I would not have agreed with them.

Because my name has been mentioned as circulating the question to the people, I must say that I did so circulate it. I wrote to every newspaper in the country, including the newspapers of Quebec, inviting representations to the committee. Many representations were made. I had intended to say certain things about the record, but perhaps I should not make a speech on that at this time.

I want it clearly understood that I was not party to the decision that there be no advertising. I did not approve such decision, and as a private senator and as a member of the committee I must say that I did everything in my own personal power to see that what I considered a defect on the part of the committee was looked after and made up for as well as possible by myself as an individual.

TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to Senator Argue concerning the problem with respect to the grain handlers' strike in the Port of Vancouver.

I do not intend to be kind to you today, Senator Argue, because this is a matter of real significance and importance to all of Canada and particularly to western Canada. Perhaps it is most especially important to our home province, senator, Saskatchewan.

The strike is costing millions of dollars; it is affecting our only really solid industry in the export field, namely the export of grain, which is the one bright light or shining example in an otherwise poor economy. The fact that we are now looking at thousands of jobs being lost, farmers becoming disenchanted and a hungry world anxiously awaiting this much-needed grain makes me venture to hope, Senator Argue, that you can give us some facts that will indicate that either this strike will be legislated out of existence or the men will be legislated back to work, or that some other means will be taken to resolve the problem not just in the indefinite future but almost immediately.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I appreciate the importance of the subject raised by Senator Buckwold. I want to say that I fully support his statement with regard to the importance of this industry and the fact that it is a shining light in a period of economic downturn.

It is a fact that a number of ships are awaiting the loading of the grain at the west coast; it is a fact that this industry is of importance not only to western Canada but to the whole of the country. It is also a fact that we decry this situation.

But let me remind honourable senators of the strike situation that existed at Thunder Bay just about one year ago. From the grain farmers' point of view that strike lasted a long time—a period of about two weeks. Fortunately, we were able to resolve that strike without invoking parliamentary legislation, and, subsequently, the workers went back to their tasks with enthusiasm. In place of the half-hearted attitude one might have expected had they been forced back to work, they returned to work determined to do a job, and they did a tremendous job at Thunder Bay last year. It was so good, in fact, that in spite of the two-week strike delay, they were able to break all shipping records in the history of this port.

I appreciated their efforts and I took it upon myself towards the end of the crop year to go to Thunder Bay to tell them so. We put on a luncheon to which we invited the leaders of the grain union, the elevators involved and the railroads, so that we could thank them for an exceedingly good year.

In reminding you of what took place last year I am expressing the hope that this year we will see in Vancouver and Prince Rupert another fine export year. If in the circumstances of last year the west could break the record, let us hope—and keep our fingers crossed—that in spite of this difficult and grave situation we will end up this year shipping an even greater volume of grain out of the west coast, than we shipped a year ago.

Incidentally, the situation we are dealing with this year is a lockout. Since the lockout took place, I have been in touch with the Minister of Labour, and with Bill Kelly, the senior assistant deputy minister, who is the labour trouble shooter for the Department of Labour. He is the best labour negotiator in Canada and is respected by both employers and employees. I might add that the Minister of Labour has been in close touch with the situation, and considers it urgent that a settlement be reached quickly.

Just this morning the Minister of Labour sent the following telegram. Perhaps senators will not object if I read it to the Senate. It will take just a shade over two minutes to read, if honourable senators so desire.

• (1500)

The telegram was sent by the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Charles Caccia, to the British Columbia Maritime Employers' Association and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Canadian Area. The telegram reads as follows:

Once again all commerce through West Coast ports has been halted as a result of a labour dispute between the BCMEA and the ILWU. The history of labour relations between your organizations over the last thirteen years and resultant work stoppages is a dismal record to those who advocate and defend free collective bargaining. The BCMEA and the ILWU have always expressed a distaste for government intervention yet seem incapable of resolving their disputes without such intervention. The record indicates that not once in the past thirteen years, except during the A.I.B. regime, have you been able to arrive at a collective agreement short of intervention of high-level mediation from Ottawa or Parliament itself. The punishment inflicted on other Canadians and the economy generally is a matter of urgent concern in the best of times but in today's grave economic circumstances such action is intolerable. Grain export, an economic life-line of this country, is strangled and already massive layoffs of railway workers have taken place. I am a firm believer in collective bargaining and rights established by the Canada Labour Code. However, I feel compelled to say that such rights do not establish our West Coast port, which belong to all Canadians, as the private poaching ground of any employers' association or union. You have exhausted, as usual, conciliation provisions of the Canada Labour Code and now with all shipping from and to the West Coast halted apparently remain aloof not talking to each other. I strongly advise you to immediately resume negotiations. Failing an early settlement of this dispute the government will accept its responsibility, repugnant though it might be, to bring about resumption of vital shipping operations.

I think that that is a position that will likely commend itself to the Senate, and I can only hope the parties involved will respond, and, through their own negotiations, reach an agreement immediately.

Senator Buckwold: I have a supplementary question. That telegram may commend itself to the Senate, but it does not commend itself to me, and I do not think it will commend itself to those who feel that, by sending a telegram to an employers' association, and giving them—

Senator Argue: And the unions.

Senator Buckwold: Did the same telegram go to both?

Senator Argue: Yes, the International Longshoremen's Union and the Warehousemen's Union.

Senator Buckwold: Sending that to both of them and combining that with a good whipping is not in fact the means of bringing them together.

I was hoping to hear of some further conciliation efforts that might be going on, efforts of some significance, because I have a feeling that stirring up the pot the way this telegram will, and getting people's backs up, will not contribute to an early settlement of the disastrous lockout. I am hoping that it will not be long before the government moves on this, and the sooner the better, as far as I am concerned.

Senator Argue: The wording of this telegram is strong. The honourable senator says that conciliation efforts should have been made. We had a conciliation officer who studied this matter at length and brought in a major report, and the feeling of the department and the Minister of Labour is that "conciliation" has really been exhausted. They feel that the parties involved should get back to work at the bargaining table, settle the dispute if they can or, in the words of the minister "the government will accept its responsibility, repugnant though it might be, to bring about resumption of vital shipping operations."

I think that that is a strong statement; I think that that is a forthright statement, and, as far as I am concerned, it shows that the government recognizes the seriousness of the situation and is prepared to bring about resumption of vital shipping operations.

Senator Buckwold: I have one final supplementary question: How long are you going to wait?

Senator Argue: I may not be able to tell you that. The minister is anxious that a settlement be brought about soon. The cabinet is considering the question. I am sure that the government desires a settlement at an early date.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am very interested in the question asked by Senator Buckwold, and I took note of the terms expressed in the telegram the minister read. I must tell him that it is unusual to hear such a frank and accurate analysis of the problem that exists on the west coast, although perhaps it did not go into as much detail as some of us would like regarding the disadvantages that flow from it with respect to the agricultural and commercial interests of western Canada, and of the nation as a whole. But it is no good analyzing the problem, even in such frank and straightforward terms as the telegram does, without dealing with the point raised by the honourable senator from Saskatoon—that is, what is the time limit?

If there is no sanction that means something, the words are empty.

The government has given itself plenty of leeway, it seems to me, in saying that, unless they get their act together it will do something. But I think that if the act is going to be got together, it has to be done through encouragement or because of the possibility of some sanction. That surely has to be in the context of the time limit the government allows—the time it sets down after which it will act if nothing else is done.

The farming interests in western Canada deserve such frankness on the part of the government. I think it would help solve the problem if those involved knew what the sanction really was. If the minister cannot give us a firm date this afternoon—and he has already stated that he cannot—I think he should give us a firm undertaking that, next time we meet, namely tomorrow, he will furnish this house with a date by which the government expects the matter to be settled between the parties on the west coast, or the date on which the government will act.

To analyze the problem and refrain from disclosing the sanction seems to me to be less than a half measure.

Senator Argue: I think the statements made by honourable senators are important. Of course, once they are made, they become part of the public record. I am sure their remarks will be studied by the Minister of Labour.

I am not at all convinced in my mind that it would have had any clearer results if the government had fixed a particular time limit for a response from the organizations involved. The telegram is strong in its terms. From comments I have heard, I gather that some senators feel it is stronger than anything that has previously been heard in the labour scene.

I appreciate the difficulties that are being caused by this lockout—and indeed it is a lockout, because the employers have locked the unions out.

In any event, there is a loss in terms of normal exports through the port of some 50,000 tonnes of grain a day. That is a serious loss.

The Minister of Labour is obviously considering the matter carefully. This telegram was sent with the agreement of his colleagues. I believe that there will be further discussions within the government tomorrow, and I am sure that when the Senate meets tomorrow similar questions will be put to me, and I will respond by giving information as to any new developments that may have taken place.

I am very pleased with the terms of the telegram and that the action that is implied will be taken unless agreement is reached soon. It is important that that happen not only for the grain industry, but for all of Canada because so many other industries are involved such as coal, potash, pulp and paper, forest products, sulphur, and many others. So, it is of urgent importance that the problems be resolved and that the workers get back to work.

● (1510)

As I said earlier, I hope that when a settlement is brought about it will be done in such a way that there will be good feeling amongst those longshoremen, and that they will go back to work and work enthusiastically. I further hope that they will, if necessary, work around the clock and do their best during the current year to make up for any losses in shipments at this time.

Senator Roblin: Would the minister undertake to ask his colleague, the Minister of Labour, how long a period of grace he intends to allow and on what date the matter will be brought to resolution?

Senator Argue: I am prepared to bring that to the minister's attention. I am sure he will want a conclusion as quickly as possible.

Senator Roblin: Will the minister report tomorrow?

Senator Argue: I am sure Senator Roblin will put a question to me and I will be happy to report.

Senator Roblin: I will second Senator Buckwold's question. He asked a pretty good one today.

Senator Argue: There was no collusion.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, of course not.

Senator Argue: We are always accused of it.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE STUDY OF SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-201

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to return to the question raised by Senator Marshall, and address a question to the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs respecting the report of the committee on the subject matter of Bill C-201, particularly with reference to the hearings and to the notices and letters which the committee may have received in respect of that bill.

Would the chairman be good enough to tell us how many communications the committee received from private individuals across the country in respect of Bill C-201 and the hearings of the committee, and whether those were received before or after the committee took its decision on August 4, and how many of them were such as to indicate being in favour of or against the bill?

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have an analysis of the submissions which we received. First of all, we received written submissions from a number of groups or organizations representing national interests and a number of these groups appeared before the committee. I should like to list those first and then I will deal with the individual submissions. The groups which appeared were the following: The Monarchist League of Canada, the Baptist Union of Western Canada, the IODE National Chapter of Canada, the Royal Commonwealth Society, the Council of National Ethnocultural Organizations of Canada and the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism.

There were a couple of other organizations that asked to appear, one of which is the Provincial Grand Orange Lodge of New Brunswick, but unfortunately its request came in too late. In any case, it really did not meet the criterion we had set of being the national organization of the Grand Orange Lodge. The other organization is called the Alliance for the Preservation of English in Canada which wrote to us asking to appear but, when we questioned the gentleman who had written the letter we were not satisfied that it, in fact, represented national groups.

There were a number of individuals who asked to appear before the committee, five in number, and we wrote to them saying that the decision had been made. These are individuals other than members of Parliament. There were three members of Parliament, namely, Mr. Robert Corbett of New Brunswick, Mr. Donald Munro of British Columbia and Dr. Bruce Halliday of Ontario. We gave them the same reply but invited them to attend our hearings. As members of Parliament, of course, they were entitled to do so in any case.

We received a number of written submissions from individuals before our committee met on October 13. The following is a list of those submissions by province: Nova Scotia, 324; Ontario, 451; British Columbia, 113; Alberta, 51; Manitoba, 81; New Brunswick, 98; Saskatchewan, 24; Prince Edward Island, 19; Quebec, 26; Newfoundland, 2; and the United Kingdom, 1. That comes to a total of 1,190 submissions received at that time. During the course of our hearings and since that date, we also received another 441 submissions. There were a number that we could not really classify because of either illegibility or incomplete addresses. Those amounted to 90. Therefore, we had a total of 1,721.

It is somewhat difficult to give a precise figure of letters for and against, but I think it would be fair to say that of the individual letters received, at least 95 per cent of those who wrote to us were in favour of the retention of Dominion Day. It might be even more realistic to say that that figure could be as high as 97 or 98 per cent.

There were comparatively few individuals who wrote to us who supported the change to Canada Day. We have just received a letter from the Quebec Federation of Women which stated that it represented 70,000 women in the Province of Quebec who favour Canada Day. We received many letters from organizations of that type. It is rather difficult to quantify in total returns the numbers, who were for or against, but certainly, of the individuals, the vast majority supported the retention of Dominion Day.

In addition, Senator Bell received numerous pieces of correspondence personally as well as in response to an advertisement which appeared in a west coast paper inviting individuals to express their preference on a coupon to be returned to her. As far as we could decipher, most of those supported the retention of Dominion Day, but I am sure Senator Bell can give us those figures more accurately than I can. Senator Bell wrote to us indicating that she had received a number of letters.

Senator Lang received a number of letters and he sent us a report of extracts of some of the letters but we did not get copies of them. Perhaps he can give us those figures more accurately.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, may I rise on a question of privilege? The committee has the originals of all the letters I received up until October 13, at which time I had received over 100 letters. Since October 13 and to date, I have received over 200 letters making an approximation of 95 to 98 per cent in favour of the retention of Dominion Day. Some of those letters are heart-rending in their concern and begging the Senate to please do its duty.

Senator Smith: I wonder if the chairman, who has answered so fully my first question, could say how many of those roughly 1,700 plus letters received by Senator Bell and Senator Lang had been received by the committee at the time it made its decision on August 4 not to hear individuals?

• (1520)

Senator Neiman: Is the question: How many had been received prior to our meeting of August 4?

Senator Smith: Or by August 4.

Senator Neiman: I know of none received by that time because we had just made the decision in the Senate at that date.

You will recall that during our debate here concerning the order of reference, it was stated that there would be a meeting of the committee immediately following the adjournment of the Senate that afternoon, and that is when we did meet.

Senator Smith: Thank you very much.

I wonder if I may be permitted to ask another question on this report, which arises out of the comments made by the Leader of the Government to the effect that the government intended to introduce a bill making the consequential amendments which are referred to in the report?

The last paragraph of the report reads as follows:

After discussion and deliberation, your Committee decided to support the principle contained in Bill C-201, to recommend that it be proceeded with and, further, to recommend that the necessary consequential amendments to the Bill be made by the Senate in this Session.

The question I would like to ask is: Does that paragraph indicate the wish of the committee that the bill to be introduced by the government at some future date, as undertaken by the Secretary of State before the committee, be not waited for, but that the Senate proceed now to make the consequential amendments referred to in this last paragraph?

Senator Neiman: I believe Senator Smith was present at all of these discussions, both those which occurred on the day we prepared our first draft and today when the undertaking of the Secretary of State to make the consequential amendments was discussed and noted. The committee, in balance, decided that, as much as it appreciated the offer, it wanted to recommend that those consequential amendments be proceeded with now.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would address a question to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

Quite recently, under the auspices of the Niagara Institute, I believe, a meeting was held in Toronto between 22 leading American businessmen and the Prime Minister of Canada and other representatives of the federal government. After that meeting I do not think any government communiqué was issued, but a statement was made by Mr. Donald Macdonald—whose name is well and favourably known in many circles in Canada and who, apparently, was one of the prime movers of the Niagara Institute's invitation—to the effect that the businessmen had been given certain promises by the government with respect to changes in the operation of the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

I should like to ask my honourable friend if that statement is correct, and, if it is, what promises did the Government of Canada make?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since it has been stated over and over again, it is not a secret that the government intends to adopt procedures that would expedite the passage of applications that require review by the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

I am not sure that I can give a report on the exchanges that took place at a meeting sponsored by an organization apart from the government—in this case, the Niagara Institute—because, as my friend knows, those meetings—and I have been to several of them—are not secret but are more or less in camera, as far as the press is concerned, for good and obvious reasons.

Whatever undertaking or statement of impressions is made after such a meeting by people who attended it is up to them. I know better than to try to answer questions on the basis of what is imagined. However, were I to speculate, I would think that there was an undertaking given with respect to expediting the process. That is already under way and, indeed, some of it has been achieved. In fact, there have been some fairly significant changes made with respect to the size of corporations required to apply, and with respect to the process from there on as to whether it comes before a cabinet committee.

Furthermore, I think there have been some changes made with respect to what you might call downstream or related matters that were considered in the past. Some of the limits have been changed.

If my honourable friend so desires, I will get a report from the minister directly responsible for FIRA, which could give great detail of the changes that have been effected to date, and whether any further undertakings were made to the businessmen; but, from the vantage point I have at this time, I doubt that. However, I think they bear repeating because there was a perception of FIRA, promoted by a number of people in the country, that was far more damaging than reality.

Senator Roblin: I must say that I am interested in my friend's speculation. However, I know he would not require me to give it the same consideration as I would give to a factual statement of government policy.

If my honourable friend can enlighten me and other honourable senators as to the changes that have been made in the FIRA organization in order to improve it, I would be pleased to have such enlightenment.

I cannot understand his point of view when he says that something which took place in this "private" meeting, which affects the government and people of Canada, should not be made known to us although it has been made known to this group of American businessmen. I hope I heard him correctly to say that he would find out if any such promises were made and, if so, he would let us know what they were.

It would seem to me that the whole question of FIRA would require a considered statement from my honourable friend because we have heard a great deal about these changes. Whether they are effective or real in their application remains to be seen.

I would like him to tell us whether these changes are all made within the administrative ambit of the act which covers this particular operation, or whether the government is giving any consideration to legislation to change the FIRA system.

I would make it clear to my honourable friend that I have no philosophical objections to the goal sought by FIRA, that is, protecting Canadian national economic interests; that is one thing, but doing it in a way which is counter-productive is another. That is why I wish to have some clarification on these matters.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have no problem in giving my friend, Senator Roblin, an undertaking that I will bring in a statement, but I hesitate slightly because I am sure that he is immediately going to rebuke me with words that I have heard over the past few days—"So, what's new?" It will not be new; it will be a repetition, and perhaps repetition is necessary to emphasize the undertakings the government made with respect to some changes to FIRA that were made several weeks ago—in fact, some of them several months ago. Perhaps I could add to that a report on how effective those changes have been, and I will do so.

My honourable friend is right in that they are administrative changes which are exceptionally and exceedingly important in terms of time and other matters. We have not made any announcement that we are going to proceed with any legislative changes affecting FIRA.

• (1530)

Senator Roblin: I want to make it clear to my honourable friend that what concerned me in particular was the point on which I rose in the first instance, which concerns the report that has been received to the effect that promises were made in the last few days to American businessmen respecting the operation of FIRA. That is what I want clarified. Were any promises made? If so, what were they?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend asked me if any promises were made at a private meeting. I said that I would inquire. I also speculated that I thought there were, that they probably constituted a repetition of things that have been made public and are known in Canada, and that, perhaps, a useful purpose was served by repeating them to these American businessmen. In any event, I will verify it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. At the same time, I congratulate him on his promotion. I do not know whether he regards it as such, but I would consider it a promotion and something of a relief from his former position.

My question is in the realm of external affairs, and, in particular, the Middle East, out of which area, during the weeks that have passed since we adjourned, we have heard news of tragedy upon tragedy, sorrow upon sorrow having taken place. I should like to ask whether the Government of Canada is following through with some action the strong support which was indicated through the minister yesterday for the positive, splendid initiative of President Reagan. Has the Government of Canada extended to the Arab states and to Israel their view that this initiative of the president is a highly welcome one? Is there any consideration of the Secretary of State for External Affairs undertaking a trip to Middle East capitals, both Arab and Israeli, to convey, on an urgent, friendly, sincere and direct basis, the importance which the Canadian government attaches to this initiative? I might say that I think it would be a highly valuable move for this country to take, considering our long-term state of usefulness in the Middle East.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to join with Senator Macquarrie in saying that Canada has played a useful role in finding some basis for settling the fundamental dispute that is taking place in the Middle East. We hope that this role can continue.

I believe that Canada has already stated its position with respect to the initiative taken by President Reagan. I can repeat that, if honourable senators wish; I have some notes here in that regard.

With respect to the other part of the question—that is, whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has any plans for a trip to the Middle East for the purposes described by Senator Macquarrie—I would have to make some inquiries. I do not know of any such plans at the moment.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

RESPONSIBILITY OF MINISTER OF STATE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I intended, originally, to direct my question to Senator Austin, who has just been appointed Minister of State for Social Development. That is an important portfolio. I intended to question him on his capacity in entertaining questions on all phases of social development, which I envision as encompassing old age security, pensions, veterans affairs, family allowances and unemployment insurance.

From an article in the newspaper it appears that Senator Austin will be responsible for the distribution of some $30 billion. The article also indicated that he would not be crossing over the lines of responsibility of his fellow ministers. I believe that we ought to be given clarification about his responsibilities with respect to answering questions here in the Senate so that we can, in turn, fulfill some of our duties. I might say that I am pleased with his appointment as Minister of State for Social Development.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was trying to perceive what the question was, other than the categorization of responsibilities. I agree with all of the other things that Senator Marshall has said. It is an important post and, as the senator indicated—whether by expression or implication, I am not sure—Senator Austin will fill this post very well.

Perhaps we should wait until Senator Austin returns to the chamber to answer that question. He can probably give a more precise indication than I can with respect to the distribution of the $30 billion and that sort of thing. I think that Senator Austin will be better informed than I—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We hope!

Senator Olson:—he having spent more time acquiring background information with respect to a number of the matters that are before the Social Development Committee of Cabinet. He is, of course, chairman of that committee. At any rate, I think my response to my honourable friend at the moment must be that he knows he has the right to ask a question on any matter related to the government service of Canada. We on this side will try to give an immediate answer. If we cannot do so, we will take notice of the question and provide the kind of precise, complete answers we are accustomed to giving, as soon as possible.

Senator Marshall: All I am saying is that, on our first sitting day after the summer adjournment, perhaps a new Minister of State for Social Development would at least stay in the chamber long enough to acknowledge a question. Senator Austin left shortly after the sitting began. I will accept your response, but would ask that you pass along to him a request to sit here tomorrow until somebody can ask him a question.

Senator Olson: I will give the undertaking that that message will be given to Senator Austin.

Senator Flynn: We have no question on sports today.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILLS C-201 AND C-127

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I wonder if she could tell us if she will be asking the Senate to take into consideration the two reports which have just been tabled.

Hon. Joan Neiman: That is the idea, Senator Bell. They are both to be taken into consideration during the course of the business of the Senate. We will be proceeding, at least, with Bill C-201 in the course of this afternoon's business. We will deal with that report in accordance with the order of reference. Honourable senators can, of course, comment upon or ask any questions about the report at any time during the debate.

Perhaps Senator Frith can correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that we are going right ahead to take that report into consideration later this day.

Senator Bell: I apologize to the honourable senator, but I did not hear the usual question asking, "When shall this report be taken into consideration?" I suppose I was waiting to hear it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the report was tabled. This report is not the usual report on a bill which has been referred to committee after second reading—the normal procedure. What the Senate chose to do in this case was to interrupt second reading, in effect, and to refer the subject matter or the principle of the bill to committee. Normally, when a bill is simply tabled no motion is made for concurrence or as to when it will be taken into consideration. In this case it will, of course, be before the Senate when we resume second reading debate on Bill C-201, which we will do as soon as we begin the Orders of the Day. The report is tabled in answer to the referral that was made to the committee in the midst of second reading debate. It will be before the Senate to be fully taken into consideration during both second and third reading debate on Bill C-201. That will be as soon as we finish Question Period.

Senator Bell: Does the same apply to Bill C-127?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, it does. For the record, there is a slight difference in the case of Bill C-127. Not only did we not refer Bill C-127 at the end of second reading, but we referred it before second reading. With respect to Bill C-201, we will be resuming debate on second reading, and with respect to Bill C-127 we will be commencing that debate. That difference is really just a footnote in answer to Senator Bell's question, which is whether these reports will both be taken into account by the Senate and form part of the debate. The answer to that question is yes with respect to both bills.

Senator Bell: I have one further question. I understand that we will not have available until Wednesday the proceedings of the committee of October 13 and 14. If we do not set aside this order of August 4, it looks to me as though we will have to vote on these two bills rather blindly. We have before us no committee proceedings. We cannot look at the evidence or the discussion that took place at those meetings. Am I right in assuming that?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe it is correct that the proceedings of the committee will not be available by this evening. However, the committee proceedings were well known to all senators, ample notice was given, and all senators were welcome to attend the hearings. If the honourable senator feels that the notice was inadequate or that she does not consider it appropriate to vote on the bill until she has had an opportunity to read the committee proceedings, then I am sure she will make reference to that during the debate on the bill. Otherwise I do not consider her comments to be a question.

EDUCATION

REPAYMENT OF STUDENT LOANS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have 13 delayed answers. I suggest that I identify the senator who asked the question, and also the subject matter, and then ask that the replies be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Subject, of course, to any honourable senator's being able to ask a further question, if he wishes.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): They are probably all obsolete, anyway.

Senator Olson: On January 27, 1981, and again on June 9, 1982, Senator Donahoe asked a question concerning the procedure for payment and collection of student loans in Nova Scotia. The answer is as follows:

Senator Donahoe was correct in his assessment of the procedure of payment and collection of student loans in Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia, like other provinces, does indeed provide non-repayable bursaries to students out of provincial funds. However, student loans in Nova Scotia fall under the Canada Student Loans Program which the federal government is responsible for administering. The procedure for the obtention and repayment of such loans is the same as for other Canadian provinces. That procedure is described in the February 12, 1981 issue of Debates of the Senate on pages 1662 and 1663.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

EXPOSURE TO NUCLEAR RADIATION OF FORMER SERVICE PERSONNEL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Marshall, on February 10, 1982, concerning disability pensions for veterans exposed to nuclear radiation. The answer is as follows:

As a result of a question raised in the Senate on February 10, 1982, additional information is being requested with regard to this matter. In this connection, the Minister of Veterans' Affairs informs me that he has now received a report from the Chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission.

The Canadian Pension Commission is responsible for the administration of the Pension Act, which provides for the payment of pension to former members of the Armed Forces who are suffering from conditions which are attributable to, or have been aggravated by, military service. An applicant's age, occupation or financial circumstances have no bearing on the question of entitlement to pension.

Insofar as possible radiation-induced disabilities are concerned, the chairman advises the minister that close liaison has been established with the Department of National Defence, and they have agreed to provide, on request, all relevant information concerning exposures to radiation for former members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

Any former members of the Canadian Armed Forces requesting information regarding possible claims for disabilities from which they may be suffering, which they believe are a result of their exposure to radiation, are advised to get in touch with the nearest National Defence installation. The local office should then be instructed to request National Defence Headquarters to provide all relevant information relating to the former member's possible exposure to radiation in the course of military service. If there is evidence to show exposure, and if the ex-serviceman is suffering from a condition which he feels may be related to such exposure, then a claim should be submitted to the Canadian Pension Commission for consideration.

The chairman advises the minister that veterans who suffer from conditions attributable to radiation exposure during military service and who apply for pension entitlement are given the same rights and privileges as all other veterans. Entitlement is awarded if a direct relationship to service can be established, for example, if there was a degree of exposure which could possibly have been the cause of the disability claimed.

The Canadian Pension Commission must enquire into all facets of the claim for pension and arrive at a conclusion within the limits of the legislation. The decision rendered is based on the evidence available to the commission, and each case is considered on its own merits.

Before submitting a claim to the Canadian Pension Commission for adjudication, it would be advisable for a former member of the Armed Forces to seek professional assistance regarding the preparation and presentation of any claim he may wish to make. In this regard, he is entitled to receive assistance, free of charge, from the District Pensions Advocates of the Bureau of Pensions Advocates located in the area in which he resides, or the service officer of a veterans' organization, such as the Royal Canadian Legion. Assistance by a representative of his choice would be at his own expense.

The chairman has provided assurances that any pension application received in the Canadian Pension Commission in respect of a condition related to nuclear radiation exposure will be given careful and sympathetic consideration.

ENERGY

OIL EXPLORATION—SAFETY OF MARINE DRILL RIGS— DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Smith inquired on February 16, and again on June 15, in relation to the Ocean Ranger tragedy off Newfoundland. His question was: If the rig came under Canadian licensing jurisdiction, could licensing be tied to the provision of adequate safety measures?

The simple answer, and I regret the delay in replying, is yes, it is possible to tie licensing to the provision of adequate safety measures. The more difficult question, which was no doubt in Senator Smith's mind, is how this should be done in practice. Here I would refer him to the terms of reference of the Commission of Inquiry, which specifically empower the commission to report on "inspection, inspection procedures, licensing and certification of Ocean Ranger" and "all aspects of safety of life at sea, including the sufficiency of life saving equipment on board Ocean Ranger".

THE ECONOMY

JOB CREATION PROJECTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on February 18 Senator Roblin asked a question concerning guidelines on the wages of federal public servants. In reply, the Department of Finance feels that in light of the June budget and the subsequent clarification of the 6-and-5 program it would be irrelevant to provide a statement at this time.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

MANPOWER TRAINING AND JOB CREATION EXPENDITURES— ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on March 11 Senator Leblanc and Senator Muir asked questions concerning the $208 million to be spent on manpower training and job creation programs. The reply is as follows:

The enabling legislation will not provide for specific amounts for each province.

The $208 million includes $188 million to be used for training and to support expansion or modernization of training facilities. The funds are for a two-year period and in the case of training are in addition to those already approved.

The funds for the 1982-83 fiscal year for institutional training, including a portion provided from the $208 million, have been allocated for training in provinces and territories as set out in the attachment below.

ALLOCATION OF INSTITUTIONAL TRAINING FUNDS 1982-83 Fiscal Year

| | $000'0 |
|-----------------------|----------------|
| Newfoundland | 18,498 |
| Prince Edward Island | 4,370 |
| Nova Scotia | 17,655 |
| New Brunswick | 15,847 |
| Quebec | 141,590 |
| Ontario | 135,349 |
| Manitoba | 21,312 |
| Saskatchewan | 18,116 |
| Alberta | 44,248 |
| Northwest Territories | 2,574 |
| British Columbia | 51,618 |
| Yukon | 1,989 |
| TOTAL | 473,166 |

The funds for the Skills Growth Fund in the amount of $108 million for the fiscal years 1982-83 and 1983-84 will be allocated in response to specific project proposals received from provinces on behalf of public training institutions, or from non-profit organizations established to give courses. A formula allocation of funds is not being contemplated but a balanced distribution recognizing labour market needs will be aimed for.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

USE OF FUND TO FINANCE JOB CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): On April 27, Senator Roblin asked a question relating to section 37 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The reply is as follows:

Recently the government has augmented the financing available under section 37 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This section provides for work-sharing agreements whereby employees facing short-term employment reduction can work a reduced week and receive UI benefits for the remainder of the week. This is a valid and useful part of the Unemployment Insurance Program and was approved as such by Parliament. It is of benefit to our economy to ensure that in periods of short-term adverse economic conditions a stable work force is maintained and workers' skills are not eroded. The current legislation does not provide for the government to make direct contributions in support of expenditures under work-sharing agreements. These costs would therefore eventually be paid through employer-employee premiums.

However, it should be remembered that many workers who are participating in work-sharing programs would otherwise be unemployed and would therefore draw full UI benefits and a large portion of these expenditures would have to be paid through employer-employee premiums as well.

THE BUDGET

EFFECT ON PURCHASERS OF WHOLE LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Walker asked a question on April 27 relating to the taxation of life insurance. The answer is as follows:

In the June 28 budget, the Minister of Finance announced revised rules relating to the taxation of life insurance. Policies in which the protection element is large relative to the investment element will be exempted from tax on accrual. These high-protection policies are essentially all policies paid for by premiums over twenty years or more and will include the vast majority of life insurance policies to be bought in the future.

The June 28 budget did not announce any changes in the proposed taxation of health and dental plans. The principle behind this measure is that company-paid premiums are a form of remuneration that should be taxable, as are wages and salaries. Many Canadians have to meet their health and dental plan costs out of fully taxable income. Fairness requires that those with the benefit be taxed. As well, for many affected the additional tax on the employer-paid premium will be more than offset by the reductions in tax rates and transferability of the $200 federal tax cut proposed in the November budget.

As previously announced, retired employees benefitting from health and dental plans of their previous employer will not be taxed on any benefit they receive.

THE SENATE

COMMITTEE MEETINGS—ALLOCATION OF ROOMS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall asked a question on June 30 concerning the allocation of Senate committee rooms.

In reply, the allocation of Senate committee rooms is made by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod in consultation with the Director of the Senate Committees Branch.

THE ECONOMY

PRICE RESTRAINT IN FEDERAL PUBLIC SECTOR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 21 Senator Murray asked a question concerning the 6 and 5 per cent policy. The reply is as follows:

Senator Murray inquired about the application of the 6 per cent and 5 per cent guidelines to fares and tariffs charged by crown corporations such as Air Canada and Canadian National, and their competitors in the private sector.

Insofar as crown corporations are concerned, they are clearly covered by the policy, and are complying with it. Any deviation will be considered by Cabinet to determine if it constitutes an exceptional circumstance.

Insofar as private sector competitors are concerned, the government is very pleased with the response it has received in the transportation field. The Minister of Transport was able to announce on August 12 that not only Air Canada and Canadian National but also Canadian Pacific (including CP Rail and CP Air) would support the policy. Expressions of support have since been received from other air carriers including Pacific Western Airlines and Nordair.

AIR CANADA

CANCELLATION OF SCHEDULED FLIGHTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Everett asked questions on July 21 and August 4 concerning cancellation of Air Canada flights and whether Air Canada was behaving legally.

The answer to the second question is yes. If Air Canada was not acting legally, the responsible agency, the Canadian Transport Commission, would have intervened.

Air Canada has been forced to cancel some flights and consolidate others as a result of decreased demand for air travel. However, two points should be noted.

First, the cancellations represent a relatively small proportion of Air Canada's operations. For example, between April 25 and August 21, 1982, Air Canada had scheduled about 60,000 flight legs, and cancelled, withdrew or consolidated just over 800—1.3 per cent of the total.

Second, Air Canada has committed itself, in spite of service changes, not to abandon any community it now serves. If demand picks up, then Air Canada will of course increase the service it provides accordingly.

DISCOUNT FARES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on July 20 and July 29 Senator Marshall asked questions about certain Air Canada discount fares and their availability to points in eastern Canada. The reply is as follows:

Senator Perrault's answer on July 29 to an earlier question points out that the setting of fares is a complicated marketing and operational process. If discount fares are available to some points and not to others, it is a result, firstly, of Air Canada's best commercial judgment, and secondly, of the opinion of the regulatory agency, the Canadian Transport Commission, that the fares are just and reasonable.

The honourable senator is probably aware of the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission of August 19, 1982, which imposed certain conditions on deep-discount fares, on the ground that such fares were causing serious revenue losses and were threatening the stability of the domestic airline system. This decision may help alleviate what Senator Marshall sees as uneven treatment of different destinations.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA TREATY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on August 4, Senator Marshall asked a question concerning the Law of the Sea Treaty and east coast fishing boundaries. The reply is as follows:

The American position on the Law of the Sea Treaty is that they do not like it and will not sign it. However, it is not for the Canadian government to comment on the Americans' reasons for not signing it. Canada regrets the American attitude and has brought this point of view to the Americans. Canada supports the treaty and Cabinet is considering our position in regard to signing the convention.

As for the east coast fishing boundaries, the question is now before international arbitration. Because, the case is before the International Court of Justice, it would not be proper to comment at this time.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

RESTRICTIONS IMPOSED BY HUMAN RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Molson asked a question on August 4 respecting the Canadian Human Rights Act. The answer is as follows:

Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act has proven to be an important first step in providing protection for personal information held by departments and agencies of the federal government. The government is aware of some difficulties which have arisen with respect to the application of Part IV. However, these difficulties were taken into account when the new Privacy Act, which will repeal and replace Part IV, was drafted.

With respect to the request made by Senator Molson, it seems that Part IV would not actually prohibit the disclosure of the information to the senator. However, some government institutions have, as a matter of policy, extended the protection to be accorded to personal information beyond that actually required under the act.

Subsection 52(2) of Part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act prohibits the disclosure of personal information where it is to be used in a decision-making process directly relating to the individual unless:

- the individual who is the subject of the information has consented to its disclosure;
- the information is to be used for a purpose consistent with that for which it was provided; or
- the disclosure is authorized by or pursuant to law.

Senator Molson's question indicates that the Public Archives offered him a practical solution to this matter by offering to mail a letter for him to the individual concerned. However, he chose not to accept that suggestion.

HOLIDAYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-201, intituled: "An Act to amend the Holidays Act".—(Honourable Senator Bird).

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before resuming the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill, may I have permission to propose a procedure with respect to the votes that will be taken later this day? If it is agreed, I should like to make a suggestion before the debate is resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to suggest that if we reach the stage when the vote on second reading would be called, we should consider deferring that vote until 8 o'clock this evening. That vote would then be proceeded with formally, and we would then move to third reading immediately. There would then be a reasonable length of time for third reading, up until 10 o'clock, during which stage amendments could be made to Bill C-201. We want to provide an opportunity for honourable senators to make amendments, if they wish, and to debate the matter within the time available.

Another suggestion, of course, is to defer all votes until 10 o'clock this evening. While the order says that votes shall be taken no later than 10 o'clock, there may be some honourable senators who believed that those votes would be taken at 10 o'clock and that they could not be taken at, let us say, 4 or 5 o'clock, or earlier. I understand that, legally, if the debate concluded, then those votes could be taken.

After discussion with the Leader of the Opposition and others, I refrain from making that suggestion. I suggest that we have second reading by itself and defer that vote until 8 o'clock, so that we do, in fact, move into the next stage, when there will be an opportunity for amendments to be made if honourable senators wish.

We could resume second reading now, but if at some time between now and 6 o'clock we complete that stage, then I suggest that we defer the vote until 8 o'clock. We may then wish to have the vote at that time or shortly thereafter, and honourable senators would then have an opportunity to make amendments. The problem is that when we reach 10 o'clock it is a requirement that we interrupt all proceedings and put all questions then before the Senate in order to dispose of the matter. If that happens and we proceed with second reading up until 10 o'clock, an opportunity might be denied honourable senators to move amendments.

I hope that honourable senators will agree that this is a reasonable way to proceed between now and 10 o'clock.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is as well the scenario that we continue with second reading followed by the vote. There is always the possibility of having a motion to delay the matter for six months. The vote on second reading could take place at 8 o'clock. I do not believe that we should have the vote later than 8 o'clock, in order that any amendments can be properly debated. If we conclude the debate on the amendments before 10 o'clock, debate on third reading could then take place until the final vote is taken at the time stipulated in the order. I believe that is the procedure we should follow.

I may have another suggestion. If we proceed with second reading, some honourable senators who have already spoken may wish to discuss the committee's report. They should be allowed to speak, but they should be requested to confine their remarks to the report of the committee. They could discuss the matter of the procedure at committee stage if they so wished, but they should not discuss the principle of the bill if they have already spoken on it. We do not need to adopt the report. After all, if we are not happy with the report, we could always move that the bill be referred back to committee, or we could move a "six months hence" motion. Also, at the end of the second reading stage we could always vote against it. Therefore, those who oppose the bill will have ample opportunity to express their views. We would try to reach a consensus. The only outstanding question is whether it would be useful to continue the debate for months.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition is clearly reasonable. We have to remember that although senators are not permitted to speak a second time in the debate on second reading, in fairness we did interrupt second reading in order to refer this matter to committee. It would not appear to be fair to deny senators who have already spoken and who now wish to add something on the basis of the committee's report now before them. If I understand the situation correctly, we are now going to proceed with the first item on the Orders of the Day, which is resumption of the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-201, standing in Senator Bird's name—

Senator Flynn: I do not see that—

Senator Frith: Let me say what I wish to say in order to clarify the point. I know that Senator Bird, the sponsor of the bill, will not wish to speak at this stage, as it would have the effect of closing the debate. I suspect that she would yield to any other honourable senator who wishes to speak. We would then continue with the second reading debate until 6 o'clock or earlier. Whether it be before or at 6 p.m., we will adjourn then until 8 p.m. When we return at 8 o'clock we will vote on second reading and then move immediately to third reading, including any amendments. As far as the debate on second reading is concerned, the refinement Senator Flynn has added is that senators who have already spoken at second reading will be permitted to speak again, but they are requested to limit themselves to the added material that is before us as a result of the tabling of the report.

• (1550)

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I rise to say that of course I will yield. I want everyone to speak to this bill, and I do not want to conclude the debate until later.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I feel there is nothing more that I can usefully add at this point. You have the report of the committee before you, and I have answered some of the questions. I would be pleased to hear the comments of other honourable senators and if I can clarify anything at that time, I will be glad to do so.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have given considerable thought to my leader's suggestion that those who speak for the second time should be confined to remarks with respect to the report. At first I was inclined to take exception to that suggestion, but having given it full thought, I rather come to the conclusion that it is a definite and proper approach. I have spoken to this bill on second reading, and I am about to take advantage of the gesture and speak now to the report. I would merely like to preface my remarks by saying that it is my intention to vote against this bill. I said that before, and I say it again.

I have read with great interest the report of the committee. I am the deputy chairman of that committee. I know that there was a meeting of that committee this morning, of which I received notice, but I did not find it convenient to attend, and I did not attend. So I had no part in the drafting of the report about which I am going to speak. I, therefore, feel the utmost freedom to say what I like about the report.

[Senator Frith.]

The first thing I will say about the report is that when the committee met on a previous occasion—I think somebody said that it was October 14—I made a long and impassioned harangue to the committee; I will not call it a speech. I said that because of personal reasons I would not be present when the report was finalized. I made one request of the committee. I asked that the points of view I was expressing, whether they be my points of view or whether they be shared by others, be at least a feature of the report. My first observation on the report, after having read it with the greatest of care, is that only by vaguest and most indirect suggestion is it indicated that there was anybody at the committee who spoke in opposition to the bill. I did so speak. I spoke as strenuously as I know how to speak. I requested that my opposition be noted and made part of the report. It does not appear in the report.

You may say that I am to be condemned for not attending the committee meeting this morning to make these observations at that time. The fact remains that I was not there and did not make the observations, but I make them now before this chamber merely to show the highhanded manner in which this report has been prepared, and the ignoring of what was said at the previous committee meeting. That is my first comment on this report.

My second comment on the report is with regard to the part which says:

Many individuals and groups from all parts of Canada sent letters, telegrams and briefs which were considered by the Committee on October 13, 1982.

That paragraph, to my mind, is misleading. Many hundreds, not to say thousands, of people did write to the committee. They expressed their views and they did so largely at the urging of myself and other honourable senators. There were many who said, "We will not write". I was told by many that they would not write for the good and sufficient reason that it is a foregone conclusion that the majority in the Senate will carry the bill; that regardless of what those people may say or what their opinions may be, it would only be a wasted effort for them to write, so they did not write. What I am objecting to about the report is that it says that many individuals and groups wrote. It does not indicate how many. In my view, we had a most unusual response to this legislation.

After sitting in the Senate for several years now and sitting as well on this committee, I have never, not once, in all my experience, experienced a response to a bill such as the response which this bill evoked. I think it is misleading if the committee is made to believe that there was some kind of a routine response; that after all this is not a very serious matter. In my opinion, it is a most serious matter. So much for the failure of the committee to indicate the seriousness of the matter.

Nor did the committee indicate the tenor of the responses that were received. I sat here this afternoon and I heard some of my honourable colleagues direct questions to the chairman of the committee, and from the replies to those questions one would judge that the responses put before the committee were almost overwhelmingly in one direction. I want to say in respect to that "overwhelming response" that the direction was against the bill. The people who took the trouble to write were, in the main, people who were opposed to the bill. I heard a belated effort on the part of the chairman of the committee, who said that a group of ladies in Quebec wrote in support of the bill. If they did, it was long after we had considered it in committee, and it is something that is new to me. That response was not before us when we were considering the matter of which I am speaking. The response was almost unanimously against the bill.

It has been said that many societies came forward. Well, there was a direct limitation on the societies. Let me tell the Senate that a decision was taken by the committee at a very early stage that no submission that was received after September 20 would be considered. So many organizations who might have had a great desire to express their feelings on this matter, by the strictures of time were refused that opportunity, because one has come to believe that a Senate committee knows whereof it speaks, and when it says that it will disregard any communication received after a certain date, then as that date nears a person is likely to say, "There is no sense in my writing a letter and, accordingly, I will not write one." But of the societies that were there, I want to say that the great majority of them were against the bill. The great majority of them said that it was destruction of a part of our heritage in this great country, that the name, so reverently selected, so honoured over the years and so used in the history of this country, should be put aside.

And there is great confusion on the subject of the name. People say, "Oh, we chose 'Canada' because 'Canada' is a great name." Who ever said that Canada is not a great name? There is no one in this body who will say more than I what a great name Canada is, but we are not discussing the name of our country. We are discussing the name under which we celebrate a day. I know—and I am still speaking about the report—that there are many people in this house, some of them on my side, who agree with the general tenor of the report, and who think it is desirable to call the day Canada Day rather than Dominion Day. I respect those people; I understand them; they are my friends, although on this occasion we find ourselves ranged on opposite sides of the question. But I want to say to those people, and I say it in all sincerity, that as one who was brought up as a Canadian I do not believe that they thoroughly understand the meaning which the word has for those of us who were so brought up.

• (1600)

There are those who live in Quebec. May I say of the people of Quebec, with all deference, that, in my opinion—and I know I am open to objection on this—they have had a great deal of credit done to them, a great deal of assistance given to them by people who might otherwise have taken entirely different positions.

One has only to look round the world to see what is the history of conquered nations and the manner in which they are treated. If one looks at the French in the province of Quebec, one finds that there has been much in the way of generosity and much in the way of recognition accorded the French, their history, their heritage and their traditions.

If they, in their turn—and I say this with great sympathy—do not realize that there are other traditions, if they do not realize that we in the parts of Canada which speak English have our traditions and our beliefs, then I find it very perplexing that they should take the position: "If you are going to prefer certain traditions, you must prefer ours to those of the British." That, it seems to me, is very hard.

In connection with that matter, I say that the French in the province of Quebec retained their language; they retained their religion; they retained their civil law; they gave in on the criminal law and they shared with all Canadians the criminal law. The French have done wonderful things. The French fought for the independence of this country in the War of 1812; the French have made their contributions in all the great wars that have involved this country as a country; and Quebec is not to be slighted in any way for the part it has played. But it might in all fairness be asked: Will you not on this occasion at least be understanding? Will you not realize that we are not, in any sense of the word, attempting to place before this house any suggestion that we should denigrate, put down or disregard the feelings of the French people of the province of Quebec? We admire them. We respect them. We ask only that they give us—who, after all, are the majority of this country and who, after all, have treated them with what one might say is very great consideration—that same kind of consideration on a question of this kind.

I know that it is said that a poll was taken on this matter. I know that it is said that the poll was definitely in favour of the word "Canada," as applied to our celebration, rather than the word "Dominion". I say to you only that it was a government poll; it was paid for by the government; it was government inspired. We have heard that much was available with respect to it, but we have in fact heard very little about it.

Honourable senators, it makes me think of the statement made before the committee that a poll on the same subject was taken in a classroom of children. Thirty-two were in favour of "Canada Day"; two were for "Dominion Day". Then the teacher spoke to the class, giving them a lecture on the history involved. She gave them a little insight into the history of the word "Dominion", its meaning and use, and then they took another poll. The second poll resulted in 32 being in favour of "Dominion Day" and two being in favour of "Canada Day".

An Hon. Senator: A great teacher!

Senator Donahoe: I say to you that that poll taken in a classroom has little or no meaning. Certainly, it has no more meaning than polls taken on the eve of elections—and we have all been subject to that experience in our time. Such a poll may be meaningless, but it does illustrate the fact that when there is knowledge and understanding of what is meant, and that no offence is meant to be given but that feelings are involved, then you get a response from the public.

I say that given the actions of the federal government in this country, no poll could be taken on a fair basis, because there have been—not hundreds, not thousands but, I am almost ready to say, millions—yes, millions of dollars spent by the federal government in its efforts to induce in the people a feeling that the day ought to be called “Canada Day”.

Senators have stood in this place to say they have received letters. I have received many letters. I have not tabulated them and I do not know the number. Some are included in those counted as having come from Nova Scotians, because my request was not that I be written to but that the committee be written to, and many people did write directly to the committee. Many of our senators have received similar letters and have stood in this house and spoken about them. In that respect all I want to say is that those are serious letters, letters from individuals, letters from a portion of the population which feels deeply about this matter. Therefore, they are letters that should be given great regard.

Honourable senators, in my opinion this report was induced in large part by the representations of the Secretary of State who made certain recommendations to our committee, saying: “We approve this bill. We approve the principle of this bill. It is a matter which requires great haste, because the committee which deals with the celebration of the holiday must act promptly, and it should act almost immediately. Therefore, we will act, and don’t be afraid that the bill is imperfect. Don’t be afraid that it requires amendment. Don’t be afraid that it requires additions. Don’t be afraid that it cannot have its full and proper effect on the legislation of this country without those amendments. Don’t mind that in the least, because you have my word for it that when you have passed the bill dutifully and obediently in the Senate, we will come along and, like the good father, will take care of it. We will introduce a new bill and we will introduce all the things that are lacking in the bill now before you, which you will have passed and which will then be law.” He told us, “We will fix it up. We will bring in a supplementary bill.”

There was then a discussion, and it now says in this report that the government will at the earliest opportunity introduce an appropriate amending bill. If I remember correctly, it was also decided by the committee that the appropriate amendments should be made in this chamber.

With respect to those amendments, I simply wonder how a person with feelings like mine could possibly vote for any amendment. How can one vote to amend a bill the very principles of which one disapproves? The very fact that you vote for an amendment says that you accept it. I do not accept it.

• (1610)

Members of this house may vote for this bill, but that is a matter of choice. The appropriate name may be Canada Day, but nobody has said that it will be an offence to call it Dominion Day, so I will continue to do so.

I am of Irish descent, and there are many people who fail to understand why a person of my background should stand and make speeches on subjects such as this. I have colleagues sitting on this side of the house who do not understand why I feel as I do. Well, I want to tell them that one can be right for the right reasons, and one can be right for the wrong reasons. I may find myself in this situation associated with people who are right for reasons I do not approve. That is quite a matter of fact, but I feel that I am right for the right reasons. Therefore, I make no apologies for standing on my feet and debating something which appears to be inconsistent with my birthright.

I am speaking as a Canadian, one who was born in this country, one who was reared in it, and one who, as a child and as a man, celebrated the national holiday of this country under the name Dominion Day. Since I was summoned to the Senate I have attended the great celebrations on the lawn outside of this building, and I have had it forced on me that the appropriate name for our national holiday is Canada Day.

I spoke of senators who received letters on this matter. I received many letters on this. I received a letter from a man who said that he agreed with me 100 per cent. He said, “I note that our local newspaper agrees with you 100 per cent, and it thinks that you are right and that it should be called “Dominion Day.” He himself was in favour of Dominion Day. He said that that same newspaper, when it published on July 1, 1982, made repeated references to Canada Day. He said—and said this rather impolitely, so I will not use his language in the Senate—that he wished the newspaper would be more consistent and not take different positions at different times because it would then be perhaps more credible, and I have to agree with that. That may very well be true with respect to letters received by other senators as well.

My answer to him is as I answered before, that that newspaper called it Canada Day because it was being pressured by the Government of Canada to call it Canada Day. Quite improperly and without justification, the newspaper was calling it Canada Day.

In conclusion, let me say that this bill is a private member’s bill. The bill puts forward a principle, if you like—a sentimental one, but a principle—and the government of the day sees fit to approve the principle. The government of the day approves the principle. It has taken advantage of the fact that the bill passed the House of Commons, although in a slipshod and an unaccepted manner. It was passed in a somewhat—I was going to say an “improper manner”, but that is not quite right, because it was all proper and legal, but whatever it was, it was not democratic. No one can say that the bill should have been passed in that way.

A bill of this kind affecting, as it does affect, our national heritage, should have been passed with all due solemnity. I want to say here and now that if we were considering a bill which had been introduced by the government, which had been thoroughly and properly debated, and which had been passed after full and complete debate with all members of the House of Commons given a proper and valid opportunity to speak on the matter, I, for one, am the kind of person who might have said, “I will accept that because the majority is speaking.”

[Senator Donahoe.]

But I do not believe that the majority has spoken, but, if it has, I believe that we who are accustomed to calling ourselves the majority in this case must be the minority. However, I think that we are a minority that deserves to be respected. So, I urge all of you to consider and remember that there has been a constitutional departure on the part of the government of this country.

In the past, if a private member's bill was introduced and the government approved the substance of it, the bill was adopted by the government putting forward a government bill and absorbing the private members' bill. If that had happened, the government could have said that it was not afraid to stand up and be counted, and that the members of the government were not afraid to ask Parliament to pass the bill.

Here we have a dubious procedure, a procedure which allowed, by pure accident—and I do say it was by pure accident—a bill to be passed without an opportunity for true discussion. Now that this bill has reached us, we are asked to accept it in imperfect form with an understanding that it will be fixed up later on.

We see the spectacle of a minister of the government coming forward and telling us what the government's attitude is. That is unheard of. If the government were really in favour of this measure, it would have taken steps to see that its own bill came forward. That was within its power and within its rights.

Honourable senators, I have just about completed my remarks and will confine myself, in large measure, to the content of the report. This is a report to which I take great exception. There will be, at a time not yet decided, a vote on this bill. All I want to say to you is that it is a matter for the individual to decide. This is a private member's bill that may or may not be endorsed by the government, but it is not a government bill. We are going to have to answer to the people as to how we voted on it. When we leave this place, that question will be asked of us. Almost every letter I have received said, in a heartfelt plea, "Please ask the Senate to do its duty; please ask the Senate to respect our rights in this matter."

Many of the letters I received asked if there were valid reasons for people to be against this, if it hurt anybody, if it did any injustice to anybody, how would I feel about it, but such is not the case. The word "Dominion", as was stated so eloquently by Senator Macquarrie, when he spoke on this, is a word selected from the Bible to represent our nation, to describe our nation, and it does describe our nation and describes it to perfection, and ever since use of the word was made legal in this country we have used it and have celebrated our national holiday under it.

The people who treasure that name, the people who feel as I feel about that name, are going to hold to account those in this house for the manner in which they vote on the bill.

Many in this house will not follow my lead and vote against the bill; many will vote for it. I only say to those who intend to vote for it: Do so at your own peril, but remember that in the constituencies you represent there are thousands of people who will take it out on you for the way in which you vote on this bill. What is more correct to say is that they will not take it out on you as individuals, because you are senators and you are appointed. You do not have to be afraid. Nothing is going to change with respect to your position if you vote for this bill, but you are sitting on that side of the house representing the government of this country by virtue of the fact that the members of the majority party in the other place support a certain man and say that he shall be the Prime Minister of this country. I say to you that your friends in the other place will be the ones who will bear the suffering and the responsibility for the manner in which you vote on this bill.

• (1620)

With all the strength at my command and with all the words at my disposal, I sincerely invite all of you, when you cast your vote on this bill, to remember that the report which we have been discussing is an unsatisfactory one, that it does not fully represent the decisions that were taken in committee, and that the bill itself will impose upon certain people something which is not repugnant to them, but the manner in which you go about it is repugnant to them. If you really want to call the day that we so revere "Canada Day" then go about it in a proper, orderly and respectful manner, take your chances in the House of Commons, bring the matter before the Senate in the regular manner and vote on it, and you may be very happy with the result. Do it as we are now being asked to do it, and you will be sorry for it and will live to see the day when you will rue your vote.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, in considering this matter I want to confine my remarks to one main point which I think is a very important matter of principle. It arises rather directly out of some evidence given before the committee when it was dealing with this matter on October 13.

In order to get to the point in an orderly way, it is well to consider just what is before us at the moment and what appears on the Orders of the Day for today:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-201, intituled: "An Act to amend the Holidays Act".

That is a perfectly correct statement of the proceedings which are before us today and I have no criticism of it, but it is well to remind ourselves just a little more precisely, within that language, just what is before us. What is before us is Bill C-201, a private member's public bill. That bill was introduced in the other place on May 2, 1980 for first reading. It finally came to the Senate in July 1982, having been passed in the other place.

At the same time, on the Order Paper of the other place was Bill C-37 which was presented for first reading on June 19, 1980. That stands in the name of the Secretary of State of Canada. Therefore, it is a government bill.

Bill C-201, which is before us now, simply and directly proposes to change the name of the day we have chosen to celebrate the anniversary of Confederation to "Canada Day" from "Dominion Day". That is all that is in the bill.

The government bill is a rather different one. It has five clauses in it, instead of one, and provides for celebration days other than July 1, but, in essence, it contains the provision contained in Bill C-201. The wording is somewhat different but the point dealt with is the same. Among some of the other matters contained in it are certain amendments to other ancillary legislation.

The bill came before us in July, not long before our adjournment for the summer. It was obvious we would not have an opportunity for a full debate on the bill, and because there was a desire to have, if I may use the term, the name change passed before the end of the session, we referred the subject matter of the bill to committee rather than wait for second reading before referring it to committee.

The committee met on October 13 and heard what evidence it could on that day, and it was under the constraint of our whole body to make its report today. It has done so and we are entitled to take it into consideration.

I regret very much that we do not have the benefit of the printed evidence. My remarks are based on evidence given by the Secretary of State to that committee. If I misquote the words used by him, I hope honourable senators who were present during that meeting will correct me, if their notes are any clearer than mine, because I do not have the official minutes of the meeting.

I should mention that I, along with a few other honourable senators, was present because of a courtesy extended by the committee, as I am not a member of the committee. I was courteously received, and I asked some questions of the Secretary of State.

Arising out of his answers there is a doctrine on constitutional practice that I consider a change in our long established constitutional practice, as developed in this country since at least 1848, which is nearly 135 years ago. It is that point which I want to deal with. I should like to quote the Secretary of State, in his capacity as a minister of the Crown, not giving information to the committee on extraneous points but dealing with the very matter contained in the bill itself. Speaking for the government, he said:

I think that the will of the government—

Notice that he said "the will of the government."

—is that a clear title should be given to our birthday and that it should be "Canada Day."

• (1630)

That is squarely what is contained in Bill C-201 and also in Bill C-37. I believe I am being fair in paraphrasing his remarks as directly meaning that the government's will is that the name be changed from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day". There are other parts of the evidence to support that statement, but I believe that single statement makes the point I am dealing with. Honourable senators, I am again handicapped because that part of the committee report is in the other official language and, regrettably, my use of it is deficient.

The minister made some other points during the course of his evidence. He stated that the government would bring forward ancillary legislation to perfect the bill. During the course of the committee meeting, I stated:

That is a rather strong admission, namely, that the bill before us is incomplete and is rather imperfect.

His reply to that was as follows:

Yes, senator.

Again, we have a specific statement that the bill is incomplete and imperfect. But he did not want us to amend it because that would mean the bill would go back to the House of Commons. That line of questioning was pursued by myself and others, and I would once again repeat that I regret I do not have the exact text before me today.

This is what I regard as a very strange, new doctrine of responsible government. I hold the view that the basic principle of our operation of Parliament and our system of government, of which all our people are so proud, is rather simple: it is that the government of the day, whatever it may be, must always be answerable to the elected representatives of the people namely, the House of Commons, for all its actions.

In this case we are not dealing with just any incidental action; we are dealing with the government of the day procuring legislation that is its will; that is what we are being asked to do. To me, that is unacceptable. I cannot accept the proposition that any government at any time in this country can procure its will in a legislative forum without being answerable to the elected representatives of the people, namely, the House of Commons, for its actions. It has to be responsible and answerable to that body for its actions. That is the whole point I wish to make.

As long as I am here—and it will not be for very many more months—I will not be a party, at this time or at any other time, to enabling any government to procure its legislative will by having legislation passed without its being answerable for its action to the elected representatives of the people. You can say that I was in the House of Commons too long—as some said in earlier years—but I think our responsibility in this part of Parliament is now somewhat changed from what it was some years ago. Our responsibility was originally to consider regional or provincial matters to protect certain areas from the majority vote in the other place. We were to protect regional interests. In my view, over the last decade or so we have seen an inadvertent diminution of the answerability of government to Parliament. That has come about in various ways which I will not develop at the moment, although at any other time I will be quite prepared to develop and argue the point.

I have considered the evolution of our responsibility in the Senate, as one of the houses of Parliament, to now also include keeping a check on any government in its use of power.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McIlraith: The distinction between the use of power and the abuse of power is very small. Adding the two letters "ab" to the beginning of the word "use" makes a tremendous difference. I have often thought of it myself as being on the wrong side of the razor blade. It is a very thin piece of equipment, but which side your skin is on makes quite a difference. I consider acting as a watchdog of the use of power by government to be one of our duties, along with the oft repeated responsibility for looking after regional interests and for giving sober second thought to legislation on its merits. I am strongly of that view.

I decline to take any step that could be construed in the future as establishing the principle that the government may procure its will through legislation without coming before "the other place". In essence, I touched upon that argument by inference in this place when earlier we were dealing with a procedural matter concerning this bill. It was then suggested that we ought not to amend the bill because that would mean it would have to go back to the House of Commons. I do not know why I should, but I still defend the House of Commons. I abhor the proposition that we should pass an incomplete and imperfect bill and not perfect and complete it by amendment when we are aware of the imperfections and omissions because that would mean it would have to go back before the House of Commons. I will not do it.

Senator Flynn: We have heard that before.

Senator McIlraith: Have you heard the proposition that I will not support it? I am not sure what you meant when you said "that".

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is a compliment, believe me.

Senator Flynn: I mean that the argument to pass a bill without amendment has been made on behalf of the government before, even if we are aware that an amendment should be made.

Senator McIlraith: Thank you very much; I appreciate your point.

I accept the government's undertaking as being in good faith and that it will come about, but I have been around here too long to see basic, far-reaching changes in principle to our constitutional practice made without protesting. Therefore, I must decline to support this bill. I cannot support its principle.

● (1640)

With due deference, I think that I did not succeed in making my point clear to the Secretary of State. I do not believe he understood the point I raised in committee. I shall go further and admit that that may have been because I did not make my point sufficiently clear.

In any event, for the reasons I have so inadequately given today, I will have to decline to support the bill on second reading.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, having spoken before on this bill, I will confine my brief remarks to two points.

I should first like to concur wholeheartedly with what Senator McIlraith has just said. In these days when the supremacy and the dignity of Parliament are constantly being eroded, what he said to us today deserves serious consideration by all of us.

My second point is raised in connection with the report, in the hope that when Senator Neiman comments on the bill a little later she will be good enough to clarify at least this one point. The report mentions that the committee agreed to receive written submissions from private individuals and groups and to hear the evidence of national organizations. Senator Neiman mentioned today that something in the order of 1,700 submissions were received from individuals, and of that number probably over 95 per cent were in opposition to the bill's changing the name of our national birthday from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day". Senator Neiman also read the list of the national organizations which appeared before the committee. I have received copies of almost all of the briefs presented by the groups she mentioned. Certainly, the majority of those national organizations which made submissions were also in opposition to the change of the name of our national birthday. If that is correct, the overwhelming majority of evidence before the committee—received either by written submission or from representatives of national groups—opposed the change of name which this bill brings about. The concluding paragraph of the report, however, says:

After discussion and deliberation, your Committee decided to support the principle contained in Bill C-201,— and recommended that the bill be passed as is, with the consequential amendments.

The conclusion I draw from this—and this is what I would like Senator Neiman to comment upon a little later—is that the decision of the committee was not the result of the representations made in the written submissions from individuals or the submissions made by the national groups attending the committee hearings, but rather was a decision to sustain the government position which, on the committee, was represented by a majority of government members. I suppose there is no ground on which one can say that a committee cannot do that, if that is its decision. It does, however, make a mockery of the whole process of referring the subject to committee if the committee, having received representations, the overwhelming majority of which were in one direction, nevertheless decides that, because the majority of its members represents the government position, it will support what the government proposed in the first place anyway. If that is a proper interpretation of the report, then I am at a loss to know why the exercise of holding committee hearings was carried on at all.

I should like to make one other point with respect to the last recommendation contained in the committee's report. The committee decided to recommend that the necessary consequential amendments to the bill be made by the Senate in this session. Quite frankly, I am puzzled by that recommendation. If it is carried out and the Senate, before passing this bill, makes those amendments to bring it into conformity with the government bill that has already been referred to it, then of course the amended bill will have to go back to the House of Commons for the amendments to be approved there. I doubt that there is an honourable senator on either side of this house who thinks the government leadership in the Senate is going to have this bill go back to the House of Commons. They were able to sneak the bill through the Commons in the dying hours of an afternoon session with less than a quorum present because they knew it would not go through if it were dealt with before a full representation of the house. Surely they are not asking us to be so naive as to think that they are now going to ask the Senate to approve amendments which would have to go back to the House of Commons and thereby open this whole matter up again before that house? That, I am convinced, is the last thing the government wants to do. There is nothing unconstitutional about going through an exercise of this kind, but when we are dealing with the name of the birthday of our country, with all of the emotional importance that attaches to it, to which reference has been made today, we should do so in a dignified manner.

I regret that we are taking up our time with this matter when there are so many far more pressing matters that we should be attending to. If we are going to address matters of this kind, we should not play games. What is the point of saying that we recommend certain amendments, which we know would require the bill's having to go back to the House of Commons, when we also know the government will not agree to them? You will have the opportunity of proving whether I am wrong later on this evening, when we see the results of the votes which are taken.

In my opinion, the way this matter has been handled casts a reflection upon the dignity of the subject we are debating. Surely a matter of this kind is something we can deal with at a time when we are not under pressure to attend to far more urgent matters. Surely we can deal with it in a democratic, appropriate and dignified manner. Then, when it is all over, no matter what the decision is, it can be said that it was properly dealt with, whether one agrees or disagrees with the decision.

I submit that this kind of procedure is not appropriate for the subject under discussion. The way this matter has been dealt with from the beginning reflects upon the dignity of Parliament and upon the respect that should attach to a matter as important as the name by which our national birthday will be remembered from here on into the future.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have listened with appreciative attention to the cogent arguments of Senators Donahoe, McIlraith and Manning. They have set out strongly their reactions to the report of the committee. I view it with a disturbed sense of our not doing things adequately. I suppose that it is the nature of a committee report to be very sketchy. Someone said at the committee meeting this morning that it is extremely difficult to compress in a short report what was done at a committee meeting, especially if there were witnesses who appeared. There are, however, simple little paragraphs contained in this report which are radiant with meaning, and I do not think that we will be able to give them the time required to sort out their significance.

● (1650)

When the committee met, as the second paragraph points out, on August 4, I think in part the decision was regrettable in that not enough was done to elicit expressions of public opinion. I do not know that I can go so far as to say that every individual who wanted to be heard should have been heard. I cannot go quite that far, if I am being practical. But we know that very little was done in a nationally organized way to stir interest in this question. It has been said that a number of honourable senators made overtures through the media. My name was not mentioned—I am used to being ignored, being a small boy from a small province—but I was in touch with the newsprint media of my province, and with my usual forbearance I did not suggest to anyone what view they should convey to the committee, but I suggested that if they cared they should do it. The response from Prince Edward Island was very good.

The point is that without a heavily organized effort there was, as Senator Donahoe has already mentioned, a veritable flow of letters and telegrams from across Canada. I am wondering if we are not paying too scant attention to that flow of letters. It is said that Canadian people really do not care for things like that, that we are dull and do not care for symbols. But if 1,700 people in the midst of a summer can show such interest, are we to say, "Oh, well, Canadians don't care."? I wonder if they care more than we may think.

I believe that Senator Bell was quite right—and this contributes to my feeling of inadequacy, not as an individual but as a member of the Senate and of the committee—in suggesting that we should have the proceedings of that committee. These witnesses were heard on October 13 and most of them had their statements in long before that. I do not think many committees were meeting during the recess. It would be very useful for every honourable senator to know, for instance, what our former colleague, Senator Eugene Forsey, said. Some very interesting comments were made and unless we believe that we are beyond the capacity to change our mind, no matter how valuable and forcible the argument, then, I repeat, it would be valuable to have the proceedings.

While we will meet a deadline and do something with dispatch, I enter upon this stage of our deliberations wondering, again, if we are giving the question the kind of care and thought it deserves. I am not at all unprepared to live with the outcome and I think that our wise colleague, Senator Manning, may be predicting things quite well. I am not troubled by that, for I have been in minorities most of my life, but I would like to use the words Senator McIlraith often uses: I would like to feel that we are doing the job well—and I wonder, in this instance, if in fact we are.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to deal briefly with the committee report and some of the comments that have been made about it. It is disturbing to me to hear some of the, almost, allegations about the manner in which the committee dealt with the subject matter that was referred to it. Senator Macquarrie and Senator Manning used such words as "playing games," "respect," "dignity" and that sort of thing. Then they went back and examined the logic behind the arguments they put. It seems to me that they are trying to argue that the committee's function is simply to count numbers and that it does not have an intelligent capability, of itself, to make a decision after hearing the arguments. There are a lot of other words that could be used to describe that kind of logic, but it certainly is amazing to me that any person who understands the legislative process and, indeed, the responsibility of members of a legislative body sitting as a committee for the purpose of considering representations, should be reduced to simply a matter of counting numbers.

Then these honourable senators went on to the next stage of their remarks and attempted to prove—and, incidentally, absolutely falsely—that there was an overwhelming number of persons or citizens represented at these hearings who were in favour of rejecting the bill. That is wrong. I am not saying it is deliberately false, but it is misleading because it does not reflect the facts. For example, the chairman of the committee said earlier today that one submission they received was from a group that represented 70,000 members. Should we put that group up against the 1,700, if we are going to play this numbers game, or should we set that aside? Two other organizations that made representations to the committee also represent several thousand people.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: One hundred, to be exact.

Senator Olson: There were more than that, but that is not the argument that these honourable senators were making. They were talking about the individual post cards, coupons, newspaper clip-outs and so on that came in, as though they were the basis on which the decision ought to be made.

Senator Lang: Better it be that way than through a Gallup poll commissioned by the Secretary of State.

Senator Frith: Who cares who commissioned it?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Some people do.

Senator Olson: It seems to me that the committee members have the right to be respected for their intelligence and capability to reach their decision on the basis of what they believe is not only supported by the majority of Canadian citizens but what they themselves, after hearing the arguments, want to support. That is the way in which committee are run. I have been at all kinds of committee meetings where one could simply count numbers as though there was nobody more intelligent in the total membership of that committee than people who could count on one side of the argument or the other.

Hon. Jack Marshall: What about the people you represent?

Senator Olson: That is an amazing part of the argument that is being advanced now, and those honourable senators are perfectly entitled to advance it if they like.

Hon. David Walker: Thank you.

Senator Olson: But I resent that they feel they can go on from there and say that we are playing games with the performance before the committee, or that we have any lack of respect for their intelligence on such things as the dignity of the members of the committee and their right to make a decision for or against a proposition before them.

I merely wanted to make a short intervention to suggest to you that anybody who attempts to present that kind of argument here to degrade the function of the committee should examine the misplaced logic upon which they make their argument.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hope not to detain the Senate too long because I think the important points in this debate have already been registered, but perhaps I can put a new gloss on some of the facts that have been placed before us. I always like to look on the bright side of a difficult question. When one deals with national symbols one is dealing with a difficult question, and when one considers the way in which this bill came before the Parliament of Canada one is dealing with a difficult question. But I take some small pleasure, satisfaction perhaps, in the fact that at least to some extent we in the Senate have discharged our responsibility to give a resolution of this kind suitable debating time in this house and that we have had a committee hold public hearings on what should be done.

● (1700)

When I think of the events that led up to the decision to hold the matter over from our previous August meeting, I must say that I am glad. I pay my compliments to Senator Flynn, who was a leading spirit in suggesting that the Senate had a duty to give this bill greater consideration than had been suggested by the leadership on the government side at that time. I must admit at once that, if his argument had not persuaded the government to change its mind, we would not be debating this matter this afternoon. But he was persuasive. I congratulate both him and the members of the government who accepted his argument for being helpful in the work of the Senate.

I must say that I am not entirely satisfied with what we have done because I agree with what other senators have said about the committee. It seems to me that the committee's report could have been much more illuminating. Consider the reports from the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, for example. They list the people who appear and give a resume of their points for and against so that anyone reading the report can get a pretty good idea of the arguments and what the committee deemed persuasive. I think that device could well have been used in this report before us now. It might then have been a little more extensive in terms of the committee's proceedings. I just offer that by way of observation.

I also wonder why the full report of the proceedings of the committee could not have been before us. After all, if I am correct, the committee met last seven to ten days ago. If that is the case, why is it that the verbatim record of the committee meetings is not before us? No other committee has been meeting. There is no other branch of Parliament that is meeting. I don't know what those responsible are doing when we are not here. I wonder why we do not have the full proceedings before us at this time. To that extent, although I am pleased that the Senate has been working at this matter a little more carefully and diligently than our colleagues in the other place, its report still falls short of what could well be expected.

I take no pleasure in this debate because, when one deals with national symbols, emotions are close to the surface. Arguments, however valid and persuasive in other circumstances, fail to convince when one's heart is involved. As we have seen, and from what we have heard from other gentlemen and ladies who have spoken in this debate, this is an issue that does engage the emotions. Apart from that, one has to regret that it also has regional implications, of which I think we are all aware. And when issues come before a parliamentary chamber of this kind, issues which involve the national symbols of the country, where regional differences are strongly marked, and emotions are evident, surely it is to be hoped that at least we can decide them on the basis of a free vote. It seems to me incredible that that has not been found possible.

Of course, I think the reason why that has not been possible was explained very clearly by Senator McIlraith. He pointed out that the government has indeed avoided its responsibility to stand behind its legislation in the place where the elected representatives are located. It has followed this easy path of getting a rather difficult subject through the House of Commons without normal debate and discussion, and without the government having to adopt formally and explicitly in that chamber its responsibility for the contents of the measure. We all know where their hearts lie, but they have avoided the debate in the other house, and one has to regret that.

I must say that if Senator McIlraith had been with some of us on our recent visit to Australia, to take a look at the proceedings which take place in an elected Senate, he would know that the elected Senate in that country does provide a check upon the unlimited—perhaps that is a strong word—a check upon the almost unlimited power of the executive in the parliamentary system as it has developed in Canada. I am very sympathetic to what Senator McIlraith had to say about the dictatorship of the executive. I am interested in his implication, at least, that this body could exercise a reasonable role in providing a check and balance not otherwise provided in our system against acts of an executive of that kind.

I hope I may enlist him in due course among the supporters of the proposition that the Senate of Canada should be elected so that we would have the constitutional legitimacy and political legitimacy to enable us to deal with these matters on their merits, as a body which would not be subjected to the same constraints which perhaps necessarily are involved in the confidence of the House of Commons.

I feel that this debate may serve some purpose if it brings to light some of the problems in the Canadian parliamentary system—problems that I think are illustrated by the proceedings of this chamber today.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Olson: Are you suggesting that they are illegitimate?

Senator Walker: Speak for yourself.

Senator Olson: I don't follow your argument there.

Senator Roblin: I think if you consult your colleague sitting beside you, he will be able to give you some sound advice as to the force of the argument.

Senator Olson: You are accusing us all. I kind of resent that.

Senator Roblin: You don't like being called illegitimate. There is another phrase one could use.

Senator Flynn: There is another word.

Senator Roblin: But neither phrase would be correct as applied to my honourable friend. He is as legitimate as all-get-out. He is as legitimate as a five-cent piece. He is as legitimate as the words "Dominion Day". He is legitimate. I cast no aspersions on his legitimacy. All I am saying is that, politically, his credentials are questionable when it comes to opposing the voice of the elected chamber by the veto of the appointed chamber. That is the point I am making. He knows it very well, and I will not indulge myself in dealing any further with that matter.

But I must say to him that his attitude about the respect that one should accord to the proceedings of a committee of this chamber interests me. He tells us on the one hand that we are not to talk about numbers—although he uses the numbers argument very cleverly himself in trying to controvert what Senator Manning said. He takes the numbers argument and turns it around for his own purpose. As a debating technique there is nothing wrong with that. That is fine. But then he goes on to say that we should respect the judgment of this committee, which is coming in with a recommendation that this bill should be passed. But it is doing more than that. It is coming in with a recommendation that this bill should be passed "as amended." The committee asks this chamber to do the amending, and if my honourable friend is so keen about the legitimacy, if he wants to use that term, or about the respect one should offer the committees of this house, I wonder what he will do when he deals with that part of the committee's recommendations. But he is not going to. He is going to be a little selective. He is going to pick the recommendations of the committee that suit him, and the rest he will let lie on the floor of the chamber.

Senator Olson: And that is the choice of every other senator in this chamber.

Senator Roblin: Why, certainly, but every other senator did not stand up here five minutes ago to extol the respect that we should offer to the decisions of committees of this house.

Senator Frith: You can respect somebody without agreeing with him.

Senator Flynn: That is not what he said.

Senator Frith: Sure.

Senator Roblin: Well, my honourable friend can pursue the argument if he wishes, but it seems to me that he is pretty selective in paying his respects to the intelligence of the committee. I don't think he even said we should support them; he merely said we should respect their intelligence. So we are going to respect their intelligence in passing the bill, but we are not going to respect their intelligence, when they say "pass it as amended." That is a nice point that he can settle himself some time. It is really not worth pursuing any further now.

I do wish to say that it is with regret that I realize that this chamber will have to deal with a bill on which the expressed opinion of the other house in response to a government measure is lacking. I regret that this house has to deal with a question of national symbols in which the elected members are just as interested as we are, if not more so, without having the advantage of having the issue—and I think we are ignoring the propriety of this—placed by the government before the other house as a government measure.

It cannot be a good thing that a matter of this kind, that is disputed so vigorously, should come to us in this defective way. I do not know what the people of Canada want to do about Dominion Day and Canada Day, because no one has asked them directly, so far as I know. But, whatever the polls may say—I haven't seen one, but I have read the reports of one—I do know that my correspondence does not say that. I join those other members of the chamber who report that the letters they have received are almost unanimously in favour of Dominion Day. I also say that in my own correspondence there is quite a marked regional aspect to the letters that have reached me, and I know that certain parts of the country certainly do not want Dominion Day changed. I must admit, however, that I may well find that other parts of the country do want the name changed to Canada Day.

But I do find it appalling that the issue should be left to us, the appointed body if you please, to decide, while the great constitutional machine in the House of Commons, with the government's responsibility to present government legislation to that chamber, is sidetracked and brought to naught by a fortuitous sequence of events. I don't think anyone really anticipated it; if they did, they are a lot cleverer than I think they are. But when it happened, they allowed it to go ahead without taking advantage of the opportunity to have the matter reviewed in the proper forum as a piece of government policy.

• (1710)

Senator Olson: On a point of order, honourable senators. I think that Senator Roblin knows as well as any member of this house that it is absolutely against the Rules of the Senate to reflect on the proceedings and decisions of the other place, yet he has pursued that line for the past several minutes.

Senator Roblin: I am willing to be chastised by my honourable friend; I am willing to be corrected if I have in any way offended the customs, precedents or conventions in this respect. I assure my friend that that was an inadvertent reflection on facts which perhaps I should pretend are non-facts.

If that is the case, and if my honourable friend feels I have trespassed against his view of propriety, I accept his rebuke and will try to confine myself to matters that are before this house. However, I do not take back a word of what I said about the constitutional aspect of this matter that was so well developed by Senator McIlraith. I will only say another word or two, because I have spoken longer than I had intended.

Undoubtedly, opinion is divided. It is a sad thing that, on most occasions when we deal with the emblems of the nation, we cannot find ourselves with a greater degree of consensus than we find now. I have always felt that it would be better if these matters were proceeded with in an extra-parliamentary manner: In other words, that we should cultivate the ground before we sow the seed; that there should be a wider degree of public participation and consideration in matters of national symbols which, after all, are not matters of fact but are matters of emotion.

Those things could be well explored and at greater length outside the regular parliamentary system. Then perhaps we could find ourselves with a greater measure of consensus, harmony and amity in dealing with matters about which there really ought to be no dispute.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, it is very obvious that instructions were given that we restrict our remarks to the report. Since we have gone into Senate reform, and other things, I feel that the subject has become very broad.

Senator Roblin: I have only spoken once; I can say anything I like.

Senator Marshall: I was not going to say anything, but Senator Manning struck a note within me when he talked about our dignity being eroded.

That being so, I should like to read a paragraph found in an editorial in the Globe and Mail, because that indicates what effect this has had or could have on the whole of the country. That states:

Whatever one thinks of the move to abolish the name Dominion Day, there is no excuse for the bum's rush being given to Canadians who want a say in the process, and who are willing to make an appointment and travel to Ottawa to deliver their opinion. Does the government not realize how important an issue this is to Canadians, or, as its performance in the Commons suggested, does it just not care?

This reflects the story we have heard over and over again to the effect that what we are doing here will not affect anything and that we do not care about anything.

One can talk of Senate reform, but all we have to do in the Senate is have the guts to do our duty—that is, refuse to pass this legislation. This is a classic case of our trying not to hurt anyone by refusing to pass the legislation. If we were to refuse to pass the legislation before us we would help the minority of those in Canada who feel that this measure should not be passed. If we were to do that, it would appear to Canadians that the Senate is doing what it is supposed to do.

Senator Olson: What we are supposed to do does not necessarily mean that we agree with you.

Senator Marshall: I do not care what you agree with.

I saw an article in the paper about what you are going to do with the Senate. You are going to sell the Senate, so here is an opportunity for you to sell the Senate to the people of Canada, to that minority you spoke of. You can tell those people that the Senate will do its duty and not pass this legislation—and this is not even legislation. This was passed by 12 members of the other place. They put through a mischievous bill, a bill not in the interests of any Canadian. They passed the bill because they wanted it. It was a selfish act, and because they wanted it, we are told that we have to go along with it; that the Senate must abide by that and pass the bill.

It is a matter of principle and conscience. We do not have to become an elected Senate, all we have to do is our duty. We are here to stop that kind of legislation, to protect the provinces and minority and individual rights, and we can do that if we would only show some individuality and independence and say, "The hell with you and the House of Commons, we are working for the people of Canada."

I repeat again, we cannot hurt anybody by refusing to pass this piece of legislation. We can send it back to the Commons, have it introduced as a government bill, and then deal with it in the proper manner.

Let us for once, before we are abolished, or before we are thrown out of here, do something that is conscionable. Let us act as we are supposed to act on behalf of the people of Canada.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I am going to be perhaps a little more intellectually honest than some of the speakers before me this afternoon and say to the Senate that what I intend to say does not strictly pertain to the subject matter of the report. I have spoken to this matter on second reading before, I suppose, by introducing an amendment so that anyone could call our national holiday Canada Day or Dominion Day.

I should like to proceed now, with leave of the Senate, even though the time is 5.25 p.m. I have waited until anyone else who might have risen had done so—

Senator Flynn: Why not speak on third reading?

Senator Lang: I would like to know whether I have leave to proceed.

My subject matter is new, it is unusual, and I would rather put it before the Senate now than on third reading, because I think it might very well affect the thinking of some senators.

This is original material which I received just this past weekend. It has not been referred to before in this chamber, nor in the massive amount of correspondence that we have received.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Lang has been candid enough to say that he intends to speak until 6 o'clock. Of course, we have all agreed that the vote will take place at 8 o'clock, and that there be no further debate on second reading after 6 o'clock. If we put those two together, we are foreclosing the right of the sponsor of the bill to close the debate on second reading.

We further agreed, as far as senators speaking a second time on second reading is concerned, that their remarks must pertain to the report. I appreciate that Senator Lang is saying that he intends to use the remaining time to not observe that rule, and is asking for leave to not observe that rule.

My respectful submission, honourable senators, is that I have heard nothing by way of explanation as to why Senator Lang's remarks cannot quite properly be heard at third reading stage. So, I do not understand why he cannot observe the rule as everyone else has. If he wants to bring forward this material—which, of course, we want to hear—he can do so on third reading without changing anything that we have agreed to.

Senator Lang: I am quite prepared to abide by the rule, since so many senators who spoke before me have not done so. I was honest enough to say that the material I should like to put before the Senate does not strictly address the question of the report of the committee. I had hoped my honesty would have been appreciated by some senators who have not observed the rule with the same exactitude.

Senator Frith: I have already expressed my appreciation for Senator Lang's candor, but that does not necessarily carry the whole question. There is also the question as to whether Senator Lang intends to give Senator Bird, the sponsor of the bill, some time before 6 o'clock to close the debate on second reading.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I take it before I embark on what I intend to say that Senator Lang has been refused leave, because if he has not been refused leave I would not in any way want to interfere with his opportunity to speak. Has leave been refused or not?

● (1720)

Senator Frith: Yes, it has.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, if I understand correctly from what Senator Lang said, the reason why he would prefer to make his remarks now before second reading is because he has new information which perhaps might persuade us that we do not wish to approve this bill in principle. If this is the case and he does not speak until third reading, and in the meantime we approve the bill in principle, are we not going against our own best interests?

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I should like it noted on the record that I have been refused leave, and I believe this is the first time it has happened in the 17 years I have been in this chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Smith.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: You have only been refused leave to not observe the course we have agreed upon. I am surprised that it is the first time.

Senator Smith: I believe I have the floor. If the deputy leader would not mind recognizing the calling of my name by Mr. Speaker, I should like to proceed.

I have not spoken on second reading before, and I am not in any way inhibited by the agreement that those who have spoken before on second reading must deal only with the report.

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator Smith: If I may, I should like to draw attention, although not so well as he did, to the point made by Senator McIlraith about the importance of preserving the constitutional practice in Parliament. I think he is absolutely right in what he said. I think his argument was absolutely right. I will not repeat it because of the constraints of time, but I want to say with all the emphasis that I can command that I think he is right.

I want to turn to the question of not having the minutes of the proceedings of the committee before us. I do not know why we do not have them before us. Ample time has elapsed since October 13, and I would have thought it would have been possible for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to arrange for those proceedings to be available when we came to listen to the report, to debate it and to consider second reading of the bill. We have not got them. The fact that we have not got them means absolutely, without doubt, that we are being asked to give second reading to a bill without having the opportunity to become familiar with the very evidence which we asked the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to hear when we referred the bill to it.

In fact, we are saying, "Look, we referred this bill to you so that you could hear what people have to say," and now we are saying we do not care very much what those people said. We are not even going to have the printed proceedings before us so we can inform ourselves.

I know what they said in committee because I was there, as were 18 or 19 other honourable senators, some of whom were not members of the committee. The leadership of this Senate is asking us to forget that we referred this bill to committee so that it might hear representations that the people of Canada wished to make. They are saying we do not care what those people said. They are saying we are not even interested in reading what they said. I find that as surprising as the Leader of the Government found the representations that he took such vigorous exception to a few minutes ago. Of course, he is going to find it hard to take exception to what I say if he does not listen to what I say.

Senator Olson: I need something to listen to.

Senator Smith: He will listen if he doesn't find something in what I say objectionable. I knew I would get a rise out of him if I just gave him a chance. You can always tell what bait some suckers will take. I am glad I read him right this time.

Senator Walker: Sucker!

Senator Olson: He had better get to his point soon because I will be leaving shortly.

Senator Smith: The honourable gentleman still wants to talk. I draw to his attention that he took his opportunity to talk on this bill, so now he has to say what he wants to say by way of rude interruption rather than by proper speech.

Senator Olson: I am interrupting without being rude.

Senator Smith: That, of course, would not trouble him because he finds that to his advantage on many occasions.

We are being asked to pass this bill in a hurry.

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Smith: Of course we are.

Senator Olson: We are being asked to pass it in the predictable time that was known two months ago.

Senator Smith: Two months? What has the honourable gentleman got to say about two months' notice? The government bill was before the House of Commons ever since 1980 which, in my judgment, is—

Senator Olson: To be more accurate, since 1946.

Senator Smith: No, the government bill on this very subject in this very session was introduced in the House of Commons in 1980, and has been standing there ever since and has not been dealt with. In my calculation, that means a good deal more than two months, and if he is complaining that we have had this before us for two months, then I can quite properly ask him what the government has been doing for two years with its bill. I can tell him what it has been doing. It has not had the guts to put it forward.

Senator Olson: That's wrong.

Senator Smith: That's right.

Senator Olson: That's wrong.

Senator Smith: That's right, and he knows it's right.

Senator Olson: I don't know it's right.

Senator Smith: Oh, don't you. I am sorry the honourable gentleman is so poorly informed. The next time he interrupts he should do so on a subject that he knows something about.

Senator Olson: I know about this subject. I have no qualms or compunction about this subject at all.

Senator Smith: In a moment the honourable gentleman is going to complain that I am taking up the time which he takes up by his mutterings.

Senator Olson: I am only doing that because you invited me to.

Senator Smith: I didn't invite you to do that. I just offered you the opportunity and you took it, hook, line and sinker.

The honourable gentleman tries to make out that the government is not trying to pass this bill in a hurry. I think we all know that is exactly what the government is trying to do because it knows it would not be able to get it through the House of Commons as soon as it wants to.

Senator Olson: He is 190 degrees off.

Senator Smith: What excuses did the minister of the government who came before that committee offer? I wish we had the proceedings so I could read them verbatim, and what reason he gave for wanting to get this bill dealt with in this peculiar way. Like Senator McIlraith and all the rest of us, I do not have the proceedings before me because they have not been printed yet. I do not even have as good notes as Senator McIlraith has, but I have some recollection of what the Secretary of State said when asked why they wanted to proceed with this bill now instead of doing it properly, and making sure it got proper treatment in the House of Commons. The effect of his answer was that the committee that is going to arrange the celebrations for next July 1 wanted it done so they would have plenty of time to know whether it was Canada Day or Dominion Day in their advertising and in their other preparations for the celebration which is ten months away.

For that the government is willing to risk doing what Senator McIlraith so clearly pointed out was wrong. For a reason that Senator McIlraith has fairly pointed out is wrong, the government is going to take the onus of putting this bill through in a hurry without it's going through the House of Commons. The reason is that this committee—which has been doing without this for many years—can put the name “Canada Day” in the documentation advertising the celebration, which is five-sixths of the year away. That is the best reason they can give for doing something that is offensive to many Canadians, is offensive to the dignity of this place, if not to the dignity of the other place and, as Senator McIlraith says, is setting a bad precedent. All this so that the committee that is going to arrange these celebrations for next July 1—as it has done in previous years—can have its desires gratified and know in advance what it is going to do.

● (1730)

Honourable senators, it seems to me that that is a very poor reason for asking this Senate to forgo its proper role as a body which examines carefully, with sober second thought, legislation which clearly infringes upon the propriety of parliamentary procedure and sets a bad precedent. For those reasons, if for no others—and there are many—I submit that this bill should not be passed.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to make an intervention in this debate but, having participated in the committee meetings, I have decided to make a very brief comment on what I learned on that occasion.

I was impressed to learn the extent to which members of the Italian community are integrated into Canadian society. During the committee meetings, Mrs. Laura Sabia, a first generation Canadian, appeared on behalf of the Royal Commonwealth Society and, although I will make no comment on what she actually said, I would note that she was their spokesperson. The leading spokesman for the Monarchist League of Canada was a Mr. Toffoli, a first generation Canadian, whose parents came from the same part of Italy that I come from. Then Dr. Leone made representations on behalf of the ethnic groups, and he spoke overwhelmingly in support of the change in the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day.

I have made some soundings of public opinion in Toronto among people who come from minority groups and I have found overwhelming support for this proposed change. I did not want to speak on their behalf on this occasion because I think very eloquent discussions have already taken place in committee and in the Senate. I did not feel there was any need for me to make an intervention.

But I have also recently consulted Canadians with a non-ethnic background and, in particular, the Honourable Walter Gordon whom, I am sure, all honourable senators know. On October 12 he wrote to me in the following terms:

During our telephone conversation last week, you mentioned that you were . . . a member of a Senate Committee charged with responsibility for deciding whether our national holiday should continue to be called “Dominion Day” or whether it should be changed to “Canada Day”.

I am surprised there should be any question about this. We are no longer a dependency, or a colony, or a dominion of the United Kingdom. Having gone through the agony of the long constitutional debate, I should have thought that kind of question would have been laid to rest for all time.

I suppose there may be a few relics of the past who are still nostalgic about our former ties with Britain and our one-time colonial status. But I expect the great majority of Canadians now think of ourselves as Canadians and think of Canada as a separate, independent state—or as separate and independent as any nation can be in this troubled world. If an opinion poll were taken on this particular question, I expect those in favour of “Canada Day” would be in an overwhelming majority.

Senator Marshall: What party does Walter Gordon belong to?

Senator Bosa: I will be very pleased to make the curriculum vitae of the Honourable Walter Gordon available to Senator Marshall.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I would ask one question: Is this Walter Gordon the same Walter Gordon who advocated moving the people of the Atlantic provinces to other parts of Canada?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bosa: I did not hear all of that question, but I will make a point of reading it in Hansard.

In answer to Senator Marshall's question, I would assure him that Walter Gordon is as blue-blooded a Canadian as anyone in this chamber.

I also asked other Canadians, such as Professor Brian Land, who has a curriculum vitae which would impress anyone in this country and whose ancestors were United Empire Loyalists. He was very much in favour of changing the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day. This opinion was also shared by Clyde Batten from Toronto, whose ancestors came to this country in the 17th century.

By reciting these facts, I want to impress upon honourable senators that this is not a view held only by new Canadians or French Canadians, as someone intimated, but a view that is shared by the majority of Canadians of all ethnic backgrounds.

I realize that this is a very sensitive issue, particularly since we are dealing with a national symbol, but I would point out that, when a great number of Canadians perceive that Dominion Day does not reflect what the majority of Canadians expect it to reflect, it makes me support this bill and I will vote in favour of changing the name of our national holiday from Dominion Day to Canada Day.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Bird speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Joan Neiman: I wonder if Senator Bird would grant me the courtesy of allowing me to make a few comments at this point.

Senator Bird: Of course.

The Hon. the Speaker: You may proceed.

Senator Neiman: I should like to reply to a few comments which were made with respect to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the subject matter of Bill C-201.

One of my colleagues this afternoon commented on the fact that it is regrettable that we do not have the transcript of the proceedings of our hearings which were held on October 13. I agree with that comment. The committee meeting was 10 days ago, and the reason why senators do not have copies of the transcript of proceedings is simply a matter of time constraint. As the members of the committee who attended that hearing will recall, the hearings were extensive and lasted all day long. They were conducted almost entirely in the English language. The translation of that very extensive transcript has held up the availability of the transcript.

As you will recall, there were 32 members on our committee. All members received a comprehensive volume containing arguments and background material along with the submissions of all the organizations which were to appear before us. In addition, any other senator who wished to attend the proceedings was free to do so, and some who were not members of the committee did, in fact, attend.

Since then, of course, these reports and submissions have been available to anyone who cared to ask for them. Any member of the committee could have circulated those submissions to anyone else. Therefore, while I do share the regret that we do not have that report before us, since it would be more convenient to be able to refer to it, I think that the contents of those submissions were made available to the people who had to make the decisions.

In that context, honourable senators, I rather regret some of the comments which were made by Senator Manning, whom I respect very highly. In reply, I can only echo the remarks that were made earlier by the Leader of the Government to the effect that, apart from the submissions which we heard, we also had letters circulated among us from a number of people. We had evidence of two Gallup polls which were taken at the instance of the government in an effort to try to arrange the celebration of July 1. The Gallup poll, however, is a highly respected, independent organization. The government had commissioned these reports simply to be informed in order to try to make decisions. I believe, as will anyone who is aware of the contents of those Gallup polls, that there seems to be a large majority of people who favour the name "Canada Day." That was simply persuasive evidence which was put before the committee.

I was grateful for the support and co-operation of all committee members. We did not, of course, agree on the contents of the report—as has been said, it was not a unanimous report—but everyone discussed the matter thoroughly and came to those decisions, as Senator Frith has said, not necessarily along party lines.

In reply to Senator Donahoe, I am aware that he was at the committee meeting for a certain part of the day, on into the afternoon.

Senator Donahoe: The whole day.

Senator Neiman: I do not have to remind honourable senators that he does make his point very forcefully and well. He is quite right; he did say that he had to leave before the conclusion of the hearings that day and he wanted his opinions and objections to be noted. I can only assure him that I believe everybody at that meeting understood extremely well what his opinion was before he left. The fact remains, however, that, as chairman of the committee, under the Rules of the Senate and Beauchesne, I cannot record in a report individual comments of members. There were other senators who had to leave who voiced their opinions, which were contrary to those of Senator Donahoe and which were also not recorded in the committee's report. I believe that all committee members who remained to take part in formulating the first draft of the report that day were conscious of the remarks made by Senator Donahoe. It is regrettable that he found it inconvenient,—to use his word—to attend the meeting this morning, because he might have been able to add something to the report as it now stands, or, indeed, might have changed its tenor.

Honourable senators, I think that what I have said is sufficient to answer some of the criticisms that were made with respect to the report. Because Senator Roblin mentioned that he would have preferred a report that was, in his words, somewhat more illuminating, I might add that I think it can be said that that alternative was considered by the committee. In essence, it was decided to be almost too difficult to try to record with any conciseness the diverse opinions we heard. It would be almost impossible to be fair and to balance the opinions, both for and against.

Senator Donahoe: Would the honourable senator who last spoke permit one question? A decision was taken by the committee to restrict receipt of submissions to September 20, and we on the committee were told that that was in order to provide an opportunity for such submissions to be translated. My question is: Were the submissions which were received up to September 20 translated into the other language?

Senator Neiman: Yes, they were all translated, Senator Donahoe.

Senator Donahoe: Why, then, the delay in making them available now?

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, obviously I do not have time to close the debate now. Since honourable senators have not provided me enough time, I would like to wait until third reading.

An Hon. Senator: Go ahead.

Senator Bird: No, honourable senators are tired and hungry and I will say what I have to say in the debate on third reading, if I am given a chance.

Senator Flynn: As is provided in the Rules, Mr. Speaker, you are to leave the chair, and warn the Senate that at 8 o'clock there will be the vote.

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: I shall be brief, honourable senators. Not having had an opportunity at any stage to speak on this bill, I will say that I have listened with interest to the remarks made here today. I have also examined the various statements of honourable senators, some of which were excellent speeches and observations made earlier in the session, concerning the bill. Most of them contained expressions of unhappiness, of unease, at the way Bill C-201 came to the Senate from the other place.

Since the adjournment of the house on August 4, I have received letters, phone calls and personal approaches in this regard. I am not talking in terms of thousands, but I had as many as six, seven, eight, perhaps 900 approaches. I would have to say that I have not received as many representations concerning any piece of legislation since coming to the Senate. Every representation that came to my attention opposed changing the name of our national birthday.

Honourable senators, in the first paragraph of the preamble to the BNA Act we read:

Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally unified into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is 6 o'clock and, according to the Rules, I have to leave the Chair at this moment. We will reconvene—

Senator Sherwood: If I have unanimous consent, Your Honour, I can proceed. I only require another minute.

[Senator Neiman.]

The Hon. the Speaker: I have no choice. I have to leave and I will reconvene the Senate at 8 o'clock this evening.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, that this bill be read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time on the following division:

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

NIL

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

METROPOLITAN-ARCHBISHOP MAXIM HERMANIUK, HEAD OF THE UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH IN CANADA, AND OTHER BISHOPS

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to a group of distinguished visitors sitting in the Senate gallery this evening.

I should like to present His Grace, Metropolitan-Archbishop Maxim Hermaniuk of Winnipeg, the Head of the Ukrainian Catholic Church in Canada, and welcome him to this chamber. In particular, we wish to warmly congratulate the prelate on the high award, Officer of the Order of Canada, which he received from His Excellency, Governor General Edward Schreyer, at the investiture last Wednesday, October 20. He is now wearing this beautiful medal. This is a worthy and well deserved recognition for the many outstanding services and contributions he has made to Canada in the fields of religion, ecumenism, social welfare, culture and the unity of our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: Metropolitan-Archbishop Hermaniuk is accompanied by several bishops of his hierarchy: Their Excellencies Bishop Nil Savaryn of Edmonton, Bishop Demetrius Greschuk also of Edmonton, Bishop Jerome Chimy of Vancouver, and Bishop Myron Daciuk of Winnipeg.

Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

Senator Yuzyk: Bishop Isidor Borecki of Toronto was unable to be present because of a previous commitment. We extend a warm welcome to them and to the several priests in attendance. We are sorry to learn, however, that His Excellency Bishop Andrew Roborecki of Saskatoon, who was to be one of this distinguished group this evening, suddenly passed away in Toronto on October 23 in the course of his duties. We extend our heartfelt sympathy to his fellow bishops, to his family, and to the faithful of the Eparchy of Saskatoon.

HOLIDAYS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Florence B. Bird, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(b), moved the third reading of Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act.

She said: Honourable senators, I have listened thoughtfully to all honourable senators who have spoken on this bill, and I listened carefully to the witnesses who appeared before the committee. There are a few points that I think I should deal with briefly. It was not surprising that the Monarchist League of Canada, the Royal Commonwealth Society, which used to be the Royal Empire Society and before that the Royal Colonial Society, and the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire were, understandably, afraid that the Monarchy may be injured by this bill. As I said when I presented the bill, it has nothing to do with the Monarchy, which is firmly entrenched in the Constitution Act of 1982.

Some of the witnesses were also worried that there may be an erosion of the Dominion. Also entrenched in the Constitution Act is the fact that the name of this dominion is Canada, and I think a great many people like the name "Canada". A number of senators and some of the witnesses felt that our traditions were being eroded by this change in name. I think it is important to understand that traditions grow as the country grows. I always think of them as the seed of a nation which has been put in good earth and, in due course, a small green tender shoot comes up. Then, after a while, there is a sapling and then, later, a great maple tree with branches coming from every country. The traditions that are good for that tree are different from the ones that were good for the small seed on the sapling. Therefore, I think we should not be worried about the growth of traditions. They are what a country acquires as it gets older. The time came when we needed a distinctive flag; the time came when we needed our own national anthem; and now the time has come for us to call our national holiday after our country. I hope that honourable senators will not be distressed by this.

● (2020)

There was also a discussion about the procedure in the other place. The witnesses, as well as many honourable senators, have mentioned that has certainly been, as everyone has pointed out, an accepted convention, though not a rule, that senators do not interfere with or discuss procedures in the other place. By the same convention, members of the other place do not have the effrontery to tell us how to handle our business. The responsibility of senators is to make decisions based on the merits of the legislation that comes before us, and not on the way it gets here. I therefore find it impossible to understand why several honourable senators have told us that they would have voted in favour of the Canada Day Bill if the procedure had been different in the other place. This, to an unprejudiced observer, would seem to be a rather lame excuse for blocking the passage of popular legislation.

In any case, it seems to me that the procedure followed by the Senate is above reproach, although today we did hear some mild words of reproach. I guess "mild" is an understatement.

With respect to the letters that were received by the committee, and there were a great many as I said, I read them with interest, but I think perhaps the polls were more convincing. I think that for the record we should be clear that there were more than one Gallup poll. There was the one that was mentioned earlier in the debate which took place on November 7, 1981. That certainly made it quite clear what the majority of Canadians wanted. There was another poll undertaken by the Institute of Public Opinion but commissioned by the National Committee for Canada's Birthday. That also is very conclusive that the majority of Canadians really prefer "Canada Day" to "Dominion Day".

I think the committee was quite justified in concluding that it would be a good idea to support the principle or subject of the bill. I hope, therefore, that this house will move with the times and go ahead and adopt this bill without amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Will the honourable senator yield?

Senator Flynn: Well, if Senator Lang promises not to speak for half an hour, I will yield to him. If he says he will be half an hour on the principle of the bill, I am not prepared to yield.

Senator Lang: Twenty-five minutes.

Senator Flynn: No; fifteen minutes.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Do I hear 20? Going once, going twice—

Senator Lang: All right, 15 minutes.

Senator Frith: What did you settle for?

Senator Flynn: Fifteen minutes.

Senator Lang: That is a real concession for the Leader of the Opposition.

Honourable senators, I rise to speak on third reading, not lightly but with a real and deep concern for the issue before us. I am appalled by the lack of that sense of history with which one would expect this institution to be imbued. May I at the outset say something to my French Canadian confreres?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Not again.

Senator Flynn: You are starting on the wrong foot.

Senator Lang: It should be that the Québécois of this country would oppose this change of name, because they have always believed that Canada did not begin in 1867 but that it began long before that.

Hon. David Walker: That is right.

[Senator Bird,]

Senator Lang: It was the Canada of New France; it was the Canada of the Province of Canada. But here they are trying to convert Confederation Day, which we celebrate, into "Canada Day". Are they not themselves defeating their own traditions? I wonder.

An Hon. Senator: That sounds like something new to me.

Senator Lang: Well, I think that is new to many senators. We should first recall that on July 1 we celebrate the occasion of the Confederation of the three provinces of Canada, namely, Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Personally, I do not think we have gone far enough back in our history to find out where the hangups about the name "Dominion" have come from and why the name should be considered as some sort of impingement on our sovereignty.

"Dominion" is a word which some people, curiously enough, identify with 19th century British imperialism. Because it has been thus identified, the word "dominion" has come to be thought of by many as depicting a subordinate state. Such people imagine that the word is an invention of colonialism to designate a state which, although one step above a colony, has an underling status.

I hope, honourable senators, that in a few words I will be able to dissipate that misconception. We all know that Sir Leonard Tilley was one of the prime movers at the time of Confederation in selecting that word as an alternative to the word "kingdom" or "Kingdom of Canada". You must not forget that at the same time the word "dominion" sent a signal to the warring states in the south that our country was to be from sea to sea and that we would not allow them to come up behind the Detroit River to take over the west of this country.

Those are matters that should be engrained historically in the mind of each person in this chamber, but, while I am sure that is true for many, I am sure it is not the case for many others.

In choosing the word "dominion," Sir Leonard Tilley made reference to the Old Testament, in which the eighth verse of the Seventy-Seventh Psalm says that "He shall have Dominion also from sea to sea." We have heard that many, many times, but that is only the beginning of the story.

What does the word actually mean? The word "dominion" comes from a Hebraic tradition and is translated from at least four of several Hebrew terms as found in the King James version of the Bible. The first of those terms is "memshallah," meaning "rule" or "constitutional government." That term is found in Psalm 114, verse 2, which says in translation, "Judah became his sanctuary, Israel his Dominion." It is also found in 1 Kings, chapter 9, verse 19, where it is translated as "In all lands of his Dominion," referring to King Solomon. It is found again in Isaiah, chapter 39, verse 2, where it says that "King Hezekiah showed them everything in his house and in his Dominion."

The second Hebrew word from the Bible is "shiltone," which means "to have power." It comes from the word "shalot," which means "to let rule," and which is a community concept word, that is, a word giving power to a gathering or to a group. The reference there is to Daniel, chapter 4, verse 31, "For his Dominion is an everlasting Dominion."

The third word for "dominion" to be found in the Bible is "yoraht," which may derive from the word "rowya," meaning "to come down upon." The River Jordan is derived from that word, because it is a "descender." It comes down as people come down upon the land and overtake the land. They rule it.

● (2030)

It is to be found in Psalm 72 verse 8, where it states:

May he have Dominion also from sea to sea and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

The fourth word for Dominion is a little phrase "l'hatzev yah'doh", and it means with hand direct, as in a commanding role. That is to be found in I Chronicles, Chapter 18, verse 3, wherein it states:

And David smote Hadarezer King of Zobah unto Hamath, as he went to establish his dominion by the river Euphrates.

Surely, honourable senators, it is blazingly apparent that none of these words, either the Hebrew or the English forms, could be taken as either subordinate, servile or of colonial mindedness. They represent nobility of spirit, community strength and independence of mind, of which there could be nothing more relevant to the spirit of this land. The evolution of these words in the ancient vocabulary of the Hebrews might very likely have developed in two stages: first, when, under Joshua, as refugees from slavery, they yearned to have their own home, and secondly, in keeping with that home in the Promised Land, a secure place to live and bring up children. The words "Dominion" and "to have Dominion" then enter the canon because of a people's spiritual ambition to rule their own home, and then from the people's will to secure that independent home.

Canada does well to emulate this worthy Biblical example, for we, too, come to be a Dominion in aspiring to be free, to rule ourselves, and, having achieved that desirable consummation, to retain it. The word "Dominion", then, is of our history, derived from the history of the humanizing influence of the Bible. We have Dominion; now, having it, let us retain that name or, as the Book of Proverbs would have it, "destroy not the old landmark".

Honourable senators, I am not a Hebraic scholar and want to make attribution of the content of what I have said so far to an old and dear friend of mine by the name of Sholome Gelber, a dedicated Canadian who is now studying in New York City. His feelings about this, although having been out of the country for some 20 years, are as deep and as heartfelt as mine.

The word "Dominion" has in its connotation the recognition of the fact that we are celebrating the Confederation of three provinces in 1867, not the so-called new Constitution of 1982.

There have been allegations made that the word "Dominion" crept into our historical usage by accident or error, but, honourable senators, I have in front of me a photostatic copy of a transcript on file in the Public Archives, copied from the original in the Public Record Office, London, England, which is the commission for Lord Monck as the first Governor General of Canada. In that commission he is instructed to deal in all aspects with "The Dominion of Canada."

Honourable senators, I have always felt that the hallmark of a free and democratic society is how the government of that society treats its minorities. One of the minorities in Canada today is the Anglo-Saxon minority, and for no reason whatsoever to advantage this country the government is overrunning the sensibilities of that minority.

If you wish to look at the history of this country, I do not think that when the Anglo-Saxon majority formed the government, up until relatively recent years, it treated the French-Canadian minority that way. I think we require a reciprocity in this area, and an easy way to do that is to stop pressing and bulldozing this bill through Parliament, through devious means in the House of Commons without representation, and now through a majority push by the government in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I think one of the greatest dangers to our country is the tyranny of the government. I have always felt that the purpose of this Senate is to be a check and a rein on that tyranny, but here, in this bill, we have the knife edge of that form of tyranny.

Honourable senators, I want to tell you something that derives from a very deep conviction, and I think out of the many years I have been in this chamber. If this chamber has any value at all it is to halt hasty and ill-considered legislation. Those are, of course, as you all know, the words of Sir John A. Macdonald in the Confederation debates.

This institution should not exist unless it is a place of sober second thought. Honourable senators, I want to say to you now that if this bill is passed unamended on a government majority push this chamber should be abolished as being legislatively useless.

Senator Frith: Because it does not agree with you?

Senator Lang: It does agree with the concept of the raison d'être for this chamber's existence.

I could never have said this before, but I can say it now: We have here an example of hasty, ill-conceived legislation from the other place. I have never seen an example such as this in the time I have been here, and I am sure nobody has since Confederation. This is hasty, ill-considered legislation and deserves sober second thought, which it has received at the committee stage, but the government whips will render this chamber marked useless as a legislative body to Canada forever, and once that has been done, we should get rid of it.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have no regrets about letting Senator Lang speak for only fifteen minutes. Since the Senate has already agreed with the principle of the bill, perhaps Senator Lang would have done those of us who support the bill a favour if he had spoken before the second reading of this bill. I am not going to try to respond to what he just said, although several allusions were made during today's debate to the position taken by Quebecers, which could very well elicit a strongly worded response. However, that is not the point.

The Senate as such has decided to support the principle of the bill, and we must consider the problem we have now. We have decided that Dominion Day would become Canada Day. Is the bill we have before us satisfactory in this respect and what is the Senate's responsibility with respect to this text?

The committee has considered practically all factors for and against the bill. I could perhaps add a few arguments. I could go back to the year one, but I shall refrain. The committee noted the following:

Your Committee noted the technical defects of the Bill now before the Senate as compared with Government Bill C-37, particularly with respect to the lack of consequential amendments to other federal statutes. The Secretary of State for Canada, expressing the Government's desire for expeditious passage of the Bill, undertook that, if the Bill is passed by the Senate in unamended form, the Government would, at the earliest opportunity, introduce an appropriate amending Bill.

On the part of the Secretary of State, Mr. Joyal, this was an invitation to the Senate to pass a defective bill for the sake of the government's purely political, and I would even say partisan objectives. Following discussion and debate, the committee's conclusion was as follows:

Your committee decided to support the principle contained in Bill C-201, to recommend that it be proceeded with . . .

That is what we have done. We have just agreed on the principle. The committee's report goes on:

. . . and, further, to recommend that the necessary consequential amendments to the bill be made by the Senate in this Session.

In other words, the committee recommends that the Senate ignore the advice of the Secretary of State, Mr. Joyal, and amend the bill so as to make it a sound piece of legislation that will not have to be amended later on, since we are aware of the problems and defects with which it is afflicted. That is exactly what the committee is recommending.

This afternoon, Senator Donahoe was the first senator to speak to this matter. He said he was opposed to the principle of the bill. He also said that he would be unable to support any amendments. There is something to say for this point of view. I merely wish to make the point that once the Senate has expressed its views on the principle of the bill, is the Senate acting responsibly, once a decision has been made to approve a defective bill, in refusing to improve a bill once the principle has been accepted by the majority? I think not.

Senator Manning also raised a second objection this afternoon. He suggested that to move amendments at this stage would be playing games. Why? Because, as he told us, the government will vote against the amendments and what with their majority, the whip and the good old discipline, they will succeed as usual in defeating the motion in amendment. I cannot agree with Senator Manning's argument. If that is true, we shall see later on whether the new Leader of the Government will tell us or have his deputy tell us—unless there is no need to transmit the order because it has already been given—not to accept any amendment; to vote for an imperfect bill, a private member's bill, but to toe the party line because that is the way the party sees it. We shall see whether the Leader of the Government or his deputy—or if he feels that the order was clearly understood—whether the majority here will decide to reject the committee's recommendation to amend the bill so as to make it consistent, taking no heed of what the Leader of the Government said this afternoon, namely that we should endorse the views of the committee and its members. That is what he told us this afternoon and we shall see whether he will say the same thing, the opposite or nothing at all, and whether those who support him, who stand behind him, will vote as he does. We shall see really whether he is consistent with the position he took this afternoon.

In any event, this bill is faulty. There is no doubt that if we pass the bill without amendments, we create a highly irregular situation.

There was some talk of illegitimacy this afternoon. I have no qualms in using an even more direct term: we would have adopted a bastard bill. That is clear, and the French word "bâtard" may not be as pejorative as "bastard" in English, but I think it is fair to say that if the majority rejects the amendments this bill requires, we will pass a bastard bill.

In view of the circumstances, I want to move a series of amendments which will make this bill, which we have approved in principle, consistent with the solution proposed by the government in its own legislation, that is Bill C-37.

The first point in issue concerns the wording of the bill, of which the only operative clause states that the name "Dominion Day" would be changed to "Canada Day"; of course, if Canada Day should fall on a Sunday, Canada Day itself would not be shoved to the Monday, but only the public holiday, and Canada Day would still be celebrated on July 1. In any case, this may not be the major weakness in this bill, and with a few contortions by the Department of Justice, of which I have some experience, it could perhaps be decided by proclamation that July 2 would be a public holiday. In any event, we could always manage to solve this minor problem if we wanted to. However, the situation is more serious as concerns the other amendments required, first to the Interpretation Act, because this Act provides for a whole series of public holidays, including Dominion Day, which means that if this act is not amended, we shall still have listed Dominion Day, but not Canada Day, so that Canada Day will not be a holiday. It is as simple as that.

If we want to risk having an amending bill only a few years from now, this would perhaps save the government some trouble; this will perhaps occur after the next election and we may be rid of this notorious administration which has been ruining the country these last few years since its return to power in 1980. The problem might be less serious then.

We also have the Bills of Exchange Act which states that days which are not legal days include Dominion Day, without mentioning Canada Day, so that Canada Day would become a legal day for the purposes of the Bills of Exchange Act.

We also have the Canada Labour Code which deals with public holidays in general and mentions Dominion Day, which reference would remain even though we would no longer have this Dominion Day. I do not know how this problem could be solved.

There is finally a general provision which states that wherever the words "Dominion Day" are used, these would from now on be read as "Canada Day". If these amendments are passed, we shall refer to the House of Commons a bill which is consistent with the position of the government and also with the wording standards of such a bill, of a bill which is not simply, as is usually the case, a bill sponsored by a private member who has no hope of seeing his bill passed. We would be saying: This is the way you should go about it and we are returning to the House of Commons the bill as amended. Some will worry and say: What will happen in the House of Commons? The government will simply have to move a motion to concur in the amendments approved by the Senate. Such being the case, the Commons do not have to divide over the principle of "Dominion Day" or "Canada Day". This will have been settled by us and by them in their own manner, but that is their problem. The House of Commons will at least be in a position to vote on the details of this legislation and thus enable those who, in the other place, are not very happy with the process that has been followed, to express their views. As a matter of fact, it is in this regard—to give this opportunity to those who are opposed to this legislation—that we, in the Senate, have finally convinced the government to refer this bill to a Senate committee where different views have been voiced. It could well be alleged ad nauseam that all views have not been stated. I believe that the substance of both sides of this issue has at least been explained. This legislation is not perfect and will never be. That is unfortunate and I am sorry for its opponents. At a given time, a decision has to be made! As far as I am concerned, this matter is not an emotional one, I can assure you. If the majority in this House or in the Commons had rejected it, I would not have been the least upset. The majority in this house or in the other place—and I say it in all respect for some of my colleagues—is not French-speaking. This is in no way a concession made to Quebecers or to the French-speaking community. At this point, the principle of the bill having been approved, it is up to the Senate to ensure that this legislation is consistent, logical, complete and not simply the result of partisan expediency from this government which likes to say: "You, in the Senate, just follow our instructions, and do not create problems for the House of Commons, just pass this legislation and later on, we shall see about bringing about some amendments".

I wish to say to the Leader of the Government that many problems have never been solved despite solemn promises made in committee by the Secretary of State among others.

Speaking of the dignity of the Senate, which was referred to, I have no objection to it but I do believe that it is improper for the government to ask us to forget about the problems of content and form of this bill and refuse to let it be amended along the lines which I propose in these amendments.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Flynn: Therefore, honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Roblin:

That Bill C-201, intitled: "An Act to amend the Holidays Act" be amended

(a) by deleting clause 1 and substituting the following:

"1. The heading preceding section 2 and section 2 of the Holidays Act are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"CANADA DAY

2.(1) In each year the first day of July shall be kept and observed throughout Canada under the name of "Canada Day".

(2) Canada Day is a holiday, except when it falls on a Saturday or Sunday, in which case the following Monday is a holiday".

(b) by adding thereto the following clauses:

"2. All that portion of the definition "holiday" in section 28 of the Interpretation Act preceding paragraph (a) thereof is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

" "holiday" means any of the following days, namely, Sunday; New Year's Day; Good Friday; Easter Monday; Christmas Day; the birthday or the day fixed by proclamation for the celebration of the birthday of the reigning Sovereign; Victoria Day; Canada Day; the first Monday in September, designated Labour Day; Remembrance Day; any day appointed by proclamation to be observed as a day of general prayer or mourning or day of public rejoicing or thanksgiving; and any of the following additional days, namely:"

3. Paragraph 43(a) of the Bills of Exchange Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) in all the provinces of Canada,

Sundays,

New Year's Day,

Good Friday,

Victoria Day,

Canada Day,

Labour Day,

Remembrance Day,

Christmas Day,

the birthday (or the day fixed by proclamation for the celebration of the birthday) of the reigning sovereign, any day appointed by proclamation to be observed as a public holiday, or as a day of general prayer or mourning or day of public rejoicing or thanksgiving, throughout Canada, the day next following New Year's Day, Christmas Day and the birthday (or the day fixed by proclamation for the celebration of the birthday) of the reigning sovereign when such days fall on a Sunday;"

4. The definition "general holiday" in section 26 of the Canada Labour Code is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"'general holiday' means New Year's Day, Good Friday, Victoria Day, Canada Day, Labour Day, Thanksgiving Day, Remembrance Day, Christmas Day and Boxing Day and includes any day substituted for any such holiday pursuant to section 51;"

5. Wherever in any Act of Parliament or in any rule, order, regulation, by-law or proclamation made or issued thereunder or in any contract, lease or other document made pursuant thereto reference is made to "Dominion Day", there shall in every case, unless the context otherwise requires, be substituted a reference to "Canada Day"; and

(c) by deleting the title thereof and substituting the following:

"An Act to amend the Holidays Act and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof"

As I have indicated before, in a sense, these amendments would render this bill in the same terms as Bill C-37, a bill which was prepared by the Department of Justice and which meets the normal requirements of drafting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:

That Bill C-201, intituled: "An Act to amend the Holidays Act" be amended—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I hope that I can do it in such a way that my friends, particularly the Leader of the Opposition, will understand.

Senator Asselin: Is that so complicated?

Senator Olson: I shall speak very slowly, deliberately and in language that I am sure they will understand.

Senator Flynn: Don't speak slowly; speak clearly.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have read very carefully the amendment that has been moved by the Leader of the Opposition and have compared it with Bill C-37. It is not an amendment but is, rather, a complete substitution for Bill C-37.

[Senator Flynn.]

To move an amendment which is a substitution for the principle that is embodied in a bill has, in the past, definitely been ruled out of order. I am not, however, going to pursue that argument.

Senator Flynn: If you don't, why do you raise it?

Senator Roblin: It is a pretty weak one.

Senator Olson: I raise it because it is important. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to use this procedure as a precedent, at another time, when an amendment which did, in fact, constitute a total substitution would be in order, I would then have to stand on the basis that we did not allow such an action to become a precedent in the past. Such a precedent is clearly against the rules of any legislative body.

If honourable senators examine Bill C-37, Bill C-201 and the amendment which is proposed, they will see that my honourable friend begins by deleting clause 1 and substituting something therefor, and that which he is substituting is the whole of Bill C-37. There is only one clause. Therefore, it is out of order on those grounds.

I think I understand what the Leader of the Opposition intends to do, however imperfectly he has tried to do it, and it has to do with the argument that he advanced a few minutes ago about the consequential requirements. He should agree with me when I say that if he wants to pursue that principle, he should continue it through his own actions. There, I suggest, he failed.

Senator Flynn: What is the conclusion?

Senator Olson: What he indeed wanted to add were the consequential amendments that are contained in Bill C-37. If that was the intent and it is clearly understood that a complete substitution is not to be considered a precedent which could be used in the future, then I am prepared to accept his amendment in this case—not to accept his amendment, but I am prepared to accept his right to move it as being in order.

Senator Asselin: You were not too clear, I'll tell you that.

Senator Olson: I will go over it once again. I am prepared, in this one case, to accept that his motion in amendment can be in order. I am not prepared to accept the amendment at all, for the reasons that I gave some time ago. We are aware and have said that there are consequential amendments that will be necessary. The government has given an undertaking that those constitutional amendments, which may be contained in Bill C-37, and perhaps others, will indeed be brought in as a government-sponsored bill.

On those narrow grounds, therefore, if the Leader of the Opposition will accept that this is not setting a precedent, then I will accept that it is not out of order according to the precedents.

Senator Flynn: I agree with that. I am willing to say that I will not consider this as a precedent, but I would add this: If the leader had not raised any objections, it could not have been interpreted as a precedent because there would have been no decision made on any point of order.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows as well as I do that a senator—and there are some very skilful members of this chamber—could come back to this instance in an attempt to move a complete substitution for a bill by reminding us that, on this date, October 25, 1982, on a motion of Senator Flynn, a complete substitution was allowed. I want to avoid the establishment of that kind of precedent.

Senator Flynn: I agree with that, but I do not think that anybody should be obsessed with raising questions of the rules.

● (2100)

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I wish to make a few comments on the progress of the debate on this bill. This is not a point of order. It is in my view a statement on what are essentially the present conditions.

The Senate has after discussion approved this bill in principle. Its subject matter is whether the name "Dominion Day" should be changed to "Canada Day". It is quite desirable that we should be ready to change that name. In the speeches delivered before the amending motion was brought in, reference was made to the Senate's decision that the change is advisable and has received some support. Senator Manning feels that after 115 years of existence, such a procedure would lead to the abolition of the Senate. If we are not ready to bring in the amendments in a single stage, we have to consider the situation as a whole, because the Senate has approved the principle of the matter and the government has agreed to introduce the necessary amendments to improve the bill. I think that we are all ready to admit that the so-called deficiencies of the bill are the consequential amendments.

Now every lawyer knows quite well that consequential amendments are only the housekeeping tools of draftsmen. The fact that amendments are described as being consequential but not essential represents a certain point of view. However, it is the view of a number of people who are not lawyers that they are inconsequential. Anyway, those are mere details.

Senator Asselin: Important details.

Senator Frith: Drafting details. Let us say that such is not the case, that those details are essential and important. Let us admit that they are not details, but important provisions which could even be considered as of a constitutional nature. The fact is that no matter how these amendments are perceived, whether as a major or minor point, the government has agreed to improve this bill. However, we are told that "No, it must be done today. Otherwise", as Senator Lang has claimed, "it would mean the end of the Senate". I, for one, feel that this is a lot of quibbling. How could it be otherwise, when we are told that this bill . . . even if it is accepted, although it is unacceptable in my view, and even if the procedure in the other place is unacceptable, we have changed it here. We have changed it as we had to, following meetings and deliberations of our committee. Because this bill is not perfect, it must be improved. Even the government has admitted this bill has flaws. On that basis, we are told to change and improve it this very day, and not wait until tomorrow or at a later date during this session. Today! Tonight! If not, it would mean the end of the Senate!

Senator Asselin: I should like to ask Senator Frith a question, if I may.

Senator Frith: And I will answer gladly, once I have completed my remarks. I suggest, honourable senators, that the Senate could play a very useful role in the legislative process by improving or streamlining this bill. But why must we do it in one single operation?

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Frith: Why? That does not change anything. Why? For it is not possible to escape the conclusion that the Senate can improve a bill, and that it must do it in two stages—

Senator Asselin: That was your committee's recommendation.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Asselin: And your committee has stated that it had to be accepted.

Senator Frith: I voted against this recommendation for the reasons I have explained tonight. And tonight it would be the Senate's responsibility to improve this bill; I cannot understand why it is absolutely essential to rush it through in one sitting. I do not see how our doing it in two stages would mean the end of the Senate's usefulness.

● (2110)

[English]

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I believe it is obvious to all of us that the consequential amendments should have been included in Bill C-201.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bird: As the Deputy Leader of the Government has said, they are housekeeping amendments, but to my mind there is no doubt that the Senate committee was doing its duty, as a legal and constitutional authority, by recommending such amendments. I would have voted for them had I been a member of the committee.

On the other hand, an amendment by this house is not necessary, because the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the minister have given us an unqualified undertaking that the necessary consequential changes—

Senator Asselin: As usual.

Senator Flynn: If that is all you have to say, why speak?

Senator Bird: —will be brought forward if the bill is passed in its present form. Honourable senators know perfectly well that there is nothing unusual about this procedure. It has been followed many times before, as a result of the Hayden formula, when an undertaking by a minister has satisfied the Senate that necessary amendments will be made in the other place; and that procedure was followed last March with respect to Bill C-78.

For us now the important consideration is that the standing committee was asked to study the subject matter of the bill, and, after hearing witnesses from a number of associations, it supported the principle that the name "Dominion Day" be changed to "Canada Day".

The question which we should all now ask ourselves is: Do we want to change "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day"?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

[Translation]

Senator Bird: The only question we should ask ourselves, honourable senators, is: "Do we actually want to change Dominion Day to Canada Day?"

[English]

If we agree, then we must defeat this and any other amendment, because it will surely kill the bill—and honourable senators know that it will. Here is the reason why—and this is for the record, because honourable senators know the answer as well as I do. Bill C-201 is a private member's public bill. It will be given precedence in the private members' hour, but it will undoubtedly be talked out in that hour, and it will then go to the bottom of the order paper, where it will die—and it will be the Senate of Canada which will have killed it.

Senator Flynn: How do you know?

Senator Bird: As several honourable senators have pointed out, and as I remind all those who love history, in 1946 the first of 23 subsequent bills to change the name of our national holiday was introduced in the other place. It was passed very quickly. When it came to the Senate, it was sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The committee recommended several amendments, namely, that the name Dominion Day be changed to the National Holiday of Canada and that consequential changes and minor changes in wording be included in the bill.

The Senate did not seem to be greatly concerned about the change in name. The bill, with the amendments recommended by the committee, was passed on division. It was then sent back to the other place and it died on the order paper.

Honourable senators, if we amend Bill C-201, we will kill it just as the Senate killed the bill in 1946. In other words, we will be repeating what happened 36 years ago. In the last 36 years a great deal of time, energy and money has been spent on debates about changing the name of our national holiday. Twenty-three private member's bills on the subject have been introduced and talked out. Do we want to go on having this debate for the next 36 years—or for the next 36 hours, or for the next 36 minutes?

Honourable senators, we are living through a very difficult time in history. There are very important issues such as the economy, unemployment and inflation which require many second thoughts. Surely it is the path of wisdom to get on with the serious affairs of the country. So let us, in our wisdom, settle this matter once and for all and not pass this or any other amendment to Bill C-201.

[Senator Bird.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have heard some extraordinary expressions of opinion in this venerable house during the years I have been here, but never have I seen anything to equal the extraordinary and untenable views expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Government and by the sponsor of the bill.

Senator Frith: What was that second adjective? You said "extraordinary" and something else.

Senator Walker: "Nothing".

An Hon. Senator: No, he didn't say "nothing".

Senator Smith: I still have not heard the honourable senator's question. However, he achieved his purpose; he disturbed my train of thought. That may not be to his advantage, because I may have to talk for a while until I find it again. What I shall say again, so that the honourable gentleman will have no trouble in understanding what I am saying, is that I have heard some extraordinary expressions of opinion in this venerable house since I came here some years ago, but never have I heard such extraordinary and untenable arguments as those put forth by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition—I am sorry, I am only forecasting.

Senator Frith: Wishful thinking.

Senator Smith:—by the Deputy Leader of the Government and the sponsor of this bill. "Let us pass the bill," they say—a bill which they admit is badly drawn, so badly drawn that the government, which supports this bill, says that it has got to be amended. "Let us pass it," they say.

Senator Frith: It's a good bill.

Senator Smith: "Let us pass this poorly drawn bill"—so poorly drawn, I say again, that they cannot support its draftsmanship, and they admit now that they cannot; yet they say, "The haste to get this done is so great that we must pass this imperfect bill now". We cannot wait until it has been amended, until it reaches the form where we ourselves can say that it is fine. I am sorry that the honourable gentleman considers other things more urgent than listening to me, but I hope he will not interrupt me with a question again when he finishes his conference.

● (2120)

Senator Walker: Pay attention!

Senator Smith: The honourable senator does not know what wisdom he is missing when he starts these conferences in the middle of a speech.

Senator Olson: You have been all wrong so far.

Senator Smith: I never expected the honourable gentleman would think anything that was sensible was right, so I am not surprised. But I say again that honourable senators opposite are saying, "Look, this is a very badly drawn bill."

Senator Olson: We did not say that.

Senator Smith: You did say that. The Secretary of State said that to the committee. He said that the government knows that the bill is badly drawn and that it undertakes at some future date to present a bill to Parliament which will remedy those defects. But now they say, "Let's get this thing through, rush it through." One would think that it was necessary to get the bill through now to put out a fire. One would think that we should vote "yes" to this bill with the same urgency one would shout for a fire engine if this place was burning down. Yet, for what great purpose? The purpose given to the committee by the Secretary of State, as I said earlier today, is simply so that the committee, which is thinking about how it will celebrate the next first of July, which is nearly 10 months away, will be able to have their feelings settled so that, if they want to, they can put in "Canada Day" with the benefit of a statute behind it, when they have been putting it in for years without any benefit of a statute.

We are asked to do this strange thing, this unparliamentary, unreasonable thing simply to satisfy the wishes of this committee to remedy what they think must have been wrong in the past. There is no great principle at stake now. The principle has been settled. As my leader so eloquently said, "We have decided as a matter of principle that this change in the name shall be made." There is no question about that. That is the decision of this house, and I accept it as I always accept a decision of Parliament, even though often I am against those decisions. There is nothing here at stake but the sensibility of this house to the decencies, niceties and the rights and wrongs of parliamentary procedure. That is what these amendments are about.

Senator Olson: No, they are not.

Senator Smith: Of course they are. What reason is given by the Deputy Leader of the Government and the sponsor of the bill for voting now? They say, "Don't put this bill back in the democratically elected House of Commons; it may die there." Is that not a strange argument in a democracy, that we should not submit this question to the House of Commons, which is elected by the people?

Senator Olson: They have already made a decision on this matter.

Senator Smith: That is what the honourable gentleman and the honourable lady opposite have said—"Don't let them get their hands on this again."

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Smith: Of course it is. "It will die" are the very words of the sponsor of the bill, and I recall them to be the simultaneous interpretation of the words of the Deputy Leader of the Government. I will get him demoted yet, without waiting for a vote.

Senator Walker: I would like to see him promoted.

Senator Smith: He will get his reward in Heaven in due course, but let us not give it to him now. I say to the honourable gentleman and lady opposite that whatever arguments have been used, they are not going to let the House of Commons get their hands on this question again. They may have decided that. I do not know, but we will soon see. I say that if they have decided that, it is a veritable negation of any democratic principle, any principle of parliamentary procedure that we know, that they have put forward or that they can summon to memory. So I suggest to honourable senators that there is no reason in the world for not remedying the imperfections of this bill now, since everybody recognizes that they are there. It is not as though there is any dispute about these imperfections. They exist and everybody admits they exist, so why should we accept them? I ask all honourable senators to ask themselves this question: Why should we now accept a bill which is so imperfect that its sponsor, the Secretary of State, representing the government, and the Deputy Leader of the Government in this place, and even the Leader of the Government himself, if one can understand his strange interruptions, agree that it is not perfect and needs to be remedied?

[Translation]

Hon. Yvette B. Rousseau: Honourable senators, should the 1st of July be called Canada Day or Dominion Day?

We have to make a choice. At first sight, it should be fairly easy. Not so, as we have all seen. It will even be a painful choice for some of us. The decision we are about to take concerning that public holiday will have consequences far beyond the fact that it will be binding on all Canadians for generations to come. It requires as well that we make a choice between a certain mostly historic and rather traditional vision of Canada and a vision of the future which reflects a different perception of the reality of our country.

I can understand that many of our fellow Canadians should not even be put in a position where they have to choose between quite legitimate traditions and new symbols. In many respects, they are right.

We could maintain or, indeed, we could have maintained the historic notion of "Dominion" had we felt supported by the people insisting that we take a whole series of measures to reach that objective. But such is not the case now and it has hardly been so in the past. A number of speakers referred to a tradition, but a good many failed to point out that it is a dying tradition. Unfortunately, we must admit that it has not been vigorously sustained. Otherwise, I suggest that we would not have to make a choice today.

Honourable senators, since we must make a choice between Canada Day and Dominion Day, I think that our judgment ought to be based on all aspects, but mainly those which will enable us to improve the image of Canada and promote a better national consensus. We may very well regret having selected one name over the other. Our fellow citizens may some day blame us for our choice. However significant that aspect, I do not feel it is all that important because it seems that the majority of Canadians are in favour of changing rather than maintaining the status quo. What matters in this debate is to reach a decision which, at least in the long term, will make it possible for us to improve the structure of the nation and the identity of our country.

The rest of the world still looks upon Canada as a young country which can show initiative and adapt itself. That is why the name Canada is synonymous with vitality and progress. The word Canada encompasses today a much truer and much more real concept as well as a much more significant political community than was the case in 1867 or even 25 years ago. We have gradually grown into nationhood, over many years and with lots of difficulties, but we did make progress. I am not sure that the word Dominion reflects the same symbolic value as the word Canada. Not only is it part of our heritage, of course, but it has been quite a worthy concept of our country at a certain time which is still fairly recent for many. Today, because we have been unable to nurture and preserve that vision of our country, it is indeed appropriate to say where we stand about the need to rejuvenate that symbol.

Throughout Canadian history, we have had to make difficult choices between keeping certain traditions and building for the future. All these choices have led to Canadian autonomy both inside and outside the country. By achieving its full sovereignty recently, Canada has freed itself from the last bonds which restricted its actions and has gained even more political maturity and national identity. What seemed difficult and even impossible a few years ago has become a reality. We have become masters of our Constitution.

This is a concrete indication that times have changed, that the mentality of the Canadian people is capable of evolution, that Canadians are willing and able to consider the realities of this century and future needs. I do not believe that, by supporting the new Constitution, Canadians have rejected their past and their history. On the whole, they thought that it was better to look to the future than to the past. However, they have not rejected their past. This indeed proves their maturity and must be taken into account. I do not believe that it can be inferred that the Canadian people are more willing to work for the future than to preserve their heritage.

Of course, it is our responsibility to help the people and to legislate so that they can preserve their heritage. It is also our duty to contribute to its evolution if it so wishes and to provide it with living traditions. Preserving our heritage does not mean that we must only keep our ancestral traditions. They must also be allowed to develop in the same way as a capital is permitted to grow. If certain symbols or certain aspects of our traditions such as words and historical concepts lose their original meaning, we must not cling to them needlessly. We would risk impeding an adjustment that a large sector of the population believes necessary. This would be an overly rigid attitude which could freeze within a series of traditions a whole people searching for its own identity. This could be as damaging to a country as asking it to evolve too quickly. It seems to me that, in this case, it is much better to place our stakes on change rather than on the status quo.

To change the name of our national holiday is to acknowledge that our country is made up of many ethnic groups. In 1867, this was not the case. One must ask oneself to what extent immigrants from Asia, Africa, Latin America and even Europe see in the term "Dominion" an historical concept which arouses particular emotions and appeals to their mind and their imagination. Conversely, I am convinced that for them, for all the new Canadians now settled on this soil the word "Canada" conveys a precise meaning and expresses a day-to-day reality. They are steeped in this reality since Canada is their country. It is unlikely that they were attracted by something else than the hope that the word "Canada" raised in them.

Now that the patriation of the Constitution gives us more control over our destiny, we have the opportunity to take a first step in this direction. How should the July 1st holiday be called? By asking the same question today we are repeating much of the debate that took place in 1867. Whitelaw, in his study on the Conference of Quebec City, published by the Canadian Historical Association, tells us that——the new nation continued to be haunted by the problem of how the country would be named. July 1st was called Dominion Day by some and Canada Day by others, sometimes depending on the preferences of the party in power.

In other words, both names were used at the time. And the problem is still with us today. We have one name that is relevant to the whole country and another that is relevant to only part of that country.

The name chosen was Dominion. As you all know, the new State was to have been given a different name. Historian Jean Bruchési, in his Histoire du Canada, mentions an interesting fact that sheds considerable light on our discussion. He tells us that it was not the Fathers of Confederation who selected the name Dominion, to be used for the 1st of July, but Lord Stanley, who insisted on the name Dominion because, and I quote:

—he was afraid our American neighbours would be offended if the new nation were christened Kingdom of Canada—

—as had been preferred.

This explanation should make us think about the basis for a tradition that has been emphasized by so many people and also about the tradition we want to leave future generations. Personally, I am convinced that we shall be doing more to promote the growth of our national identity by changing the name of our national holiday and adapting it to our present demographic and cultural status than by preserving an historical concept which, although interesting, will be entirely obsolete in the decades to come. I seriously doubt whether we should hand down to our children a concept that they will be hard put to understand and even harder put to preserve. Present generations have barely managed to preserve this kind of concept, this traditional view of our country. We cannot expect future generations to do a better job in this respect.

Honourable senators, the traditional concept of dominion could certainly be justifiably explained as far as the future is concerned. Obviously, it will not be difficult for us to promote the unity of the country with a historically based symbol whose foundations and roots are genuinely Canadian. Already, the younger generations speak of Canada Day because future generations will refer to their homeland by the name "Canada".

To state that the word "Canada" is not adequate to refer to this holiday is, in my view, to have little consideration for the reality of Canadian pluralism. It amounts to an attempt to lump together the whole nation into a name which has little meaning for a great majority of its citizens. It is also a deliberate denial of the pressing necessity to bring our country into today's reality and to prepare it for a better future.

Now that we have our own Constitution and we all want to keep this Constitution in tune with the requirements of modern times, it is necessary to take action that will reflect our times and our sense of responsibility toward the future. I most sincerely hope, for the sake of the future of Canada, that July 1st, 1983, will mark the first in a long series of Canada days which, I dare say, will last at least another century.

For these reasons, honourable senators, I will vote for the principle and the subject matter of the bill.

[English]

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I have to agree with Senator Rousseau. I do believe that if we spent a little more time and effort in telling people what "Dominion Day" really stands for it would still be a popular term. But as it appears to be now, it is rather in the same context as saying, when you have not fed the baby for quite a while, "Why bother feeding the baby? He is dying." That is what is happening to the expression "Dominion Day".

"Dominion Day" is not in general use, we were told at the committee meeting last October 13. Of course it is not in general use. But by whom is it not in general use? Officialdom. That is true to such an extent that a beautiful set of commemorative stamps was put out on June 30, paintings depicting each province, commemorating "Canada Day." When I wrote to the Postmaster General inquiring, "What and when is Canada Day?" I received a quite terse reply saying, "Oh, well, you know, it is not official but this is what everyone uses." So it is perfectly all right for Canada's legitimate stamps, which go all over the world, to be in commemoration of a day which we do not have by legislation. That is the type of use we are lending ourselves to this evening, I feel.

Apart from that there is another aspect to all this which disturbs me terribly. If other countries were doing what we are doing here, we would accuse them of being revisionists, or rewriting history. Well, perhaps that is too strong; maybe it is not fair to apply that to Canada. But we are being terribly destructive. In the almost 1,000 letters I have received, mainly from British Columbia, the main point is that the people of Canada do not care to lose their heritage; they value it.

I forwarded to the clerk of the committee as many of these letters as I could, because I knew that the members of the committee, as well as other members of the Senate, would be anxious to read some of the comments made to me.

Another thing that is important and that was brought out to a certain extent at the committee hearings was that the people of Canada are entitled to think that we in both houses of Parliament do have some sense of expertise; we called upon experts when we were considering the national energy policy. Of course, we in the Senate understood that thoroughly, did we not? We knew exactly what was being proposed and the effect that that policy would have on Canada's economy. We were thoroughly versed on that, and the people of Canada are entitled to think that we should be.

With the serious deficits we are running, it is naturally thought by the people of Canada that the committees of Parliament will interview the Comptroller General and ask searching questions. The people of Canada should not have to concern themselves with the details of that. They feel that we in Parliament should concern ourselves with those details. But when it comes to a piece of legislation which deals with the symbolic name of the birthday of the country, every Canadian is entitled to an opinion, every Canadian is an expert, just as much as any of us care to think we are. I feel we should give them credit for that.

The people who appeared before the committee were very convincing. I found their thoughts to be extremely helpful, and I certainly learned a great deal from them. I hope that when the report eventually reaches us—I was told it would reach us on Wednesday—some of you will take the opportunity to read it.

What I feel most strongly about, and which did come out during the committee hearings, is the importance of a spiritual concept of Canada. We have a political concept, we have a geographical concept, but I am afraid that we are losing the spiritual concept of Canada.

He shall have Dominion also from sea to sea, and from the rivers unto the ends of the earth.

That is integral to our country. It was there at its birth; it was there on July 1, 1867.

I believe that "Dominion" has a connotation of a firm foundation and an assurance of growth. It takes us above and beyond rather small partisan political concepts of a country. "Dominion" leads us closer to the true Kingdom, the Kingdom of the spirit. To retain the word "Dominion" is important to many people in Canada. I can assure you that many of those people are residents of British Columbia.

Although I am totally opposed to what we have agreed to in principle, I might support the amendment to the extent it would make a better bill, which is what the Senate is supposed to do with all legislation that comes before it. I would be more than pleased to see this bill returned to the House of Commons so that they may have a proper look at it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I ask honourable senators to vote on the amendment, I want to be sure I understand that the Leader of the Government has not raised a point of order.

Senator Olson: I did not ask that you rule the amendment to be out of order, for the reason I gave. As long as it is not a precedent, that is fine.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wanted to be clear on that. Those in favour of the amendment, please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those opposed to the amendment, please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Bird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, that this bill be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: On division.

● (2200)

Senator Macdonald: Should not the doors be opened in the event that some senators may be outside?

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors be opened.

Senator Flynn: We have no confidence in you at all. You may as well have your way, if that is how you want to behave.

Senator Frith: That is how we want to behave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I have to read the motion?

Senator Flynn: They don't want to hear anything; they just follow the Whip. Shame. Trained seals!

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when I move the adjournment, according to the rules, we will re-convene tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock.

The order respecting Bill C-127, which will be the first order tomorrow after Question Period, provides, as did the order regarding Bill C-201, that if the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs does report, or if the bill is referred to it, as it has been, it be an instruction of this house that the bill or the subject matter thereof be reported back to the Senate on Monday, October 25, 1982, and that not later than six o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, October 26, 1982, any proceedings before the Senate shall be interrupted and all questions necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of the said bill shall be put forthwith without further debate or amendment.

Honourable senators, I underline that, with regard to this bill, as with regard to the bill we have just dealt with, it is to be voted on not later than 10 o'clock p.m. However, that does not mean that we need wait until 10 o'clock before voting on it if honourable senators are ready to vote on it before then. We will deal with Bill C-127 immediately after Question Period tomorrow. Honourable senators have copies of the report of the committee, and I am sure that any additional information they may want before deciding whether they will intervene in the debate or how they will vote will be available from the committee chairman between now and the time of our sitting tomorrow.

If there is no misunderstanding, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-201
"AN ACT TO AMEND THE HOLIDAYS ACT"

Monday, October 25, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which the subject-matter of Bill C-201, intituled, "An Act to amend the Holidays Act" was referred for consideration and report in advance of Second Reading of the said Bill, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of August 4, 1982, examined the said subject-matter and now reports as follows:

Your Committee met on August 4 to discuss organizational matters. It decided to receive written submissions from private individuals and groups and to hear the evidence of national organizations.

Many individuals and groups from all parts of Canada sent letters, telegrams and briefs which were considered by the Committee on October 13, 1982.

Your Committee heard representations from the Secretary of State for Canada and from every national organization that requested a hearing, namely, the Royal Commonwealth Society, the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, the Monarchist League of Canada, the Council of National Ethnocultural Organizations of Canada, the IODE National Chapter of Canada, and the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Life in Canada. These representations included arguments for and against changing the name of "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day".

Your Committee noted the technical defects of the Bill now before the Senate as compared with Government Bill C-37, particularly with respect to the lack of consequential amendments to other federal statutes. The Secretary of State for Canada, expressing the Government's desire for expeditious passage of the Bill, undertook that, if the Bill is passed by the Senate in unamended form, the Government would, at the earliest opportunity, introduce an appropriate amending Bill.

After discussion and deliberation, your Committee decided to support the principle contained in Bill C-201, to recommend that it be proceeded with and, further, to recommend that the necessary consequential amendments to the Bill be made by the Senate in this Session.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN,
Chairman.

APPENDIX "B"

(See p. 4798)

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-127
"AN ACT TO AMEND THE CRIMINAL CODE IN RELATION TO SEXUAL OFFENCES AND OTHER OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON AND TO AMEND CERTAIN OTHER ACTS IN RELATION THERETO OR IN CONSEQUENCE THEREOF"

Monday, October 25, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which the subject-matter of Bill C-127 entitled "An Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences against the person and to amend certain other Acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof" was referred for consideration and report in advance of second reading of the said Bill, has, in obedience to the order of reference of August 4, 1982, examined the said subject-matter and now reports as follows:

Your Committee, on August 4, 1982, decided to invite submissions on Bill C-127 from provincial law enforcement officials and several organizations with a particular interest in the subject-matter. Accordingly, submissions were solicited from: the ten Attorneys-General of the Provinces; law enforcement officials of the two Territories; the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women; the National Action Committee on the Status of Women; the National Association of Women and the Law; the Criminal Lawyers Association; the Canadian Bar Association; and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

Of these individuals and groups, two expressed a desire to appear before your Committee. One group, the Advisory Council on the Status of Women, although so desirous, was unable to appear. The other group, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women did appear and expressed its views on the Bill to your Committee on October 14, 1982.

Of the remaining groups and individuals, only the Attorney-General of the Province of Alberta and the National Association of Women and the Law submitted briefs to your Committee. The remaining groups either did not reply or indicated that they had nothing to add in relation to the Bill since they had already expressed their views on Bill C-53, the predecessor to Bill C-127, in briefs and submissions to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of the House of Commons and had been made aware that their previous representations were known to your Committee.

Your Committee wishes to remind you that, in anticipation that Bill C-53 would be the Bill it would shortly have to consider, it held two lengthy hearings with the officials of the Department of Justice on August 3 and 4, 1982 at which time it conducted a detailed pre-study of the subject-matter of Bill C-53. Following the Order of Reference made later on August 4, 1982 and its organizational meeting referred to above, your Committee held a further meeting on that date with the officials of the Department of Justice to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-127, particularly in respect of the changes from and amendments to Bill C-53 which it had earlier considered.

Finally, as a result of the invitations it had extended for comments on Bill C-127, your Committee heard representations from the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, on October 14, 1982 and again heard explanations from the officials of the Department of Justice on submissions that were made to the Committee and by its members with respect to the subject-matter of Bill C-127.

During the course of its examination of the Bill, your Committee heard some recommendations for further improvements to the Bill. Your Committee, however, was informed by officials of the Department of Justice that the proposed legislation will be subject to continuous monitoring by that Department and that, if there is a need for improvement based on the Department's on-going studies and experience with the legislation, future amendments would be introduced. Your Committee was also reminded that the entire area of the criminal law of Canada is currently the subject of a long-term comprehensive review involving the Department of Justice, the Law Reform Commission of Canada and the Ministry of the Solicitor General, working in close cooperation with the Provincial Attorneys General.

Your Committee, accordingly, supports the principle of Bill C-127 and recommends that it be proceeded with in the Senate.

JOAN B. NEIMAN,
Chairman.

THE LATE MARIA MAGDALENE MOLSON

NOTICE OF DEATH

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret having to inform you that Senator Molson's wife has passed away. The funeral will take place in Montreal on Thursday. Those who would like more information can get in touch with my office.

[Later:]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I now have further information. The body of Mrs. Molson is resting at the funeral parlour of Wray-Walton-Wray Funeral Services Ltd., 1459 Towers Street, Montreal. Visiting hours are from 4 p.m. to 8 p.m. tomorrow, Wednesday. A private funeral will take place on Thursday.

TABLED DOCUMENTS

AVAILABILITY TO SENATORS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday the Leader of the Government tabled several reports and orders. May I be advised as to the disposition of those? Are they automatically delivered to our offices or do we have to ask for them? Could I have an explanation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will obtain a more detailed explanation respecting the documents I listed yesterday, but, generally speaking, there is no need to ask for them, because copies of financial reports are delivered either to the mailboxes of senators or by hand to their offices. It may be that there has not been a general interest in all of them or that some of them have not been generally required, in which case a request might be necessary. However, I will look into the matter and find out exactly what the situation is.

Senator Marshall: There is a reason for my question. Yesterday I was interested in hearing the tabling of the report of the Army Benevolent Fund Board, which was not delivered to my office until I called the minister's office this morning. On the other hand, in tabling documents today, the minister listed the report of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and that document was in my office yesterday.

What is the cause of the confusion? Is delivery supposed to be automatic, or does someone just say, "We will deliver it when we are going over that way"?

Senator Olson: I will attempt to remove the confusion. I know that from time to time an assessment is made of whether there is a broad general interest in certain of these reports. If, for example, we find that 80 per cent or more of these documents are being printed for the kind of general distribution my honourable friend has suggested, that might be considered a waste.

In any event, there is no member of either house who cannot have these documents. Perhaps there should be a mailing list so that those who are interested can receive the documents without specifically requesting each one.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government indicate what is in store for us in the immediate future? Perhaps I should direct the question to the deputy leader, since he has the specific responsibility for this.

My understanding is that we will be disposing of Bill C-127 this afternoon, and that there are no other urgent matters that require our attention. With that in mind, is it the plan of the government to adjourn today or tomorrow? If so, when will we be expected to return?

● (1405)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): It may be that after Bill C-127 is dealt with today, one could assume that the Senate has no urgent business before it. However, I do not accept the proposition that the Senate should meet only when there is urgent business before it.

There are a number of items still on the Order Paper. I believe there should be negotiations to determine whether there are any with priority interest, and if there are perhaps we could deal with them later today, tomorrow or Thursday.

We are now in the process of arranging for Royal Assent for Bill C-201, which was passed by the Senate last evening, and also, we hope, for Bill C-127.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that he will make a statement on the economy in the other place tomorrow. It is difficult to predict the exact hour at which he can commence that statement. It could be said, all other things being equal, that he will begin at approximately 3 o'clock, and he will require a reasonable length of time. Members of the Opposition have, quite properly, asked for some time to reply to his statement tomorrow, and in the days that follow.

As I said, we are attempting to arrange for Royal Assent tomorrow, if it does not cut into the time allocated for opposition spokesmen to reply to the statement of the Minister of Finance. If we find that we have a few minutes before 6 o'clock, then I believe Royal Assent will be scheduled for tomorrow. In the event that there is no time for Royal Assent tomorrow, it will be scheduled for Thursday afternoon.

Senator Flynn: You are not serious!

Senator Olson: It is fairly important that Royal Assent be given to these bills, if they are both passed.

Senator Flynn: You are going to keep the Senate here for Royal Assent?

Senator Olson: A number of other interesting things may arise on Thursday. I am sure honourable senators opposite would want to ask questions on the state of the economy.

Senator Flynn: We never get any valid replies.

Senator Olson: I am sure there will be questions arising from the statement of the Minister of Finance and, as I said earlier, there are a number of other items on the Order Paper we may want to deal with.

I do not accept the view of the Leader of the Opposition that the Senate should only sit when it has urgent business before it.

Senator Flynn: When it is useful.

Senator Olson: There are a number of other items to be dealt with. In any event, that is the situation as we see it now. We will give you more specific details as soon as we have them.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government has mentioned that Royal Assent for Bill C-201 and Bill C-127, assuming that it is passed, will take place on Thursday, if it cannot be held tomorrow. If Royal Assent is held tomorrow it will only take 15 minutes of the time of the House of Commons. If Royal Assent is on Thursday, it might just as well be held next week. There is no urgency in having these two bills receive Royal Assent; it will not change anything if these two bills receive Royal Assent either tomorrow or next week.

I would hope that the Leader of the Government would be realistic and not continue the practice of accepting orders from the other place as to when the Senate will sit and as to when it will adjourn.

Senator Olson: I would like the Leader of the Opposition to know that I seem to place a much higher priority and value on the work of the Senate and its sittings—

Senator Flynn: After what happened last night, I have lost a great deal of my faith.

Hon. David Walker: So have we all.

Senator Olson: It is sad that the honourable senator—

• (1410)

Senator Flynn: It's sad because of you.

Senator Olson: The fact remains that we have responsibilities in this chamber. It may be that we would want to have a discussion on Thursday so that we in this place may have an exchange of views respecting economic matters, as do the members of the other place. It may be that honourable senators opposite would like to ask some questions about the state of the economy.

Senator Flynn: You no longer have responsibility in that area, so what is the use?

Senator Olson: As usual, the Leader of the Opposition is completely wrong in that respect. All members of cabinet have some responsibility for this country, including the economic factors that are involved.

Senator Flynn: You are not going to speak for someone else.

Senator Olson: The honourable gentleman asks me a question and when I give him my views he disputes them. It may be that he wants to ask some questions, even though he does not get a satisfactory reply, so that the people across this country will know that he has some intelligent curiosity about some of these kinds of things. Even that has a useful purpose.

Senator Flynn: In any event, the honourable leader cannot say that he is now speaking for the Minister of State for Economic Development. He held that position, but he no longer does, and the only questions that he can receive are those posed to him, and, of course, he can consult others for an appropriate reply. He has no authority to speak for someone else, unless he gets definite answers to transmit to us. That is all he can do in his capacity as Leader of the Government.

Senator Olson: I am not sure that this is the place for this kind of debate, but I am amazed at the complete 180 degrees flip-flop of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Olson: A day or so ago, and in many previous discussions—indeed, even when he was the Leader of the Government—he assumed that the Leader of the Government in the Senate had an obligation to reply to any questions concerning the government.

Senator Flynn: On behalf of the minister responsible.

Senator Olson: You have to be present to hear the question. If I know the answer, I will give it immediately, and—

Senator Flynn: It makes no difference.

Senator Olson: —if I do not have the answer, I have the responsibility to accept the question as notice and seek a reply. If the Senate is not sitting, then obviously that cannot be done. If the Leader of the Opposition is saying now that he has no curiosity, or believes that I do not have any responsibility to accept questions on any subject respecting the government, that is a new stance.

Senator Flynn: I am saying that you can accept them, but you have no authority to give your own reply. You must say that "the minister responsible has told me to say this and that," and that is all you can say.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is not accurate at all. My colleagues will take the questions that are addressed to them—

Senator Flynn: If those questions fall within their jurisdiction.

Senator Olson: —and they will reply if they are sure they are enunciating government policy. There is no question about that. There are some types of questions that my honourable friend and some of the honourable senators sitting around him very cleverly design trying to anticipate government policy, and in those cases a reference to the minister directly responsible is the appropriate procedure.

SPORT

LOTTERIES—ACTS OF VIOLENCE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the difference between the role of the Leader of the Government and the very important portfolio held now by Senator Perrault is quite marked. For instance, I could ask Senator Perrault what he has to say about the decision of the Superior Court of Quebec rejecting the injunction that the federal government sought to stop the so-called sports lottery in Quebec. I believe the press attributed some statement to him. Perhaps he would like to repeat it now in this place.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, may I place on the record a statement I made on October 22 on the subject of sports lotteries? It is a short statement, but I believe it will clarify the position of the federal government. I stated:

As you know, the Government of Canada has introduced legislation in Parliament calling for the establishment of a National Sports Pool.

This style of voluntary funding was first popularized through the two national lotteries authorized and later operated by the Government of Canada. The Olympic Lottery and Loto Canada raised $424 million for the Montreal Olympics.

Therefore I am concerned to learn that Loto Quebec has introduced their own sports pool.

May I provide you with some background of the present situation.

In August of 1979, the Clark Government entered into an agreement with the provinces that the Federal Government would withdraw from the sale of lottery tickets effective December 31st of 1979.

While the Federal Government could have challenged that agreement, it chose not to do so, leaving the lottery field to the provinces.

[Senator Olson.]

As a result of this decision, the Federal Government decided to examine other areas of gaming, and a proposal was made to establish a sports pool program. The purpose behind the new proposal was to establish a type of fund-raising program to provide non-tax monies for specific programs in the areas of fitness and amateur sport, arts and culture and medical research, as well as worthy capital projects of national interest—projects such as the Calgary Winter Olympics.

● (1415)

My predecessor, the Honourable Gerald Regan, then Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport, quickly announced the Government's intention on September 14, 1981 in order to coincide with the presentation of Calgary's bid for the 1988 Winter Olympics. Indeed, this commitment was an important factor in Calgary's success in the bidding process.

On March 18th of 1982, Bill C-95, The Athletic Contests and Events Pools Act, was tabled in the House to establish such a pool. In that Bill were included amendments to the Criminal Code, providing for a legal operation of a sports pool. The Bill will proceed through further stages when Parliament resumes in a few days.

Senator Flynn: It has already resumed.

Senator Perrault: Yes, it has resumed, but I am quoting exactly from the statement of October 22. The statement continues as follows:

This proposed Bill is designed in the first instance to assist with the Calgary Olympics, and coincides in spirit with the similar notion of the Olympic Lottery and Loto Canada which were used to raise $424 million to help pay for the Montreal Olympics.

And now we have the news of the establishment of a Quebec sports pool.

I concluded the statement by saying:

The Federal Government is concerned by what appears to be an action by the Government of Quebec to attempt deliberately to sabotage federal plans to assist Calgary by introducing an almost identical version of the sports pool.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Not again! You are always against Quebec.

Senator Perrault: I went on to say:

It is almost unconscionable that the Government of that province—a province assisted heavily by people from all parts of Canada to sponsor their Olympics—would seek to jeopardize similar assistance to a fellow province. It is inconceivable that a majority of Quebecers would support such unfair and unsportsmanlike action.

Since the Federal Government considered that legislation would be required to legitimize its own planned activities, the Honourable Gerald Regan, minister responsible for the sports pool legislation, has asked the Attorney General to consider any kind of legal action appropriate to deal with this matter.

The Leader of the Opposition very correctly pointed out that application was made in the Quebec courts for a temporary injunction to halt the hockey pool established by the Province of Quebec. The injunction was not granted. The matter is in the hands of the Department of Justice and is being pursued actively at this time. It does not, however, mean an end to the matter by any means, either judicially or in any other sense.

Senator Flynn: Is the honourable minister saying that no decision has been made as to an appeal from the decision of the Superior Court?

Senator Perrault: Yes. Discussions are being held by Department of Justice officials at the present time to determine what other legal avenues may be open.

Senator Flynn: But no decision has been made?

Senator Perrault: Other extra-legal actions may also be available.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question to the minister on that very point. I would point out that the difference between a sports pool and a lottery is a very basic question.

Senator Perrault: In the case of the sports pool, the person engaged in this type of activity must make a selection of the anticipated winners of sports contests such as hockey games, baseball games and football games. A lottery involves random numbers chosen by chance. A pool involves a degree of skill, and a lottery involves pure random chance; that is the difference.

Senator Nurgitz: As a further supplementary question, although my recollection is vague, do I understand that there is an agreement with the provinces with respect to lotteries?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Nurgitz: Am I correct that the holding of these sports pools would certainly be considered both beyond the spirit and the letter of that agreement?

Senator Perrault: I will be chairing a meeting of ministers from all provinces in Saskatoon on Wednesday to discuss this and a number of other matters.

In my view, it is important that the respective federal and provincial jurisdictions should be established. We should know, as well, what is clearly within the law and what is without the law; and, beyond the legalities of the matter, what is perceived to be fair play is an important consideration.

Senator Flynn: You may use the word "sabotage" again.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we want to be fair. We want to be sure that the Calgary Winter Olympics will be the most successful Winter Olympics ever staged in the world. The Montreal Olympics were a superb world success. Canada's reputation is at stake. We are looking to revenues from the sports pool as a major means of financing the Calgary Olympics.

Senator Nurgitz: By way of clarification, am I correct in my understanding that the anticipated revenue from the sports pool to which the minister has referred is approximately $200 million, and that that is the total commitment of the federal government to the Calgary Olympic Games?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the yield from the sports pool could be as much as $60 million per year for sport, in addition to funds for medical research and culture. The estimates vary, of course. The federal government has made a commitment to contribute up to $200 million to the Calgary Olympic Games. When people consider a contribution of this kind, which sounds rather large, they should keep in mind that there are enormous gains to be derived from the revenue side of the equation. I think that all of Canada will benefit from this great event which will take place in Calgary.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I do not quite understand that answer. I am not arguing with the idea that the tourist, hotel, travel and other industries will benefit from the revenues to be derived from the Calgary Olympics. I am asking whether it is expected that the $200 million will come directly from a portion of the sports pool profits.

Senator Perrault: Yes, the honourable senator is quite correct. The sports pool is looked upon as the main source from which that revenue would be drawn and directed to the Calgary Olympic Games. Regardless of the events which have taken place during the last week, the intention of the Government of Canada is to support the Calgary Winter Olympics to the extent to which that commitment has previously been made.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have one final supplementary question. Quite apart from the Province of Quebec, has any other province made a complaint, if I can use that term in a broad sense, to the effect that the operation of a sports pool is in breach of the arrangement to allow a province the sole jurisdiction over lotteries?

Senator Perrault: In this regard, honourable senators, two things can be said. Certain provinces have indicated concern, or have, at least, raised a number of questions in that regard. That is one of the reasons for the meeting on Wednesday in Saskatoon. We wish to sit down and discuss with the provinces federal and provincial ideas in a number of areas. I anticipate that it will be an amicable meeting. We do not expect to encounter any serious difficulties. I must express my deep regret that the Province of Quebec will not send a representative to that meeting.

Senator Asselin: They won't? If not, it is because you used the word "sabotage".

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the decision of the Province of Quebec not to send a representative to that meeting was made long before any statement of mine. The only way we can make this nation work is by standing together, overcoming many of our federal-provincial differences, and building goodwill.

Senator Flynn: The honourable senator is repeating the Prime Minister's speech: "Have faith in us; trust us!"

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. I realize that the absence of the minister from Quebec is significant, since the matter raised by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport is an important one. If he had been more careful in his choice of words in his statement regarding the attitude of the Quebec minister, perhaps the minister in question would have come to discuss the matter with the federal minister.

In any event, does the minister intend to use his meeting with his provincial colleagues to discuss with them a matter of major importance in the world of professional and amateur sport? I am referring to violence in sports.

If we look at newspapers across the country, people seem to be very concerned about a situation that seems to be firmly rooted in the sports world, namely, that some athletes use their skills not necessarily to provide entertainment but quite often to commit criminal acts in the course of sports events, acts for which they are not punished by the provincial attorneys general since the latter seldom prosecute athletes who are guilty of such aggressive acts.

I believe the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport should raise the matter with his provincial counterparts. I would like to hear what his opinion is on the matter and how the federal government or the Minister of Justice can convince his provincial counterparts that the Criminal Code applies to people in sports as well as the rest of us in this country.

I do not think the Criminal Code provides for any exemption or privilege for people who commit a criminal offence on the ice, on the football or soccer field or in any other sport here in Canada. I feel the minister has a responsibility here, and he should tell this house what he intends to do to try and correct the situation.

● (1425)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, to answer the second question first, the honourable senator advances a most interesting idea. Many Canadians are concerned about violence in sport, not only in hockey and football but also in boxing, where a number of deaths have occurred over the years. It may well be that the Senate should consider undertaking a study in this area. I know that if such a study were established, Senator Asselin would wish to play an active part in the committee's deliberations. His idea will most certainly be discussed with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and perhaps a study can be initiated.

So far as the sports pool is concerned, of course, we would like to achieve an amicable understanding with all of the provinces. Our concern stems from the fact that the sports pool concept, which has been in the planning stage for some considerable period of time, has been known to all of the provinces. The provinces have been aware of the fact that some of the proceeds from that sports pool, when established, are to be directed to the Calgary Olympics. That fact is known to all of the provinces. They know why the pool is being established. All the provincial governments, including the Government of

[Senator Flynn.]

Quebec, know the reasons. They know the proposed legislation is before Parliament, and they know that the Department of Justice had rendered a preliminary opinion that legislation is required to make the sports pool legal. Had the government proceeded unilaterally without legislative action, the establishment of a sports pool could be in contravention of the Criminal Code. Yet, with this prior knowledge, one province has acted to introduce a sports pool which is virtually identical to the federal model—almost to the type and structure of the forms being issued.

We consider that action by the Quebec government to be hardly an act of good faith, under the circumstances. There is no shortage of revenue from lottery games in Quebec, from which something like $150 million a year is derived. We believe that the vast majority of Canadians in all of the provinces want to support the Olympic Games in Calgary and make them a success.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to know from the minister if he consulted with his colleague in the Province of Quebec and tried to negotiate with him before taking any action before the court.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there were numerous consultations over a period of some months. I will undertake to check the record which I believe will serve to indicate that we have acted in good faith. When the sports pool is finally established, may I point out that the revenues that will derive—perhaps in the area of $100 million a year—will result in substantial new sums for medical research, cultural activity and sport in all the provinces, without discrimination. So it is a worthy channeling of funds.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: To get back to violence in sports, would the minister, in consultation with his provincial counterparts, let us know whether he is in favour of establishing a senatorial commission that would examine all aspects of this problem? Has the minister considered the possibility of establishing a code of ethics for sports or amending the Criminal Code so that the law will be observed? Is the minister prepared to recommend such a study?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the idea that has been advanced is a worthwhile and constructive one. I happen to believe, and the record will show, that the most effective committee work of any parliamentary assembly in Canada is done by the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Are there any other appointed assemblies?

Senator Perrault: The quality of the parliamentary committee work in this chamber is unexcelled in this country.

Senator Flynn: It is the best appointed body that we know of!

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition still retains his old-fashioned cynicism. The idea put forward by Senator Asselin is a good one and I believe it should be pursued. We might have a meeting involving both sides, and, if we can structure a study, then let us do it.

WORLD UNIVERSITY GAMES

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, while the minister is on his feet, jogging or not, there is a proposal to hold a games tournament in Edmonton next July, I believe. I believe it is called Universiade and refers to the university games. Are those games to be supported by the federal government, either by direct funding or through gambling games, or what role does the federal government have in connection with exploiting that operation?

• (1430)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): The honourable senator is referring to the World University Games. The games will be supported, in part, by the federal government. The commitment is now something in excess of $5 million. The games will also be supported by the federal government insofar as it is necessary to provide certain federal services, such as immigration, policing, Department of Defence services and so on.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

RESPONSIBILITY OF MINISTER OF STATE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Austin, but first I would like to congratulate him on his appointment. I am interested in his appointment because it seems to cover a wide umbrella of concerns that will be expressed by senators, including old age security pensions, family allowances, veterans affairs and unemployment insurance. The news articles and the items surrounding the minister's appointment are a bit confusing, especially when they refer to the allocation to his portfolio of $30 billion.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It is too much money for him.

Senator Marshall: These articles also said that the minister's responsibilities would not overlap into the responsibilities of, for example, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I wonder if the minister could advise us as to what responsibilities he has as far as this chamber is concerned and whether or not we can question him on these various items that I have mentioned, to express our concerns on behalf of Canadians?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the congratulations offered today and also yesterday with respect to my appointment. I must say I find it an exciting and challenging one. I also want to express my regret to Senator Marshall for being unable to stay beyond 3 o'clock yesterday to answer the question he put after I had left. One of my responsibilities is that of chairing a cabinet committee, so it will not always be possible for me to stay beyond 3 o'clock for that reason, though I respect the fact that the Senate regulates the length of its own Question Period, which often runs beyond 3 p.m.

However, if I leave at about that time, I am sure you will appreciate that I have cabinet responsibilities to which I must attend.

I would like to try to answer Senator Marshall's question with some background on the Ministry of State for Social Development. The position of Minister of State for Social Development was created by this government in June 1980, and it was considered by the Clark government as part of its reform system in the organization of government as recommended by the Lambert commission.

My primary responsibility is to act as chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Social Development by developing, in concert with the committee, a policy and a resource overview of the social sector and ensuring the individual actions of committee members reflect the common government approach for the social development sector.

The committee is responsible for managing the social policy sector composed of ministers responsible for the following departments and agencies: Communications, Employment and Immigration, Environment, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Labour, National Health and Welfare, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, Secretary of State, Veterans Affairs, Justice, Solicitor General and Office of the Coordinator of Status of Women.

With respect to the question of my relationship to the ministers who hold those portfolios or responsibilities within the categories I have described, I think it is obvious to honourable senators that the responsibility for the administration of their departments and for the policies under administration in their departments belongs to the appointed ministers. It is not mine.

My responsibility is that of chairman of the cabinet committee—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That's all.

Senator Austin: —co-ordinating the policy system described by the portfolios and responsibilities I have described and also in controlling the spending allocations for the overall envelope. That envelope for the fiscal year 1982-83 totals $31.4 billion or 42 per cent of total federal expenditures.

Senator Flynn: But you cannot change the amount of, for example, old age security pensions or family allowances, which are included in that $32.4 billion?

Senator Austin: Senator Flynn well knows that there are statutes prescribing the system of transfer for a majority of those funds and that there are also executive agreements.

Senator Flynn: But you said that you have control over these expenditures.

Senator Austin: No, what I said was that the envelope's resources total $31.4 billion. I did not say that I controlled those resources in the sense that I was some sort of czar over the funds.

Senator Flynn: You said it in another sense, but you said "control".

Senator Austin: Of course, these funds are subject to statutes and agreements—

Senator Flynn: That are beyond your authority.

Senator Austin: There is a lot that is beyond my authority—

Senator Flynn: Thank God.

Senator Austin: —and probably beyond your judgment.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Don't worry, you'll get your old age pension.

Senator Flynn: There's Davie. I didn't know he was here.

Senator Marshall: I thank Senator Austin for his answer, but would he answer the specific question: May we ask questions pertaining to the umbrella of his responsibilities and the chairmanship he holds to combine the efforts of these departments? In other words, is the minister prepared to take questions pertaining to all these portfolios mentioned?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, indeed, I am prepared to receive questions within my authority as it pertains to this envelope, but in many cases honourable senators will appreciate that I will have to seek specific answers from the responsible ministers, which I will, as a member of cabinet and as Senator Olson said a few moments ago, offer to the chamber as soon as the answers can be obtained.

Senator Marshall: The minister mentioned that the meetings would be held at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. In order to facilitate the Senate, would he consider postponing his meetings until 4 o'clock so he could be here to answer questions?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): You couldn't help smiling, could you?

Senator Austin: I would like to say to honourable senators that I am not seeking to be a busy minister in terms of answering questions in the house, but to the degree you can accommodate me, I would appreciate whatever questions you might ask as much before 3 o'clock on Wednesdays and Thursdays as is possible.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I direct my next question to the Leader of the Government. There was an idea being mooted that the government might consider appointing parliamentary secretaries from the Senate, which I think is a good idea. It could appoint members of the Senate as parliamentary secretaries to many of the important ministries, and there are many good, intellectual senators on the opposite side as well. Would the honourable senator tell us whether there is any basis of fact in that idea being put forward?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I am not quite sure where my honourable friend's rumour came from or whether it is one of those self-generating ones.

Senator Marshall: From the paper.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Olson: The idea is an interesting one, but the government has made no decision with respect to it as of this point in time.

TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Would he inform the chamber whether he has any further information to add to the facts he gave us yesterday respecting the labour dispute in Vancouver?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I was in touch with the Canadian Wheat Board this morning to see how this situation stands as far as the position of the board itself is concerned. They tell me that there are now 23 ships in Vancouver harbour awaiting loading, and that if there is no settlement of the lockout soon the number will increase in the next few days by another 10 ships. So it is a very serious question.

One of the factors involved is that some of our customers do not have large storage facilities and, therefore, it is urgent that they receive their supplies on a regular basis and with as little interruption as possible. A further factor is that in the opinion of the board there are possibilities for increased sales, over and above all that are in place at the present time, that would have the effect of providing additional shipments of grain during the current year out of the west coast.

So, as I have said, it is a difficult situation at the present time, but it is quite likely that there could be an increase in sales, if the present interruption is of short duration. I can tell you that the Minister of Labour has the whole question very much in hand. The government acknowledges that this is a serious situation and, in the words of the Minister of Labour yesterday:

Failing an early settlement of this dispute the government will accept its responsibility, repugnant though it might be, to bring about resumption of vital shipping operations.

The government is considering its position, and I take it that an announcement will be made by the appropriate minister when a decision is taken. In the meantime, all of us hope that the parties to the dispute will themselves reach an agreement and settle the whole matter by negotiation in the normal tradition.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I draw the minister's attention to some of the language used in the telegram sent by the Minister of Labour to the two parties to the dispute and which he read to the house yesterday. Towards the end of the telegram we find the sentence:

I strongly advise you to immediately resume negotiations.

Ignoring the split infinitive, which I cannot really approve, I ask my honourable friend whether he has had any reply from the two parties to this request that they resume negotiations.

Senator Argue: I am not able to give the honourable senator any information on that. I spoke to the Minister of Labour recently and, although I cannot be definitive about it, I am not aware that they are negotiating at the present time. I am quite certain that they are not.

Senator Roblin: Has there been any indication that the parties acknowledge having received the telegram?

Senator Argue: I would have to ask the Minister of Labour whether there was a reply or not. I was informed shortly after the telegram was sent that it was, in fact, received by the parties to whom it was sent.

Senator Roblin: With respect to the telegram, I take it that the present situation is that the minister is pretty sure they got it, but he hasn't the faintest idea what they intend to do about it.

I would then ask him to consider another question I put to him yesterday. I asked him if he would undertake to ask his colleague, the Minister of Labour, how long a period of grace he intended to allow before taking the action he referred to in his telegram, in which he said he would accept his responsibility, which I presume means using the facilities of Parliament to settle this affair. Did my honourable friend speak to his colleague about this question?

Senator Argue: We have discussed this matter, the minister and I and certain other ministers, and when a decision is taken and a period of time has been decided upon for a particular action, an announcement will be made, not by me but by the appropriate minister designated.

Senator Roblin: Will my honourable friend undertake to talk to his colleague to find out what he intends to do about this matter, because it is still pending? We do not know what will happen. No sanction is attached to this telegram. No time limit has been imposed. The minister himself has outlined to us in clear language the problems involved and the economic disabilities being suffered on this account. Will he give us the assurance that he will make the representations to his colleague and obtain an answer as to what the government intends to do?

Senator Argue: Representations have been made based on what was said in the Senate yesterday. I shall be happy to take the message of Senator Roblin to the minister.

Senator Roblin: I honestly advise my honourable friend not to take my message to the minister.

Senator Argue: Your statement.

Senator Roblin: Well, not my statement either. I want the minister himself to become the advocate of the agricultural interests of this country, who are suffering, and persuade his colleague to get a move on.

Senator Argue: I take second place to none as a strong advocate of the interests of the agricultural industry. I believe that, in compliance with the words of the Minister of Labour in his telegram yesterday, appropriate action is certainly being considered. My personal hope is that the matter will be settled at an early date. My further hope is that, when the workers do go back to work, they will go back with enthusiasm to try to improve the efficiency of deliveries of grain into the export market on the west coast, and that we will in fact, after this dispute has been settled, see an increase in exports.

Senator Roblin: We all live in hope, but I want to tell my honourable friend that "hope deferred maketh the heart sick." I would like to see him deal with this question of deferred hopes in this matter.

What this chamber wants—and I don't think I speak for myself alone—is a positive indication so that the country may know what the government really intends to do.

I have said it three or four times; the minister has answered me three or four times; we have really not advanced the situation very far. I hope tomorrow he will allow me to ask him another question on the point.

Senator Argue: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate—and not just because he is simply being upstaged by his colleagues in the answering process, but because my question concerns a matter of the highest and utmost importance.

I am sorry that I cannot put this with my usual laconic brevity, but I must point out that yesterday and today the maritime premiers have been meeting in Prince Edward Island.

The Charlottetown Guardian recently had this headline, "Ottawa Stalling on Vet College". In an article appearing in the Guardian, it was stated that the Nova Scotia premier believes that the federal government is stalling on its support for this essential project, and he is quoted as saying that "it is obvious that they are not going to do it and never intended to do it."

The article further stated that the Premier of Prince Edward Island, Mr. Lee, has said, "All we need is the green light from the federal government."

I listened with anxious but unfulfilled anticipation to the Prime Minister's speeches in the last series, and I remember very well his comment that the big thing is trust. We recall—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick."

Senator Macquarrie: If the scripture quoting is through, I will continue.

We recall that the Prime Minister said that the important thing is trust, belief. We know very well, and the leader knows very well, that the commitment was made by the federal government that, if certain provisions were made by the provincial premiers, that veterinary college, a much-needed establishment, would go forward.

Now, as a consequence of the magnificent statesmanship displayed, especially by Premier Buchanan and Premier Lee, everything is in readiness. Therefore, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can assure the people of the Atlantic region that in this era, when trust is so important, the federal government will go through with its commitment, following up on what the premiers have done, all of them—and I can assure the leader that they are not playing politics because they won all of their elections—to establish this essential institution in our region.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend's eloquent attempt to equate this matter of announcing a decision to trust may have been a great attempt, but of course it was completely irrelevant to the subject matter involved.

● (1450)

He quoted one of the premiers to the effect that all they were waiting for was the green light from the federal government. The green light, I presume, includes considerable funding.

An Hon. Senator: It's a green bill.

Senator Olson: Somebody says it is a green bill in addition to that.

The minister responsible for that will have to look at that in view of the restraint program of the government, which program is well known to honourable senators opposite.

For many, many months—in fact years—the deficiency was a lack of agreement among the governments of the maritime provinces themselves. It may be that that has been worked out, but it was not worked out at that time.

I do not have any evidence in front of me to the effect that the site has been agreed to, and that all the governments of the maritime provinces will support the location of the college, or that they will make the financial commitments that it needs. Maybe that has changed; nevertheless, there are many high priority items which require commitments of funding that have not been proceeded with because of the restraint program of the federal government.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I do not like to be bootlegging into questions on matters of information, but since the minister is clearly so deficient on the latest information, I feel it is my duty to the Senate and the country to do so.

He has indicated that there was a lack of agreement. That agreement was dated during the premiership of his colleague, the Honourable Gerald Regan, who although he suggested they should set up a committee to decide on the best place in the maritimes to establish a veterinary college did not agree with the choice of Charlottetown.

Premier Buchanan, who could have suggested many places in Nova Scotia, was sufficiently a man of the region that he said, as he is quoted in today's press, that the Nova Scotia government would support construction grants and do its part for the ongoing expenses of the students. He realized that there was great importance in having the college in the region.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

That new kind of statesmanship may be somewhat new to the minister, but I suggest he look into that, because he will find that there is a new situation prevailing.

The Minister of Agriculture said clearly that if the maritime premiers and their governments would make contributions the federal government would respond.

The maritime premiers have solidified their contribution and now, exactly in the words of the premier, there is nothing left but for the federal government to answer them in trust—quoting the words of the Prime Minister who said a great deal the other night but made few commitments.

Senator Olson: There is no question that the Minister of Agriculture has stated publicly that he would like to see the veterinary college established in the maritime provinces. There is no doubt about that.

The government has many other priorities with respect to this, but my honourable friend, as usual, has attempted to lay the total responsibility for the delay of X number of years at the door of the federal government, and I must explain to him, so that he has the right perspective—something which is somewhat closer to the truth than his interpretation—the cause of the delay, and that is what I was attempting to do.

Senator Macquarrie: I have been called many things, and have to live with that, but I think the record shows that now, and not under the Regan administration, the maritime premiers have come forward with the part of the bargain which the Honourable Eugene Whelan said was a part of the federal obligation.

If the minister can tell me that the provincial people have not done so, that is something, but if he is going to tell me in woolly words that the federal government has now changed its obligation, let him say that; let him tell the people of the Atlantic region that the commitment the federal government made to them is now no longer obligatory.

Senator Olson: I cannot say that because that is probably not a fact. The federal government generally has to look at all matters in terms of priorities within the circumstances that exist at the time.

I will take my honourable friend's question as notice and see if I can obtain an answer soon, but I did not want to leave the misinterpretation that he attempted to paint when he was revolving all around the word "trust". I feel that I have done that satisfactorily.

Senator Flynn: If you say so.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE

Hon. G. I. Smith: I shall observe, before I ask the question I rose to ask, that the minister's interpretation of the meaning of the word "trust" obviously does not coincide with that found in the dictionary.

My question is: What is the situation with regard to the construction of the TQ&M pipeline to the Atlantic region?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will obtain an answer to Senator Smith's question. I do not think that things have changed much since I last answered questions on that earlier this year—that is, before the Senate recessed for the summer.

I will ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for a complete update with respect to that pipeline.

If my honourable friend wants an immediate answer, I can, from memory, tell him what I said then, and that is still clear in my mind.

Senator Smith: I do not know that I would like to commit myself to trusting the memory of the honourable gentleman, good though it may be.

Senator Olson: You obviously have forgotten, so I just wanted to remind you of what I said then.

Senator Smith: After all, a long time has passed since the honourable gentleman answered that question, so I thought it might well be that some progress had taken place, and if so, I would want to know what the progress is. Obviously, the honourable gentleman does not know, so I prefer that he consult with someone who does and perfect his answer with knowledge and with truth.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend has invited me to take his question as notice and update information for him, so I accept his invitation.

Senator Smith: That is some progress, and I appreciate that.

I also ask him, while investigating this matter, if he would refresh his memory regarding the commitment given by the government that it continue the construction of this pipeline into the Atlantic provinces, and particularly into Nova Scotia, and whether that undertaking still stands.

Senator Olson: I will take that as notice as well, although I am tempted to quote him chapter and verse replies that I think I made to him in April, May and perhaps the first week of June, which gave him a very specific reply, but I will resist that temptation.

Senator Smith: That is already some months past, and surely even he has noticed that passage of time and, even in his very pedestrian sort of idea of progress, must recognize that that is time enough for something to have been done. I want to know whether there has been any change in the undertaking, and if so, what that change is.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question posed by Senator Macquarrie yesterday concerning a proposed visit by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to Arab and Israeli capitals, and Canada's support for the Reagan peace proposals in the Middle East.

Honourable senators, I have been informed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not contemplating a visit to the Arab and Israeli capitals in the immediate future.

As for the question regarding the Reagan peace plan, we have made it clear, and it is well known, that Canada supports the Reagan proposals as a basis for beginning negotiations in the Middle East.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

DECISION RE J.B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY OF CANADA LIMITED

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised by Senator Nurgitz on July 29 concerning the Lippincott case, and the recent changes in the administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act.

Senator Nurgitz asked whether recent changes to the administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act might allow for a review of the decision taken in the Lippincott case.

The new measures announced in the June 30 budget were developed specifically to reduce red tape and delays. Thus, the thresholds for the shortened procedures for small investments were raised and the government undertook to confine its examination of undertakings to the key elements of an investment proposal. There were no changes that related to the review of decisions previously taken under the act.

● (1500)

As for the Lippincott case per se, I would like to reassure the honourable senator that the government shares his understandable consternation over the planned closing of Lippincott, but that the decision to close was taken by the foreign parent, at its own initiative and not as a result of a government order. There are a number of alternatives open to the foreign parent, including the filing of a new revised application with the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

I would also like to have a letter written by the Honourable Herb Gray, the minister then responsible, to the editor of the Globe and Mail incorporated with the answer, as I think it will shed further light on this particular case. That letter is one-and-a-half pages of single-spaced typing and, if it is agreed, I should like to have the letter taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The letter follows:)

Contrary to what you say in your editorial of July 30, FIRA is not shutting down Lippincott Canada. This is being done, if it does in fact happen, by Lippincott Canada's United States parent, Harper and Row, of its own accord and on its own responsibility.

In June 1981, the Cabinet decided not to allow the takeover of Lippincott by Harper and Row in the light of information then available to it as well as in the light of a longstanding policy to encourage a stronger Canadian role in book publishing and distribution. This has also been the policy of the Ontario government. The fact that this decision was made some twelve months before Harper and Row announced that it was going to close Lippincott Canada helps confirm that the federal government is not forcing Lippincott Canada to close. Rather, this is being done by its parent, Harper and Row, instead of making use of one of a number of alternative courses of action open to it. It could file a new application with the government under the Foreign Investment Review Act. It could have Lippincott Canada form a joint venture with Canadians. It could sell Lippincott Canada to Canadians. As your own paper reported, the Association of Canadian Book Publishers confirmed that Harper and Row rejected three credible offers from Canadians for the company.

It is important to note that last year, when the transaction was being reviewed, the Ontario government informed the federal government that the application was not compatible with its own objectives for the book publishing and distribution industries, and in effect asked that the application be disallowed.

The editorial alleges that FIRA, by its own yardstick, is not of significant benefit to the country. On the contrary, the evidence confirms that the effect of the Foreign Investment Review Act has been to bring thousands of jobs and other economic benefits to Canada. For instance, in the period from April 1, 1977 to December 30, 1980 approximately $3.5 billion in new investment and 53,000 new jobs were to be created by investors receiving approval during that time. It is estimated that in 1981 new investment proposals approved under FIRA accounted for the creation of another 14,000 to 15,000 new jobs.

The requirements of the Act as passed by Parliament are such that the government must find significant benefit connected with an application in order to allow it. It has been able to do so with respect to most FIRA applications to the benefit of Canada and Canadians since 1974 when the Act came into effect.

ITALY

EARTHQUAKE DISASTER—CANADIAN AID

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I call the Orders of the Day, Senator Rizzuto would like to make a report on aid to earthquake victims in Southern Italy. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Thank you, honourable senators.

I have just come back from a trip to Italy as a member of a delegation headed by the Honourable James Fleming, Minister of State (Multiculturalism), which also included Mr. Frank Vincelli, President of the Italian-Canadian Congress and several other members of the committee for assistance to victims of the earthquake which took place in the autumn of 1980 in Southern Italy.

The purpose of the trip was to sign contracts for the construction of homes and to attend the official sod-turning ceremonies.

As several senators were involved in the fund-raising campaign which was chaired by our honourable Speaker, I am pleased to be able to inform you that a contract worth $8,048,000 was signed for the construction of 128 homes in the towns of Balvano, Conza di Campania, Calabritto, Laviano and San Mango sul Calore, plus the construction of a senior citizens' home in the town of Acerenza. Construction should be finished by the end of the summer of 1983.

As soon as the work has been completed, as chairman of the fund management committee, I shall be able to provide a complete and detailed report on the use made of all funds collected from the general public and from provincial and federal governments.

Finally, I would like to add that our national anthem was played during the official ceremonies and there was a great display of Canadian flags. It was very moving to receive the thanks of the local authorities for our humanitarian gesture, and it was particularly touching to see the gratitude on the faces of the people present at the ceremony.

It is with great pleasure that I extend their sincere thanks to the people of Canada.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEMBERS OF TERRY FOX YOUTH CENTRE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to the south gallery where we have a group of young but distinguished Canadians visiting us from across Canada under the auspices of the Terry Fox Youth Centre. Their presence in the gallery is part of their visit to Parliament Hill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CRIMINAL CODE (SEXUAL OFFENCES)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the second reading of Bill C-127, to amend the Criminal Code in relation to sexual offences and other offences against the person and to amend certain other acts in relation thereto or in consequence thereof.

• (1510)

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-127 is grounded in two previous bills, one of which was Bill C-53, tabled in the other place in January 1981, on the same general topic of amendments to the Criminal Code with respect to sexual offences, child exploitation and child abduction. These bills all arose out of a series of studies and recommendations which were made by the Law Reform Commission, by various legal organizations, by many women's organizations and individuals, and also through the efforts and intensive studies of officials within the Department of Justice.

The sexual offence provisions, particularly, were the object of intense debate in the other place; so much so that the study of Bill C-53 dragged on through a long period of time in the committee stage over there. As a result of that, it appeared, as we were getting ready for the summer adjournment, that the bill might not arrive here until very late in the session, thus resulting in very little time being available for the Senate to give it any proper consideration. The rumour was, as you may recall, that we would receive Bill C-53 with just a few days to give it consideration. However, as a result of negotiations, that bill was considerably shortened and the essential elements on which there was no basic disagreement were incorporated in a new bill called Bill C-127. It does not include the sections on child exploitation or pornography that had been the subject of a great deal of controversy at the committee stage and, I believe, throughout debate in the other place.

As a result of our being forewarned that this bill or some version of it might appear here, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs convened in early August to undertake what we called a pre-study of the subject matter of the bill. The committee held two long meetings, on August 3 and 4, with officials from the Department of Justice who gave a thorough explanation of the provisions of Bill C-53.

Following an agreement between the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition, we agreed, as you will recall, to refer the subject matter of the new bill, Bill C-127, to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to report back this day. The report which was approved in committee was tabled yesterday.

Bill C-127 deals with a number of amendments to the Criminal Code but, insofar as we are concerned, some of the most significant and the most far reaching are those sections which would change the present definitions and methods of prosecution of various sexual offences. They demonstrate in a very tangible way the more subtle changes which have occurred in societal attitudes and in the gravity with which certain types of offences against the person are now viewed.

As many senators will be aware, with respect to sexual offences, our Criminal Code incorporates notions derived from both the English common law and statutory precedent. It developed from a time when women were regarded more as chattels than persons, and its concepts have remained remarkably unchanged for literally hundreds of years.

At present we have a number of provisions in the Criminal Code ranging from the most serious offence of rape down to indecent assault on a female. In between there are a number of provisions involving sexual elements which can be described as offences involving interference with the integrity of the individual. Most of those offences also include a degree of violence as an element of their commission.

The crime of rape, as I have said, evolved from medieval times and the notion of female ravishment. It has gradually taken on a specific meaning of what has been referred to as unlawful intercourse; the only lawful intercourse recognized being that between husband and wife.

The concept that, upon marriage, a husband and wife gave their consent to sexual intercourse is deeply rooted in both the religious and social mores of western civilization and, therefore, until comparatively recently, the idea that there ever could be inter-spousal rape was never really seriously entertained.

Another aspect of our approach towards the spectrum of sexual offences involving violence is that the entire emphasis of the criminal law has turned on the sexual element of the crime rather than the violence which is also intrinsic to the commission of those offences. For that reason, the most important issue in cases involving sexual offences has been whether there was consent between the parties; that is, did the complainant by word or action, then or previously, consent to the violence which had been inflicted? If that element were established, the accused almost invariably had a good defence to the charge.

In recent years, the umbrella of that defence has been enlarged through judicial decision to the effect that the accused would need only prove that he had an honest belief, even although it might appear to others to be unreasonable, that the complainant had consented to the sexual assault in order to be deemed not culpable with respect to that particular offence.

Bill C-127 addresses the concerns of those people and organizations who have indicated that our concepts and practices with respect to sexual offences are not only outmoded but, in particular, almost always militated against the human rights and dignity of women, the principal victims of such crimes.

Bill C-127 will encompass three new sexual offences. They are sexual assault; sexual assault with a weapon, with threats or by bodily harm; and then the most serious charge, aggravated sexual assault. These will parallel a similar three-tier approach to assault involving no sexual aspect.

Other significant changes in the provisions pertain to the prosecution of sexual offences, changes which will do much to abolish the inequities in our law enforcement and judicial procedures which very often allowed the victim's past history and character to become overriding issues to the central issue of whether a violent and criminal assault had taken place. These changes provide a very welcome improvement over present practice and have the approval of the majority of law enforcement bodies, legal bodies and other interested organizations.

Although they have been generally supportive of all the changes that have been made, a few of the women's organizations have expressed the view that the present provisions still do not go far enough in the matter of protecting the rights of women when their character and previous actions are called into question in court. In fact, our committee clerk received today four telegrams from organizations in the Vancouver area where these problems are very prevalent and very disturbing to women who are working in the field of trying to help other women who are victims of assault. They feel that, in this version of Bill C-127, we have not gone far enough to protect the victims of sexual assault. However, I think that, as a result of all of the debate which took place in the other place and the testimony that was given before our committee, we reached a fair and reasonable compromise. I can only suggest that if, in practice, it appears that the law has not provided sufficiently stringent protection for women, suitable changes will be made in the future.

I should like to mention briefly the other important provisions contained in Bill C-127 concerning custody battles over children. The existing provisions of the criminal law are unsatisfactory because the child abduction sections provide a defence on the basis of colour of right, with respect to the right to the possession of a child.

Without going into great detail, honourable senators, I will say that the proposed changes would create two offences. The first would be for abducting a child where there is a custody order outstanding anywhere in Canada; the second would be for abducting a child where there is no custody order. In the latter case, consent would have to be obtained from the attorney general of the province or his local representative before taking action against the offending parent.

There does appear to be an anomaly or hiatus in the child abduction sections with respect to children of the ages of 16 and 17 years, who are legally minors in certain jurisdictions. Officials of the Department of Justice and other agencies are aware of this problem, which arises from the fact that we do not have the same age of majority in all provinces. However, we may cause greater administrative difficulties than exist at present if we try to correct what appears to be an oversight in the provisions which are proposed in Bill C-127.

As is stated in the final paragraph of the report, we did hear various recommendations for even more improvements to the bill. It seems clear to me, honourable senators, that this bill, as it now stands, has the overwhelming endorsement of literally hundreds of people and organizations across Canada. There can always be room for improvement in the Criminal Code because of its very complexity and because of variations in the jurisdictions in terms of the administration of justice. We are assured, however, by the Department of Justice that there will be undertaken an ongoing monitoring process of this bill as it is administered in the various provinces. I am confident that, should any changes be necessary, they will be carried out at the earliest possible date. In the meantime, I highly recommend this bill to honourable senators as a very progressive step in our criminal justice system.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should like to express my appreciation to Senator Neiman for her excellent presentation of this bill today, and, indeed, for her handling of the committee hearings dealing with this entire matter. For many of us it has been a complicated subject, the understanding of which has been made much easier through the efforts of Senator Neiman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, the explanation of this bill is, I think, clear. There should be no misunderstanding of the kind of significant changes that will be made to our criminal justice system. With the exception of the abolition of the death penalty, I cannot think of a more revolutionary change to our criminal law in the last 25 years.

There have been many diverse views expressed about this bill across the country. At our committee meeting we heard from two women who, although representing one group, actually spoke on behalf of women everywhere. I recall that Senator Frith was pressing them—as he often does all of us—to admit that half a loaf is better than none, but then, he is used to doing that; from his position, I suppose he is often selling half loaves.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Steady now, mate; half a compliment is better than none.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): A quarter!

Senator Nurgitz: A slice!

Hon. C. William Doody: A crumb!

Senator Nurgitz: Notwithstanding the fact that those two women criticized and complained about the bill, they did intimate that it constitutes an improvement. I think we should all be looking upon this not simply as a badly needed reform, not simply as an update of our criminal law, but, more significantly, as a means by which we can bring the law into some conformity with present-day values and current thinking. It is to be hoped that after today we will begin addressing what we will call "sexual offences," not with a view to the erotic nature of the offence but with more concentration upon its violent aspect. It is clearly the violence that we are seeking to eradicate.

In my view, these women were recounting their own experience, which was totally within the realm of a rape crisis centre, where they were constantly exposed to the very serious, brutal kinds of sexual offences. As a result of that, I think that some of their concerns were not exactly realistic. We had, with these two women, a lengthy discussion concerning what is referred to as the "Pappajohn defence"—the defence of honest belief. A man may be acquitted of the charge of rape where he honestly believed that he had obtained the consent of the woman with whom relations took place. The two women made the statement, quite baldly, that there is never such a situation. I think, honourable senators, that we must consider their perspective in the context of their experience, which has been only in the very violent sexual situations. I am willing to concede that, in any brutal sexual assault, there is no basis for the defence of honest belief. However, perhaps they failed to address the question of what happens in other types of indecent assaults, such as rape brought on by intimidation, rape brought about through threats, and so forth, where there are no obvious signs of violence.

[Senator Neiman.]

I was a little disappointed in the presentations in that they did not raise the question of section 245 of the Criminal Code. That is the section which describes an aggravated assault, one which wounds, maims, disfigures or endangers the life of the complainant. I was somewhat disappointed because the presentations made to us did not include the mental harm done to a victim as a result of a sexual assault. One would think that an accused ought to pay the same price for causing mental harm as that for causing physical harm. I am sure that all honourable senators have heard of cases where sexual assaults have resulted in severe mental damage that might take years, if not forever, to resolve.

I believe that the most significant complaint we received regarding the bill was delivered to us in a brief on behalf of the Attorney General of Alberta and it concerns the question of lack of definition. Nowhere in the Criminal Code will there now appear, once this bill is passed, what indeed constitutes a sexual assault or an aggravated sexual assault.

● (1530)

I make the comment, more in general than specific terms, that it seems to me to be bad practice forever to be allowing the courts not only to interpret but indeed to write the law. We all understand that once the law is made the courts will interpret it. In this instance I believe we are clearly allowing a situation where the courts will indeed make the law as to what is sexual assault.

As the departmental officials explained to us, we are dealing with a matter that is rather self-evident. I hope and trust that is so. In any event, we have the assurance of officials that this type of matter will be monitored. I consider this bill to be a great step forward and that we should not argue about that aspect at this time.

Another matter of concern is that of questioning the complainant with respect to previous sexual activity. I understand that Senator Frith may speak on this aspect. I do not want to leave the impression that questioning of the complainant is now totally forbidden. I believe the new bill proposes to remove the old rape trial procedure, where, instead of an accused being on trial, it was quite easy for defence counsel to put the complainant on trial. I believe that the new section 246.6 deals in large measure with overcoming many of the current difficulties while not, in obvious cases, removing the prospect of examining a woman who, in clear circumstances, should be examined on her conduct. I leave that point for others.

Before concluding, I wish to comment on what I consider to be a serious flaw, if not omission, in the bill. Clause 16 of the bill now before us amends section 214 of the Criminal Code. If I can explain the section in simple language, section 214 describes those offences which, if death ensues during the commission of such an offence, the offence then constitutes first degree murder.

I have conducted my own private poll, and have asked friends and others, lawyers and laymen, to name an indictable offence, a serious offence, for which a person would be guilty of capital murder if death ensued during the commission of that offence. Everyone I polled immediately snapped back "Armed robbery".

When one looks at the statistics, one finds that in the province of Quebec the incidence of robbery is approximately four or five times the number of sexual assaults. I have the figures.

Senator Frith: That is, known sexual assaults.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. But there are also armed robberies, and in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, particularly, there is a large number of armed robberies. For those who undertake such a venture with a firearm, there is, I admit, a serious penalty. I do not say there is not a serious penalty in the event that a death occurs in the course of armed robbery, but it does not constitute first degree murder. My point in committee was that it should have been included in the amendments.

I repeat that I believe this legislation to be a great step forward, but I point this out as being a serious flaw, a serious omission, and one that I hope the department, or this or the other chamber, will deal with quickly.

I should mention that when this point was raised with the departmental officials at our hearings, I received agreement and a sympathetic response; but we did not receive an amendment. This morning I received a copy of the speech made by the Minister of Justice, which he thought was fitting enough to distribute to all senators and members of the House of Commons. His topic was "Criminal Law: Perception versus Reality". Needless to say, honourable senators, omissions such as the one I have mentioned provide, I suggest, a greater gap between perception and reality.

Having said that, possibly for the third or fourth time, I should say that I consider this legislation to be more than half a loaf. I repeat that it is a great step forward. I agree that it should be monitored and watched, and I consider that amendments such as the inclusion of robbery in section 214 should be made quickly. However, I believe the bill will help narrow, to a large extent, the gap between perception and reality, and, further, I believe it will help bring some of our laws into the twentieth century. I commend the bill to honourable senators.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Nurgitz has suggested, I would like to make a few comments, particularly to underline an aspect of this bill I consider to be important from a psychological viewpoint. As most honourable senators know, there is a substantial body of opinion that maintains that the number of complaints of rape, or aggravated or other forms of sexual assault, represent only the tip of the iceberg, to use a rather hackneyed but still poetic expression. Many women would rather accept an incident of sexual assault, with all of the psychological and often physical horrors that are attendant upon it, than complain to the police and be obliged to go through added psychological horrors in instituting a complaint.

Honourable senators may or may not know that one of the reasons for that is the principle that long existed relating to the question of consent. It was based, as Senator Neiman has pointed out, on the assumption that a sexually active woman was not rapable, in effect, because it was to be assumed that she had likely consented.

Under the old system, one of the horrors for a complainant was that, as a matter of law, counsel for the accused could question her on her previous sexual behaviour. If she were not of so-called chaste character previously, then that would be evidence that she may have consented.

We have heard over many years from women's organizations, crown attorneys, police and others, that that principle, in practice, discouraged many women from making a complaint. There was an improvement prior to the present bill, with the provision that notice had to be given by counsel for the accused if he wished to raise the question of previous sexual behaviour; and that hearing, as to whether permission should be given, was heard in private.

There is a further advance in that area contained in the bill now before us. We should simply note that although the point made in law appears to be a narrow one, in terms of the administration of justice and of the whole concept of treating so-called rape not, in effect, as a sort of moral aberration but as an assault on the person, it is, however, an improvement, I think it is worthwhile noting that we in Canada can take credit, in my opinion, for having made a substantial advance in this aspect of the law on rape or sexual assault. As it once was, counsel for the accused could determine in the midst of the trial that since he had nothing to lose he would go on a fishing expedition. It used to be perfectly admissible for counsel to go on such an expedition, make innuendoes, suggestions and so on, thereby subjecting the complainant to a kind of procedural horror to add to all the rest of the horror.

• (1540)

What happens now is that in order to make an application to the court even to cross-examine the complainant or to offer any independent evidence touching upon the sexual history of the complainant, the accused must first serve notice upon the Crown, within a reasonable time before the trial, of the intention to adduce such evidence, together with the particulars of that evidence. The accused must then satisfy the trial judge that the proposed evidence falls within the three very limited exceptions that now exist to the general rule against such evidence, and satisfy the trial judge without being able to call the complainant—this is an important advance—as a witness at the in camera hearing.

The three exceptions to the general rule that I have referred to are: where the Crown itself opens up the issue of previous chaste character; where the evidence relates to identity only and not to consent; and where this results in sexual acts which relate to the accused's allegation of so-called honest belief, which was touched upon by Senator Neiman and Senator Nurgitz.

So, honourable senators, as one of the reasons that I ask you to support this bill, I underline this major advance in what has been a sad history all over the world of dealing with the question of rape—that being, as I say, the horror of the procedural aspects of laying a complaint added to the horror of the experience itself.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Neiman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Riel, that this bill be read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wanted to mention that one of the consequences of the amendments included in this bill is that a man may now become a victim of a sexual offence.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I am glad the Leader of the Opposition has brought that point to our attention. I had intended to refer to that very important change in our law which will take place with the passage of this bill, but in following my rather convoluted notes I omitted reference to it.

The other area that is very important, to which I would like to refer briefly for the record, is that there will no longer be spousal immunity and a spouse may be charged with sexual assault. That is an extremely important new provision in our law.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ATTEND LAUNCHING OF ANIK C SATELLITE AT CAPE CANAVERAL, FLORIDA

Hon. G. I. Smith, pursuant to notice of Monday, October 25, 1982, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to send representatives to the launching of Telesat Canada's Satellite Anik in Florida.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that this matter was raised yesterday, and I think that I should enlarge a little on what I said then.

It will be recalled that the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications received an invitation to attend the launching of the first of Telesat Canada's three Anik C series satellites. Perhaps the best thing I can do is read portions of the letter of invitation. A copy of this letter was sent to each member of the committee. It reads in part:

On 11 November 1982, the first of Telesat Canada's three Anik C series satellites is scheduled to be launched from the J.F. Kennedy Space Centre in Florida. When it enters commercial service in January 1983, Anik C3 will be the most powerful domestic communications satellite in the world. Anik C3 will be launched from the Shuttle Columbia during its first commercial flight into space.

On behalf of the Chairman of the Board of Directors of Telesat Canada, I am pleased to invite you to join us in Florida on this historic occasion.

The letter goes on to give particulars of the event and the arrangements for accommodation. The invitation was dated August 20, 1982. A subsequent letter from Telesat Canada was received on October 21, 1982 expressing satisfaction that some members of the committee had been able to accept the invitation and giving further details of the program. I do not know whether the Senate would be particularly interested in hearing me recite the two pages of detail, so I merely say that they are available, should any honourable senator wish to see them.

I have information from the clerk of the committee that five senators have accepted the invitation from Telesat Canada, so they would be covered by the motion. The clerk of the committee also understands that two other senators have accepted the invitation but have made their own arrangements.

The budget of the committee is more than capable of taking care of the expenses involved. We have made inquiries as to what those expenses are likely to be, and it seems likely that they will total less than $5,000.

I ask honourable senators to support this motion so that those who have been invited will be able to accept this invitation.

● (1550)

I might add that I am not one of those who have been able to accept the invitation, so it is of no personal benefit to me. However, as chairman of the committee, I understand that it is my duty to seek this authority from the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is clear that an important Canadian event will be taking place in Florida touching on and, in fact, further expressing what has become some leadership for Canada in world communications. Thus, it is entirely appropriate that members of the committee attend.

I thank Senator Smith for giving us the opportunity to support this motion. I believe we should all support it.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 27, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

27 October 1982

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Brian Dickson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 27th day of October, 1982, at 5.55 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be
Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 2, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

TIMES OF SITTING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a suggestion to make regarding the hours of sitting—and it is simply a suggestion. Some honourable senators will know what I am going to say because I have already raised it with them.

I say this now so that honourable senators may give it some thought in the days ahead. My suggestion is that the Senate sit on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, as usual, but with the sitting on Tuesday commencing at 2 o'clock.

If that were the case, the available time for committee meetings would be increased substantially, and attendance, I believe, significantly improved. I know that committees can sit on Tuesday afternoon, but, since I was summoned to the Senate, my experience has been that it is easier to get a quorum and good attendance if the Senate is sitting.

● (1405)

We would continue with the practice of permitting one committee to sit while the Senate is sitting. If the Senate were to sit at 2 o'clock, then one of the committees could meet later that day while the Senate is sitting. We could have several committees meet on Tuesday evening, and we would still have Wednesday morning when, despite caucus meetings, one committee could meet. On Wednesday afternoon another committee could meet, according to our practice, while the Senate is sitting. It seems to be traditional that we do not have committee meetings on Wednesday evenings. Then, of course, we would have available to us Thursday morning for committee meetings. Normally committees do not meet on Thursday afternoon after the Senate rises, except perhaps for Senator Godfrey's committee.

I am not moving a motion but asking honourable senators generally to consider whether this is a good idea or not, and then consider the suggestion of Senator Macdonald, Senator Marshall and others. I know it would create scheduling problems for some honourable senators. I am not pressing it, but if it is considered a good idea then we might put it into practice next session.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that next session, whenever it comes, might be the proper time to do this, after consultation in caucus. Personally, I think it is a good idea but, as the deputy leader said, we have to see whether it creates problems for some by forcing them to come to Ottawa a day earlier. Perhaps we could consider the exact hour of sitting in the afternoon. In any event, we have agreed to discuss this in caucus. Perhaps we should invite Senator Lang, Senator Manning and Senator Cook to attend our caucus meetings because of their interest in the question. However, this matter is not urgent, as the Deputy Leader of the Government has mentioned.

What we should discuss at this time is the program for next week. We have no legislation or items of an urgent nature before us at this time, and I should like to know what is scheduled for next week, because some of our colleagues are wondering why we are not adjourning to November 9 instead of November 2.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, before Senator Frith replies to the question raised by Senator Flynn, I should like to say that the proposal is a surprise to me. Speaking now as co-ordinator of committees, I point out that on Tuesdays we have been able to accommodate six committee meetings. The proposal for the Senate to sit on Tuesday afternoons, having regard for space and personnel, cuts us back to five.

Because I am a local resident, my preference would be for the Senate to sit on Monday evenings, and so leave Tuesdays for committee meetings. I am not proposing that, but I ask honourable senators to keep in mind that to have the Senate sit on Tuesday afternoons does reduce the availability of time, rooms and personnel for the number of committee meetings that can be held.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have long been an advocate of holding committee meetings on Tuesday mornings, when necessary, and that we should not find it necessary to have a Senate sitting on Monday evening, in order to have a committee meet on Tuesday morning.

• (1410)

Senator Frith did not mention the possibility that, if the sitting of the Senate commences at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, senators will get into the habit of arriving early on Tuesday morning. As far as senators from Toronto and, I am sure, Montreal, are concerned, we could have committee meetings commence at 10.30 on Tuesday mornings.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, for those of you who have not noticed, there is a part of Canada outside of Toronto and Montreal.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: I would point out that at the present time I have to leave my home on Sunday night in order to arrive here for a Tuesday evening sitting. I would prefer not to have to leave on Saturday night in order to accommodate Senator Godfrey by being present on Monday or Tuesday morning.

Honourable senators, I think the schedule of the Senate should be geared to the fact that Canada is a big country; it is not that I think committee meetings cannot get along without me, since I know they can very nicely.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No, we need you; we want you.

Senator Flynn: No decision has yet been made.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, with reference to the suggestion that has been made by the Deputy Leader of the Government, from the standpoint of committees I think there is, undoubtedly, merit in it. However, when this question is being considered, I would ask that one other factor be taken into account: Those of us from the western regions of Canada—and I assume the same is true of those from the Atlantic provinces—have available to us only one direct flight to Ottawa per day, which flight leaves in the morning and arrives in this city in the afternoon. Therefore, to be in attendance for committee meetings on Tuesday morning would necessitate leaving on Monday morning.

If the house sits on Tuesday afternoon, and then does not resume again until Wednesday afternoon, to arrive here for the Wednesday afternoon sitting it would be necessary to leave on Tuesday morning, because the day flight on Wednesday does not arrive here until 4.30 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon—too late for the afternoon sitting. If it is decided to sit on Tuesday afternoons instead of Tuesday evenings, I would ask the deputy leader to consider retaining the Tuesday evening sitting, so that those of us who may not be able to attend a committee meeting on Tuesday can still be in attendance for the Tuesday evening sitting. If the house sits only on Tuesday afternoon, and not on Tuesday evening, some honourable senators will have to leave on Monday. They will not be here in time for the sitting on Wednesday unless they leave a day early. Therefore, I would ask the deputy leader to retain the Tuesday evening sitting.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, this is an appropriate time for me to refer to "my old perennial" again. I plead that consideration be given to those of us who, first, do not live in Ottawa, and, secondly, do not live in the corridor between Quebec City and Windsor and, therefore, are not within a couple of hours of motoring distance from this city.

Some honourable senators live on the periphery of the country and have to depend on airplanes. As the fall advances, it becomes increasingly difficult to arrange accommodation and flight reservations at short notice. Even in recent weeks I have had some difficulty in that regard, and I can expect more of it.

Honourable senators, I plead that, no matter what schedule is adopted, there be a minimum of variation from it. That will, at least, facilitate our making reasonably long-term reservations with the airlines so that, assuming they fly, we can guarantee we will arrive on time. I would ask that more consideration be given to that factor than, I regret, has been given in the past.

• (1415)

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I echo the sentiments expressed by Senators Manning, Rowe and Lucier to the effect that consideration be given to the convenience of some of us who must come from the extremities of this country. On many occasions, when I have arrived on the flight from Vancouver, my friends in the Senate would say, "Oh, George, you are here again. Have you just come in from Vancouver? I don't know how you manage such a long commute." They are most solicitous until it comes to rearranging the scheduling of committee meetings or chamber sittings. It then becomes quite a different story.

I would submit to those honourable senators from central Canada that it is time that this chamber—and I will not speak for the other place, although I think it should do the same thing—give serious consideration to adopting a full working week for two or three weeks, and then adjourning for a week.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator van Roggen: That would be a meaningful gesture to all honourable senators and members of Parliament who must travel to Ottawa from the extremities of this country. We would accomplish twice as much work, and would not have to live on airplanes. Including the time spent in airports, I spend 15 hours a week travelling just to be here for a couple of days. I do not even have to travel the first 50 miles by horseback to get to the airport, as do some of my friends who live on the prairies.

I would make the strongest plea that, while discussing this in caucus and in considering it individually, honourable senators give some thought, first of all, to our sitting on Monday afternoons. Some of us could leave Vancouver, for instance, on Monday morning by the 8 o'clock flight. We would arrive in Ottawa at 3.30, and, although we might be somewhat late, we could then work through the rest of Monday. Perhaps the Senate need not sit on Tuesday, which would allow the committees to have the full day, as well as Thursday morning, in which to conduct their hearings. Possibly we could adjourn Thursday afternoon rather than Friday, although it would not bother me to stay until Friday. I do not really appreciate spending more time in a given week on airplanes than I spend in the chamber and attending committee meetings, which is what I must do at present.

I hope some thought will be given to my suggestion by honourable senators from central Canada.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps some thought could be given to this not only by senators from central Canada but by members of the other place. If we could decide our own fate, our own hours without interference from the other place, perhaps this could be more readily achieved.

Senator Frith: I thank all honourable senators for their suggestions. For a moment I thought about prefacing my comments by saying that I'm sorry I brought it up. But I do hope that all honourable senators will remember that I was merely asking for their consideration of this change; I was not moving a motion. I assure them that it is not my intention to bring this matter to a vote. We will not implement this change unless everyone more or less consents to making the adjustments necessary to put it into effect.

All the suggestions that have been made are valuable. I know that they will be taken into account by senators in their reflections.

As to the question of sitting next week, honourable senators, I will reiterate what Senator Olson, the Leader of the Government, mentioned on Monday. It is part of his and the government's plan to try to share some of the legislative burden which falls on the other place by introducing more bills in the Senate. I know that Senator Olson has proceeded with that plan. There is a good chance that next week we will receive a bill from the other place. As well, we may be introducing some bills here. It is for that reason, and because we would like to give all honourable senators an opportunity to deal with what will be a major economic statement delivered by the Minister of Finance in the other place this afternoon, that we want to come back next week. Because we hope to have Royal Assent this afternoon, we do not intend to sit tomorrow. Therefore, the first opportunity for honourable senators to dig into the statement of the Minister of Finance will arise next week. For that reason, and for the general reasons advanced by the Leader of the Government yesterday—although there may not be legislation, there will be other matters for us to deal with—the Senate will sit next Tuesday at 8 p.m.

[Senator van Roggen.]

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—NATIONAL TRAINING ACT—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an announcement is being made today by the Minister of Employment and Immigration respecting an important agreement that has been signed between the federal government and the Government of Quebec. I am prepared to read it, if the opposition is agreeable. It is brief.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We did not get prior notice, but we will agree to its being read.

Senator Olson: The communiqué is as follows:

Federal Employment and Immigration Minister Lloyd Axworthy and Quebec Manpower and Income Security Minister Pierre Marois today signed an agreement under the new National Training Act.

As a result of this agreement, the federal government will be providing funds for training in Quebec during 1982-83 amounting to $141,590,000 for institutional and apprenticeship training and $30,830,000 for training in industry.

"Today marks the beginning of a new era of co-operation between the Government of Canada—

Senator Flynn: Thank God! It's about time.

Senator Olson:

—and the Government of Quebec in the vital area of human resource development," Mr. Axworthy said.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jack Marshall: Human resources are Senator Austin's responsibility.

Senator Olson: To continue:

Noting the agreement was the culmination of months of extensive negotiations between federal and provincial officials, the two Ministers said that it is now possible for thousands of Quebecers to improve their skills which can open the way to the careers of the future.

The new act also will benefit workers who need to be retrained because of technological changes which now require new skills.

"I am particularly pleased that the new National Training Program will facilitate training opportunities for members of minority groups traditionally disadvantaged on the labour market," said Mr. Axworthy.

Mr. Marois said that "the agreement reaffirms our belief that the province's economic development is largely dependent on the timely development of the skill and knowledge of our labour force."

"Today's agreement," he said, "represents an important step forward in federal-provincial cooperation to improve Quebec's social and economic conditions."

That is the end of the announcement. I should advise, by way of a postscript, that agreements of this nature, of course, were entered into with almost all of the provinces some time ago, and we are particularly pleased that the present agreement is now also part of that major National Training Act scheme.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Opposition about the agreement previous to the one which has just been signed. I believe there have been similar agreements in previous years, and in this connection I would like to know—and I think all our colleagues would also be interested—what amounts were involved in the agreement previous to the one that has just been signed.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that requires some historical data that would have to be obtained. I do not have it with me today.

Senator Flynn: We will reserve our comments for the time being.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

TRANSFER FROM WESTERN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development. Could the minister confirm that as a result of the budget of November 12, 1981, $345 million was transferred from the Western Economic Development Fund to the Social Affairs envelope? It is my understanding that that fund is there to improve housing conditions and, generally, economic opportunities for native people.

● (1425)

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): The sum of $345 million reserved for native economic development, including housing, has remained under the control of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What else?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. If the fund has remained under the responsibility of the Prime Minister, would the minister confirm whether these monies are earmarked funds out of the Western Economic Development Fund?

Senator Austin: I shall have to make an inquiry to check those facts, and I will do so.

Senator Nurgitz: While the minister is checking those facts, would he obtain answers to a couple of other questions I have relating to this fund? First, would these monies be for western native people only, considering the source of the fund; second, have any of the funds been distributed yet and, if not, when will they be distributed; and third, what would the criteria be for the distribution of those funds? I assume the minister will want to take those questions as notice.

Senator Austin: I thank Senator Nurgitz for his questions and interest, and I will reply with some care in a day or two.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

UNIVERSALITY OF OLD AGE SECURITY AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development. There has been a great deal of speculation in the media in the recent past concerning the universality of certain programs—namely, the old age security program and the family allowance program—and whether the government is examining them with the possibility of making changes. Would the minister advise the Senate as to what the government proposes to do in this area?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): At the moment, I think the short answer to the honourable senator's question is that all government programs are under review at all times, but the universal nature of the availability of family allowances and old age security pensions is not in the process of any change or new designation. This is a firm characteristic of the programs and it will continue.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF WELFARE RECIPIENTS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that statistics show that the welfare rolls are increasing at the alarming rate of 10 to 12 per cent, and the prediction is that this process will continue for the next few years because of bankruptcies and high unemployment, I wonder if the minister could advise us as to whether he is discussing these statistics with the provinces in order to be able to cope with this problem, to provide the necessary funds to keep people off the welfare rolls.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I, personally, am not having discussions with the provinces, but the responsible ministers are.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): And you are not a responsible minister?

Senator Austin: I think the honourable senator can anticipate that statements will be made on this subject over the next few days in the other place by the responsible ministers.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

AGING PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF COVERAGE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, turning to another social problem having to do with veterans' affairs, there is in existence now an aging program which is extended to disability pensioners. The minister, on several occasions, has been asked to extend the program to those veterans on war veterans allowance and civilian war allowances, and he has indicated that because of a lack of funds it will probably not be extended for the next many months or, perhaps, years.

● (1430)

In view of the fact that the Second World War veterans are now, on average, in their middle sixties and, for the most part, need to participate in that aging veterans' program, which is excellent, would the minister, when he meets with the cabinet committee, discuss with the Minister of Veterans Affairs this alarming situation, which is becoming worse with each day that passes, to see if they can hasten the extension of that program to those recipients of the war veterans allowance?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): I will certainly speak with the Minister of Veterans Affairs on the subject of disability pensioners under his authority.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

UNIVERSALITY OF OLD AGE SECURITY AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Social Development. I heard the question and answer with regard to universality of family allowances and old age security, if that is the right terminology. I also thought I heard the Prime Minister, when he made his trilogy of speeches last week, declaring that the universality of those two programs would not be affected by any effort to find money to convert to other purposes.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): I believe the Prime Minister said about two weeks ago that these aspects of universality in the two programs, child care and old age assistance, would not be amended.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Oh, yes, they would be amended.

[Senator Marshall.]

Senator Austin: He went on to say that this was a time when the social security system of Canada was most needed by the people of Canada and that, indeed, it would be maintained and, where necessary, reinforced. I hope that is the same answer I gave earlier today in this chamber with respect to Senator Bosa's question.

Senator Flynn: I think you are wrong. The Prime Minister said it would be amended so that the rule of six and five could be applied. That is an amendment.

Senator Austin: I am speaking about the universality. With respect to the rule of six and five, the Prime Minister—

Senator Flynn: You said "reinforced." How can you reinforce universality?

Senator Austin: Let us take the record as it stands. If you want to bring a prime ministerial comment to the chamber, I will be glad to see it.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I think the answer the minister gave to my question, subject only to the question of six and five, was what I heard, or thought I heard, the Prime Minister say and what I thought I heard the minister answer to Senator Bosa. However, I wanted to make sure that he was relying, as I had come to do, on what the Prime Minister had said and not upon his own responsibilities.

Senator Austin: I do not know what that question means. I am taking responsibility, as a minister, for answering questions in this chamber, and I am happy also to advise you of the Prime Minister's statements with respect to policy, and I will endeavour to make them clearer, if that is possible.

With respect to the previous question and Senator Flynn's comments, I am sure Senator Flynn understands that I was dealing with the question of universality, that is to say, universal access to those programs, and not with the question of how much is paid specifically or other matters which, albeit of important character, are not identified with the concept of universality.

Senator Flynn: How can you reinforce universality?

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question concerns the Garrison situation in Manitoba. In spite of the fact that both the federal government and the Government of Manitoba have repeatedly made representations to stop progress on the Garrison project, the fact remains that money has been voted to continue its further development. The people of Manitoba are becoming more and more concerned that their fresh water will be polluted because of infiltration of water from the project. They are concerned also about the fish and wildlife dependent on that fresh water.

I am not asking my leader to answer that question today, but bearing in mind the importance of the project and the seriousness of the question, could he undertake to give us a progress report, perhaps some time next week?

It may be that he will wish to refer the matter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If so, perhaps he could ask him to make representations on our behalf so that the work on the project will be stopped once and for all, and so that the people of Manitoba can be reassured that the planned development will not proceed and the water will not be diverted into Manitoba, as has been suggested.

I am voicing this concern in the hope that some representation will be made by the leader of the Senate on our behalf.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He is the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He is not the leader of the Senate.

Senator Guay: I am sorry. I forgot for a moment that there was a leader of the other side. I should have said, "Leader of the Government in the Senate."

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am keenly aware of the importance of this situation and of the consequences for that part of Manitoba that would be affected should the project go ahead. I am also keenly aware of Senator Guay's interest in this matter and of the service he is performing for the people of the province—who, understandably, are apprehensive—by continually and consistently reminding us that certain events appear to be taking place that are inconsistent with the best interests of Manitobans.

As Senator Guay has suggested, I will take notice of the question and try to bring an update to the Senate early next week.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

RESPONSIBILITY OF MINISTER OF STATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Social Development if he has retained all of the responsibilities that fell on his shoulders prior to his present appointment. I refer to such matters as the constitutional development of the northern territories, the interests of the native peoples, and the like. Who is now responsible for those matters? Are those responsibilities on top of or beneath his new responsibilities?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): I have retained, without change, the responsibilities I had before September 10.

TABLED DOCUMENTS

AVAILABILITY TO SENATORS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Marshall yesterday concerning the tabling of documents in the Senate and their distribution to senators.

I should like to advise Senator Marshall that, first of all, the minister responsible sends a covering letter to the Clerk of the Senate, along with two copies of the document to be tabled, in both official languages. The documents are then formally presented by me, as Leader of the Government in the Senate, for tabling. After the documents have been tabled, they are available to any honourable senator who wishes to examine them.

If an honourable senator wishes to have a copy of a tabled document, he or she can usually obtain it either from the Journals Branch of the Senate or from the Distribution Office.

I should like to emphasize that there is no actual link between the distribution and the tabling of the documents, except insofar as I have already explained. There are, of course, statutory requirements for the tabling of certain reports and other documents within a specific time frame, but the parliamentary distribution of documents is the responsibility of the department involved.

It follows, therefore, that honourable senators might, because of a parliamentary recess, receive some documents before they have been tabled. Indeed, that has happened. Other documents might be distributed after tabling, while still others might not receive general distribution at all, but such documents are always available to honourable senators upon request.

In the case of the report of the Army Benevolent Fund Board, alluded to yesterday by Senator Marshall, I was informed that that report had not been generally distributed. So it would seem that, because of the tabling process, Senator Marshall was made aware of the existence of the document and was able to obtain a copy for his own use. It would not be either practical or very economical for every department to send copies of every single report to the office of every parliamentarian.

● (1440)

Having said that, there is no question that those reports are available. You may request that your name be placed on a mailing list and you will receive those documents on a regular basis. To send out every single report that is printed would entail an unjustifiable expense.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked on June 15 last by Senator Nurgitz regarding the federal government's advertising campaign.

The Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has developed a computerized system for storing and retrieving information on jobs which cannot be filled locally—the National Job Bank. Job seekers can therefore learn about job vacancies in another region. Based on the recommendation of the Allmand task force report, where there are large numbers of vacancies in the same occupation, the CEIC places ads in newspapers. Jobs that are hard to fill are advertised in shopping centres via Teledon, a terminal on which all job vacancies are listed. Job vacancies are also posted on bulletin boards in a job information centre which is part of the CEIC.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS—ADVERTISING BUDGETS AND EXPENDITURES

Question No. 64 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Lowell Murray:

For the 1981-82 fiscal year, what is the advertising budget for each government department?

Reply by the Minister of Supply and Services:

Insofar as the Department of Supply & Services is concerned:

The projected budget for 1981-82 was $68,900,000. The actual expenditures, for the fiscal year 1981-82 by department are provided in Appendix A for the contracts processed through the department.

SALARIES

Question No. 75 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Orville H. Phillips:

What are the salaries for (i) the Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister's Office, Thomas Axworthy (ii) the Privy Council Clerk, Michael Pitfield, and (iii) the Federal-Provincial Relations Secretary, Michael Kirby?

Reply by the Prime Minister's Office and the Privy Council Office:

As individual salaries of deputy ministers or equivalent rank are determined on the basis of assessed performance, their exact salaries are not released. Effective November 1, 1981, the salary ranges were adjusted as indicated in part (a) below. Individuals did not receive an increase corresponding to this range adjustment, however, and their salaries continue to be set within the ranges as established effective April 1, 1981 as set out in part (b) below.

NATIONAL FINANCE

"GOVERNMENT POLICY AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT"— CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance entitled Government Policy and Regional Development, tabled in the Senate on Monday, October 25, 1982.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance entitled Government Policy and Regional Development was published on October 20 and was tabled in the Senate on Monday evening. Therefore, all honourable senators have received a copy of it and have had an opportunity to peruse it, so my remarks on it will be as brief as I can possibly make them.

First of all, I should like to thank, as we do in the preface of the report, all of the staff connected with the publication of the report. I thank them for the outstanding work they did.

I would particularly like to thank the members of the committee who attended the 40 meetings to hear the evidence on which this report is based.

I make special mention of Peter Dobell, from the Parliamentary Centre, who was of enormous help to the committee.

I should also like to thank Peter Sagar, who was commissioned by the Parliamentary Centre to be directly involved in this report.

I should like to make special mention of Gordon Lovelace. The Senate is fortunate to have him assisting His Honour the Speaker. I found him a joy to work with and very effective.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: The report on Government Policy and Regional Development is really divided into two parts, the first being an enunciation of the principles on which we believe that a regional development policy should be based, the second being an examination of the government re-organization which was announced some months ago. That examination takes place from the viewpoint of the principles that we develop early in the report.

Dealing first with the principles on which we believe regional development policy should be based, we discovered that there is a tendency to try to minimize disparities between the different parts of the country through the personal transfer system and, as admirable as that might be, we found that very often an attempt to narrow disparities by that means actually widens them. What happens is that it impedes the adjustment of costs which will attract new investment and will see those areas develop the way they should.

We find that the only effective way to reduce disparities is to encourage development to the potential of the under-developed region, and to put in place policies and investments that will improve productivity.

The government's role is to interfere as little as possible with the natural market forces. The development should be based on the principle of comparative advantage, and in the report we do define "comparative advantage". There is a fairly lengthy discussion setting out what comparative advantage is, but we conclude by saying simply that comparative advantage is that each region does what it is most able to do, and trades for the products and services it is less adapted to supply.

The most effective area for the government to take action is in the maintenance and improvement of the infrastructure. There are two elements of infrastructure: hard infrastructure and soft infrastructure. Honourable senators are very much aware of what the hard infrastructure is—roads, communications systems, the railway systems, and so forth. In that regard Canada is highly developed, but there is also another aspect of infrastructure which deals with things like training of personnel, and that is soft infrastructure. That is an area into which more time and effective effort must be put, and that effort should include improving skills in the less developed areas in marketing and management.

The committee tried to develop certain guiding principles that the government might follow when intervening on behalf of the underdeveloped areas. First of all we say, "Don't try to pick winners." That has been the problem of governments all over the world. They have not been successful at that and, in our judgment, will not be successful. What they should do is encourage the market forces to work, and react to those market forces.

There has been a tendency in Canada to emphasize development based on manufacturing and on resource upgrading—and by that I mean the processing of our natural resources. There is also a growing emphasis on investment in high technology, despite the fact that, while there is a lot of fun and sometimes some profit in high technology, it is a high risk area. Probably more than one out of every 10 firms in that area go under.

We do not believe that there should be emphasis on these particular segments of the economy. We say that whatever investment works should be supported, provided it is based on the market principle of comparative advantage.

We say that there has been a tendency to overlook certain areas of development. The idea today is that upgrading and processing one's own resources is what one ought to do. The fact of the matter is that we live in an extremely competitive world in terms of natural resources. We should only upgrade if it makes market sense to do so. We have been schooled to the idea that it is a terrible thing to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, but the fact is that an enormous part of our national income and the national income of many countries is based on the export of resources. We ought to be very careful about saying that we should not export our resources or that we should leave them in the ground until we can do all the processing and manufacturing.

● (1450)

The other thing about resources is that we are often preoccupied with non-renewable ones because the projects involved in their development are exciting. It is always exciting to see an oil well drilled and a mine started up, but we often overlook the fact that the greater national income comes from the renewable resources such as farming, fishing and forestry.

We also found that one of the most overlooked sectors, with very little support in terms of regional development and in many other areas of government assistance, has been the service sector. For some reason it is not accepted as a sector that is worthy of support. In fact, the service sector is a labour-intensive one. The argument against it is that it just supports the resource and manufacturing industries, but there are many service industries that stand on their own feet.

My favourite example is the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minnesota, a somnolent little town 60 miles from Minneapolis, where two brothers who were doctors happened to live. They developed a clinic which now treats patients from all over the world. An enormous amount of income flows into that sector of the American economy by virtue of that service industry's being there.

One of the arguments against the service industry is that there have been no advances in productivity. The figures belie that. There have been tremendous advances in productivity in the service industries. Also, many countries have achieved very fine living standards by deriving much of their national income from service industries such as banking and insurance.

The third area that we felt was being overlooked was the tremendous improvement that has taken place over the last few years in the technology of communication. It makes it possible to decentralize much of our industry across the country that is now centralized largely in the Toronto area. It also makes it possible to have a wider dispersal of head offices across the country.

One of the other principles we found was that regional development policies must be steadily pursued and consistently funded. In other words, they have to be part of a long-range policy.

The central recommendation of the report deals with the fact that all provinces, be they rich or poor, have underdeveloped areas. By "underdeveloped areas" we mean the following—and I should like to quote from the report, at page 12:

Our concern is for those regions that for many years have known little more than failure and threatened failure and have existed at income and employment levels well below those in other parts of Canada. These areas have not fallen recently from economic grace in the same way that certain manufacturing areas in southern Ontario have done. The regions that concern us have never known such grace.

If there are such areas—and there are—in every province, be it rich or poor, then it means that the objectives of the federal and provincial governments in respect of regional development are the same. There must be involvement of the federal government in regional development to offset the advantages that exist in the wealthy provinces, to ensure that regional development policy strengthens rather than fragments the economy and to prevent balkanization of the Canadian common market. But there must be co-operation with the provinces.

The central theme of the report is that in every province there are underdeveloped areas. They may be the inter-lake area of Manitoba or the Gaspé region, but in every province there are such areas, and they are the areas we must be concerned with. We must be concerned with them as a federal government along with each provincial government, and there must be co-operation between those two entities.

The report goes on to examine the government reorganization from the viewpoint of those principles. The reorganization centred around two areas: the Ministry of State for Economic Development, and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The Ministry of State for Economic Development was changed to the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development by adding to its mandate the regional policy and co-ordinating functions of DREE. This was done to ensure that regional concerns are a priority in cabinet decision-making. It was done to co-ordinate the activities of the economic departments that are known as the sectoral departments, such as Agriculture, and Industry, Trade and Commerce. MSERD was also to act as an adviser to the Cabinet Committee on Economic and Regional Development, and there is to be a co-ordinating executive named by MSERD in each of the provinces to co-ordinate the economic activity and to advise the government on the regional implications of its economic policies.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was merged with the domestic part of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to form the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion.

Another part of the reorganization was that the General Development Agreements, which were agreements signed by the federal government with each of the provinces laying out a strategy for regional development, are to be allowed to expire. They are to be replaced, according to the news release, with simpler agreements, and the savings from the GDAs, as they expire, will be put into a regional fund, but it is uncertain how that regional fund is to be used.

The government will base much of its development on the mega-projects that it sees necessary for Canadian development down the road, and will try to assure that the benefits from those mega-projects are shared across the country.

In certain regional development initiatives the government also will assume sole responsibility for certain projects and leave sole responsibility for other projects to the provinces.

The reaction of the committee to that reorganization and some of the plans that were enunciated at the time of the reorganization is, first of all, that the idea of co-ordinating the regional development efforts of all the economic departments in the government is a good one. The idea of MSERD having executives in each of the provinces to co-ordinate activities and to keep the cabinet informed of regional development activities and needs may be a good thing. However, we are concerned about the co-operation with the provinces.

● (1500)

Take a look at the initiatives that the government is suggesting they will undertake. They are saying that they are going to replace the General Development Agreements on which, up to now, regional development strategy has been based. They say they are going to replace them with simpler agreements. Obviously, they are going to be fairly simple because there is enough money flowing out of them to set up a regional development fund which they estimate will be worth $200 million in 1984-85, and they see it growing beyond that.

The federal government is assuming sole responsibility for certain projects and is leaving other projects to the provinces. When we spoke to witnesses and when we did some private investigations into government thinking, it became clear that the government wants greater visibility for its role in regional development. I can understand that. Very often, if the federal government provides up to 90 per cent of the funding of a project and the province gets all the political credit, the federal government, being part of a political entity, is probably going to be upset. One construction one can put on that, if one takes those things altogether, is that there will be less co-operation with the provinces, so that the federal government will seem to be more involved in regional development than it has been to date. That is one concern.

The other concern is that if you look at the announcement of the reorganization and what we have been able to read and discover since, regional development is viewed in terms of provinces or the western region, the maritime region, the prairie region, or the central region. In anything we have been able to read, there is no mention about the underdeveloped areas of the country. Those areas, that I mentioned before when reading from the report, have never known the grace of economic development.

DREE is going to be merged with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The role of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is to create development wherever it can. That is what it is there to do.

If one is trying to encourage development in the country, it is a lot easier to encourage development in Toronto than it is in the inter-lake area of Manitoba. DREE has been merged with that department, so the possibility arises that there will be no voice to champion the cause of the underdeveloped areas. The tendency will be to go for the main chance—to support development where success is assured. One cannot be assured of success in the underdeveloped areas.

A large part of the concept is based on distributing the benefits from the mega-projects, but, when we examined that, we found that the mega-projects will probably widen the disparities between the developed and less developed areas of the country and not narrow them. There may be a semantic difficulty because the government is talking about regional development in terms of spreading the benefits across the country so that there is less of a difference between, say, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island—and that is a very valid point of view—but that has very little to do with regional development. We found that that kind of development largely takes place as resources are discovered and population moves. It is not what we call regional development. What we call “regional development” is the concern for the less developed areas of this country which are found in every province, rich or poor.

The committee is prepared to accept that the government reorganization is, in many ways, a fait accompli, but there is still, as we say in the report, flesh to be put on the bones.

We suggest that MSERD and DRIE receive a legislative mandate. In this regard, I should like to read the recommendation at the top of page 12 of the report, which states:

With the demise of DREE, there is no longer a federal department with the sole mandate of promoting development in the least developed regions of the country. There is a risk that the Ministry of State for Economic and Regional Development and the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, which have responsibility for the prosperous as well as the least developed regions, may pay diminished attention to the latter. Accordingly, MSERD and DRIE should receive legislative mandates requiring them to pay special attention to the problems and needs of the least developed regions of this country.

Additionally, we say that MSERD, in consultation with the provinces, should designate the underdeveloped areas throughout this country. The report goes on to state:

MSERD should be directed, in co-operation with provincial authorities, to designate specific regions across Canada that most require and that would benefit from regional development programs. This designation should be confined to the least developed areas of Canada and should not include areas that require special industrial adjustment assistance during a period of transition or industrial disruption.

We believe that there should be an annual assessment of the efforts of the sectoral departments in regional development.

Finally, we believe that the General Development Agreements should not be replaced; that is most important. If you designate underdeveloped areas of the country, then it follows that you should enter into agreements with the provinces. These General Development Agreements provided a co-operative effort that was based on long-range planning. They were effective and they should not be done away with.

If the federal government legitimately feels that it is not getting adequate visibility for its efforts, then the General Development Agreements ought to be amended to provide for that, and we feel that can be done.

Honourable senators, it is true that in committee we are speculating on what the government will do. It has created the framework of the organization. It has not finally enunciated the policies on which that organization will operate.

There is nothing wrong with that, although a couple of articles have been written indicating that the report has come out too late; but that is not so. Now is the time to influence the government on how it will implement that reorganization, because that is where all the difference will be made. All I say is that we, as a committee, are concerned that there be co-operation with the provinces and that visibility for the federal government be achieved through agreement with the provinces and not in spite of agreement. We further say that the special efforts requiring regional development should be directed to the underdeveloped areas of Canada.

• (1510)

It seems to us, from everything we have read and from everything we have seen, that the basic point the government has missed is that regional development concerns those underdeveloped areas. That is the point that has to be brought into government policy when that policy on which the new government reorganization will operate is fleshed out.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I am a member of the National Finance Committee, and I should like to say a word or two in connection with General Development Agreements. Let me say, first, that I think the report is an excellent one. I congratulate all who worked on it, and particularly the chairman of the committee. I think one of the finest compliments I heard regarding the report was from a member of the press. He said that he had read the report and that it was so eminently sensible that he did not think the government would adopt it.

Honourable senators, I want to say one or two words about General Development Agreements. In doing so, I disagree somewhat with Senator Everett, the chairman of the National Finance Committee.

I would like to take a moment or two to put forward the case on behalf of the federal government with regard to General Development Agreements. I will only speak about the province of Saskatchewan, about which I have some first-hand knowledge. The top third of the province, or northern Saskatchewan, was one of the areas designated as being underdeveloped. A great weakness of the General Development Agreement was that, to begin with, one level of government spent the money while another level of government raised it. My experience has been that the government which did not have to raise the money—in this case, the provincial government of Saskatchewan—spent and budgeted for the money with a rather careless hand. I think that what I have to say about the provincial government of Saskatchewan can probably be generally applied to the governments of other provinces.

Honourable senators, I actually heard of a case where one individual who had been working for the provincial government came down from the north, having budgeted for $100,000, and was almost fired and was told to go back and find a million, because, after all, "the feds are putting up 90 per cent of the money." When I was Treasurer of Saskatchewan—they are now called finance ministers because they spend more than a billion dollars, but in the old days, when we were responsible, we were called treasurers—I hated the idea of a 25-cent dollar or a 10-cent dollar, in the sense that the province would put up 25 cents while the feds would put up 75, or the province would spend 10 cents while the feds would spend 90 cents. It was my experience that, in spending that kind of money, there was a great deal of irresponsibility on the part of the province.

Therefore, while I agree with Senator Everett that there could have been some tightening up, I think it is difficult for the federal government to be in full co-operation with the provinces while they are allowed to get away with not paying the piper.

The other point I want to raise has to do with political credit. This may seem crass or rather petty, but it is not. I will deal again with western Canada. Unfortunately, there is in the west a feeling of alienation from central Canada. I am not speaking only in the political sense; it crosses political lines. Western Canadians seem to be asking, "What do we get out of Confederation? What is in it for us?" We have seen, continually, millions of federal dollars spent in northern Saskatchewan, where practically no credit at all has been given to the federal government. During the short time the Conservatives were in power, the same thing happened—and I repeat that I am not talking along political lines. The federal government continued to spend a lot of money in that province, yet still received very little credit for doing so. People continued to ask: "What is in it for us in Saskatchewan? Why should we be part of this federation? We don't get anything out of it; it is all a one-way street." The situation did not change, in spite of the warnings given over the years by the federal government to the provinces that they ought to be giving a little more recognition to the federal effort and input. The federal government certainly did not get that recognition from Saskatchewan.

Perhaps the federal government had a sore finger and cut the arm off to cure the disease; perhaps it went too far in cancelling or changing entirely the General Development Agreements. Perhaps there is another solution, as Senator Everett has said. Surely, the federal government is not without the wit or the common sense to find some way of obtaining adequate acknowledgment of the federal presence, in the spending through DREE or whatever takes its place? Let us not discount this lack of acknowledgment of the federal government's effort as being a serious problem; it certainly is serious.

I want to say only one other thing about the General Development Agreements. I say this coming from Saskatchewan, and I am sure that I will be abused for saying it, but from the security of the Senate I can take that abuse. There are some areas of northern Saskatchewan where it is just damned nonsense to talk about spending money on development. I do not know about the rest of Canada; I am sure such places exist elsewhere. There is no point in talking about spending money in efforts to encourage development—there is just nothing to develop. In a vast country like Canada, we have to face this fact. There may be some areas where perhaps, at one time, there was a mine, or where, at one time, hundreds of people made a living fishing and trapping, yet today the mines are gone or the other natural resources have become depleted. There is only one solution to this sort of problem, honourable senators, and it lies in the re-education and relocation of the people living in those areas. Politically, however, that is a very tender subject in most provinces. The easiest answer was to go to "good old uncle down here in Ottawa" and get millions of dollars in subsidies.

Saskatchewan had a great trick. They said, "We have really cut down on welfare in northern Saskatchewan"—they hired them all to work for the provincial government. I could never really tell, in some cases, whether those people ought to have been on welfare or on the public payroll, but it looked real good in the report.

I think there was good reason, honourable senators, for the federal government to look long and hard at the General Development Agreements. I am inclined to agree with Senator Everett when he says that they went too far too fast, but if they do change their minds and reconsider the question, in whatever department this happens, I hope they are much more selective. I hope, as well, that there is a far greater demand for the fair recognition of the federal government, regardless of the political stripe of the government in Ottawa. When I make that statement, I am talking about the federal presence in a federal state.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, may I be permitted a supplementary question? The Honourable Senator Steuart referred to the fact that the federal government was paying 90 per cent while the provincial governments paid 10 per cent under General Development Agreements. I would refer him to page 80 of the report, where it shows that the federal government paid 90 per cent in only two provinces—Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. In Saskatchewan, the federal government paid 60 per cent while the provincial government paid 40 per cent. I wondered where he got his figures.

Senator Steuart: Perhaps it is so indicated in the report, but if you take the total DREE commitment in General Development Agreements, you will find that in some places the split was 50-50, and, in others, the split was 40-60. There were some places in northern Saskatchewan, however, where I am sure that the actual extra money spent by the federal government in some programs would make the split 90-10.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, in reply to what Senator Steuart has said, I do not think there is much difference between our views. I think that the federal government, regardless of stripe, as Senator Steuart says, should receive credit for what it does in any of these areas and, indeed, should be criticized for what it does badly. I think the report is really getting at this point, namely, that the honest need for visibility should not result in the necessary reduction of co-operation between the federal government and the provincial governments. I believe that is what is so important. The means has to be found by which to give each government its proper share of the limelight. The most important thing, however, is that those areas should be looked after. The only way they can be looked after is in a co-operative effort.

I could not help but agree, as does the report, with the idea that one of the greatest criticisms of DREE was that, under political pressure, half the country was designated as being an underdeveloped area. Of course, what we are saying is that the definition should be narrowed. We think the federal government may well have fallen into the same trap now, when it talks about provinces and regions of provinces. It is the underdeveloped areas that should be designated. They should be helped, and the only way they can be helped is by close co-operation between the two levels of government.

● (1520)

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have read the report, but obviously I have not read it with the same understanding and eyes as Senator Everett has. I had not intended to say anything about the report, except to compliment the committee. However, having listened to Senator Everett explain his understanding of what the report is all about, and having listened also to Senator Steuart, it occurs to me that there may be some things that should be said in addition to saying it is a fine report. I should like to have the opportunity to read the Hansard report of what both honourable senators have said. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CANADIAN RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' PENSION ASSOCIATION— CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications with respect to certain issues relating to the Canadian National Railways Pensions Trust Funds presented on Thursday, July 29, 1982.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I do not propose to speak at length on this report; nor do I intend to make a formal motion regarding it. However, it is clear, from the evidence heard by the committee, that this question does require considerable study. I believe that in the minds of the members of the committee there is the question of whether or not those who appeared before the committee were justified in some of the arguments they presented, and it may well be that further investigation, at some length, is necessary.

In any event, I wish to say that in the opinion of the committee this is a serious problem, the examination of which may justify the criticisms that are made about the present situation. There is sufficient evidence that things are not good and that a further and more extensive investigation should be carried out.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this order is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INDUSTRIAL STRATEGIES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of the Leader of the Government? My question arises from statements attributed to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, during the luncheon for journalists following the budget. The Minister of Finance is quoted as suggesting that the government will embark shortly on a series of industrial strategies, and, according to the report in the Globe in Mail,

Mr. Lalonde used the National Energy Program, which encourages Canadian ownership in the oil and gas industry, as an example of a successful industrial strategy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Murray: It was stated that the government has said it is preparing industrial strategies for fishing and transportation and has talked of developing others for such areas as forest products.

My first question to the minister is: When may we expect an announcement of the industrial strategies for those sectors if, indeed, the minister confirms that those strategies are now under preparation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall refer the question to my colleague to whom certain statements in a forum other than Parliament have been attributed. Those statements may have come from a press report, and such reports can sometimes be quite accurate and, of course, sometimes not. I would, therefore, want to check with the minister to whom the statements are attributed to make sure the interpretation is correct. Following that, I shall answer the other parts of the question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the minister is only a few days removed from the portfolio of economic development; I am astonished that he is not in a position to say whether the government has under consideration industrial strategies in the areas of fishing, transportation and forest products.

Can the minister say, to his knowledge, as a member of the government and as the former Minister of State for Economic Development, whether, in fact, the government will embark shortly on a series of industrial strategies in those sectors?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is not a matter of embarking on a series of industrial strategies in those sectors because it is already a well-known fact that the government commissioned what is now referred to as the Kirby report on the fisheries on the east coast and the Pearce report on the fisheries on the west coast. Those reports are now complete and contain a number of recommendations. One cannot say that the embarkation upon an industrial strategy to improve the economics and the well-being of the people involved has not already taken place; there is no question about that.

With respect to the matter of reforestation, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has announced a number of agreements with the provinces regarding enhanced reforestation programs and, indeed, in many cases he has attached quite a significant amount of funding to those programs; that is already under way.

If there is any other particular sector that the honourable senator would like to inquire about in respect of an embarkation date, I would remind him that an announcement in this regard was made some time ago.

Senator Murray: It is the estimated time of arrival that we are interested in. However, I think we are making some progress, since the minister obviously knows a bit more about these matters than he was prepared to admit in response to my first question.

Senator Olson: The verb "embark" caused me difficulty, because we are already well down the road.

Senator Murray: May I ask the minister to identify which aspects of the National Energy Program commend themselves to the government in the preparation of industrial strategies for fishing, transportation and forest products?

At the same time, may I ask the minister whether the Kirby report on the east coast fisheries will be made public, and, if so, when?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, to answer the last question first, I will make inquiries to ascertain from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans when he is prepared to make that document public.

In regard to the other part of my friend's question—since he is obviously on a fishing expedition—I would want to check with the Minister of Finance to find out exactly what he did say, because he drew the similarity between the National Energy Program and others.

● (2010)

I know that my honourable friend can read it out of the newspaper if he wishes, but both of us have been around here long enough to know that we really ought to give it at least a cursory check in order to ascertain the accuracy of the interpretation. I have already given him an undertaking that I would do so. I also told him only a few moments ago that, after I have so checked, it may be that other information will come to light and I will be able to answer the other questions that he raised. His attempt to try to relate this matter to an allegation that I have not checked is hardly the way to pursue this kind of question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the minister does seem to be terribly uncomfortable, if not embarrassed, by the suggestion that there are aspects of the National Energy Program which could be applied to industrial strategies in other sectors.

Is it or is it not the position of the government that the National Energy Program is a model for industrial strategies in other sectors?

Senator Olson: I should advise my honourable friend that I am not one bit uncomfortable. The only time I get uncomfortable is when I accept at face value one of his interpretations from whatever his sources are. I then become very uncomfortable because, upon checking them out in a number of cases in the past, I have found them to be substantially different from my information.

[Senator Olson.]

There are many highly desirable aspects of the National Energy Program, such as raising significantly the Canadian ownership of the energy sector in this country.

Senator Murray: By those means—it is good to have that on the record.

Senator Olson: "By those means" is, again, an interpretation which is highly questionable.

IMMIGRATION

CUTBACKS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Government in the Senate has finished his postscript to my colleague, Senator Murray, I should like to direct to him a question with respect to recent indications that there will be a serious diminution of the number of people from other parts of the world who will be allowed to emigrate to our country. I am not clear on this matter, and nothing I have read in Hansard of the other place or, for that matter, in the press—which obviously is of the view that it knows more than the inhabitants of either house—has made it any clearer to me.

Could the honourable senator tell us what is meant, in numerical terms, by the statement of the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy? Is it possible to determine the reduction in numbers of potential immigrants who will be coming into our country? Are there any geographic or ethnic bases upon which decisions regarding immigration will be made?

I think it is apparent that it has been decided by the government that, because of the shortage of jobs in Canada, we should cut down on immigration. I am not commenting on that policy one way or the other. The honourable minister is a very astute man in terms of economics and mathematics. Could he tell us what this means?

For a long time Canada has been considered one of the great countries in terms of opening its borders and accepting people who wanted to come to a new land, namely, our land.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the immigration levels are arrived at by adding their components; that is, the family class, the refugee intake, and selected workers. The reduction reflects a drop in selected worker intake and results from the current economic climate, which is well known to my friends opposite.

The reduction in selected worker intake from this year's level of a range of 20,000 to 25,000 to a range of 8,000 to 10,000 in 1983 will, when the dependants of these workers are included, account for virtually all of the reduction in the total level.

These 8,000 to 10,000 selected workers will be destined to fill job positions which, after careful checking, cannot be filled from within Canada. I should also mention that this figure of 8,000 to 10,000 is for planning purposes, and that the actual selected worker intake could be even lower. The restriction on selected workers from abroad will remain in effect until, as a result of the expected economic upturn, it is demonstrable that such immigrants are required and can be absorbed within reason into the Canadian labour market.

● (2015)

Senator Macquarrie: I thank the minister for his answer. I do not wish to be argumentative about this, but, as one who knows what is decided by the Cabinet, can he tell me whether, in terms of movement into this country, the policy will prove to be a hardship on the suffering people of Lebanon, and the people from the Caribbean, who have established a flow to our country?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall look into that aspect and give a more precise answer as soon as possible. However, I want to make it clear to my honourable friend that we hope that the selected workers can indeed find jobs that are economically beneficial to them, as persons emigrating to this country, and also to Canada, where the main thrust of the change is.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, may I add a final supplementary? I realize that the Caribbean people would be in that category, and I know, as does the minister, that the Lebanese people would be in the category of political refugees, or something very close to it. I should be grateful if the minister, as he indicated, would give us further information on that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall do so; and if I were as familiar with my notes as I would like to be, I might find that I already have the information in my book.

SPORT

HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA—CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE
FRANCHISE—CONSTRUCTION OF STADIUM—PROPOSED GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Recently, I have been perusing periodicals and have noticed that the Canadian Football League has given to my constituency, Halifax, the right to a franchise to run a football team, provided it gets an adequate stadium.

I note that the federal government assisted towards having a stadium built in Edmonton for the Commonwealth Games, and that following those Games the stadium was made available to the Edmonton Eskimos of the CFL.

The article stated that the Minister of State for International Trade, the Honourable Gerald Regan—who happens to be the member of Parliament who sits for the constituency of Halifax—was opposed to a loan in any amount to assist in the construction of a football stadium. The requested amount is $4 million.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Donahoe: I now come to the point of my question, having set the stage for it. The article in question further stated that, since the honourable senator opposite has now become the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, the prospects for a loan or a grant being made to Halifax had vastly improved.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: I should like to know whether I can believe that story and be pleased about it, or whether it is another case of my hopes being dashed to the ground. Would the minister please state whether or not he can confirm the story?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, concerning Canadian professional football, I cannot imagine a more desirable event than the entry of an Atlantic team into the Canadian Football League, to give the CFL a truly national dimension.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: The fact is that today the Atlantic provinces are producing some of the most outstanding football players in Canada. Unfortunately, if they wish to enter the ranks of professional football, they must go to other teams in other parts of Canada or North America.

I have no doubt that, if the Atlantic provinces are able to field a professional franchise in the next two years, they will be competitive from the start because of the quality of the players there. I have recently had a number of constructive conversations with those who are attempting to develop the team in that area, and while there appear to be no existing federal programs available to provide loans or grants for stadium construction, except in those circumstances where Canada is hosting a major recognized international event, I can tell the honourable senator that I will do everything I can to support those who wish to establish a CFL presence in the Atlantic provinces.

● (2020)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We could not expect less.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Say thank you.

Senator Perrault: There seems to be a Montreal cynic here. But, really, I am not serious. I know that the Leader of the Opposition is just as enthusiastic about the prospect of an Atlantic team as anyone on this side, and it would be unfair to cast him in any other light. I want to be sportsmanlike.

Senator Flynn: So do I.

Senator Perrault: To provide a short answer, I have had conversations with some people who are attempting to bring a CFL team to the Atlantic provinces. I can say that anything I can do to make that goal a reality I certainly will do. But I have no immediate answers.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Must we be content with generalizations, or is it possible for the minister to give a specific answer to the question asked?

Senator Perrault: At the present time, I am considering the difficulties standing in the way of plans to establish an adequate stadium in the Atlantic provinces—something suitable for CFL football and other events. Let me share with honourable senators a problem that exists.

Senator Flynn: Good.

Senator Perrault: When Canada hosts a major recognized international sports event, the Canadian government, as a general practice, has participated financially and in other ways in attempting to ensure that the event is hosted successfully and properly, and so the federal government helped to build the Commonwealth Stadium in Edmonton for the Commonwealth Games, and the federal government helped to stage the Olympic Games in Montreal, and in the process helped to build the Olympic Stadium. The task of providing stadium assistance for the Atlantic provinces would be substantially easier were those provinces to host an international event which might qualify them for some sort of federal assistance under the program for the Canadian hosting of certain international events. Without a major international event, I can make no promises to the Atlantic provinces, but if a way can be found to meet the problem it certainly will be found by me and by the officials in my department, because I think it would be very desirable to have an Atlantic franchise in the CFL.

TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I am sure that the minister will remember my question of last week regarding the longshoremen's lockout on the Pacific coast and the rather strong criticism I and some other honourable senators had for the delay in getting these people back to work and settling the strike. The strike has now reached the stage where it appears that the government will have to legislate and end to the dispute.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You mean Parliament, not the government.

Senator Buckwold: That is correct. Will the minister give us an update on how long this process will take? Can he give us the assurance that things will be done as quickly as possible, keeping in mind that this is not the first time such a situation has arisen—or, to put it another way, this is not a virginal experience—and the government has legislated these people back to work on several occasions? The economy is suffering. The farmers of western Canada are anxious to have this matter settled. I shall be listening with interest to the response of the minister as to the time schedule involved in getting these people back to work.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I, too, wish that the lock-out of the grain handlers on the west coast was not continuing and that the parties had been able to settle the dispute. Unfortunately, that has not been the case. The government has already said that it is prepared to accept its responsibility in this matter. I am informed that the Honourable Yvon Pinard, the government house leader in the House of Commons, filed notice of back-to-work legislation at 5 o'clock this afternoon. I am also informed that Mr. Pinard will be meeting at 9 o'clock this evening with the house leaders of the other parties and will be pressing them to bring the legislation forward and to pass it through all its stages tomorrow. I am sure that the Senate will co-operate, as usual. I express my own hope that we can have Royal Assent to the bill tomorrow, thereby putting the legislation into effect.

Senator Flynn: Have you spoken to the leaders of the NDP in the other place?

Senator Argue: I looked over the blues of the House of Commons for this afternoon, particularly with regard to the exchange between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When did he become "Right Honourable"? The leader of the NDP is an Imperial Privy Councillor?

Senator Argue: I said, "the exchange between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition."

● (2025)

It was clear that the Leader of the Opposition was willing to co-operate and have the legislation pass all stages in a single day. The question, of course, arises as to the attitude of the leader of the NDP and the attitude of the New Democratic Party itself, but I express the hope that that party, too, will co-operate so that Parliament will be able to deal with this legislation effectively at all stages tomorrow.

I really do not think there is much more I can add. It would have been preferable—and perhaps there is still time, even though there are but few hours left—for the parties to settle their own differences. If that is not possible, the legislation will be proceeded with as soon as the parties in Parliament can agree. I understand that 48 hours' notice is required to put the legislation before Parliament, but it is hoped that that provision will be waived.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the honourable minister. Is it not correct that in the House of Commons this afternoon the Right Honourable the Prime Minister was being pressed by the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition to introduce the legislation today and have it pass all stages today?

Senator Argue: That is correct.

Senator Buckwold: I have one supplementary question. In the unlikely event—and I stress that I hope the possibility is remote—that the longshoremen ignore the order of the government, in view of the seriousness of this situation has the government a contingency plan for moving that grain?

Senator Argue: I have not heard that question discussed. My own view is that the parties will abide by the terms of the legislation. I have been around Parliament a long time and I do not recall any back-to-work legislation under which the employees involved did not in fact go back to work. I believe that if this legislation is passed they will go back to work.

In any event, I hope that when work is resumed the productivity will be there and we shall be able to meet our export targets and commitments out of the west coast. As I have referred to often before, there was a strike at Thunder Bay last year of two weeks' duration. Upon returning to work after that strike, the workers increased their productivity and broke all records of shipments through Thunder Bay.

From the statement the Prime Minister made in the House today, I understand that the legislation will provide for the immediate resumption of work. Perhaps I should read what he said so that I do not misinterpret his words:

As a first stage the lockout would be ended and work could resume in the ports on the west coast. Failing that, if the legislation has to be proceeded with then the government would intend applying the spirit of six and five legislation.

So it is now known to the parties involved that the spirit of 6-and-5 will be in this legislation. That may or may not be sufficient inducement to bring about a settlement.

SPORT

B.C. PLACE STADIUM, VANCOUVER

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a couple of quick questions for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Concerning various stadia in the country, it seems to me that yesterday or today I heard that Vancouver was about to test the roof on its new closed stadium. I trust the federal government has no financial involvement whatever in that structure.

• (2030)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): There is no federal financial involvement of any kind in the new British Columbia Place stadium, which will be the largest covered stadium in North America, and a great tribute to Canadian suppliers, architects, engineers and workers.

Senator Nurgitz: I can hardly wait to get to Vancouver to hear my honourable friend speak in that place.

WINTER OLYMPIC GAMES, CALGARY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Since the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport is on record as saying that the Calgary Olympic Games will get $200 million from the federal government in one way or another, I should like to ask whether that means that the $200 million commitment is iron-clad, or whether it is dependent upon revenue from such things as sports pools?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, this government has a remarkable record of keeping its promises.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Remarkable is right!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Exceptional!

Senator Perrault: I meant that in a very positive sense. We have made a commitment to the Calgary Olympic Games, which we hope will be the finest winter games in the history of that competition. We intend to keep our commitment to Calgary.

We hope to resolve our problems with the sports pool over the next few weeks.

LOTTERIES—DECISION OF QUEBEC SUPERIOR COURT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: On the question of problems with the sports pool, my understanding is that since I asked my last question the Quebec Superior Court has rejected the application of the federal government for an injunction against the Quebec provincial lotteries.

Is the minister able to tell us whether an appeal of that ruling is planned?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): The alternative courses of action are now under consideration. The preliminary action taken by the Quebec Superior Court may be but the first chapter in an extended scenario involving the courts.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are very pessimistic, aren't you?

Senator Nurgitz: I take nothing from the last answer.

I take it that Bill C-95 will deal with the question of sports pools. I trust that, in light of the decision of the Quebec Superior Court, that bill will not go forward at this time.

Senator Perrault: No, we are betting that the sports pool legislation will be through by the end of the year.

Senator Nurgitz: That bill will go forward notwithstanding the ruling made by the Quebec Superior Court?

Senator Perrault: The court ruling did not find that the proposed federal legislation was in contravention of the Criminal Code. Our view is that legislation is required to legalize sports pools in this country.

This position of the government has been stated over the past few months, and this position has been made known to the provincial governments, and, in my view, there is no feature in the preliminary ruling of the Quebec Superior Court which would deter us from our efforts to have the sports pool bill dealt with and passed by Parliament.

Senator Nurgitz: I have one final supplementary question. The federal government launched an action in the Quebec Superior Court challenging the province. I appreciate that we have received only a preliminary ruling on the injunction, but surely the government will await a decision in an action brought by itself before it proceeds with Bill C-95.

Senator Perrault: I have said all that I am prepared to say at this time. Perhaps a more detailed statement can be brought to the Senate later.

There is no intention on the part of the federal government at this time to halt its efforts to have the sports pool bill move through Parliament. I wish to give credit to the official opposition. A number of the members of the official opposition in the other place have made known their support for the bill and their desire to have it passed as quickly as possible. I want to say publicly that the government appreciates the kind of support it has received from certain members of the Progressive Conservative Party.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition would join with me in discouraging this kind of activity during Question Period, which activity really turns Question Period into a cross-examination.

I am sure he will recall the vigorous protests he made regarding some of those on this side of the house who involved themselves in the kind of activity Senator Nurgitz has just involved himself in. I would ask the Leader of the Opposition to ask him to please return to Question Period and cease this cross-examination.

Senator Flynn: I will certainly do that when the Leader of the Government understands the spirit of the rules, one of which is that nobody can question the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Olson: I am just asking the Leader of the Opposition to support me in attempting to restore order to Question Period.

Senator Flynn: You cannot ask me that during Question Period.

THE ECONOMY

NOVA SCOTIA—GLACE BAY AND PORT HAWKESBURY— RUMOURED CLOSING OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I trust that he will not resent it.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: You had better be careful, though.

Senator Muir: Yes, I notice that he is becoming touchy.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He is a Senate room lawyer, that one.

Senator Muir: According to the media, both written and electronic, it would appear that the heavy water plants in Glace Bay and Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia may possibly close, thereby putting approximately 1,000 skilled workers out of work.

Would the leader be good enough to tell this chamber that these reports are erroneous, and that work will continue in both of those plants?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received no notice that there is a firm announcement expected with respect to either of those plants. I think the honourable senator answered his own question before he started by saying that it was media speculation.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Muir: May I ask a supplementary question?

For some reason we find that with this government where there is smoke there is sometimes fire, and sometimes the media knows more about what is going on than the government does, and regrettably, this eventually develops into bad news.

Would the leader advise this chamber if he has any knowledge whatsoever, since he is one of the heavyweights in the Cabinet—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He used to be.

Senator Muir: —or was one of the heavyweights in the Cabinet, that there is a possibility that these plants may close because of a lack of markets for heavy water?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the answer is that I do not know about that. My honourable friend also has to realize one thing. While he may think it is in order for him to ask questions regarding what takes place at meetings of the Cabinet, he should know that I am prevented by the oath I have taken from discussing that with him or anyone else outside the Cabinet.

Senator Muir: I am sure that none of us in this chamber requires a lecture from the Leader of the Government with respect to what we should or should not ask him. In fact, he resents our questions, and I thought that that was the purpose of an opposition in a democratic form of government. We have not yet become one of the South American banana republics—I hope not, in any event—and I hope we are still in a position to ask questions. I am not asking him to tell us about any great love affairs or secrets; I am asking him what the future may be for the people employed in those heavy water plants. Since he is a very knowledgeable gentleman, and has so many years of experience under his belt, both in opposition and in government, I am sure he must have knowledge of some sort upon which he can base some word of encouragement or, God forbid, discouragement, to the employees of the heavy water plants I have mentioned.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, let me make it clear that I have never challenged or questioned my honourable friend's right to ask questions—or his privilege, or however he wishes to define it. If he is asking whether or not there has been any discussion in Cabinet on that subject, then the answer I gave him is the correct one.

• (2040)

As to the other part, if there is any announcement to be made, or if Cabinet has reached any decision with respect to this matter, I will make sure that my honourable friend is advised as quickly as possible. Let me comfort him and the workers there by saying that I do not know that any such decision is going to be made imminently.

Senator Muir: I have a supplementary question. I presumed, since the leader is the former minister of mega-projects, and this type of thing comes under that, that he might have some inside knowledge of what the future holds. May I continue to ask him if there are any negotiations going on at the present time with the Government of Korea for the purchase of a second Candu reactor. Such negotiations were going on, but for some reason they came to a rather abrupt stop. Does he have any further information on that at the moment?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will check with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and also with the Minister of State (International Trade) to get an accurate description, if that is the right word, of the present state of negotiations. My information prior to having made those inquiries is that the negotiations now are not quite as intense as they were.

Senator Muir: I have a further supplementary. In view of his response to my penultimate question, would it be in order then to relate to the workers in Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay that the Leader of the Government is speaking on behalf of the government when he says that insofar as he can determine there is no fear of closure of the heavy water plant at either of those points, a move which would jeopardize their jobs?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, Senator Muir cannot put that interpretation on it. What he can do is read carefully in Hansard what I said, and whatever portion of that he wishes to convey would be appropriate. If he wants to put some other interpretation on it, then, of course, he will have to take the responsibility for that interpretation.

Senator Muir: Is the minister not aware, through our long acquaintance, that I would only put the truthful interpretation on it. My understanding, as limited as the leader thinks it may be, is that at the moment these plants will continue to operate, these people will continue to work and their families do not have to worry about their being laid off next week, next month or next year.

Senator Olson: If Senator Muir reads what I said in Hansard tomorrow, and he wants to put that interpretation on it, I guess that is his responsibility.

Senator Muir: Is the minister not aware that he is evading the question? He should either tell us that there are going to be difficulties because of the lack of a market for heavy water, or that there are not going to be difficulties. Let us be frank with these people, because they have to think about their future mortgage payments, and all the problems that everyone is faced with in this country.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is confusing a couple of things. He asked me about a decision, and he asked me about speculation in the press. I told him very frankly that I know of no decision to support the speculation in the press. He was not satisfied with that answer, and he even went so far as to say that in his experience sometimes the press knows more than somebody else.

Senator Muir: But you discounted that.

Senator Olson: No, I did not. I said that if you want to extend it out to the words that you used after I replied to the question that is your responsibility. I will take responsibility for what I said.

Senator Muir: I wonder if the Leader of the Government is aware that the people who are involved in these plants will be just as confused with his gobbledygook and his baffle gab this evening as I am, because in one sentence he is saying that there is nothing to worry about, and yet in another sentence he is saying I am putting a different interpretation on it. Therefore, I shall be in touch with the unions and those concerned to ensure that they read his words very carefully.

Senator Olson: I would appreciate that.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to refer to a question I posed to the then Leader of the Government on July 20 concerning the Post Office, which had to do with the definition of "letter." As I think the minister may be aware, there is a good deal of concern about the fact that in this definition of "letter" the Canada Post Corporation is essentially defining its own monopoly. As there is no utility board or regulatory authority before which it appears, it creates some question as to whether the proposal will receive the sort of critical examination that it deserves.

On July 20 I asked the then Leader of the Government, first of all, to provide us with the contents of the representations made by the various interested parties with respect to the proposed definition of "letter" by the Post Office. I also asked him whether there would be a parliamentary opportunity to examine this definition and to ensure that Parliament be allowed to deal with the matter rather than leaving it in the unsatisfactory manner provided for in the statute, whereby the Post Office merely has to secure the consent of the Governor in Council in order to establish a monopoly in terms of its own definition, something which none of us would allow to happen in other industries which occupy similar monopolistic positions.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will endeavour to get an answer very shortly. Bearing in mind the fact that during the summer adjournment there were changes in the responsibilities of some ministers, we are now almost prepared to provide delayed answers to questions asked earlier this session.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I should tell my honourable friend, in view of the fact that he was not the leader at the time, that on July 27 a reply was offered, but it merely repeated what we already knew from publication in the Canada Gazette and did not deal with the point of the question, which was whether we would have the representations to study and whether there would be a parliamentary occasion on which the matter could be examined and debated. Those questions are still outstanding from July 27.

The reason why I am pursuing this question this evening is, as I suppose everyone knows, that there has been a widespread feeling of uneasiness on the part of the people who are using private couriers and on the part of the private couriers themselves. The people who are using private couriers think that their expenses will be grossly inflated if the definition of "letter" proposed by the Post Office really comes into effect. That certainly does not seem to fit well with the present state of the economy or the desire of the government for a more efficient and productive economy.

The second part of the concern is on the part of people who provide these services, who now feel that they will be forced out of business by the Post Office monopoly. Some of the organizations concerned are: The Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Industrial Traffic League, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Bankers' Association and the Canadian Association of Couriers of Toronto. There is quite a wide spectrum of people who either use this service or provide it, and who feel that their interests are going to be adversely affected, thereby affecting the interests of the national economy, if the definition goes forward as proposed at the present time.

I want to stress to my honourable friend the desirability of putting the facts on the table. Let the Post Office put their facts on the table and let them make their case which, to my knowledge, they have not done as yet. In any case, there should be a parliamentary opportunity—in the Senate, if you like—for the matter to be studied further, and a decision rendered.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understood the purport of the question, although I had not realized that Senator Roblin had already received a reply that was either unsatisfactory or incomplete. However, I will make further inquiries to see if we can complete the answer to his satisfaction. In any event, there is an opportunity in the Senate for him or any other honourable senator to give notice of an inquiry concerning this matter, which can be debated.

• (2050)

I do not want to make the other side of the argument, but there is an equally good one with respect to what the Post Office's activities are and where it has an obligation to deliver what is defined as "letter" to all places in Canada whether it is profitable or not.

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend that an inquiry could be launched, but I think he recognizes, just as I do, that that would not be an effective way of coming to grips with this problem, because the nature of an inquiry in the Senate does not permit those kinds of hearings on the part of people interested or on the part of the Post Office itself in respect to this matter.

The essential policy question is: Is he going to provide a forum before which these issues can be discussed, because they are of national importance and ought to be discussed, as any request by any other monopoly is discussed, before some public forum prior to any rights being granted?

[Senator Roblin.]

In view of the time limit, if we do not take steps very quickly to have the matter further ventilated, it will be settled by the Governor in Council. I urge upon my friend the necessity of getting a policy decision as quickly as he can.

LEGISLATION

BILL S-30—AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS IN RELATION TO CANADA DAY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government with respect to the bill which has just received first reading, Bill S-30, entitled: An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to Canada Day.

It seems to me that this bill contains entirely the same wording as the proposed amendments, except for one section, that the Leader of the Government invited the supporters of the government to reject last week when we were dealing with the Canada Day bill. I should like the Leader of the Government to confirm that the government is now asking the Senate to approve something it rejected last week.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is not true. There was more to the proposed amendments than is contained in the consequential amendments.

Senator Flynn: I would challenge the Leader of the Government to prove what he has just said, because he is entirely wrong. This bill contains, word for word, what was contained in the proposed amendments and I do not accept that we can just dispense with an argument such as the one he has just made.

My second question is: If I am right—and I say I am right—would the Leader of the Government say that this bill comes under rule 47(2), which states:

An order, resolution, or other decision of the Senate may be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescission.

In other words, is the government asking the Senate to do a flip-flop, and, if so, will that rule apply?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the answer is no in both cases. My friend knows that we gave an undertaking to bring in consequential amendments to Bill C-201, and that is what is contained in this bill.

Senator Flynn: That is not true.

Senator Olson: It is not only that they are perhaps very similar to some parts of the proposed amendments—I think it was a substitution in many cases—

Senator Flynn: Word for word!

Senator Olson: It is almost an exact copy of a government sponsored bill, namely, Bill C-37.

Senator Flynn: I say that they are my amendments also.

Senator Olson: Bill C-37 was before the House of Commons. I explained very carefully to the honourable senator why we chose the course of action that we did and why my colleagues did what they did, and, indeed, we are now making progress.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government has said that the government undertook to bring forth that bill. That is not true; Mr. Joyal said he would introduce it in the House of Commons and have the House of Commons pass it first.

Now the Leader of the Government comes to the Senate and asks us to do something that he was asking us not to do last week. This is incredible and an offence to the dignity and intelligence of the Senate.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend should not get so excited.

Senator Flynn: I am not excited, I am offended.

Senator Olson: He should realize that he supported the recommendation of the special committee.

Senator Flynn: I did not.

Senator Olson: We are now keeping a commitment and are following the recommendations of the committee.

Senator Flynn: That is a lie.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can say that and scream from his seat—

Senator Flynn: I say that it is a lie.

Senator Olson: If he wishes, he can go back and look at the record.

Senator Flynn: I have looked at the record. You asked the Senate to vote against what you are asking us to vote for now.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I invite the Leader of the Government to look at the Rules of the Senate. He is a man who is very adept in advising us to follow the rules. I would invite him to look at rule 47(1) which says:

A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.

Then rule 47(2), which deals with the point of rescission, states:

An order, resolution, or other decision of the Senate may be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescission.

Honourable senators, we are not in the position at the moment of having to apply this rule because we are not at the point where we are dealing with first or second reading. A point of order has been raised between the two steps.

If my honourable friend expects to proceed with second reading of this bill, I suggest that he had better reconcile the matter with the clear order and regulation of this house. I think the plain meaning of the words is that it is the same in substance as the amendments proposed by my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, which this house rejected and, therefore, it cannot be introduced into this house again unless there is five days' notice and until the matter has been dealt with under the rescission rule. I suggest that my honourable friend take that matter under consideration.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we can take it under consideration, and my honourable friends can make any argument they like; if they want to raise a question of order in this place, that is their privilege. However, one thing is particularly and specifically obvious, and that is that there was more to the amendments than what is contained in the bill.

Senator Flynn: Oh no!

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is wrong because what he did the other day was strike out all the words after "That" and he made a complete substitution.

Senator Flynn: You never understood the meaning of the rules.

Senator Olson: I think I understand them better than you do.

Honourable senators, as I was saying, the Leader of the Opposition made a complete substitution, not only of the so-called consequential amendments but of the other parts of the bill. Of course, I objected because it was not an amendment but rather a complete substitution.

One citation in Beauchesne has been drawn to my attention which allows such a motion sometimes to be in order if it is substantially the same, even though it is a complete substitution. But, in this case, my honourable friend cannot make that argument because he does not believe it himself. He knows very well that the consequential amendment in Bill S-30 is only part of the amendments he tried to move the other day.

Senator Flynn: You say anything; you do not bother about the truth.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, let's cut through this Jesuitical casuistry. I am referring to the comment made by the Leader of the Government. I never heard a more ingenious—that means—

Senator Olson: Ingenious.

Senator Roblin: If it were ingenious, I would give my friend credit for it. It is not ingenious; it is ingenuous. It does not reflect any credit on his ability to lead this house in matters of order.

The Leader of the Government cites Beauchesne, and that is all very well, but the rules of the Senate come first. Can any ordinary mortal, who thinks in common sense terms, maintain that this proposed bill in connection with amending certain acts in relation to Canada Day, to which first reading was given this evening, is not the same in substance as the matter which this house rejected last week? It is the same in substance. He can argue until he is blue in the face, but if he were to take a straightforward view of this matter, I do not see how that point could be controverted.

Honourable senators, there is a procedure provided in this red book whereby we can deal with matters that have already been dealt with once in the house. If my honourable friend wishes to bring this matter back a second time, there is a procedure whereby he can do so, and I invite him to consider it. If he wishes to bring in this bill, I think it is essential that he follow the rules of this house so as to ensure that we do not debate the same matter twice.

There is a good reason why this regulation is contained in our rules. It is not in the interests of the proper conduct of the business of the Senate that we debate the same issue twice. Heaven knows we do it enough anyway in some of our debates; they tend, sometimes, to get a little repetitious, that I do not deny. In terms of the government's order paper, however, which is what we are interested in tonight, I think that it contravenes the rules and the minister ought to do something about it.

Senator Flynn: It also offends the intelligence.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I am not an expert on the rules of the house. I do know, however, that we are not to call someone a liar or say that something is a lie. One may say that something is not the truth. One may, if one wishes, use that wonderful phrase of Senator Roblin's—"Jesuitical casuistry."

Senator Roblin: Oh, you've got it down very nicely.

Senator Godfrey: To say that something is a lie, however, is completely and absolutely out of order.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I regret that my honourable friend opposite resorts to that kind of language, but he has to take the responsibility for it and he knows very well why he used it. Perhaps he does not know what the word means, but it is prohibited from all proceedings in Parliament. If that is the way he wants to conduct himself, however, that is up to him.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would not reply if I thought that the Leader of the Government would not pay attention to the remarks of Senator Godfrey. If he does, however, I will say this: When I say that something is a lie, I do not mean that whoever said it is a liar.

Senator Godfrey: You can say something is untrue, but you should not say it is a lie.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps Senator Godfrey is not subtle enough to appreciate the difference.

NOVA SCOTIA

TRURO—SITTING OF CITIZENSHIP COURT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised on July 20, 1982, by Senator Smith concerning the celebration of Canada Day in Truro, Nova Scotia. Although the answer is not a long one, I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The celebration of Canada Day in Truro, Nova Scotia, did in fact take place on July 1 of this year. However, the ceremonies held by the Citizenship Court for the granting of citizenships and proofs of citizenship took place on June 30.

The ceremonies took place on June 30 in Truro because the Citizenship Court had scheduled similar ceremonies which were to take place in Halifax the following day. However, because of the Secretary of State's timetable, the citizenship ceremonies were rescheduled to take place in Halifax on June 30. By that time, the Court decided that it was too late to reschedule the ceremonies in Truro. Therefore, the citizenship ceremonies took place in both Truro and Halifax on June 30 but Canada Day was celebrated on July 1 in both cities as usual.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised by Senator Guay on October 27, 1982, concerning the Garrison diversion project. Again, honourable senators, the answer is not a lengthy one, but I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Federal and Manitoba authorities are working closely in their efforts to ensure that members of the House of Representatives are aware of Canadian concerns with the Garrison project when the FY83 Garrison appropriation is voted on before the end of this year.

We still have serious reservations about this project and believe that before construction proceeds further, it should be redesigned to ensure that foreign biota, which would seriously and irretrievably affect Manitoba's fisheries and water quality, cannot enter Canadian waters via the project.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83 (NO. 2)

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-128, to provide supplementary borrowing authority (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VISITORS IN THE SENATE GALLERY

JEAN-LUC FOREST—1982 WORLD FRISBEE CHAMPION

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure that I draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of a young man from St. Boniface, Manitoba, a young man of whom we are very proud, because he won a contest for the World Frisbee Championship, for which 600,000 girls and boys were competing, and here he is, our young champion, Jean-Luc Forest from St. Boniface.

I also would like to introduce his father, George Forest, and his brother, Pierre, his manager and trainer. They are all from St. Boniface, and I am sure you will want to join me in congratulating them. I had hoped that Senator Perrault would be here to see this very young champion, to whom we offer our very best wishes.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

GENEVA MEETING—WHEAT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in connection with the forthcoming GATT meeting in Geneva.

I understand that one of the subjects which may well be raised at that meeting has to do with the Common Agricultural Policy of the European Economic Community and the agricultural subsidy policies of the United States of America. I notice that our representative at that meeting is to be the Minister of State for International Trade, the Honourable Gerald A. Regan.

● (1405)

I want to ask my honourable friend what the policy of the Canadian government will be with respect to wheat problems, which are noted as being on the agenda for that meeting, and whether or not special personnel are detailed to assist Mr. Regan in representing our view. I take it that the minister himself will not be going?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I do not expect to be going. I will take the honourable senator's question as notice.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

UNIVERSALITY OF OLD AGE SECURITY AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Social Development.

Last Wednesday, Senator Austin said:

—the universal nature of the availability of family allowances and old age security pensions is not in the process of any change or new designation. This is a firm characteristic of the programs and it will continue.

I should like to know whether the minister still stands by that statement.

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Yes, honourable senators, I do.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are not going to get away with that.

Senator Nurgitz: As a supplementary question, honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Austin whether he noticed the reference to comments made by the Minister of Finance which appeared in today's newspapers indicating that the universality feature of the baby bonus may be near its end.

Senator Austin: I should like to point out, Senator Nurgitz, that in the statement I made on October 27, which is now before me, I said:

—all government programs are under review at all times, but the universal nature of the availability of family allowances and old age security pensions is not in the process of any change or new designation. This is a firm characteristic of the programs and it will continue.

I reaffirm that statement.

Mr. Lalonde has raised a question in the press and it relates to policy, which is always under review. I stand by my answer. We might always welcome questioning of matters in which we are involved.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

Senator Nurgitz: I trust the honourable minister is not questioning a statement that is only a week old. The statement says that, while the matters are under review, the universal nature of the availability of family allowances and old age security pensions is not in the process of any change or new designation.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): That is perfectly clear.

Senator Flynn: What he said is clear, but it is not true.

Senator Nurgitz: It is perfectly clear, and I trust that he is standing by his statement that it is not considered to be anything but a universal family allowance program.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I stand by my statement of last Wednesday.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Which one?

Senator Flynn: Do you deny the statement of the Minister of Finance? Do you not attach any meaning to what the Minister of Finance said just a day ago?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the statement of the Minister of Finance appeared in the press and is on record. I do not see any inconsistency between that statement and what I said last Wednesday.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question of the Minister of State for Social Development.

The Minister of Finance is quoted in a Canadian Press report as follows:

"When you see a financial situation where the government is not getting the revenue that it used to, where the economy is not growing, where public funds have to be used extremely sparingly and targeted better than ever before, then you have to ask yourself questions like this" he said.

[Senator Flynn.]

• (1410)

The Minister of Finance was referring to the question of family allowances, old age pensions, and so on. I would ask the minister whether, instead of asking questions about the social programs of the government, when we are in a situation such as that described by the Minister of Finance, it is not better to ask questions about the economic policies of the government that led us into this situation.

Senator Austin: Well, honourable senators, I suppose the Minister of Finance is entitled, as is any minister or any member of either chamber of Parliament, and indeed any Canadian, to raise a question and discuss any subject—

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Austin: —without indicating that there is any change of policy involved. If the opposition is suggesting that there is no possibility of any minister asking questions concerning public policy, then that is a strange attitude indeed.

I would also say to Senator Murray that the government of the Right Honourable Joe Clark—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Austin: —also expressed some thoughts about the question of social security. Ministers of that day who spoke about it are on record as having asked certain questions about the system. I notice that during the time of that government it did not lead to any evaluation of the policy.

Senator Flynn: That has nothing to do with the clear statement made by the minister last week that the question of universality of family allowances was not under review. That is what Senator Austin said and, according to his statement, the Minister of Finance said exactly the contrary.

Senator Austin: That is your interpretation, senator.

Senator Flynn: It is everyone's interpretation except yours.

Senator Austin: That I would be very surprised to know.

Senator Flynn: I am not speaking of the trained seals who may be yapping over there. I am speaking of the general public.

Senator Austin: I very much doubt whether the Leader of the Opposition has any more authority in that respect than I have.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps the minister who is being questioned could clarify this situation. We had his clear statement a few days ago that the family allowance program was not under any question with respect to the principle of universality. We now have a statement from the Minister of Finance which would lead one to think that it is under question.

My honourable friend has told us that the Minister of Finance may talk about this matter if he likes, just as any member of the two chambers or any member of the public may, but does not my honourable friend recognize the difference between a statement made by a Cabinet minister, particularly the Minister of Finance, and statements made by other members of Parliament or people generally? Most other people do. When a person of the status, the importance and the responsibility of the Minister of Finance raises a point that deals with the question of universality of family allowances, then we are entitled to ask the minister to reconcile that statement with the statement he made in the Senate the other day.

I ask him, therefore, whether he will approach his colleague to find out what his colleague actually meant, if he did not mean what his words would lead one to believe.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have no intention of going over the same ground again. I have said that there is nothing irreconcilable between my statement of last Wednesday, October 27, and what I read in the press this morning attributed to the Minister of Finance. If the honourable senator is saying that there is no possibility of any member of the government, including the Minister of Finance, ever asking a question about ongoing public policy—

Senator Flynn: You are sidestepping the question.

Senator Austin:—then I am astonished.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend need not be astonished, because, of course, I did not say any such thing. I said that ministers of the Crown have a responsibility—and my honourable friend is one of them. He has the responsibility to elucidate government policy. He did it the other day with respect to this issue. Now one of his colleagues has raised another point of view on the subject, and the public is entitled to know where the government's policy on this matter stands. I again ask my honourable friend whether he will speak to his colleague to find out what he actually meant when he used those words.

Senator Austin: Let me be absolutely clear, as I have tried to be, and say that the Minister of Finance did not announce any change in the policy of the government.

● (1415)

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend does not think that his colleague's statement has sent shock waves reverberating through the Canadian polity at certain levels, he is very much mistaken. It is up to the government to clarify its policy. If the government wishes to tell us that the principle of universality is now under question and under review in their considerations of their economic stand, that is fair game, but we want to know what the policy of the government is. We have two contradictory statements. They have to be reconciled and it is the minister's duty to see that that is done.

Senator Austin: My case rests.

Senator Flynn: Typical.

Senator Roblin: I would like my honourable friend to deal with the matter more frankly. Is he going to enquire of his colleague as to what the policy is, or is he not? Is he going to say that his case rests, and sit there and do nothing?

An Hon. Senator: Yes, he is.

Senator Roblin: I want an answer.

Senator Austin: I have told Senator Roblin and other honourable senators what the policy is.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend evidently declines to answer the question. Let that be noted.

An Hon. Senator: He does not know what to say.

Senator Austin: I absolutely demur respecting the last statement made by Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: If you are going to answer the question, then answer it.

Senator Austin: The question stands answered.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Because some of us in the Liberal Party over the years fought for universality and have come to believe that it is now a tenet or principle of the party, and because of the uncertainty which this morning's press coverage might leave with recipients of family allowances and, indeed, insofar as universality is concerned, recipients of the old age pension program, would the minister accept the responsibility of clearing up the uncertainty that obviously will exist in the minds of Canadians today by announcing or restating at the earliest opportunity current government policy, which I believe to be in support of universality? Would he restate that policy and, thereby, shoot down the lead balloon that has been floated by the Minister of Finance?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am always respectful of Senator McElman, but I would like to repeat the assurance on government policy that I gave this chamber on October 27. If there is in Senator McElman's mind—and it is not the case in my mind—some inconsistency between the policy of the government as I stated it on October 27 and press references to the Minister of Finance today, then I shall do my very best to try to understand the difference—

Hon. R. James Balfour: That is what you were asked to do.

Senator Austin:—and bring a response again to this chamber, if I believe that some additional comments are required.

Senator McElman: If I could assist the minister, the press reports this morning state that the Minister of Finance, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, in a interview stated that he disagreed with some of his colleagues—I assume in the cabinet—that universality is part of the tenets or principles of the Liberal Party. I think there is enough of a difference there that would require some reconciliation on the part of the minister.

Hon. David Walker: That's right.

Senator Austin: If that is the nature of Senator McElman's doubt, then I will do my best to reassure him in the next few days.

Senator Flynn: That is better.

Senator Austin: Some people can accept answers to questions without turning them around. Perhaps Senator McElman is a better lawyer than you are.

Senator Roblin: I think he has a little more leverage than we have.

● (1420)

Hon. Jack Marshall: I should like to put a supplementary question to the same minister. Last week I asked him whether the government was meeting with the provinces to face the serious and widespread problem caused by the dramatic increase in welfare rolls, which amount to about 10,000 people a month. The minister said he would inquire.

If you add to that calamity the family allowances problem, it will be a double calamity for those who have to go on the welfare rolls because they are dependent on family allowances.

Has the minister an answer for us with regard to any consultation there is between the federal government and the provinces respecting the increase in welfare rolls?

Senator Austin: Well, I have nothing specific to tell Senator Marshall about meetings. Discussions are constantly taking place between the federal minister and his provincial counterparts. However, if Senator Marshall wishes to ask a question about a specific meeting, I will try to be more helpful.

Obviously, the economic stabilizers in the social security system are under consideration. They are playing a superb role in defending Canadians against the conditions of the present economy. Obviously, they are larger in cost, as they ought to be, than they have been in the past, when the demand on these economic stabilizers was lower.

All of the provinces and the federal government are looking at the rising costs of this vital and immutable system. If that is the assurance Senator Marshall wants, I am happy to give it to him.

Senator Marshall: When the minister brings forth his statement on the position with respect to family allowances, will he at the same time give us a statement concerning the welfare rolls situation? I am sure he can, as chairman, formulate a statement from his next meeting on the Social Development Committee, indicating what plans the federal government has for dealing with this ever-increasing problem. We do not want to wait until the last minute, until the calamity is upon us and the provinces have started to scream about the fact that they cannot cope with the number of people on welfare.

Could the minister give a brief statement on that position?

Senator Austin: I am happy to be as co-operative as my position allows me to be, but if questions are directed specifically to the role of the federal government in terms of welfare, which is a provincial responsibility, then those questions could either be asked in the other place or put to me as specific questions to which I would then seek the answers from the minister responsible.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTING PRACTICES

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government. Last week the Auditor

[Senator Austin.]

General reported that the government had overestimated its assets by $4 billion and had underestimated its liabilities by $12 billion.

Could the Leader of the Government indicate whether this latest criticism by the Auditor General of the government's accounting practices is likely to lead to a revision on the part of the government of the manner in which it arrives at these calculations and presents them to the Canadian public?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am aware of the comment made in the report of the Auditor General. I will obtain, or attempt to obtain, as quickly as possible, a comment from other people in the government who have actuarial expertise in order to ascertain what their position is respecting the Auditor General's comments.

As soon as I have the information I will provide it to the honourable senator.

Senator Charbonneau: Is the minister implying that the Auditor General may have been wrong in his assessment?

Senator Olson: No, I did not imply that at all. I said that there was probably some explanation that, as background information, would be helpful to my honourable friend, and that I would try to obtain that information for him.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASED PRODUCTIVITY—GOVERNMENT PLANS

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that the director of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development has said that Canada is the worst of the western nations in terms of productivity, and since it is becoming increasingly evident that the productivity problem is very much at the base of the economic problems in Canada, can the minister tell us what plans the government has to deal with the problem of Canada's lack of productivity in relation to its competitors?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a direct relationship between productivity and the economy, but I think my honourable friend should have been a little more precise in the preamble to his question. The comment made by the OECD was directed to an improvement in productivity in terms of being cost-competitive, which is slightly different from the way he put it. But I am not going to quarrel with that.

● (1425)

My honourable friend asked what the government intends to do about it, and I can tell him that we have attempted to do a great deal, such as the establishment of the inflation fighting program commonly known as the six-and-five program.

The government has increased resources that are applied to the utilization of high technology. There is a fairly long list of plans, some of which are already under way, but I think it would take up too much time during Question Period if I were to recite those now.

I would be more than pleased to provide my honourable friend with a list of what the government plans to do in order to put Canada into a competitive position with respect to the international market.

Senator Doody: In order to be more precise, as the leader has asked, I wonder if the government has given any thought to establishing a productivity centre in an attempt to bring government, business and labour together to work toward increasing the productivity of the country. That has been done in some of the western industrialized countries, such as Japan and West Germany, and, to an extent, even the United States has had a hand in that in one way or another.

To my knowledge there has been no such effort made on behalf of Canada, yet it would appear that our need is the greatest.

The Prime Minister, in his serialized addresses a short time ago, touched lightly on the productivity problem, but came up with no concrete suggestions as to how that problem could be coped with.

Senator Olson: I am amazed that my honourable friend's memory is so short, because there was a long series of very useful meetings held between government, business and labour. Those meetings began in March and were held until the budget of June 29, and, indeed, immediately following that another series of meetings was held.

So, for my honourable friend to say that there has been no attempt to have a united or co-operative approach is a little unfair, but never mind that.

Regarding the establishment of a productivity centre, as he put it, I do not know whether that is being contemplated, but we have certainly made a great effort to enlist the support of business, industry, labour and everyone else involved in the total productivity factors as far as Canadian industry is concerned.

Senator Doody: I have a further supplementary question. My memory is not quite that bad. I do remember that there was a series of meetings, an almost interminable series of meetings, but I was asking what came of those meetings in terms of increasing Canada's productivity in relation to that of its competitors.

Senator Olson: My friend should not use the word "interminable" disparagingly in this context.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Answer the question! Don't beat around the bush!

Senator Olson: I am not beating around the bush. In most cases, the various sectors of Canadian business and industry requested that there ought to be on-going meetings, and that these ought to be on a continuing basis. Therefore, they will not be interminable and ought not to be.

Senator Flynn: Get to the question!

Senator Olson: A great deal of useful suggestions were made at those meetings and, indeed, what is more important than that, there were expressions of attitude towards a resolution of this problem that I think were very useful.

Senator Doody: Just on a point of clarification, I wonder why the leader assumed that my use of the word "interminable" was disparaging. In the context in which I used it, it certainly did not appear to be disparaging, but perhaps the leader knows something that I do not know since he chooses to interpret it that way.

Senator Olson: If I have accused my honourable friend of the wrong nuance, I ask him to forgive me. I did not intend to attribute something to him that he did not intend.

Senator Flynn: You have succeeded in answering the question. Bravo!

● (1430)

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have discussed this matter with the minister on other occasions. I am sure the minister and honourable senators opposite recall that in the early 1960s under the Diefenbaker government there were some very serious problems, although not created by the government, and an attempt was made to meet them which resulted in the establishment of the National Productivity Council. I believe that was in 1961. I am sure that members of the opposition will be pleased to know that Mr. Diefenbaker appointed me a member of that council and I sat on it for many years, so I am well aware of it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: That just shows you what a fine Canadian he was, and how broad-minded and tolerant he was.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And what good judgment he had!

Senator Buckwold: And what good judgment he had—which is more than I can say for some members of the opposition, but that is another story.

The question I am raising involves the consideration of a re-establishment of that kind of concept. The program was carried out in the United Kingdom, as you will recall, with some success. The Canadian program was comprised of a high-level group including a labour representative, who was the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, Claude Jodoin, and some very important government and industrial leaders. It spread through the provinces where, in fact, as a result of the national effort, provincial productivity councils were set up. Overall, I think that it had a fairly significant impact on drawing to the attention of Canadians the importance of productivity and the challenge which faced Canadians.

Senator Flynn: Congratulations!

Senator Buckwold: The National Productivity Council was eventually moved into the Economic Council of Canada, and the productivity aspect sort of faded away.

I want to ask the minister whether his government might give some consideration to the re-establishment of that kind of program, which I think was effective.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Doody and Senator Buckwold have made some suggestions. Senator Doody was asking what we are doing about it, and Senator Buckwold comes along and, in his usual good fashion, makes a concrete, positive suggestion, and I will take it as such.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government but in order to do so I shall have to give a brief preface, briefer, I hope, than the one given by Senator Buckwold a moment ago.

On October 26, as shown at pages 4850 and 4851 of Hansard, I asked the minister a question relating to the construction of the TQ&M pipeline to the Atlantic provinces. Following that question there was an exchange of comments.

Perhaps the urgency of Senator Perrault's question could await the completion of mine.

After the question was asked—well, if the honourable gentleman wants the floor, all he has to do is ask for it and I will yield to him. If he does not want the floor, perhaps he would not bother the minister who is endeavouring to listen to my question.

After I asked the question, as shown at page 4851, the minister and I exchanged some comments. About half-way down the left-hand column, the honourable gentleman said:

My honourable friend has invited me to take his question as notice and update information for him, so I accept his invitation.

Has he been able to use the week's notice to find out what the answer to my question is, as well as the answer to the later question in the same column with regard to the construction continuing into the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have to report that I do not have as yet the reply to those two questions, which I took as notice. I will again attempt to get the answers quickly.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEMBERS OF CANADIAN MOUNT EVEREST EXPEDITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the presence in the gallery this afternoon of the members of the Canadian expedition to Mount Everest.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: They include—and this is a departure from the norm as it was in the other place just a few moments ago—Bill March, the team leader; Lloyd Gallagher, the deputy team leader; John Amatt, Dwyane Congdon, Laurie Skreslet, the first Canadian to reach the top of Mount Everest—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Perrault: —Dave Read, another one of our outstanding climbers, Peter Spear, the base-camp manager, Pat Morrow, the second Canadian to reach the summit—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: —and Mike Breckon, who helped organize the event. During all of the conversations this morning they emphasized that it was a total team effort of Canadians from all regions who did something great for their country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

FORESTRY

ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Marshall on March 23, 1982, concerning assistance to the forest industry. The answer is rather lengthy, and I ask permission for that answer to be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

I can assure honourable senators that increased effort and dollars are being spent in Canada by the government and industry on the reforestation of lands that are not regenerating naturally.

It is true that in the northern parts of Canada and the United States, the growth of trees is much slower than in the southern United States. However, the slower growth of softwood species, especially the spruces in the northern region, produce a denser wood of very high quality which for certain uses attracts a premium price in world markets.

Forest sites vary as to their growth capability. The variations are caused in part, by nutrient availability, density of vegetation, drainage aspects and soil quality and compaction. Generally speaking it requires a greater area of a poorer quality, slow growing site than a high quality fast growing site to produce a given volume of timber on an annual basis. The cost of owning land is an important factor in any analysis of cost. In Canada, the forest lands allocated to the forest industry are for the most part Crown owned. Their management and operation are leased or licensed by the Crown to the industry for a nominal fee. In the United States much of the forested land is privately owned and the associated costs (taxes, capital investment, etc.) must be included in cost calculations.

In the case of the Newfoundland forest industry, the federal government provides advice and assistance through the Canadian Forestry Service, in the fields of forest management, protection and research. The Newfoundland Forest Research Centre, with a staff of 66 and a budget in excess of $2.5 million has developed close working relationships with their provincial counterparts to share research information and to identify methodologies and approaches to deal with issues of mutual concern.

There are in place forestry subsidiary agreements totalling $63 million in the province and a Pulp and Paper Modernization Agreement totalling $33 million designed to assist in the upgrading of mills and their equipment. The forestry subsidiary agreements are designed to ensure that pulp and paper mills have an adequate supply of the raw material.

The Canadian Forestry Service has developed several mechanisms to consult with their provincial counterparts on matters of concern. Through the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers, the Canadian Forestry Advisory Council, the Deputies and Chief Foresters meetings and many less formal structures, the Minister of the Environment and his officials consult regularly with the provincial governments on new initiatives which may be considered to develop the industry.

I also wish to highlight another recent initiative of the government designed to address the problems facing the forestry sector. A total of $174.5 million over the next 18 months has been allocated to the forestry component of the Federal Employment Stimulation Program which was established under provisions of section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This program will create immediate job opportunities in the fields of forest management and renewal; the retention of an intact work force in areas where workers could subsequently return to their original jobs; and the creation of assets of value through forest renewal.

The government is also investigating other avenues which may be followed in meeting the problem of unemployment which now faces some workers in the forestry sector.

THE ECONOMY

PRICE RESTRAINT IN FEDERAL PUBLIC SECTOR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised by Senator Roblin on July 21, 1982 concerning a request for a list of those bodies that fall under the price restraint policy of 6 per cent. Although this answer is not that lengthy, I should like it to be taken as read, if that is agreeable.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, a list of governmental and para-governmental bodies subject to the 6 per cent price restraint rule would simply include all organizations listed in the federal telephone directory plus crown corporations.

Consequently, I would like to have incorporated as part of the answer a copy of the press release issued by the President of the Treasury Board on the subject of administered prices in federal public sector. It should be noted that all ministers have been requested to ensure full implementation of the price restraint policy in their departments and in agencies, crown corporations or regulatory bodies reporting to or through them. The Treasury Board is the main point of contact for implementation of the policy and the President's office will be dealing with specific questions which may arise as a consequence of the policy.

Honourable senators, with respect to this particular news release I should like to ask permission to have it taken as read because it explains the answer in some detail.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The news release follows:)

July 20, 1982

PRICE RESTRAINT IN THE FEDERAL PUBLIC SECTOR

The Honourable Donald Johnston, President of the Treasury Board, made public today the measures adopted by the Government to implement its policy of price restraint in the federal public sector. This policy was announced in the budget introduced on June 28 by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance.

The Minister confirmed that the policy will apply to all prices established under federal jurisdiction. This includes prices established by departments, agencies, Crown corporations, and their wholly-owned subsidiaries, either directly or indirectly, as well as those established under the authority of regulatory bodies.

All price increases are limited to no more than 6 per cent in the twelve-month period commencing June 28, 1982 and 5 per cent in the following twelve-month period. Any increase higher than the stipulated ceiling that has been approved prior to June 28, 1982, but which is scheduled for implementation after that date, will be rolled back. The only exceptions are export price and oil and gas price increases arising from federal-provincial agreement. Under the National Energy Program these latter prices are already and will remain well below world levels.

The price limitations apply to individual prices or rates for specific goods and services, and not to average price increases for groups or classes of goods or services.

All Ministers have been requested by the Prime Minister to ensure full implementation of the price restraint policy in their departments and in agencies, Crown corporations, or regulatory bodies reporting to or through them.

The Treasury Board has suspended for two years all authority previously delegated to departments for price increases beyond the 6 per cent and 5 per cent limits on goods and services provided to third parties.

Any exceptional circumstances that could require deviation from the stipulated price limits would have to be explicitly considered and approved by Cabinet.

The Government intends to implement its price restraint policy in a manner consistent with containment of the federal deficit. Net revenue losses that might result from price restraint would be offset by expenditure reductions.

GOVERNMENT RESTRAINT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Roblin on July 27, 1982 relating to the federal government restraint policy as it affects prices. This answer is rather lengthy and I ask permission of the Senate to have it taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The policy of the government that "net revenue losses that might result from price restraint would be offset by expenditure reductions" refers to prices set and charged by the federal government for goods or services provided by the federal government where partial or total cost recovery is involved. The policy of limiting such price increases may result in lower revenues recovered than would otherwise have occurred in the absence of the policy. Concurrently, the government expects to reduce expenditure increases by virtue of holding federal Public Service wages and salaries within the 6 and 5 limits, and additionally, to realize savings where expenditures may not need to rise as rapidly as would otherwise be the case because of the pursuit of this policy generally within the government and by other sectors of society who will be pursuing the same objectives and who are recipients of assistance from the government or provide goods and services to the government. These sectors or groups are expected to benefit from reduced inflation and thus reduced escalation of their costs.

On balance, the effect of the restraint policy could be towards raising or lowering the deficit. The decision of the government is to ensure that, should there be a possibility of an increase in the deficit because of the policy, this increase will be offset, as necessary, by other expenditure reduction measures to ensure that the final outcome will be to not increase the deficit.

That decision to prevent any increase in the deficit applies only to those prices charged by the federal government. The effect of the policy on the private sector is a separate question. There has been no decision taken to offset the implications of the policy as it might affect the performance of companies in the private sector. In general terms, the success of the policy should lead to improved performance in the private sector, as with all sectors of society, as the inflation rate is reduced.

It would be unwise and impossible to predict that any particular company will suffer as a result of the policy, when indeed most, if not all, will benefit over time. Companies such as Bell Canada fall within regulated sectors and there is a process for assessing their needs and taking into account the implications of rate increases. I am sure that, over the longer term, Bell Canada and its shareholders, like all other citizens, will benefit from bringing down inflation. I am confident that any decisions taken in the short term will fully recognize the implications for all those who may be affected, both in the short and longer term, and that the decisions will result in benefits to all concerned.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—NATIONAL TRAINING ACT—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Tremblay on October 27, 1982 concerning the amount of federal contribution to the training agreement with the Province of Quebec for 1981-82. Although it is not lengthy, perhaps honourable senators prefer that the answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the total federal contribution under the previous job training agreement with the Province of Quebec amounted to $184,598,000 for 1981-82. That figure breaks down as follows:

Institutional Training:

| | | |
|----------------------|-------------|---------------------|
| $ | 1,700,000 | Trainee Travel |
| | 132,400,000 | Course Purchases |
| | 24,300,000 | Training Allowances |
| $158,400,000 | | Total |

Industrial Training: $26,198,000 (includes critical skills training)

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I realize that the figures will be included in Hansard, but I have another question to ask the minister related to that answer. Perhaps I should wait until the minister presents all his delayed answers.

IMMIGRATION

CUTBACKS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on November 2 concerning whether the 1983 immigration levels will prove to be a hardship on people from Lebanon or the Caribbean. Although the answer is reasonably short, may I have permission for that answer to be taken as read?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the answer is no. No country quotas exist in any form. This would be contrary to the Immigration Act which specifically prohibits discrimination based on national origin.

Insofar as refugees are concerned, the global refugee allocation has been redistributed to reflect changing conditions in both the refugee-producing and first-asylum countries. Thus, the allocation for Latin America and the Caribbean has been doubled to 2,000 for 1983 from 1,000 in 1982. Similarly, the allocation for the Middle East has been doubled to 800 for 1983 from 400 in 1982. The annual refugee plan does not include those privately sponsored refugees who will account for between 2,000 and 3,000 admissions in 1982. Nor does it include landings resulting from claims to convention refugee status made within Canada and considered by the refugee status advisory committee.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—NATIONAL TRAINING ACT—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: With leave of my colleagues, I would like to ask a not quite supplementary question further to the answer the minister just gave to the question I put to him last week. By the way, I wish to thank him for answering so quickly. My question concerned the amount covered by the agreement previous to the one he announced in the Senate last week with respect to occupational training. My request today concerns the agreement itself.

Is the minister willing to table or to send me the text of the agreement signed last week by Minister Marois and the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, my reason being as follows: The report on regional development prepared by the Committee on National Finance and tabled in this House last week by the chairman of the committee, Senator Everett, contains considerations that to me are very important and they concern what the committee calls the soft infrastructure of development—an expression that the chairman of the committee is not particularly fond of—and some of these considerations are more specifically concerned with the importance of occupational training and especially manpower retraining in the circumstances described by the committee in its report.

The question I put last week was about the quantitative aspect, in other words the amounts covered by the new agreement. The agreement itself, in the definitions it gives of the programs involved, and the committee's report on regional development, clearly have a number of concepts in common. Since the debate on the committee's report is already in progress, I think it would be useful for the members of this House to examine not just the occupational training agreement signed by Quebec and the federal government but also other, similar agreements existing between the federal government and other provinces, this with a view to clarifying our debate on regional development and transcending the dollars and cents aspects in order to understand the qualitative aspects emphasized in the committee's report. I apologize for the lengthy formulation of my request. I think it is important, if the minister is agreeable, to have the agreements in question, or at least those signed by Quebec and the federal government, tabled in this House, thus providing some clarification in this debate on the report prepared by the Committee on National Finance, the Everett report, if I may be allowed to put it that way.

● (1440)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will give an undertaking to make a request for the text of the agreement signed between the federal government and the Province of Quebec.

However, I am not sure if Senator Tremblay has also requested copies of all the other agreements signed with the other provinces. I am sure he will let me know if that is the case. In any event, they are public information. I would like to be clear on the magnitude of what he is asking.

The agreement signed between the federal government and the Province of Quebec contained the essential ingredients such as the amounts of money. Of course, the criteria were included in the communiqué issued immediately following the signing of the agreement.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I am not requesting the text of all the agreements. I am asking only to have the text of the signed document relating to the Province of Quebec, because in that document I suspect there will be elements of real significance in terms of our own analysis of some of the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Since our debate has already commenced, I would ask that that document be furnished as soon as possible. If I go through the normal channels, it may take two, three or even four weeks before I have the document in my possession. I would, therefore, ask that the minister provide the document as soon as possible so that it can form part of our discussion on the report of the committee.

Senator Olson: I will give an undertaking to make the request.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

AGING PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF COVERAGE

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on October 27 in connection with the Aging Veterans Program.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has advised me that in 1980 his department was granted $1.9 million for fiscal year 1981-82, building up to $7.3 million in fiscal year 1984-85 for contributions to aging disabled veterans for home and community care.

The case load, based on pensionable disability, was estimated at 1,650 persons. At present, the program is targeted only at veterans and persons with a war-related disability. That program is undergoing evaluation before a decision is made as to what changes may be effected.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am well aware of what the minister has said in this regard. The program is in existence, and applies only to those with war-related disabilities.

The problem is that the evaluation has been going on for some time and the veterans are getting older. I do not know how long they have to evaluate before they come to the conclusion that people are, indeed, sick.

Every day people who require the assistance of the Aging Veterans Program make applications and are rejected, and I am sure my honourable friend's colleague is aware of this. Something should be done now to extend this program to all veterans.

Perhaps the next step would be to ask the Senate for unanimous consent to have the matter referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science so that we can take this matter up on a more urgent basis, have the minister appear before us, and try to impress upon him the need for the evaluation to be made now and for action to be taken immediately.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

TRANSFER FROM WESTERN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on October 27 in connection with the Western Economic Development Fund.

As Senator Nurgitz requested, I would confirm that, as a result of the November 12, 1981, budget, $345 million was transferred from the Western Economic Development Fund to the Social Affairs envelope.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance indicated that those funds were to be used—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Which budget?

Senator Austin: The November budget.

Senator Flynn: I thought the minister said that it was not a budget speech.

Senator Austin: I was referring to the November 1981 budget.

The Minister of Finance indicated that those funds would be used to improve the housing and economic opportunities of native people over the next four years.

At this time, mechanisms and approaches to develop the operational side of this policy, including criteria for distributing funds, are under study but have not yet been finalized.

[Senator Austin.]

In response to the specific question Senator Nurgitz asked as to whether this native economic development initiative would be directed at western native people only, it is my understanding that the initiative is national in scope but, inasmuch as a very high proportion of native people live in western and northern Canada, I believe an appropriate share of those funds will be directed to the western provinces and the two territories.

SENIOR OFFICERS—SALARIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have received an answer to a question on the order paper. My question was directed to the salaries of the officers in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The answer is the one we have been getting for the last 10 or 15 years; namely, that it has not been customary to require officials from the CBC to provide such details as salaries.

Honourable senators, I think that is a lot of rubbish. They can come out with the fringe benefits and salaries of senators and members of Parliament. Why can we not find out how much they are making and the fringe benefits they are getting?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: They, too, can go to the Parliamentary Restaurant on Friday nights with their families. Honourable senators, I think it is time we refused to accept this type of answer. I want to know their salaries, and if I have to go to the Department of National Revenue to get the figures, I will do so.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

TRANSFER FROM WESTERN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT FUND

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: If I may, honourable senators, I have a supplementary question with respect to the answer given to me by Senator Austin, for which I thank him.

First, I would like to know when this evaluation is expected to be finished. I ask this because I suppose that the various questions I raised as to the criteria for distribution and the time of first distribution of funds will not be answered until that evaluation is completed. Can I have some indication from the minister as to when it is anticipated that the evaluation will be completed?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, I cannot provide a precise deadline for the completion of that evaluation. It is, however, actively under way. As soon as I have an idea of when the program is evaluated, I will so advise Senator Nurgitz.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in his response given on October 27, the minister indicated that the sum of $345 million was transferred from the Western Economic Development Fund and is now under the control of the Prime Minister. I wonder if I might ask the minister whether any other funds have been transferred from the Western Economic Development Fund to the control of the Prime Minister; if so, under what envelope was this done?

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I believe that the response I gave last Wednesday was to the effect that, while these funds are transferred to the Social Development envelope, the Prime Minister is the minister responsible for the Western Economic Development Fund. I will make inquiries to see whether I can obtain any additional information of the kind Senator Nurgitz is looking for.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC REGION—INDUSTRIAL INCENTIVE OFFERS

Question No. 78 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

What is the list of industrial incentive offers accepted by firms in the Atlantic Region in the last five years, with reference to (i) the amount of offer (ii) the cost of the project and (iii) the number of jobs created?

Reply by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion:

The reply for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is as follows:

Under the Regional Development Incentives Act, all Incentive Offers accepted by firms, and other relevant information pertaining thereto, are reported to Parliament on a monthly basis.

These reports are available on request from the Library of Parliament.

Insofar as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned:

Reply by the Minister of Communications:

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

(i) and (ii) It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as its employees' salaries and benefits. The background to this custom was explained in detail in the reply to Senator Norrie's oral question of December 16, 1976.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATUS OF SUBSIDIARY AGREEMENTS

Question No. 82 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

What is the status of subsidiary agreements with the Province of Newfoundland under the former Department of Regional Economic Expansion or the newly named Department of Regional Industrial Expansion for (i) the Institute of Fisheries and Marine Technology (ii) construction of secondary roads (iii) Corner Brook harbour development (iv) fisheries port improvements and (v) funding for the Labrador Straits Road?

Reply by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion:

Insofar as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is concerned:

(i) The Institute of Fisheries and Marine Technology

The Government of Canada is considering a proposal to provide funding for the construction, in Newfoundland, of an Institute of Fisheries and Marine Technology. The proposed Institute would replace and improve upon existing facilities of the College of Fisheries.

(ii) Construction of Secondary Roads

The Province has been advised that general highway construction should be pursued with Transport Canada through the Canada/Newfoundland Transportation Agreement.

(iii) Corner Brook Harbour Development

The Province has been advised that any initiative for port infrastructure in Corner Brook would have to be raised with Transport Canada.

(iv) Fisheries Port Improvements

The Province has been advised that any agreement on Fisheries would have to be pursued through the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and that any initiative to be concluded would have to await the report of the Kirby Task Force.

(v) Funding for the Labrador Straits Road

The Province of Newfoundland has a transportation agreement with Transport Canada, and it is recommended that the completion of the Straits Road should be considered for inclusion in this agreement at some future date.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been informed by a member of the staff of the Privy Council Office and the Leader of the Government in the other place that the House of Commons intends to deal with the grain handlers' strike on the west coast by sitting past 6 o'clock this evening. It is hoped that all stages of the bill will be passed in the other place today.

When I asked for the best estimate as to when the bill might be passed in the other place, I was told, as an estimate, some time around 7 o'clock.

Honourable senators, the government is requesting that the Senate deal with all three stages of this bill today, with a view to having Royal Assent given to the bill tonight. I cannot formally ask that this be done tonight until we have received the bill. I merely rise at this time so that honourable senators are kept up-to-date with what we might call the state of play on that bill. And I want honourable senators to know what will be requested of them today with regard to that bill. As soon as I receive further information, I will advise honourable senators accordingly.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I suppose that means that, if the process in the other place is completed by 7 o'clock this evening, it will be reasonable to expect the Senate to deal with the bill before midnight. As the Deputy Leader of the Government has mentioned, I do not think that we can give any assurances or make any commitments before we receive the bill and see what form it takes. I suppose that the idea is to wait and see.

As I recollect the drafting of the bill, were we to have Royal Assent by midnight—which is, apparently, the objective of the deputy leader—it would mean that at 12.01 the operations on the west coast would have to be resumed; we would have to send a telegram, which would give them approximately an hour's warning—no more than that.

Senator Frith: I suppose that is true, honourable senators, subject to the time difference.

In any event, as the honourable Leader of the Opposition has said, I do not think that we can go any further at this time. I am not asking honourable senators for an undertaking at this stage. I simply want everyone in this chamber to be brought up to date on what is happening with respect to the legislative stages of the bill and to give notice as to what we will be asking for. I am not asking for an undertaking until we actually receive the bill.

Honourable senators, it may be that we will sit this evening. If we adjourn before 6 o'clock, we will probably ask for resumption at 8 o'clock in the normal way, as was implied by the honourable Leader of the Opposition.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN THE SENATE GALLERY

ITALIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding with today's business, I would like to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of the very important delegation of Italian parliamentarians who are particularly interested in public works, urban development and the environment. They are visiting Ottawa and I had the pleasure of their company at lunch today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83 (NO. 2)

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-128, to provide supplementary borrowing authority (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, this is not the first borrowing bill we have had this session, nor is it the first we have had this year.

Honourable senators will recall that the Financial Administration Act, Part IV, section 36, stipulates that statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament in order for the government to increase its outstanding debt. Therefore, in order for the government to borrow money to meet its financial requirements, statutory borrowing authority must be obtained from Parliament. That is the "why" of this bill.

The next question to be raised with respect to borrowing bills is, of course, "How much?" The bill currently before the Senate, Bill C-128, seeks additional borrowing authority of $4 billion for the current 1982-83 fiscal year.

Honourable senators will recall that so far in this fiscal year the government has obtained parliamentary approval for a total of $17.1 billion of borrowing authority. I underline the word "authority" because, although the distinction may be a fine one, what the borrowing bill or borrowing authority asks for is the authority to borrow and not, at this stage, the actual granting of those funds. So far Parliament has approved a total of $17.1 billion of borrowing authority. That amount is equal to the financial requirements forecast for 1982-83 in the budget presented by the government last June. The figure of $17.1 billion of borrowing authority is made up as follows—I can see that Senators Croll and McElman are hanging on to every word and are computing every figure.

• (1500)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): They're discussing universality!

Senator Frith: So that I may finish my remarks, perhaps discussions on universality could be a little less universal in the chamber. In any event, the figure of $17.1 billion of borrowing authority is made up as follows: First, the amount of unused borrowing authority carried forward—because, as I mentioned a moment ago, all that borrowing authority bills do is give the authority to borrow and the authority is not necessarily immediately used—is $3.5 billion from earlier years. That will be seen to be significant in a moment. An amount of $6.6 billion of authority for 1982-83 was provided by Bill C-111, and $7 billion supplementary authority was provided by Bill C-125, which was passed in the Senate in late July. Therefore, the amount carried forward was $3.5 billion, plus $6.6 billion by Bill C-111 and $7 billion by Bill C-125. The $17.1 billion of borrowing authority already granted was equivalent to the financial requirements for 1982-83 projected in the June budget.

Some honourable senators may be aware that the financial requirements for 1982-83 have increased to around $22.2 billion. These developments were explained to the House of Commons last Wednesday by the Minister of Finance, and his explanation was duly reported. I am sure that some honourable senators are aware of those figures. At that time the minister pointed out that the major share of the increase in the financial requirements was due to the increase in the budgetary deficit which had gone up from $19.6 billion predicted last June to the current estimate of $23.6 billion. He explained that the reason for the increase was a weakness in the economy that had become more severe since the earlier forecasts were presented in the budget last June.

In view of the $5.1 billion increase in the financial requirements for 1982-83 since last June, the government is planning a larger debt program—and, as I mentioned, a corollary to such a program is a borrowing authority bill that, pursuant to the Financial Administration Act, requires the authority of Parliament.

Honourable senators will recall that the original bill seeking supplementary borrowing authority for 1982-83, which was dealt with last summer, included a non-lapsing contingency reserve of $4 billion over and above the $7 billion needed to meet the financial requirements. As members of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will recall, that was closely studied in committee, and during passage of the bill through the House the bill was amended so that the contingency reserve—that is, of $4 billion—was dropped; and, in lieu of the reserve, the House moved that standing orders be amended so that if at any time prior to March 31, 1983 the government introduced a bill requesting new borrowing authority of not more than $4 billion, then debate on all stages of that bill in the other place would be limited to a period not exceeding three days.

Senator Flynn: That is of no concern to us at all.

Senator Frith: In a moment it might be. The reason I believe it is of concern to us is that the $4 billion did have some significance for the Senate, particularly in the course of the committee's study of the bill. As a result of those three days of debate in the other place, pursuant to their order, the bill is now before us.

Before proceeding further, I shall run through the bill very quickly. Clause 1 refers to the short title. The bill is now on your desks, honourable senators.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I do not believe it is.

Senator Frith: I believe it was distributed.

Senator Flynn: Anyway, it is in standard form.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Yes, it is. I thank the Leader of the Opposition.

Clause 2(1) seeks the borrowing authority for the $4 billion. Clause 2(2) stipulates that any portion of the authority not used as of March 31, 1983 will expire on that date. Clause 2(3) refers to the ability of the government to borrow and repay loans in foreign currency. That has been included in the last four borrowing authority bills; and each time I have to explain that, although over the years Canada has borrowed and repaid funds in a number of currencies, in recent years that clause has been added to confirm Canada's right to so borrow. I also have to explain that a bill which the government plans to reintroduce into Parliament will propose certain amendments to the Financial Administration Act, including an amendment clarifying the government's ability to so borrow. Once that amendment is passed, and I hope it will come soon, there will no longer be a need for this technical clause or any reference to it.

Finally, clause 3 stipulates that the act will be deemed to have come into force on November 1, 1982, the date of issue of this year's Canada Savings Bonds. The reason for that, honourable senators, is that the 1982-83 Canada Savings Bonds campaign is now under way and it is expected that it will use up a major portion of the remaining unused borrowing authority. However, even though we expect that the amount of unused borrowing authority now available will cover expected net sales of Canada Savings Bonds, it is exceptionally difficult to fine-tune any prediction of CSB sales results. There are approximately 13,000 branches of financial institutions acting as Canada Savings Bond sales and issuing agents, and it is not possible to determine the exact aggregate amount of bonds they have sold at any point in time during the two-week campaign period. Up-to-date sales results have to be projected using sampling techniques, and, of course, as we know from dealing with sampling techniques such as Gallup polls, they do contain an element of error.

In view of that uncertainty, clause 3 of the bill states that the new borrowing powers will be in force on November 1, 1982. That provision has been used in the past to ensure that all Canada Savings Bond sales are covered by unused borrowing authority.

• (1510)

In closing, honourable senators, here in summary is the government's debt program so far in the current fiscal year and the amount of borrowing authority that has been used to date. First, up to November 1, the government will have used a total of approximately $8 billion in borrowing authority, leaving $9.1 billion of the original $17.1 billion unused. The use of borrowing authority that has been used is made up of $0.9 billion as a result of foreign borrowing and $7.1 billion as a result of the domestic debt program. The foreign borrowing represents U.S. $750 million borrowed in the Eurobond market last June and a partial redemption of a Deutschmark loan that had matured earlier this year. The amount for the domestic debt program will be $7.1 billion. Of that, $5.2 billion will be raised through the issuance of treasury bills, $3 billion through the issuance of marketable bonds, and the net Canada Savings Bond redemptions will reduce the amount borrowed by $1 billion.

Honourable senators, that is the explanation for the clauses of the bill, the background to the request for additional borrowing authority, the breakdown as to the borrowing authority that has been used, and the reasons for the amount asked for in the bill before us. I ask honourable senators for their support of this bill on second reading.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Will the Deputy Leader of the Government accept a question?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Murray: Perhaps he could obtain the answer from the officials of the Department of Finance and give it at a later stage in the debate. Senator Phillips will be speaking for this side, but I would like to intervene to ask this brief question.

Some time ago the Conference Board of Canada projected that the deficit would be $20 billion on a national accounts basis, which was based on a negative rate of growth of 5.2 per cent. I note that the Minister of Finance forecasts a deficit of $24 billion on a national accounts basis, based on a negative rate of growth of 4.4 per cent. I realize that the Conference Board of Canada deficit projections are based on the calendar year, whereas the government's projections are based on its fiscal year, but that does not explain the discrepancy of $4 billion. I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to obtain an explanation from the officials of the Department of Finance.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is an appropriate question for the committee to study and to report on. If we complete the second reading stage today, the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I give the assurance that a transcript of the question asked by Senator Murray will be given to the officials so that they may answer the question in the committee hearing, and the committee report may deal with it. If not, I shall deal with the question at third reading.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, because this is my first intervention since the recent changes in the cabinet, and, more particularly, those changes that affect the Senate, I would like to comment briefly on that matter first. I was surprised the other day to hear my leader congratulating Senator Olson. I thought that, more appropriately, he should have extended his sympathy.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): No, the congratulations were accepted.

Senator Phillips: I say this for a number of reasons. Senator Olson was pushed off his lofty economic perch and dropped to his present level of Leader of the Government in the Senate. That must be some sort of a record for a free fall without a parachute. In any event, he landed very quietly in the Senate pool. I commented to one of his followers that he did not even create a ripple, to which I received the reply, "Did you ever see a feather create a ripple?" I was a bit puzzled by that comment and came to the conclusion that he was being referred to as a featherweight. I think that is unfair and I am sure that Senator Olson will show us in time that he is very capable of being the Leader of the Government in this body.

Senator Perrault was made Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. I think that perhaps his title should be "Minister for Ben-Gay" because, if he is anything at all like me, if he tries to be too active he will need heat liniment. Senator Austin was just getting accustomed to his duties and finding out what they could possibly be when he was shifted. I now think that the only thing that is consistent in Senator Austin's career is that he is still the "minister of state for Maurice Strong."

Senator Argue showed that he has political experience. Before the cabinet shuffle was announced, he took his friends and went off to Japan, thereby escaping the shuffle. The Prime Minister did not even realize that he was away. In fact, the Prime Minister had planned to make a visit to the Far East himself, but he decided, apparently on Senator Davey's advice, to stay home and look after the economy. I am not so sure that it was not done backwards. Perhaps we would have had more success if the Prime Minister had gone to the Far East and Senator Argue had stayed home to work on the economy.

Upon being asked at a press conference about the economy, the Prime Minister made the comment that it would be a long, cold winter. It will certainly be a long cold winter for the 1.5 million unemployed; it will be a long cold winter for those waiting to be laid off; and it will be a long cold winter for those who have lost their homes. Earlier today Senator McElman raised a question with regard to universality. I think that the government is continuing with that principle, in that they seem to be applying unemployment to everyone.

The Minister of Finance, in his statement on the economy in the other place, rambled on for an hour and twenty minutes—almost as long as I will be today. However, I am not so sure that he touched on very many of the important items. Ordinarily, when we think of the economy we use certain indices. One is manufacturing. Today manufacturing is approximately 50 per cent of what it was last year. The small business industry provides about 60 per cent of the jobs in Canada. When a plant closes in a small town the numbers may not seem to be very great, but the effect on that town is disastrous. For example, Canada Packers in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, recently announced that 290 to 300 employees would be laid off. Now, 300 employees in the vast pool of the unemployed is not a very big number, but it is quite significant in terms of the population of that city, as in the recent lay off of 3,000 workers by the CNR in Montreal. There was no encouragement for the small manufacturer in the minister's statement.

Another index used in reference to the economy is mining. I am sure the various ministers in the House of Commons see the flashing neon lights of Sudbury when they go to sleep at night, and well they should. Everyone was very anxious that Dome Petroleum be bailed out, but no one has asked that Sudbury be bailed out. Now we can add Schefferville to the list, and there was an announcement in today's news at noon hour that the mine in Timmins is beginning to be closed down. Again, there is silence.

The forest industry is no better off than the two I have just mentioned. Conditions are so bad in British Columbia that Senator Lawson even came here for a couple of days. I am sure that he did not come here to vote for the Canada Day Bill. He must have wanted to make some representations on behalf of the B.C. forest industry.

With regard to fisheries, there have been commissions dealing with the problems on both coasts, but there is still no action to improve the economy in that industry.

As far as agriculture is concerned, the Minister of Agriculture said in February that agricultural income would decline by 30 per cent. If we are lucky, the minister will be right; but it may be more than that.

● (1520)

The Minister of Finance made a statement in the House of Commons. Before he did so, potatoes were selling in Prince Edward Island for five cents a pound. The minister made his speech and the price dropped to two cents a pound. While I am complaining of silence on the part of the ministers, I must admit that sometimes it is a good idea if they keep quiet.

Transportation is another form of index used to study the economy. The transportation industry is running at 59 per cent of its capacity.

Honourable senators, I do not think we need any further examples to convince us that the economy is in grim shape. But the grimness, the difficulty, is universal. This is our third budget in a year. Normally, I would want to criticize that, honourable senators, but there is an advantage to this budget in that it has filled the budgets of November and June with buckshot, and I think that should have been done much earlier.

The main theme of the minister's remarks in the other place was that the government is providing $1.1 billion for the unemployed. Now, at first glance, that seems a lot of money. It makes a nice headline, and perhaps it may convince a few people that the government has moved to meet the needs of the unemployed. But let's be practical and take that $1.1 billion out of the headlines and reduce it to common terms. It works out to $333 per unemployed person. Don't get excited, honourable senators; that is for 18 months. In terms of years it comes down to $222 per year, or roughly $4 a week for each person who is unemployed.

At the same time, the minister announced that those receiving the maximum unemployment insurance benefits would receive a $20-per-week increase in benefits. I find a certain amount of political schizophrenia in that, because, if the unemployed person has used up his benefits, the government has $4 a week for him; but, if the unemployed person is drawing $235 a week in benefits, the government will give him another $20 a week.

The program was also headlined to provide, it was hoped, 60,000 jobs. Well, honourable senators, that, too, is misleading. If you ask where the jobs are, you are told that they are to be temporary. That was the first bit of information the Leader of the Opposition in the other place was able to obtain. On further questioning he was informed that they are not to begin before January because the government is not ready with a program yet.

Surely, honourable senators, with the unemployment situation the way it has been for the last two years, somewhere along the line some of the ministers must have learned of the situation. Surely the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Manpower, or even the Minister of Finance, would have learned about the unemployment situation and have had some program ready. But, no, there is no program ready. We must first of all meet with the provinces.

I have no objection, in principle, to meeting with the provinces, honourable senators, but last September the provinces wanted a meeting on this very subject and the Prime Minister refused to meet with them. The situation then did not require consultation with the provinces. Now it is the excuse for delaying things until January.

The Leader of the Opposition, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, in his further questions asked what type of work would be provided. The answer was that the Minister of Finance did not know; it all depended; it depended on private industry and on a number of things.

When the question was asked what the persons working in these mysterious projects would receive in payment, no one seemed to know. We are down to the stage where it is sort of "Don't know when; don't know where, but some time." I believe that is the way the song went, and that is what the government is singing to the unemployed today.

I see that the chairman of the National Finance Committee is here. I am sure that he will be interested in the fact that the federal government has asked the provinces to join with it in providing the funds to the tune of $500 million. It is not so long ago that the chairman issued a report in which the committee was critical of the federal government for breaking off DREE programs because the federal government was not getting its fair share of credit. Now, I have asked the sponsor of the bill who gets the credit for the 50-50. Will there be signs saying: "Joint Projects"? Will that be sufficient to satisfy the government?

Honourable senators, the federal government is not the only level of government which is experiencing difficulty with its budget. The provinces are also experiencing difficulty. The Province of Prince Edward Island has no surplus funds. The Province of Nova Scotia spent a great deal of time this summer trying to trim $35 million off its budget in order to reduce its deficit. I do not imagine that Newfoundland or New Brunswick have any surplus funds either. Certainly Quebec has not. I suggest to you that the provinces, with their limited tax bases, will find a great deal of difficulty in matching the federal government in a program of that nature.

One point that has not been questioned throughout the discussion of the program is the unemployment insurance benefits. At present, in at least one of the make-work program employees are not entitled to unemployment insurance stamps. I ask the sponsor of the bill if the employees under this program will be entitled to unemployment insurance stamps. It is rather odd that the federal government cannot afford to purchase unemployment insurance stamps. They can pass on the increases to the employers and employees. Last year they passed on an increase of 43.5 per cent. This year they passed on a 53 per cent increase in premiums.

You know, honourable senators, it might not seem much to say that the premiums have gone from $1.35 to $2.85 over a two-year period.

● (1530)

That has taken approximately $4 billion out of the economy in the past two years, and that has to be paid by the consumer in the end.

It is fine to say that we should compete with Japan and Germany, but industry can only compete if it is given an equal opportunity.

Another item in the employment program is the $400 million for improving the rail system in western Canada. I am not quite sure how that $400 million is to be spent. I presume by now that the double tracking of railways from Winnipeg to Vancouver has been completed, and that the $2 billion designated for that has been spent, but since then VIA Rail has just about disappeared, and the number of employees being laid off by the CNR increases each week. I am beginning to wonder whether there will be any employees left in the CNR to work on the improved rail system.

As I said earlier, the transportation system is only 59 per cent utilized now. What will be shipped over the railways in two years' time if policies do not change?

The amount of money available for the housing programs has been increased. As honourable senators know, every now and then I like to give the government a compliment. I am pleased to see that the $3,000 grant for the purchase of new homes has started to get real estate sales moving, but having given the government a compliment I would like to give a warning. The average family income in Canada is $29,900 and to purchase an average home in Canada today an average family income of $40,000 is required. Somewhere along the way those two figures are going to collide, so I would ask the minister not to get over enthused about using housing as the sole means of recovering our economy, because Canadians are going to be so heavily mortgaged in the future that they will have no surplus funds to purchase other goods.

Hon. Peter Bosa: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question.

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Senator Bosa: I do not wish to interrupt the honourable senator's train of thought, but he has just mentioned that the average family income in Canada is $29,900, and that that amount in relation to the cost of housing is rather low. He intimated that the average family income should be around $40,000 to enable the average Canadian family to buy a dwelling. I wonder whether Senator Phillips has studied the relationship of the average income of a Canadian family and the price of a dwelling today to the average income of a Canadian family and the price of a home 30 years ago.

Senator Phillips: That is something I suggest Senator Bosa do because he is far more capable in financial matters than I. I am sure he would do a much superior job in compiling those figures for comparison purposes than I would. I would be delighted to obtain those figures from him.

The Minister of Finance stated that $1.1 billion would be made available because of reductions in the budgets of certain departments. I was rather amused with the explanations offered by the various ministers. The Minister of National Defence, who is supposed to make $200 million available, has said, "I have already done that. We are following the six-and-five program, so I do not have to come up with any more."

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was really surprised when he found out he was to provide $600 million. I cannot help wonder, since the $600 million seems to be so readily available from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—because the Minister of Finance did not even bother to tell him he was taking it—why we have such high gasoline taxes. Gasoline in the maritime provinces costs approximately $2.25 a gallon, and it is even higher than that in Quebec. Home heating oil is $1.50 a gallon, so perhaps there should be some reduction in those prices. It would be interesting to see what a reduction in the cost of fuel would do to the manufacturing industry.

The sponsor of the bill stated that the total borrowing authority this year would be at $21.2 billion. Honourable senators, so far this year that amount of borrowing authority amounts to $2 billion a month, and I fully expect the government will be back later this year, so I think it is about time we started putting the brakes on to slow up this procedure.

In this session the government has received borrowing authority for $47.6 billion, which is something of a record for one session.

The deficit as a result of the large borrowings made during the past few years has increased drastically: It was $10 billion in the first budget; $19.6 billion in the second budget; and $23.4 billion in the last budget. The interest costs of our total debt now exceed by $1.6 billion the total transfers to the provinces, and that includes medicare, hospital insurance, higher education costs, and equalization payments. That, honourable senators, is a needless cost, and had we had better management in the past we would not be looking at those figures today. If we started to repay our national debt at the rate of $1 billion per year on principal, not taking into account interest payments, we would require 150 years to pay it off.

● (1540)

Honourable senators, throughout this government's history, it has provided a number of guarantees. As examples, it provided guarantees for Canadair of $1.3 billion and to de Havilland of $1.5 billion. The other day the Minister of Finance mentioned that a further $400 million would be provided to those two firms. Other firms such as Dome Petroleum, Maislin and Massey-Ferguson have also had the benefit of government guarantees.

It is all very well to say that the federal government has not loaned the money but only made credit easily available to these firms, but, honourable senators, when these large amounts are made available, you create an escalating demand for money. As a result, interest rates go up.

I am sure honourable senators will recall Dr. MacIntosh, President of the Canadian Bankers' Association, appearing before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance earlier this year. When asked what he foresaw in regard to interest rates, he said that there would be a decrease during the summer but that governments would then start borrowing in the fall, and interest rates would again increase. He referred to the fact that the American government would be borrowing approximately $165 billion, and the Canadian government $25 billion. Added to that, the provinces and the municipalities would also be borrowing. Again, a demand for money would be created, and there would be pressure on interest rates once more.

Honourable senators, I requested the Library of Parliament to prepare a research paper on the rate of taxation and rates of interest Canadian firms must meet in competition with other countries such as Japan and Germany. The library was not too enthusiastic about my idea because of the difficulty in trying to relate one form of taxation to another. It would, indeed, be a major task for an individual researcher.

However, I would point out that in August, Canadian firms were paying interest of 16.5 per cent on loans whereas the Americans were paying 13.5 per cent, the Germans 9 per cent, and the Japanese 7 per cent. Canadian firms will have a difficult time competing in foreign markets unless efforts are made to control interest rates.

I would suggest to honourable senators that a thorough study and comparison be made of not only interest rates but of taxation and of wages. It is fine for the Prime Minister to say that we must compete, but let us find out what league we are competing in and how it can possibly be done. I should like honourable senators to give some consideration to that as a future project.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I find it strange that no other senator on the other side wishes to speak to this matter because, after all, this is a very important bill. It requests authority for the government to borrow $4 billion, which is not peanuts.

C. D. Howe coined the phrase, "What's a million?" He also used to say, "Who can stop us if we decide to go ahead?" This latter attitude is still in force in the other place and even more so in this place where the present majority decides—a majority no one can stop.

It seems to me that this bill requires more debate than just one speaker on each side although, I understand, it will be referred to committee.

When the agreement was reached in July to cut the previous borrowing authority by $4 billion, it was understood that, if the government needed that additional sum, the House of Commons would introduce and deal with a bill in a matter of three days. At that time the deficit was anticipated to be about $20 billion. From the recent statement of Mr. Lalonde, the new Minister of Finance, we now know that the deficit will be close to $24 billion; that is an additional $4 billion.

The minister has explained that the expenditures have increased by $1 billion and that the revenues or income have decreased by $3 billion due to the recession which is, according to the Prime Minister when he spoke to the nation on television, the prime cause of all our problems. The government accepts no responsibility; a universal crisis has suddenly hit us without warning and is the cause of all our problems. In keeping with his previous posture, the Prime Minister refuses to acknowledge any responsibility for our problems. The government's position is perfectly correct; our troubles are due entirely to external causes. If only we had faith in the Prime Minister and accepted that everything he does is appropriate, we would be rid of our difficulties in no time.

In any event, that is merely incidental. I could make a speech on the Prime Minister's perception of himself which would keep us here for hours and might even interest Senator Godfrey.

The $4 billion difference was not anticipated in July when we dealt with the first borrowing authority. Can we assume that at this time the government does not envisage the need for additional borrowing authority until the end of the fiscal year on March 31, 1983? That is one question, the answer to which I was not able to detect in the speech of the new Minister of Finance the other day in the House of Commons, or in the speech by the sponsor of this bill. It is a very important question.

• (1550)

The sponsor of the bill has already mentioned that, in future borrowing authority bills, the paragraph dealing with the authority for the government to borrow in foreign currency and refund the bonds in that currency would probably not be needed, because there will be amendments made to the Financial Administration Act. Is there a bill before the House of Commons dealing with that amendment to the Financial Administration Act, or is this merely a proposal that will materialize at some future date? I should like a reply to that question.

The third point I wish to raise has to do with the text of clause 2 of the bill. I have always found it difficult to determine exactly what this clause means in practice, although the text, as I have mentioned before, is standard. It reads:

2.(1) The Minister of Finance, with the approval of the Governor in Council, may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by any Act of Parliament heretofore passed, borrow, under the Financial Administration Act, by the issue and sale of securities of Canada, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole, four billion dollars, as may be required for public works and general purposes.

This wording "public works and general purposes" has been on the books, I would imagine, since the time of Confederation. I fail to see why mention is made of public works, because, generally, it is not one of the major items necessitating the extra borrowing. In any event, it is not an important point.

Honourable senators, when we dealt with the previous borrowing authority bill in committee, as I think Senator Everett, the Chairman of the National Finance Committee, will remember, it was explained that the cancellation of the authority results from the fact that, before the end of the fiscal year—in the present case, March 31, 1983—if we have not used up the authority contained in this bill or in any other bill which has not provided for cancellation, we may use it, but after that it is done. What I find strange, is what was told to the committee by the officials of the Department of Finance, that once the authority to borrow has been used, the loan can be re-funded or the debentures can be reissued indefinitely. I cannot reconcile the scrupulousness applied in saying that the authority under the act is cancelled on March 31, 1983 where it is not used, with the fact that, where it is used, it is possible at any time in the future to borrow the same amount to re-fund it. In other words, honourable senators, we never know whether the government has lowered its total debt.

We apparently have a debt of over $100 billion at this time; perhaps the sponsor of the bill can be more precise on that point. No matter what is provided for in a borrowing authority bill that we have passed, our debt never diminishes. It continues to go up, but the condition of its going up is merely that we use the authority before the expiration date mentioned in the bill, which, in this case, is March 31, 1983. If we want to have this authority indefinitely, however, we merely have to use it.

I find that to be a rather strange procedure, honourable senators, and I suspect that very few people in Canada understand that that is the effect of this type of legislation and, indeed, is the practice that has been followed over the years. It seems to me that the format of these bills should be changed somewhat so that they reveal more frankly and clearly the financial situation of Canada. Who really understands that this is the meaning of this type of legislation; that we can borrow as much as we want to repay bond issues which were authorized, let us say, 50 years ago? But if, by any chance, we do not use the authority provided here within a few months, it is cancelled. I repeat, honourable senators, that I find this to be a rather strange procedure. Perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance could look into this matter and express some views on how it could be clarified, for the benefit of the citizens of this country. I would be very surprised if there is one out of every hundred Canadians who understands that this is the way we operate.

Honourable senators, the present situation of the economy, and recent speeches made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, give rise to countless comments that could be related to this borrowing authority. I suppose that a better occasion might be found on which to deal with the entire situation in a general way and, possibly, also in specific ways.

But at this time we are called upon to provide the government with this borrowing authority. It obviously needs the money, but I am not satisfied that that is all it needs to solve its present financial problems. I am not at all satisfied that what the Minister of Finance said in the House of Commons last week will bring substantial comfort to Canadians in general, or to the more than one and a quarter million unemployed in Canada. I am not satisfied that the 100,000 or 60,000 jobs which the Minister of Finance said he will create by diverting 1.1 billion from other areas of expenditures will remedy the situation. It seems to me these measures will end up reducing the number of jobs that were to be made available through the expenditures already provided.

Honourable senators, I do not think that anybody can rejoice at the economic situation. While it is not entirely the fault of the government, I maintain that a large part of it is their responsibility. At this time, the government is trying to avoid its responsibilities by attributing the economic situation to external causes. The government accepts no more responsibility for the present economic situation than did Mr. Trudeau for his actions in 1974, when he won the election on the basis that he would never bring wage and price controls in, and did precisely that in 1975.

At this time, honourable senators, one of the major problems facing us—one which is the responsibility of the government—is the large sum of money that has been lost to this country through the National Energy Program. The government won the last election on the basis of what was proposed to Canadians at that time. We realize now that it was a big mistake to listen to those proposals, but the government will not backtrack. It continues, and thereby adds to the problems that have already been created by external factors.

In any event, honourable senators, at this time we must provide borrowing authority. I repeat, however, that I have no confidence that this government will be able to get out of its rut—extricate itself from the web of deception it has woven—so as to provide the economic direction that is sorely needed in this country at this time.

● (1600)

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, before the sponsor of the bill winds up the debate, I have a few thoughts that I shall share with you on this somewhat gloomy afternoon—both outside and inside the chamber, I believe. I do not believe that I have ever taken part in a parliamentary debate where I felt a greater sense of unreality.

It is fantastic that we have reached the state of national management—or mismanagement—if you are partisan, like some people, you would say "mismanagement", but I, being a kindly person, will be more straight on that—that we are looking upon a small bill, with a figure of $4 billion, as if it were a mere afterthought, something that is tagged on. Being a poor man, and coming from a province that is not made up of great riches, I remain overwhelmed by the concept of the figure of $1 million, and here we are talking about a small bill of $4 billion. It seems that we have reached the point of such magnificence of blundering and miscalculation that we are no longer shocked.

For instance, I hear very few Canadians reacting to a front page statement of the Auditor General concerning an enormous miscalculation, perhaps $2 billion, or an overestimation of, expenditures, or of assets being miscalculated. Not only have we reached the state where the finances of the country have been mismanaged, but even Parliament itself is being mismanaged. It now takes a man with a very good memory to recall when the session began. One picks up an order paper of the other place and one sees things lying around that are yellow with age, as if they were from the archives. There is a lack of management.

I am so old that I can remember when Ministers of Finance—yes, under Mackenzie King, I admit it—would bring in a budget once a year—imagine, once a year!—and things fitted into place. People looked at the statement of expenditure and revenue and found that they corresponded so well that at times the biggest problem of the Minister of Finance was to know what to do with the surplus. It is easy to say that times were better, but I believe that the administration was better. I believe the country was handled better from the very top.

Reference has been made to the Prime Minister's speeches, that they should have been significant clarion calls in this difficult time. I do not believe in forgetting the past—I try not to live there, but I do not believe we gain much by forgetting it. I recall when another prime minister took to the airwaves. I was too young at the time to vote, but I was old enough to listen. The Right Honourable R. B. Bennett paid for a series of five broadcasts out of his own pocket. He was one of those rich Conservatives who spent a lot of his own money for the purposes of the state. He began with an audience estimated at three million and ended with an audience estimated at eight million. Did he have expert technical advice? I doubt it, because on radio it was not considered to be all that important. But why was that such an interesting series? Was it because he said things that everyone loved? God help us, it was far from that! But it was a bold, courageous declaration of policy. I doubt if one could find, in the whole of our history, a more concentrated policy declaration than the one given by the then prime minister. That is why people were listening. He said we would do this, this and this; and insofar as the courts and the Liberal Party would allow, they did them all. It was a discussion between a great leader and his people.

Mr. Bennett is not considered to be much of a hero, and I do not believe I would have liked very much to have been in the House of Commons with him. But it is not so much a question of his popularity but the discharge of his duty. He set before the people a course which he discussed with candour, and I would have admired the present Prime Minister had he done the same.

I am not interested in the scoring of points—I believe the points have already been scored on him—but would it not have been fine had all of us, since he found it necessary to speak, been able to find something in what he said? It would have been far better for every Canadian if he or she could have said,

[Senator Macquarrie.]

“That is something; something is now being done.” But I am afraid that we are still not at the stage where someone has grappled with the difficulty.

I listened carefully to Senator Phillips. I always do. I would not dare to do otherwise, because he is so much my senior colleague here. He elucidated the problems associated with the unemployment aspect of the recent quasi-budget statement. The concept is an excellent one, because only the most myopic and hardhearted person would say, “We are interested only in inflation. Let the unemployment figures mount.” Of course, the state must be concerned about the gnawing agony of unemployment. I was interested in a bulletin I received from the Department of Finance, which included a summary of current allocations for employment creation. I hope it contains something more than I can see, to be quite frank. This is the very issue that Senator Phillips dealt with: What is being done for the people? Are these jobs going to come into being? Senator Phillips is right. We are living in a sensationalist society where we hear of the Sudburys—that is terrible; we all know that—and the Scheffervilles. But the economic blight is affecting all areas.

I never like standing in a parliamentary place and bemoaning the problems of the area I represent. I would be much happier saying how good it was—and I could spend a lot of time saying that. With regard to what the sociologists call “psychic income”, Prince Edward Island takes second place to no area. We have problems which, though they may not be dramatized, are gripping our people, and causing even those who tend to optimism to become slightly touched, if not overcome, by anxiety and a little fear. There has not been much said about the imminent closing of the Canada Packers plant in Charlottetown, but from that little city, in our little province, will go a $6 million annual payroll—$6 million represents a great deal in Prince Edward Island—and $23 million a year in agricultural produce. If our little work force is diminished, and if our basic industry, agriculture, is inhibited, then that represents an economic blight. It is not as dramatic or as immediate—we are thankful that it is not—as the sudden closing of a factory on which a whole community depends. That is terrible. It is terrible because it is becoming prevalent. One does not like to be wading in abysmal gloom, but one must try to be realistic and perceptive.

• (1610)

I last attempted to speak in an economic debate when the subject of the mega-projects was before us. Some of those mega-projects were not before us for very long. But there are challenging opportunities to do something. Charlottetown needs a feasible alternative and I mentioned this last week. The provinces are prepared to help in the construction of a veterinary college there. That project will do something for both the agricultural industry and the labour force. I hope that that is the kind of thinking that is going on, and that it will not take as long for the federal government to build that veterinary college as it has in upgrading the Charlottetown airport. They have been at it for 15 years and they are not nearly through yet. We have jet age service from the airlines and prop service from the Department of Transport in terms of the facilities for the public. I am not suggesting that there is anything wrong with those services in the essential elements of safety.

There are all these considerations. I hope, because it is getting late economically, that we can find more realism and that we will find more in the projects than we have found in the three-part television performance because even the greatest manipulators, the greatest traders in tinsel, the greatest marketers of political products, as they call them, are out of their depth now in reality.

Of course, we know that this little bill will go through, but I hope it will go through with some attention to the wise words that Senator Flynn uttered. I have thought more than once since I came here, when it comes to the operation of this chamber, that when he is listened to the operation is far more efficient. It is well, when you have people who know what is wanted, to listen to them and I do listen. I commend Senator Phillips. I actually thought, as I believe Senator Flynn did, that we would have quite a debate here. I was going to hold back until some other people who know the world of business and the world of economics spoke before I, who do not know those areas well, entered. When I studied economics in university it was called the dismal science and, by jove, nothing has happened since to make it any lighter.

But, perhaps, for an optimist there is always hope. If I keep saying that for too much longer I will probably be called not an optimist but a fool. At least, I would rather become an optimistic fool than the other kind.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I would like to make a brief intervention at this point to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government, when he closes the debate on this bill, to clarify a point for me. Senator Flynn in his remarks made reference to what I am about to say. He stated that the Prime Minister had said in 1974 that he would not implement wage and price controls, and that in 1975 he did just the opposite. My recollection of what Mr. Trudeau said in 1974 is that he would not implement wage and price controls because the high inflation rate was not generated in Canada but was imported from abroad due to the higher price of oil and other commodities. In the fall of 1975, however, the inflation rate was impacted very much by the dramatic increase in the price of goods and the high salary demands within Canada. I recall specifically electricians in Oshawa asking for a 95 per cent increase in their wages over the course of one year. Were these not the factors that motivated the Prime Minister to implement wage and price controls in the fall of 1975? It was not therefore, a reversal of a stand taken in 1974 as stated.

Senator Flynn: No, of course not.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I had not intended to intervene in this debate because I did not know that it would be a debate on the state of the Canadian economy, the budgeting process or the economic policies of the government. I thought that we were to discuss Bill C-128, which is an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

Senator Flynn, for the most part, stuck to the topic. Others, however, decided to make the debate more wide-ranging. I am not complaining. I am rising, perhaps, because of all the allegations from the other side of the house to the effect that we on this side are surprised and would not wish to take part in such a debate. Of course, we want to take part in the debate because, while I may, from time to time, criticize government policy and be rather acerbic about it in general terms, I think the policy of this government at this time is the correct one. It is the policy that should be followed.

However, I am not quite sure what the opposition wants. They want the economy to perform correctly, yet, somehow, they complain every time the government takes any medicine at all. If I heard the debate correctly when I entered the chamber today, there was some sort of complaint on the part of the opposition because the government was reviewing the concept of universality as it is applied to the baby bonus.

Senator Flynn: That was in Question Period.

Senator Everett: Perhaps it was a question, but, obviously, there was some sort of concern on the part of the opposition that this universal concept would be put in jeopardy. I would have thought that the opposition would support the idea that the government should look at all aspects of an expenditure program to see if it can be more efficient by cutting some expenditures.

Senator Flynn: We were just wondering whether Senator Austin was telling us the truth.

Senator Everett: I am sure the question was engendered by some reason.

Senator Macquarrie: Ask Senator McElman.

Senator Everett: The fact of the matter is that the government of this country and the central bank determined they would put into place policies that would reduce the rate of inflation. Those policies have been put into place and adhered to, and the rate of inflation has come down.

Senator Flynn: When the economy collapses, no doubt inflation will come down.

Senator Everett: The economy has not collapsed. On a month-over-month basis the rate of inflation today is running at approximately 6 per cent, and on a year-over-year basis it is 10.6 per cent. On the same basis as the United States arrives at its figures, inflation in Canada is running at 6 per cent at this point.

Senator Flynn: You come back to your old tune.

Senator Everett: That has been a major victory in economic policy. I am mystified as to why the opposition finds that this somehow should not be. I would be interested to know what their policy might have been under the circumstances. It is true that we have a very high unemployment rate at the present time. That is a consequence of the sort of policy that has to be followed when you want to reduce inflation.

● (1620)

The government is not unmindful of the serious problems and the unhappiness that it has caused. The government is trying to do something about it. But I thought that Senator Phillips was rather distorting the policy when he said that the government was providing only $4 per unemployed person per week and at the same time was increasing the benefits of those who are drawing unemployment insurance. Surely the fact of the matter is that there are two groups. There are those who are drawing unemployment insurance, and the government has moved to increase the benefits that are payable to them. There is another group who are at the stage of losing their entitlement under unemployment insurance, and money is being provided by the government to put those people back to work so that they will regain their eligibility. To say that that is $4 a week is a distortion of the facts.

Senator Phillips also says that there is something wrong with the government meeting with the provinces, that this is taking up too much time. Well, I think it is only right and sound. I would have thought that Conservative policy would be that the government should meet with the provinces.

He says the provinces do not have the money to come in with the government, and yet, in fact, it is my understanding that a number of provinces are supporting the government's expenditure and will match it with money of their own.

He says that unemployment insurance premiums are being increased. Well, that is true, but can he tell me, can the Conservatives tell me, what the alternative is?

Senator Flynn: Change the government!

Senator Everett: We have a serious unemployment problem in Canada—

Senator Macquarrie: Change the government! Fire Trudeau!

Senator Everett: It seems to me that that is all we ever hear from your side.

Senator Flynn: There is no trust.

Senator Everett: But I have not heard one cogent policy to the effect that, "This is what we would do if we were in power." There is distortion of what we are doing. There is complaint that we are doing something. There is the wish that it would go away, and there is the promise that, "If you elect the Conservatives, it will go away." But the fact of the matter is that that is not what is going to happen. There is not a cogent—

Senator Flynn: A lot of things would have happened, if the Conservatives had been in power.

Senator Everett: There is not a cogent policy—

Senator Flynn: You know very well that there would have been a change in the national energy policy and a change in FIRA, and other changes which would not have resulted in all these mega-projects which have gone down the drain.

Senator Everett: Well, let's take a look at FIRA, for example. My understanding is that your leader is in favour of FIRA.

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Flynn: Not the way it is operated at this time; not at all.

Senator Everett: He is not suggesting that FIRA be done away with. On the one hand, I hear the Conservatives say that FIRA ought to be done away with, and yet I hear your leader saying that FIRA should be retained and that every country should have a FIRA—

Senator Flynn: Greatly modified.

Senator Everett: —and he would retain it.

Senator Flynn: Greatly modified.

Senator Everett: I remember hearing the Conservatives before the last election talking about how they would get rid of Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Everett: And yet, when you got into power, you retained Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: We would have saved a lot of money, billions of dollars.

Senator Everett: I remember you complaining before the election in which you were elected that you would change the economic policy, and yet you endorsed the whole economic policy of the government at that time.

So I don't know what it is that you would do. You are very unclear, and I would like to hear what it is. Senator Roblin is sitting there smiling, and I am sure he could get up now and give us an exposition on what it is that you would do.

Senator Flynn: Even if you understood, you would not admit it.

Senator Everett: In any event, I think that the government's policy at this stage is a sound one; it is a difficult one; it is one that has to be applied over a lengthy period of time. I am not apologizing for some of the mistakes that were made before, and there were mistakes made.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: You say you are not apologizing for them?

Senator Everett: But the policy that exists today—and I challenge the opposition to refute it—the policy that exists today is the right policy for the time and it should be followed through.

Senator Flynn: Surely, we have no choice?

Senator Everett: There is one last point I wish to make.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: It is time you made one.

Senator Everett: Senator Phillips referred to Senator Olson as a featherweight. Well, I want to refute that allegation totally.

Senator Flynn: Is it necessary?

Senator Everett: I think it is necessary, because I think it was a totally unnecessary comment. Senator Olson did a superb job as Minister of State for Economic Development.

Senator Flynn: Why was he demoted?

Senator Everett: And I am certain he will do a superb job here as the leader of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: If that is all you had to say in his favour, you might as well not have bothered.

Hon. Duff Roblin: I suppose the favourite opening line of participants in a debate of this kind is that they had not intended to speak. However, inspired by what I have heard so far in the debate, I feel impelled to offer a small contribution toward the exposition of our affairs.

I should have thought it suitable had the leader of the house favoured us, on the presentation of this bill, with some broad-ranging sketch of the policy of the government with respect to the state of our economy and the forecasts that they would offer as to its immediate future.

Senator Olson: Would you like us to repeat Mr. Lalonde's speech here? No problem.

Senator Roblin: You can follow me, if you wish.

A debate dealing with the sort of climax, you might say, of our borrowing program, which rests on the foundation of the economic affairs of the country today and on the political and financial situation in which the government finds itself, provides an opportunity for a broad-ranging discussion of present and future economic policy. Therefore, I think we must be grateful to Senator Phillips for having taken a wider view. I think it was quite appropriate for my colleague from Prince Edward Island to do so. He spoke effectively on this general theme, and so did my leader.

I would say to Senator Everett that his contribution was more attuned to the potential of this debate than perhaps his deputy leader illustrated in his time. Maybe when the latter winds up the debate he will favour us with further thoughts on this general motion.

Honourable senators, we are actually dealing with the climax of a series of events which have been building for many years. A deficit of $24 billion and a borrowing program of $22 billion-odd have not come about in the last 12 months. They did not happen in the last little while. They are the climax of a policy of governmental operation that has been developing in the country over the past ten or twelve years.

We have seen the rules of Keynesianism violated in the fact that over these many years we have been hard put to it to find any surpluses in our federal accounts.

A figure I saw tells me it is 12 years since we last had a surplus. I am not sure that that is exactly right, but there have not been any large surpluses. Quite the contrary has been happening. Even in the best of times the deficit of the government has been steadily increasing until it has reached this monumental stage today; and we have become so acclimatized to this kind of thing that nobody, really—apart from one or two noisy voices in the opposition, I suppose—is concerned about it. But we certainly ought to be.

We have been told by politicians—and I use that collective noun because, while I think those in government have to bear the responsibility for acts, many politicians on all sides have been telling the people of Canada that they could be excused from the impact of the economic events of their own country; that no matter what happened the government would bail us out; the government would protect us from the course of events; that we would not have to face up to the difficulties of a declining economy in this country and the world, and that somehow the miraculous operation of the federal fiscal system would save us harmless from the difficulties in which we find ourselves.

• (1630)

What I am going to say might hurt my friends from the maritimes because they have been substantial beneficiaries, but I might as well put my opinion on the table. When world oil prices began to rise we said to ourselves: Canadians are going to have a made-in-Canada price; we will have a price for energy in this country that will protect us from what is happening in the rest of the world, and we will put on taxation to do that—which we did. Incidentally, we have taken that item of taxation out of our budget, so our real expenditure increase over the years is much greater than it appears to be because we have changed the basis of our accounting. That is called “constructive accounting,” I think. We took the compensation payment for energy out of the budget, and we told our people that they would not be hurt by the price of oil, that they would be saved harmless because there would be a made-in-Canada price.

I use that as one illustration of the attitude of mind which we Canadians have brought to the problems which beset us, and I point to that as an illustration of faulty leadership on the part of the gentlemen who sit opposite.

That was a natural thing to do, perhaps, if one wished to save us harmless, if one believed in gradualism, if one tempered the wind to the shorn lamb, but all of those elevating sentiments translated into budgetary consequences have put us in the situation in which we find ourselves today.

So, our problem today is not one, I am sorry to say, Senator Everett, that can be solved by the policies of my party or any other party in a short period of time; it can only be solved over the long term.

The Conservative Party tried to say that to the people of Canada in 1979 when it brought down its budget, a budget that had to do with this very problem, a budget which had to do with government expenditure, Petro-Canada, if you please, and the oil question. We said to them in that famous phrase that there would be “short term pain for long term gain.” But members of the Liberal Party said: “Never mind about that. There won't be any short term pain or any other pain. Eighteen cents a gallon! Don't believe it. We won't have to do that, we have a made-in-Canada price; we will save you harmless.”

I have to admit that that was shrewd politics, because in that part of the country—and I am thinking mainly of the province of Ontario—

Senator Flynn: And Quebec.

Senator Roblin: And Quebec—the argument appealed to such an extent that the government that is now in power resumed the reins of office.

So, if anyone is concerned about the solution to our problems—and I know that we are all genuinely concerned—and if anyone is perplexed by the size of this debt and the problems we are facing in our public finance, one cannot expect that anything other than a vigorous, long term approach to this question is going to bring us within reach of solutions within any sort of reasonable period of time.

I am sorry to say that I do not have the perfect solution. If I were to proceed on this line of thought and expose to this chamber some of the proposals I would make—well, I may do that at a later time. I want to establish the central fact that what we are dealing with now is the culmination of a generation of self-indulgence on the part of politicians. It is a generation of fiscal irresponsibility on the part of Prime Ministers, and Ministers of Finance in this federal Parliament, and we are not going to cure our problems by any waving of the magic wand this afternoon, or at any other time in the near future.

I was asked inferentially about my position on universality in connection with a certain welfare policy. My own position on that is well known—let me alter that statement; it may be well known to some—but the questions we asked the minister today had nothing to do with the principle of universality, but the questions had everything to do with what the government policy was. It is as simple as that. That is all we wanted to know, because when we know the government policy we can talk further on this general point.

Can we grasp in any way the size of the problem we are dealing with? It is only when one tries to understand the magnitude of the problem that one can do anything about it. Do we realize that since that famous election of 1980 spending has risen by 55 per cent on the public accounts basis and 66 per cent on the national accounts basis? And when was that election? It was scarcely three years ago, and yet look at what we have done in terms of public expenditure.

You may say that it is unavoidable. I will not argue that at the moment—I will argue it at a later time—but look at the magnitude of that increase, and look at the magnitude in this year of grace alone—a 20.8 per cent increase in public expenditures on a national accounts basis. And what was the policy of the government at election time? They declared that they would not increase the expenditures of the country faster than the rate of inflation. That was their basic economic policy. Yet in no single year since it has resumed office has it lived up to that particular plank of its platform, and there have been, what, five or six budgets since then?

Maybe that could not be done, but I am saying something to you about the size and the magnitude of the problems we are facing when we find that kind of increase over that period of time, which leads directly to the deficit, to the weight of the debt, and, in my opinion, over the long term it is bound to have a constraining effect on the ability of this economy to grow and prosper. Public spending is certainly very high indeed.

What are we to think of a situation such as the one we are in now? Honourable senators, it is not 12 months since we had a budgetary estimate by the former Minister of Finance as to what our deficit was going to be. What was it—$10 billion, with a financing program of $6 billion or $7 billion? Shortly after that, in edition No. 2, a little more than six months later, the deficit had risen to $19.6 billion, and the borrowing program to $17.6 billion. Then, the other day, we had the third instalment; the deficit has risen to $23.6 billion, and the borrowing program to $22.3 billion.

If someone were to say that our public financings were out of control, it would seem to me that there would be some basis for such an argument, but I can only hope, for the sake of all of us, that that proves to be false.

Honourable senators, what became of the deficit in the Unemployment Insurance Fund? That will be several billion dollars, and we are going to put in a wage tax of $1.7 billion now to collect part of that back. This cuts the ground out from under any expectation of increases in consumer purchasing, which are going to be the great engine of growth in the next little while. Growth certainly will not be found anywhere else in terms of the domestic economy.

What happened to the rest of it? How is the rest of the Unemployment Insurance Fund being funded? Is that not part of our financial problem? Is that not, indeed, part of our deficit? But where does that appear in the statement of the Minister of Finance?

If he has included that in his borrowing program of $22.3 billion, that is an interesting fact I would like to have explained to us; but, in any case, why it is not calculated as part of the deficit of the country I do not know.

You know, there is a very nice thing about this; you take the Unemployment Insurance Fund, shift it out of the limelight, and put it off in a place by itself, then you do not have to count what goes on there in terms of the public expenditure or in terms of the borrowing program of the country.

You take the Post Office, and what do you do with that? You shift that off into another area, and its requirements do not appear in the accounts we are discussing today, but there surely must be half a billion dollars worth of problems over there.

● (1640)

You have already done the same thing with the Oil Compensation Fund, and I dare say if you scratch a little further you will find some more. If you are really trying to rigorously define the terms of your problem, you will find that $23.6 billion does not encompass the whole situation.

I do not say that with any satisfaction because we are in this together—make no mistake about that. The opposition and the government and the people of the nation are in this together. We are not going to get out of it if we content ourselves with disputing in the rather academic fashion which perhaps I am guilty of in this chamber from time to time, but it is only if we are seized with the size of the problem and are determined to do something effective about it that we are going to come to grips with the situation that we find ourselves in.

What are some of the things we ought to do? There are a great many, and I cannot deal with them all. The first thing that I think we ought to do is to say to the Minister of Finance: "Come clean. Tell us what you really think. Is this $23.6 billion the last word or are we going to find out, when the new budget comes down in a few months, that it is going to be something more than that? Have you really calculated the effect on the Unemployment Insurance Fund, for example, and will you please include that because we have to raise that money somewhere? Will you come clean with us?"

That is the first thing we have to have—candor! We do not get it. We get people fiddling with the figures in order to make them look as harmless as possible. When you get into the $20 billion range, honourable senators, there is no way you can do that kind of thing. You might just as well come clean and let us know what the situation is.

If the situation on inflation, for example, is as good as Senator Everett says it is—and I will take his word for it—he says that figured on the American system it is 6 per cent. Inflation down there is 4.2 per cent figured on the same basis. Let us suppose that he is right. If that is the case, why in the name of all that is sensible is our interest rate standing where it is? Surely that should come down. Are we going to have a spread between our inflation rate and our interest rate of six points, seven points, eight points, when everyone tells us that what we need to do to get the country moving at least partially is get some control of the interest rates? We had that long argument with the Bank of Canada about interest rates and inflation. The Bank of Canada policy does not give a hoot about interest rates. The Bank of Canada policy is dedicated to one principle only and that is dealing with the value of the Canadian dollar. The sooner we get that through our heads the better. Any advantage that we may have sought in having an independent dollar freely floating has long ago been sacrificed on that altar.

I am not one who is convinced that we cannot modify that policy to some degree. Absolutes in this argument are out of the question. You are only dealing on the margin; you are only dealing with degrees. There is a degree to which we can move the interest rates down. The Economic Council of Canada says so, at any rate. They say that real interest rates would seem to be higher than necessary to restrain inflation. Lower real interest rates would help to get the recovery well under way. That puts it somewhat more moderately than I have been doing this afternoon, but I think that is what I mean. I think that we have some flexibility here. I say to the government: "Come clean about what our real problem is."

The Prime Minister tried to appeal to Canadians the other night to rise to meet the challenge. I have no doubt that that is what he was trying to do, but he did not succeed because I do not think he ever put the challenge to them in terms that they understood. He talked about trust. We trust one another. The stuff of life is made up of trusting one another. He talked about everyone pulling their weight in productivity, but when you get down to it there was nothing to grab on to. It was banal and unworthy of him because I know he can be an inspiring leader, but he did not lead on those occasions. I hope for the sake of the country—and I say this in a non-partisan way—that he can muster those qualities that are within him and lead us out of this slough of economic despondency in which we find ourselves.

Come clean with us and put the matter as straight as you can. It is a difficult job, but that is what should be done. Take the Bank of Canada policy and the interest rate policy and squeeze the water out of it. Make it more suitable to the great issues of the day which are no longer inflation, although I do not dismiss it and I am not discarding it as a terrible problem or something that we can afford to ignore because we cannot. The real problem that faces this country is the lifeblood of men and women having jobs and being able to work. If we can get that interest rate down somewhat and make a contribution towards that goal, then we will see economic leadership from the politicians of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I do not overstate my case. I think there is a lot more than interest rates that has to be done in order to get the Canadian economy going again. That is only one factor. It is the sign that people look for when they are trying to plan their futures and are looking to see how they are going to get along in life. That is a very significant sign in the economic field. It seems to me that we are missing a great opportunity because we in this country have been hypnotized too long by this gradualist monetary policy that has been espoused by the Bank of Canada and, up until quite recently, in fact rejected by the Government of Canada. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has all my sympathy. He has been trying to run a deflationary policy with a government that would not co-operate. Maybe they are going to do so now, but it has been hard lines on him, and while I am critical of him at times I do not forget that he has his problems too.

Regarding interest rates, would that the government would show some signs of restraint itself. They are asking the whole country to do so. They have in the June budget added $2.5 billion of taxes to the people of Canada as a result of Mr. MacEachen's June budget. Those are the facts—a $2.5 billion increase in taxes—and now with the unemployment insurance situation they are putting a wage tax on every man and woman who works in this country that is going to reduce his or her income and is going to make the economy more difficult to operate because prices are under pressure.

What are you going to do? You have got to get the money. The conundrums are not easily solved, but it seems to me that we have to face them and decide what we are going to do about them. One of the things that we are looking for from the government is some kind of evidence that there is restraint on its part to match the sacrifices it is asking the people to make. It is asking everyone to make a sacrifice when it cuts the indexing in half, and perhaps if Senator Everett's figure is correct that will be a little less of a burden than it would otherwise be. They are asking people to sacrifice to support the unemployment insurance situation. They are asking the people of this country to sacrifice in the 5 and 6 per cent. There is something there that we do not want to underestimate and we want to give credit where credit is due and hope that those measures are successful. But when we look at the operations of the government itself, where do we see that restraint that we are asking the people of this country to adopt as their goal and target now? I, for one, do not see it. You can go through every one of the departments of government. I have a resumé here for every department, and you can be thankful, honourable senators, that I have no intention of dealing with any of them, but in every department of government there are examples of, one would have to say, unfortunate mismanagement.

We see that the real crunch of restraint is hard to detect. Perhaps civil servants could say it is there. Perhaps members of the executive of government could say it is there because they are working with it every day. I hope it is there. We do not see it though. There is no feeling among the people that the government is practising what it preaches in respect to this general feature of restraint. When you look at the items that compose our cost of living index you see that, as far as the private sector contributions are concerned, that is practically a zero. When you add in those prices which government itself controls, there you will find the big inflationary factor in these days.

When you are talking about restraint, one has to ask the government, "What are you doing about it in those areas you control?" It seems to me that those are among the factors that could lead this country back to some self-confidence—coming clean with the people; dealing with the question of interest rates; and doing something about restraint in government, which really strikes the public as being conscious of waste, conscious of thrift and conscious of the necessity for prudence, recognizing that at the same time, willy-nilly, you have to continue to support those life-saving measures which are protecting the unemployed from the hard facts of life to which they would be exposed under other circumstances.

I am grateful to honourable senators for having the patience to listen to me on this subject because had I known that I was going to speak so long I would no doubt have prepared a speech. As it is, I have just given you those thoughts which come to my mind when dealing with this great problem.

● (1650)

What is this $4 billion going to do?

Senator Frith: It is a borrowing authority.

Senator Roblin: Is it going to do anything to relieve unemployment? No, I do not think it is, and I will tell you why not. Is it going to do anything to increase productivity? I cannot see it. Is it going to do anything to bring interest rates down? On the contrary, it will probably be a factor in keeping them up. Is it going to do anything to increase the productive capacity of the country by way of new investment? That is not very likely.

[Senator Roblin.]

What is it going to do? It is going to pay the interest on the national debt; that is what it is going to do. It is going to pay the operating expenses of the government, which has nothing to do with investment, jobs, productivity or any of that kind of thing. Basically, it is going to pay the interest on the debt which has climbed dramatically. I do not know if I dare give the figures since they are so shocking, but the gross national debt has risen so fast and so far in the last 10 years as to indicate why we need all this money to meet the interest payments.

There is no possibility of its ever being paid back—you can get that out of your head. Very seldom do governments repay debts. They did in my province at one time, and I will remain grateful to those who initiated that policy, which I had something to do with continuing. However, I have never seen this in the federal field and I do not think I ever will. The cost of carrying that money will be a burden on future generations for all time to come. If we are sufficiently cynical, we can hope that there will be enough inflation in that time to make the burden bearable.

Whatever happens, what we are doing now is borrowing a lot of money to pay the interest on the national debt. There is no repayment; there is no productivity investment; there is no increasing output of the country; it has nothing to do with employment; it will not bring interest rates down. However, it is necessary and I am going to vote for it, but I do so with a heavy heart.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, dealing with the interventions in reverse order, following the Biblical dictum that the last shall be first and the first last, I am sorry to have disappointed Senator Roblin in sponsoring this borrowing authority bill without having given an inspiring speech on the entire range of government economic policy.

Senator Roblin: It is hard to be inspiring with that.

Senator Frith: Although I doubt it, it is possible that, if I had given as inspiring or as good a performance as Senator Roblin gave by repeating the government policy behind this borrowing authority bill and repeating what Mr. Lalonde had said, perhaps Senator Roblin would have stood up and said, "Hear, hear. Where do I sign?" I doubt that would have happened.

Senator Roblin is well aware of the government's economic program put forward by the Minister of Finance, and the borrowing authority bill, which is now before us, is just a part of that program.

In fairness, I must say that I was not disappointed in Senator Roblin's performance, although I was slightly disappointed in the content because I did not hear anything I had not heard before from him or his colleagues. However, I must say that I have seldom heard it better put.

Senator Flynn: It is worth repeating because you always forget.

Senator Frith: No, we do not. You assume that we forget. We listen to it patiently, over and over again.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: One of these days it might sink in.

Senator Frith: If the content improves, it just might.

Honourable senators, there was one bright spot in what Senator Roblin said. He said that he, on another occasion, is going to tell us what he would do. He is a distinguished former premier, and I look forward to what he has to tell us about how interest rates can be brought down further.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Does that mean you have no solution yourself?

Senator Frith: No, it does not mean that. Do you have any other questions?

Senator Asselin: Would you expand on that a little?

Senator Frith: Yes, I will; that is what I was about to do.

I understand that Senator Roblin, on another occasion, is going to tell us what his approach would be if he were able to bring forward programs to improve the government's role and, therefore, improve the economy.

It seems to me that two basic threads run through Senator Roblin's speech. One, I suppose, is on the philosophical level. There is an underlying thread in all of the urgings for different programs from the government that, to me, seems Marxist. I understand the basic theory of Marx to be that governments can solve all economic and social problems—

Senator Roblin: The basic theory throughout your last election campaign.

Senator Asselin: That was not said?

Senator Frith: No, it was not.

Senator Asselin: Oh, yes.

Senator Frith: Oh, no; that is not what the government said.

Hon. G. I. Smith: We heard it; we know what was said.

Senator Frith: We are going to find out from Senator Roblin how a government, in a free society, in an economy that has as large a private sector as ours, can solve all its problems. I assume it will be by more government intervention.

Senator Smith: Lack of intervention.

Senator Frith: The other thread that runs through Senator's Roblin's speech, as it does so often, is that the bête noir is, to him, the deficit. He is one of the most eloquent chargers, a Don Quixote against the windmill of the deficit, that we have in this chamber.

Therefore, I look forward to his telling us what would be his, or his party's, policy. And I do not ask him to tell us now. Will he tell us that we should have a balanced budget? Perhaps.

Will he tell us that we should budget for a surplus? Perhaps. Let's wait for more on this promising point in his intervention.

We will find out what he wants to cut in federal spending for this year, 1982-83. The government is spending $14.9 billion on transfers to individuals—that is, family allowances and pensions. Perhaps he will tell us how we should cut that. An amount of $14.1 billion is spent on transfers to governments, including medicare, welfare and equalization payments. We can look forward to hearing how he would cut down on that spending. $5.5 billion is spent on other transfers such as foreign aid. He might want to cut that. Regional economic expansion—he might want to cut that. Payments to natives—he might want to cut that. $2.9 billion is used on payments to crown corporations. I believe he hinted that he would definitely like to cut that. He mentioned the Post Office as one example.

Senator Flynn: And Petro-Canada.

Senator Frith: Exactly. And I am sure he will tell us how we should cut down on the $7 billion for national defence, which includes $3.4 billion for salaries and benefits.

Senator Flynn: We have already started on that.

Senator Frith: We want to hear that from Senator Roblin; perhaps we will hear it from Senator Flynn too.

$11.7 billion is spent on operating and capital expenditures, including $7.6 billion in salaries and benefits. I know he will tell us in detail where those cuts can be made, because he did show a great deal of concern about excess spending in that category.

The last category on which I know we will hear from him is the $16.8 billion interest on the public debt. He will show us how we can reduce the public debt. I sincerely look forward to hearing Senator Roblin's comments on that.

Senator Everett was the next speaker, in reverse order, and no one will be surprised to learn that I associate myself with his comments. I also say that nothing Senator Bosa said about his recollection of what the Prime Minister said concerning wage and price controls is inconsistent with my own recollection.

● (1700)

I believe that Senator Macquarrie was the next speaker. With respect to what he and Senator Phillips, his colleague from Prince Edward Island, said, I will paraphrase and Canadianize the old expression "I'm from Missouri," which means "You'll have to show me; I'm not yet convinced." Honourable senators, we now have a new expression—"I'm from Prince Edward Island; I am not convinced that these unemployment programs are going to work."

I can only say that I share their sincere and genuine hopes that these programs will do something for unemployment. I share the hope that they will work, but we will have to see whether they do or not.

Honourable senators, I certainly did not at any time entertain the illusion that Bill C-128—this borrowing authority bill with, admittedly, rather large figures—would miraculously change Senator Flynn's assessment of the performance of the government. Therefore, I do not intend to take this occasion, the debate on second reading, to tell him that I am disappointed that the bill did not persuade him to praise the government's performance.

If I can go back for a moment to a comment of Senator Macquarrie's, I will say that I was moved by his reference to "the good old days under Mackenzie King." If there were a way to verify whether Senator Macquarrie sang paeans of praise to Mackenzie King in those good old days, I would make every effort to find it. Senator Macquarrie might help me in getting the Library of Parliament to check what he said in those days about the government's performance.

Apart from Senator Flynn's "report card" on the government's performance, he raised a couple of points on which I would like to comment. I agree with his remarks about the section which deals with borrowing authority that must be cut off if it is not used.

We know, from the committee hearings, that the government has requested additional borrowing authority while it still had some amount hanging around from former years which it was able to use. The committee said, "Look, when you come to us for borrowing authority, we are going to give it to you but it must lapse. You cannot keep carrying it forward year after year." If what Senator Flynn says is true—and I think the matter should be brought up in committee—then I agree with him that the section could be reworded in such a way as to more effectively bring about its stated objective.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps we should ask for authority to increase an actual debt by so many billions of dollars. In that way we would clearly know where we stand.

Senator Frith: Let us raise that point in committee with the minister and the officials.

Senator Flynn raised one other question: Can we assume there will be no need for any additional borrowing authority? Honourable senators, I cannot answer that. I think we should ask that question of the minister tomorrow if he attends the committee meeting.

Incidentally, on another point, I do not know whether I understood Senator Flynn correctly but, if I did, then he is quite correct. The $4 billion that the committee agreed in July would be cut but left there for the asking, so to speak, was justified by the Department of Finance on the basis of need for flexibility in the foreign exchange market. In strict terms, therefore, what was left aside for the asking is now being requested, but not for precisely the same reason as the original one. As I explained, it is not being requested for that reason, but because of the cut in government revenues.

Honourable senators, the amendment to the Financial Administration Act has not been introduced. In my notes, it is stated that the government intends to introduce it. I hope so, because it is becoming a little tiresome to constantly have to refer not only to the need for the section but the fact that that need will be remedied by an amendment to the Financial Administration Act, when that amendment to the Financial Administration Act does not come along. Perhaps I could ask the leader to bring that up at legislation planning. I do not think we will have any trouble getting such a bill approved.

At the risk of disappointing other honourable senators and not being sufficiently wide-ranging on the subject of this bill, as Senator Roblin has said on other occasions and, in effect, has said again today, the borrowing authority is the necessary corollary to a debt program. A debt program is the necessary corollary to the overall economic program. As he has said, just because he votes for the borrowing authority, which is the second corollary, does not mean that he agrees with either the debt program or the economic program to which it is the corollary.

Honourable senators, I believe that this has been a useful and enjoyable extension of the normal debate on borrowing authority bills. We really have not had much chance to debate Mr. Lalonde's statement of last week, and today we were provided at least some opportunity to have a crack at it. We might want to extend that opportunity by way of an inquiry. In the meantime, we have had a useful exchange of views, as the diplomats always like to say.

I ask honourable senators to support the request for additional borrowing authority as embodied in this bill, against the background of its overall policy dimensions, considering the fact that it is, I suppose, a necessary corollary to any government economic program.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I believe Motions stand. Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 7.30 p.m.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Deputy Leader of the Government any information? I assume that the Commons bell we can now hear is for a vote on an amendment to the bill they are considering.

Senator Frith: I do not know. I am open to suggestions as to when we should resume.

Senator Flynn: Let us say at the call of the bell at 7.30 or 8 o'clock. We can consult and let His Honour know.

Senator Frith: Yes. Therefore my motion is that the Senate do now adjourn to resume at the call of the bell at approximately 7.30 p.m. In the meantime, we shall consult. The reason I suggest 7.30 instead of 8 o'clock is because if we do receive the bill earlier it will give us a half-hour start. It is now only 5.30.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 9 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

WEST COAST PORTS OPERATIONS BILL, 1982

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-137, to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast of Canada.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have no objection in principle to giving leave, but I would like the Leader of the Government to tell us how he intends to proceed. I see that there is a table in front of the Leader of the Government and his seat-mate, which suggests to me that the bill will be referred to Committee of the Whole. May I have the assurance that if the bill receives second reading it will be referred to Committee of the Whole?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, some preparations have been made in anticipation of that procedure being followed tonight, as the Leader of the Opposition knows since I discussed it with him, albeit very briefly. However, we are not difficult. The bill can either be referred to a standing committee of this house or dealt with in Committee of the Whole. It seems to me that it would be more expeditious to deal with the bill in Committee of the Whole, and there is the added advantage that all honourable senators on both sides of the house will be able to participate.

My honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, is correct in saying that some preparations have been made. While it is not customary to make reference to the galleries, I will say that in this case we have the opportunity of calling in the Minister of Labour and his senior officials to answer technical questions.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Not only technical questions.

Senator Flynn: Questions of substance also.

Senator Olson: To answer unqualified questions.

Senator Flynn: Then, on the strength of that assurance, leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that this bill be now read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to introduce this bill and give sufficient background so that all honourable senators on both sides of the house will have a better understanding of the background leading up to the situation that we are dealing with tonight on a somewhat urgent basis.

I want to say that, on the one hand, the government regrets the necessity of having to introduce legislation to restore longshoring operations at Canada's west coast ports and, on the other hand, the Minister of Labour and the government generally have accepted their responsibility to bring about a conclusion to a work stoppage which has brought the export of many commodities, including western grain, to a virtual standstill, and has caused hardship to the business community and its employees who are dependent on water transportation for the shipment of their goods and services.

It is a situation in which the parties to the dispute are able to inflict more damage on others than on themselves. As well as conferring rights upon the parties to bargain collectively and arrive at acceptable terms and conditions of employment for the employees, the industrial relations framework set out in Part V of the Canada Labour Code clearly places the responsibility for resolving any labour-management disputes on the parties themselves.

Unfortunately, there are occasions when the government, as custodian of the economic and public interests of Canadians, must assume the responsibility entrusted to it and act in a firm and responsible manner to ensure that the interests of all those parties affected by a particular work stoppage are protected.

The contract negotiations to which this particular piece of legislation applies concern the renewal of a collective agreement involving the British Columbia Maritime Employers' Association and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union that expired on December 31, 1981. The notice of dispute was filed by the union representing some 4,000 regular and casual longshoremen in ports on the Canadian west coast on January 7, 1982. Prior to this the parties had been meeting in direct negotiations over a three-month period without reaching an agreement on a new contract.

A conciliation officer was appointed on January 19, 1982 but was unable to assist the parties in resolving their outstanding differences. Following receipt of the report of the conciliation officer, the Minister of Labour, on March 3, 1982, appointed Mr. H. Allan Hope, Q.C., of Prince George, British Columbia as a conciliation commissioner in the dispute. Following his appointment, Mr. Hope arranged conciliation meetings with the parties toward the latter part of March, and in the course of these meetings the conciliation commissioner convinced the parties of the merits of returning to direct negotiations.

In this regard the parties met in direct bargaining several times during the month of April and the first half of the month of May. Mr. Hope again entered the talks on May 20 and held a series of meetings with the parties throughout the month of June. Again, at the conciliation commissioner's urging, the parties returned to the process of direct bargaining on several occasions during July. With negotiations deadlocked and no prospect for a settlement in the dispute, the commissioner filed his final report with the Minister of Labour, and it was subsequently released to the parties on August 13, 1982.

In his report Mr. Hope made recommendations dealing with not only wage increases but also several contentious issues such as container handling, shift differential premiums, training of casual longshoremen and the employers' right to institute continuous operations. The conciliation commissioner recommended a three-year agreement with wage increases of 12.4 per cent in the first year, 10.6 per cent in the second year, and a wage re-opener in the third year of the contract.

The current hourly base wage rate for west coast longshoremen is $12.55. In the area of container handling Mr. Hope recommended that there be a one-year moratorium on the application of the container handling provision in the collective agreement with an automatic reinstatement of the provision at the end of that time.

The BCMEA has maintained that the container handling clause which provides the union with jurisdiction over the stuffing and destuffing of consolidated cargo containers which are destined to or come from any point within the Vancouver local area or the Prince Rupert Port area placed the Canadian ports at a competitive disadvantage with other major ports such as Seattle. The employers felt that the removal of the limitations provided within the clause would sharply increase the amount of traffic and the amount of skilled work available to the union.

From its point of view, the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union has viewed the employers' claim with skepticism and is concerned that the forecast of increased traffic predicted by the BCMEA is wrong and that the union will have surrendered jurisdiction over a substantial part of its present work with no hope of retrieving it.

Conciliation Commissioner Hope proposed recommendations to deal with the problems experienced in adequately manning the Monday-to-Friday day-shifts in the port. In an attempt to make the day-shift more attractive for longshoremen, Mr. Hope recommended a reduction in shift differential premiums for both the night and the graveyard shifts. The report recommended a reduction in the night-shift differential from time-and-one-half the base rate to time-and-one-quarter the base rate over the first two years of the new agreement. The report also suggested that the graveyard shift premium be reduced from two times the base rate to one-and-three-quarters times the base rate over the same two-year period.

[Senator Olson.]

As an additional measure to deal with the problem of insufficient manpower during the regular week-day shift, the conciliation commissioner recommended that the employer have an unfettered right to train casual employees in all categories in numbers sufficient to meet the many needs of the port as assessed by the employers.

After carefully weighing the requirements and concerns of both parties to the issue, the conciliation commissioner recommended that a provision be incorporated in the collective agreement permitting the employers, through their association or on an individual basis, to institute continuous operations after full consultation with the union, and permitting the institution of rules that would protect against the potential abuses of inadequate relief for the employees. The recommendation also provides that the parties have the right to submit any dispute in this area to arbitration under the existing provision of the collective agreement.

In addition to increases in the skill differential premiums, the report also called for increases in the employers' contribution to the pension, welfare and supplementary unemployment benefit plans. The employer association indicated a willingness to accept the report of Mr. Hope as terms of settlement for the contract dispute, but the union rejected the total report as an unacceptable package. It indicated some willingness to negotiate further on these terms where it was not prepared to accept the recommendations put forward by the conciliation commissioner.

The parties acquired the legal right to strike or to lock out on August 21, 1982. Over the next six weeks the parties met several times in direct negotiation, with little in the way of progress being made towards a final settlement of the dispute. The union held a series of one-day port closures to inform their members as to the progress of the negotiations, and in addition instituted what they termed a work-monitoring program, which effectively slowed the loading of ships to the point where several major shipping consortia began diverting their vessels to the port at Seattle.

On October 18 the BCMEA advised the union that unless the work slowdown was brought to a conclusion it would stop the dispatch of all labour to all terminals, except for grain, effective at 12 noon on October 19. When on the following day the union did not meet the employers' demand, the employers instituted a lockout at all west coast ports with the exception of the grain operations. However, the union then refused to allow their men to report to the grain-loading operations, thereby closing down all longshoring operations on the west coast.

Honourable senators, I will try to abbreviate this slightly. Let me deal now with October 25, when the Minister of Labour sent a telegram to the presidents of the BCMEA and the ILWU. I think the text of that telegram is well known to members on both sides of the house, so I will not put it in the record again. I should like, however, to read the last paragraph of that telegram because I think it is particularly appropriate at this time. In his telegram the Minister of Labour said:

I strongly advise you to immediately resume negotiations. Failing an early settlement of this dispute the government will accept its responsibility repugnant though it might be to bring about resumption of vital shipping operations.

Senator Flynn: Repugnant to the government or to the unions?

Senator Olson: The telegram was from the Minister of Labour and I am sure that he was speaking for himself and for the government. No one likes to get involved in this kind of situation, but, as I said at the outset, the situation has deteriorated so that the Government of Canada, including all of the ministers and its officers, must take the responsibility to bring an end to this work stoppage.

There are many more important points that perhaps can and should be made, but I want to suggest to honourable senators that the Minister of Labour has faced up to this situation. He has tried on many occasions, through the process that has taken place since early this year, to bring the two parties together and to come to an agreement that could be reached under the collective bargaining arrangements. Honourable senators, this government has faced up to its responsibility by introducing this legislation which will bring about an immediate resumption of longshoring activities in Canada's west coast ports.

The parties, on the passage of this legislation, will have until midnight, November 8 to reflect again on the situation that collective bargaining does work and that, if left to their own devices, they can reach a collective agreement.

In closing, I would ask honourable senators for an early and speedy passage of the legislation to bring about a resumption of shipping operations and perhaps also to prod the parties to get on with the negotiations, which I hope will culminate in a collective agreement between the two parties involved.

Much more could be said about the matter; more detail could be filled in. However, I hope I will have satisfied honourable senators that I have tried to cover some of the history leading up to the many attempts that have been made by the Minister of Labour and by many of the other people involved to bring this situation to a satisfactory conclusion so that we can get our economy moving again through the essential services that are required through the west coast ports.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate accept a question?

Senator Olson: I think so.

Senator Flynn: You are not sure?

Senator Balfour: Will the Leader of the Government indicate whether or not the Minister of Labour has offered personally to intercede in the negotiations between the parties? If not, why not?

Senator Olson: Well, I am not sure just what is meant by that question. The Minister of Labour, as I outlined a number of times, has indeed made the services available through the Department of Labour on many occasions. If you are asking me whether or not he personally has been out in the west interceding—no. But the minister and the Department of Labour have on quite a number of occasions been actively involved in attempting to find a solution to this dispute.

Senator Balfour: The question was simple: Has the Minister of Labour offered to intercede? If not, why not?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not know the precise answer to that question, whether he offered or not—

Senator Balfour: Then just say that you don't know.

Senator Olson: But before long, if we proceed into Committee of the Whole, perhaps you can get a direct answer from the minister.

Senator Balfour: Thank you.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My honourable friend has given us some details regarding the report of the conciliation commissioner, which details were rather difficult to grasp, so I wonder if he can provide us with a copy of the report so that we can see what the issues are.

I have two other questions in that regard. First, on what date was the conciliation commissioner's report rendered? Secondly, what did the parties say about it?

I believe my honourable friend said that the labour side said that the whole thing was unacceptable. What did the management side say about it? It is rather important for us to know what is in the report of the conciliation commissioner and what reaction he received from the parties concerned.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will go back over my notes, because I believe I gave the precise date on which the conciliation commissioner's report was presented to both parties involved. It seems to me that that was on August 13. I will repeat what I said, because I appreciate that it is difficult to grasp every detail at first.

Following his appointment, Mr. Hope arranged conciliation meetings with the parties toward the latter part of March. During the course of those meetings, the conciliation commissioner convinced the parties of the merits of returning to direct negotiations, and in this regard the parties met in direct bargaining several times during the month of April and the first half of the month of May.

Mr. Hope again entered into talks on May 20, and held a series of meetings with the parties through the month of June.

Again, at the conciliation commissioner's urgings, the parties returned to the process of direct bargaining on several occasions during the month of July. With negotiations deadlocked and no prospect, or apparently no prospect, of a settlement of the dispute, the commissioner filed his final report with the Minister of Labour, which report was subsequently released to the parties on August 13, 1982.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

Senator Olson: There were several other parts to Senator Roblin's question, particularly relating to what is contained in the report. I do not have a complete copy of the conciliation commissioner's report, but I did go over a number of matters that were in the report, and if it would be helpful I can repeat that.

Senator Roblin: That is not so much my point. I appreciate the minister's difficulty regarding the items, but what I want to determine is the reaction of the parties concerned. I think he said that the labour side rejected the thing holus-bolus. What was the reaction from the management side?

Senator Olson: I did say that, and if I can refer to my notes, the employers' association indicated a willingness to accept the report of Mr. Hope as terms of settlement for the contract dispute. The union rejected the total report as an unacceptable package, but indicated some willingness to negotiate further on those items where it was not prepared to accept the recommendations put forward by the conciliation commissioner.

Senator Roblin: On what were they willing to negotiate? What did they accept and what did they reject?

Senator Olson: I would prefer that questions regarding the report, and what each side's position is, be directed to the officials who will be here in a few minutes, if we get into Committee of the Whole.

I believe I gave some detail regarding a number of things, such as wages, terms and conditions, differentials between various shifts and, of course, the matter of—well, I do not know whether it is jurisdiction or not, but it dealt with the containers and the stuffing and destuffing of the containers.

When we get into Committee of the Whole, I am sure that more precise answers to questions such as those asked by my honourable friend will be forthcoming.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Could the minister tell us whether wages are the only thing in dispute now, and, if so, how far apart the parties are on that issue?

Senator Olson: It may be that wages are in dispute. I suppose that the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union rejected the total package of the report, but it may be that we can obtain some enlightenment on that as soon as we get into Committee of the Whole. However, I think it is a bigger issue than simply wages.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, the legislation before this House today is emergency legislation that is used by Parliament when there is no other appropriate and effective way to remedy a situation. Only when all other means have been exhausted does a government decide to table emergency legislation in Parliament.

Actually, this particular bill negates the basic principles of labour relations. It denies the right to strike, a right that has been recognized for some time by our Labour Code and was recently entrenched in the Charter of Rights, passed by Parliament, which recognizes the right of association and also acknowledges the right to strike as the sole effective course open to union members when all other means have failed.

If we pass this bill this evening, we shall be denying a group of employees a basic right, namely the right to strike under certain conditions.

The leader of the government said earlier that the Minister of Labour and his senior officials had been involved for quite some time in attempts to get the parties to the negotiating table and to agree to a compromise and settlement formula, but I feel that the question put by my colleague, Senator Balfour, is very important.

I think that if the Minister of Labour had personally offered to intercede, an appropriate solution might have been forthcoming and there would be no need today to resort to emergency legislation. I say "might", and in fact the procedure has been successful in the past. I would remind the minister that in 1979, shortly after the then Minister of Labour, Mr. Lincoln Alexander, was sworn in, a similar conflict occurred in the Vancouver area. By interceding personally for several days in this dispute, the minister, without introducing emergency legislation and without calling back Parliament, managed to resolve a dispute that had been going on for some time.

Like Senator Balfour, I am convinced that if the Minister of Labour had offered to intercede personally, today's emergency legislation would not be necessary.

I would like to ask the minister once more, and I believe this is going to be an important point in the debate we shall have this evening regarding the immediate passage of this emergency legislation: Can the minister prove to us, can he convince us that the Minister of Labour has personally used all the avenues open to him in order to try to resolve this dispute?

[English]

Senator Olson: Yes, I think it is fair to say that the Minister of Labour has made every possible effort—a very sincere and competent effort—to arrive at a settlement to this dispute, short of bringing in legislation that would end the lockout.

● (2130)

Senator Asselin: There is no proof of that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we thank the Leader of the Government for his recitation of the notes that were provided him. Because he is not the Minister of Labour and is not that familiar with the situation in Vancouver Harbour, we did not expect him to have full knowledge of the subject, but he has provided us with the essential facts of the matter.

Those essential facts are, first, that there is a strike in Vancouver that cannot be allowed to continue; secondly, that resumption of the longshoring operations has to take place as soon as possible; and, thirdly, that the conditions under which the longshoremen should go back to work have been provided by this legislation.

Generally speaking, I do not think there is anybody in this country—I would even include a great majority of the union members—who feels that this situation out west can be allowed to continue. The question is whether the conditions under which this legislation orders the men back to work provide a real solution and are in keeping with those circumstances.

Senator Asselin mentioned that this is emergency legislation. It has never been satisfactory, in my experience, to deal quickly with a bill of this kind. The bill was tabled last evening in the House of Commons. No one knew exactly what the intention of the government was until late yesterday, and the House of Commons was forced to proceed with haste this afternoon because of the urgency of the matter. The bill received second reading, was referred to the Committee of the Whole and received third reading at approximately 8.30 p.m.

We are now being asked to do practically the same thing—deal with this bill very quickly. I do not believe there is anybody who, in that short a time, can appreciate the consequences of what we are being asked to decide in this chamber. On the whole, our judgment may not be wrong when we say that the strike has to end and that work should be resumed. But the conditions under which we force these men back to work may be beyond the capacity of Parliament to assess properly. That has been my experience on previous occasions in dealing with similar situations.

The principle embodied in Bill C-137 is twofold: the resumption of operations; and the conditions that union members and, indirectly, employers must face with the resumption of these operations.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Directly for the employers too.

Senator Flynn: I am not prepared to say directly and I will make some comments about that later.

You need not convince anybody of the necessity, under the circumstances, of acting. But the government has had the problem before it for quite some time. Many questions have been addressed to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board on this matter. But, suddenly, when the government is ready to proceed, Parliament has to rush through the legislation. The wisdom of the legislation before us is not beyond question. This government has too often manifested its lack of judgment for us not to be leary. This is a tired government, not above dealing in a very expedient manner with any manner of problem.

That a resumption of work is required presents no problem. But the question is, what are we proposing in this legislation as the conditions surrounding that return to work?

Clause 3(2) under the title of "Longshoring Operations" reads as follows:

On resumption of longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast of Canada, the terms and conditions of employment under the collective agreement to which this Act applies shall apply until

(a) a revised collective agreement extending at least to December 31, 1983 is entered into by the employers association and the Union, or

(b) section 4 is proclaimed in force,—

We know that it has been impossible for the union and the employers to reach a collective agreement. We heard the Leader of the Government explain the report of the mediator. The process has been going on for several months. I believe it began in April, if I recall correctly what the Leader of the Government said.

Senator Olson: It began in March.

Senator Flynn: It began as early as March, as the leader says, and no agreement has been reached. I recall that at one point the mediator recommended increases of wages of 12.4 per cent for the first year, 10.6 per cent for the second year, and a reopening of the wages clauses for the third year. That was not acceptable to the union. Could a collective agreement be reached now after a forced resumption of operations? I believe not. I would suggest to the Leader of the Government and his colleagues that, with the operation of paragraph (b), this would be completely impossible because the application of clause 4 would mean that section 3 of the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act would be amended by adding thereto, immediately after subsection (3) thereof, the following subsection:

● (2140)

"(3.1) This Part applies to persons who were ordinarily employed under a collective agreement that expired on December 31, 1981 in non-supervisory longshoring or related operations at any port on the west coast of Canada by any company that is, on the day this subsection comes into force, a member of the British Columbia Maritime Employers Association."

What does that mean? There is no agreement between the parties, none has been reached at this time, and there is no indication that one could be reached. If they do not reach an agreement, they will come under the six-and-five policy of the government, which was applied to the public sector through legislation.

I ask you: What interest do the employers have in reaching an agreement? The mediator has recommended a 12.4 per cent and a 10.6 per cent increase for the first two years. We are now saying that, if they do not reach an agreement, we will impose the 6-and-5 legislation. That is exactly half of what was suggested by the mediator.

The offer was rejected by the employees, but it is obvious that so far as the employers are concerned, they have no interest in reaching an agreement and would let the government take the responsibility of imposing on that small section of the private sector under the jurisdiction of the federal government the rules applicable to the public sector under the bill we passed a few months ago related to the 6 per cent and 5 per cent policy of the government. Unless the employers are very generous, I submit that they would not want to reach an agreement.

On the other hand, if any agreement were reached, it would mean that the employees would have to capitulate and say, "What we refused a few months ago we will now accept because of the fear that the government will impose the 6 per cent and 5 per cent formula on us."

As Senator Asselin has indicated, not only are we doing away with the principle of collective bargaining, but we are imposing on that group of employees conditions that were not meant to apply to them and conditions that were not known to them when the negotiations began in March, a long time before Mr. MacEachen came down with his 6 per cent and 5 per cent formula. At that time they were negotiating under conditions that were entirely different and had no relationship to the legislation which we now suggest should be applied to them. The conciliator, I'm sure, never mentioned legislation when he recommended the 12 per cent and 10 per cent adjustment for the first and second years. Yet here we are with legislation that threatens to enforce 6 per cent and 5 per cent, which is only half of what the mediator recommended.

It would be difficult to imagine that the government would want to impose these conditions upon the workers. I believe the government should have stated that the workers would not lose any of the benefits contained in the mediator's report. The recommendations of the mediator's report should be a minimum, but they are not; the minimum is 6 per cent and 5 per cent.

I cannot imagine how a government can proceed in this fashion because it is contrary to what has been done on previous occasions. During my first years in Parliament, specifically in 1959 when we had a problem of that kind dealing with the railway strike and the government had to intervene, Parliament was recalled and legislation was passed and, although the resumption of work was arranged, the matter was referred for collective agreement to an arbitration board. That is a sensible and fair proposal, but I would submit that it is not fair in a circumstance where there is no agreement and we simply apply the conditions applicable to the public sector.

I am sure that, when the east coast longshoremen see what has happened to their colleagues on the west coast, they will deal with the situation in another fashion. If they can reach an agreement for a 10 per cent, a 15 per cent or a 20 per cent increase on the east coast, it will be legal and acceptable. But the longshoremen on the west coast will have had imposed on them a 6 per cent and 5 per cent increase.

If you think this is sensible, if you think this is fair, and if you think this is reasonable, then I capitulate—I give up.

Senator Frith: Good. I think it is reasonable.

Senator Flynn: I know you think it is reasonable for us to give up. That is exactly what the Leader of the Government has said. The only thing he is interested in is having government legislation passed whatever the consequences, and he would be only too happy if the opposition were as docile as is the government majority here. That is exactly what was suggested.

Senator Frith: No, it was not. I just thought I would never hear such a reasonable offer for capitulation although I did not really expect you would.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: I expected the deputy leader would understand the meaning of my capitulation.

Senator Roblin: He is a little dense.

Senator Frith: So now we get personal.

Senator Flynn: I was discarding the hope of any understanding by the government. I was not capitulating in the sense that I would accept the legislation or the argument of the Leader of the Government or even his deputy.

Senator Asselin: We will not give up the fight.

Senator Flynn: We are faced with a dilemma. We are in agreement with one of the principles of the bill, that is, the resumption of operations. But we cannot accept the conditions provided in this bill with regard to the terms under which the employees will be forced to return, with all the penalties that are provided thereafter.

What can we do at this stage of second reading? If we vote for the bill as it is, we, in a way, accept conditions that we consider unfair. The only way we can deal with this problem is to amend the bill. If it is amended to provide for arbitration, as was done in previous cases, then we can vote for it without any hesitation.

Were the government willing to accept that principle, replacing the application of that Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act by the usual formula of arbitration, then we would have no hesitation, and the bill could be passed very quickly on second reading and even in Committee of the Whole. I am sure the minister would be only too happy to see how co-operative we can be when the government is reasonable.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move:

That the bill be not now read a second time, but that it be amended by deleting paragraph (b) in subsection (2) of clause 3—

● (2150)

I should point out that clause 3(2)(b) is on page 3 and says: "section 4 is proclaimed in force, . . ." Those are the words to be deleted. To continue:

—and substituting therefor:

(b) failing such an agreement—

That means the agreement referred to in paragraph (a), the agreement that would be reached under normal conditions by agreement between the two parties involved. To continue:

(b) failing such an agreement being reached within 30 days from the coming into force of this Act, when a decision is made as hereinafter provided,

(i) The Minister of Labour shall, within 14 days appoint an arbitration board consisting of three members, of which Business, Labour and Government would each nominate one member, and refer to that Board the further extension of the term of the collective agreement to which this Act applies to include the period referred to in subsection 2(a)—

Which means until December 31, 1983:

—and all the matters relating to the amendment of the collective agreement that in the opinion of the arbitration board, at the time of its appointment, are in dispute between the employers association and the union; and provide for the form in which the decision of the arbitration board in respect of all matters referred to it shall be set forth.

(ii) The arbitration board has, with such modifications as the circumstances require, all the powers and duties of an arbitrator under section 157 of the Canada Labour Code.

(iii) Notwithstanding any other provision of the Act or of the Canada Labour Code, the arbitration board shall be required to decide all matters referred to it under this Act within sixty days of its appointment.

Perhaps I might add a few words. I have copies for everyone. They are in English only because I was restricted in the facilities at my disposal. I even had to borrow a secretary from an official of the Senate to help me prepare this. In order to explain the important factor in this amendment, I should say that we do not impose on the employees the special restraint act applicable to the public sector. We say "If you do not agree within 30 days, then the matter is referred to arbitration," in the way I have indicated, and the award of the arbitration board will finally govern the situation. I believe that is in conformity with precedent. I believe it is fair. It is difficult to imagine that the arbitration board would come with conditions that would be less than those provided in the mediator's report, with which Senator Olson said the employers were in general agreement. It is difficult to imagine that the arbitration board would not grant at least these minimum conditions. It would likely be more generous than the government which is prepared to give them only half of what the mediator provided. The six-and-five policy would apply only to this small part of the private sector, and not to others who might be in a similar economic situation.

Senator Argue said the other day that he would like the men to return in good spirits and make up for the time lost. Productivity could be increased if the men were happy in their work, whereas under this legislation I believe that only unhappiness will prevail. Even if there is a resumption of operations, I believe that productivity will suffer.

In any event, I would beg the government to consider the fairness of the proposal contained in this amendment. I am quite sure that the House, which is waiting for Royal Assent tonight, would approve these conditions, particularly if the government would say it does. I am sure that the official opposition, and even the NDP, would agree because it would be an advantage for the members of the union. I therefore commend the amendment to honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Flynn's motion raises a point of order. The motion in amendment as such is not out of order, but it may well be out of order at this stage. There is substantial authority for the position that amendments to provisions of a bill are irregular at the second reading stage. The reason given is that the second reading stage deals with the principle of the bill, and motions dealing with provisions of a bill should be made either on third reading or in Committee of the Whole.

However, I understand Senator Flynn's dilemma, because, if he felt that he could, I am sure that he would just as soon move his amendment in Committee of the Whole. I am not now speaking to the clearly expressed reason for the amendment. If I understand the honourable senator's position on the procedural side, it is that he feels that he must make this motion at this stage because he does not want to vote on the principle of the bill if it includes this second principle, namely, the imposition of the amount rather than reference to arbitration. If it could be understood that any vote on second reading refers only to the principle of settling the strike, then, in my respectful submission, the motion of Senator Flynn would more regularly and properly be moved in Committee of the Whole or at the third reading stage.

Without going into detail, the references will be found in Bourinot at page 225, and the principles I have mentioned are set out in paragraph 740. It refers only to three types of amendment that may be proposed at the second reading stage of a bill. They are the six months' hoist, the reasoned amendment, and referral of the subject matter to a committee. I had hoped that the third category might cover the present situation, but as I read on I found that the one referral to a committee that cannot be moved is to a Committee of the Whole.

However, there are other references that I could cite from Bourinot and Erskine May to the same effect. I understand the background and the principle behind Senator Flynn's amendment, and I hope that we shall have an opportunity to vote on it. I would hope that we can find a solution to the point of order that, in my submission, the amendment is out of order at this stage but would be perfectly in order in Committee of the Whole. If it could be clearly understood that the vote on second reading refers only to the principle of settling the strike and not to the other principle, then I believe we could move quickly to Committee of the Whole and immediately deal with Senator Flynn's amendment.

● (2200)

Senator Flynn: As the deputy leader knows, we on this side of the house are always willing to co-operate when the government side is reasonable. For once, I think that the deputy leader is proving to be reasonable. If he tells me that at the stage of Committee of the Whole he will not raise any objections to the validity of the amendment I have moved, I will withdraw it at this time. The only problem we face is how to vote on second reading. Personally, I would say that we have to abstain because of the cloud surrounding the principles of the bill.

Senator Olson: Pass it, on division.

Senator Frith: Senator Olson says that we should pass it on division, but, with respect, I think that Senator Flynn will not accept that suggestion because it will indicate that he is voting against the principle of the strike settlement, and he does not want to vote against that particular principle. I suggest that we proceed exactly as he suggested. I can tell him that not only will I not object to the regularity of the amendment in Committee of the Whole, but I will support its regularity against anyone who makes such an objection.

Senator Flynn: Then I withdraw the amendment.

Senator Frith: That is, subject to these conditions.

Senator Flynn: And with the consent of Senator Godfrey. Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that this bill be now referred to Committee of the Whole.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Senator Everett, in the Chair.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Charles L. Caccia, P.C., Minister of Labour, was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

● (2210)

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole to take into consideration Bill C-137. We are honoured to have with us the Minister of Labour, the Honourable Charles Caccia.

Have you an opening statement, Mr. Caccia?

Hon. Charles L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that I have an opening statement to make. It seems to me that Senator Olson made all the relevant points in his speech.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Caccia.

Bill C-137 is an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast of Canada.

Shall discussion on the title of the bill be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Frith.]

The Chairman: The short title of this bill is found in clause 1:

This Act may be cited as the West Coast Ports Operations Act, 1982.

Shall consideration of clause 1, the short title, be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Clause 2, Interpretation. Definitions. "Collective agreement to which this Act applies"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: "Company"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: "Employers association"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: "Lockout"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: "Strike"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: "Union" and "the Union"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: "Words and expressions"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Does clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Part I, Longshoring Operations.

Clause 3, "Resumption of operations and work"?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

Senator Flynn: No, not too quickly. I should like to state to the minister that we are happy to see him with us. We are sorry that one of the first decisions he has to make as Minister of Labour is the one embodied in this legislation. I am quite sure that he would have preferred not to have to bring this kind of legislation before Parliament. Perhaps he will tell us if he tried to intervene personally to settle this matter, or if he left all of the responsibility to the mediator or other officials of his department.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, it is a good practice and tradition in this ministry to find out, first of all, whether your services are needed and whether they are welcome. If I had felt that my services would have helped in bringing the matter to a solution, I would certainly have stepped in personally.

Senator Asselin: You did not?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Before doing so, however, I would weigh the matter very carefully because I would know that in the next dispute the services of the minister might again be requested by the parties involved, and so on and so forth.

In this particular case the answer is that I have not participated personally in negotiations. I felt that the matter had been dealt with at various stages by competent people and that, if on the basis of the assessment of the situation in recent weeks, it would have been our conclusion that personal intervention would have helped, I would certainly have done so.

Senator Roblin: I should like to refer to a point that was raised earlier, namely the arbitrator's recommendations of August 13. Could the minister tell us what the fate of his recommendations was? We were told previously that they were accepted by the employers but rejected as a package by the employees. The indication was that there were some items that the employees would accept and others that they wanted further negotiations on. Is that understanding of the situation correct? If it is, what are the points at issue today?

● (2220)

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, there are no arbitrator's recommendations as of August 13. There is a conciliation commissioner's report which contains recommendations.

Senator Roblin: Is there a substantial difference?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: There is certainly a substantial difference. Secondly, Mr. Chairman—

Senator Roblin: What are they?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: —the recommendations are at this moment before the two parties and contain a number of considerations dealing with, not simply monetary matters but matters regarding productivity of the harbour. They also deal with matters related to fringe benefits, overtime payment, training, and the disposition of part-time employees as seen fit by the employer.

It is a fairly comprehensive report. I imagine that parts of it have already been brought to the attention of the Senate, but there is a portion of it that I should like to bring to the attention of honourable senators, because the conciliation commissioner made some observations in his report which have relevance to the matter before us. I quote from Commissioner Hope's report:

I consider that the existence of high unemployment and low national productivity has generated a public mood that would find a disruption of our ports intolerable. I consider it likely the national policy would reflect this mood, and that intervention would be swift in any dispute that ties up the waterfronts. I pointed out in particular the national policy now anticipated diminished expectation of wage negotiations with the guidelines recommending increases limited to 6 and 5 per cent over the next two years.

I have recommended wage increases that exceed those guidelines. I made those recommendations in response to the move by the employers to achieve significant concessions from the unions in terms of working conditions and job jurisdiction. I speak particularly of the training of casual employees and the expansion of container traffic, the introduction of container operations, the control of regular work force rotation, and telephone dispatch.

The union has made considerable concessions in those areas, but only on the expectation of acceptance of its wage package and the introduction of a day shift premium.

I consider it essential that those concessions be recognized in my recommendation as to wages.

The union proposal is beyond reasonable expectation in the current climate, but significant recognition must be given to what the union is being asked to accept in other aspects of the agreement.

In addressing the issue of intervention, I emphasize the possibility, if not the probability, that guidelines would be imposed to the detriment of the self-interest of both parties.

In the application of the guidelines, one would anticipate maintenance of the status quo on all issues except wages, with wages limited to 6 and 5 per cent for the guideline.

I repeat, I did not purport to speak on behalf of the government, but simply to point out the obvious, that the restraint program of 6 and 5 per cent, with no change in other terms and conditions, was a possible result of any imposed settlement.

My purpose was to urge the parties to continue to negotiate a settlement within the industrial relations milieu as the surest means of achieving their goals in some form of acceptable compromise.

Mr. Chairman, I would simply add that the bill before honourable senators endeavours to provide a window—and by that I mean an option—of five days for the parties to the dispute to look once again at the recommendations of the commissioner, to see whether they can find a solution to their dispute within that time period. Failing that, of course, at midnight on Monday the government will have to implement its restraint program as outlined in the bill itself.

● (2230)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister to clarify a few points for me? He tells us that the arbitrator, or whatever his correct title is, recommended salary increases of 12 and 10 per cent. In that package were a number of other considerations which apparently were thought to counterbalance the size of those wage recommendations on the part of the employers. However, the bill itself speaks of 6 and 5 per cent unless an agreement is reached. What happens to the other points at issue such as destuffing and so on which are not mentioned in the bill? Are they allowed to fall by the wayside? Are there any arrangements made for dealing with those particular issues?

I think it boils down to the point made by my leader that if 6 and 5 per cent is mandated by the government, is there any reasonable expectation that negotiations will continue that will go beyond those wage rates, or are we in a position where the issue is pre-empted by this unilateral imposition of 6 and 5 per cent by a third party?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, I think the honourable senator is questioning along these lines because it points to the sincere hope on the part of the government that the five-day window, which I referred to earlier, will be of sufficient length as I think it is for the parties in the dispute, to look at all the recommendations while they are still before them. These recommendations are important because they deal with the long-term efficiency and productivity of the harbour.

It is our hope, of course, that the matter will be resolved between the employers and the union, taking into account the totality of the interests that are before them.

Senator Roblin: Is that not the triumph of hope over experience? Is not the experience of labour relations in this particular issue a difficult one? Is it not a fact that over the last ten years or so, with one exception, the labour disputes in this port have been settled by government intervention? What makes the minister think that it will be any different this time or that because he has offered this breathing space that anything will happen when he himself is mandating 6 and 5 per cent? What becomes of collective bargaining? Surely that is an established principle of the Canadian industrial society. Is it necessary to go this length to frustrate the normal collective bargaining principle to get the port back into operation? We agree that the port should be brought back into operation, but is it necessary to take this step?

On previous occasions and in other situations we know that we have proceeded differently. We have not had a guillotine as we have had in this bill. We have had a procedure to enable collective bargaining to proceed, a procedure whereby we have been able to have conciliation and arbitration introduced into the issue, so that while we secured the return of the port to a functioning operation, we did so in terms that did not do such violence to the collective bargaining principle as this bill happens to do this evening.

I support the minister and the government in their desire to get this port back in operation. I consider that to be essential, and to that extent I would be happy to lend whatever support I can to the issue before us. But I ask my honourable friend: Why was it necessary to impose the six-and-five per cent when it could have been just as easily decided to go to some form of arbitration which would have done less violence to the principle of collective bargaining, which is an accepted principle of our industrial relationship?

● (2240)

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, the measure of the six-and-five per cent will come into effect after the two parties have had another opportunity to look at the recommendations of the commissioner. It may seem to be a Draconian step, but the onus is put on the shoulders of the two parties, as it should be. In the experience and in the tradition of collective bargaining, the matter is put squarely back on the shoulders of the two parties to the dispute.

We are asking them to make a final effort. We think the commissioner's report contains all of the recommendations necessary for them to come to a reasonable and satisfactory solution.

The honourable senator wants the government to act, and the government is giving leadership. It is acting, and it is acting in the interests of a community that includes the harbours on the west coast plus the industries and workers affected in almost four provinces.

Perhaps, to add a lighter note, as you know, the name of the conciliation commissioner is Mr. Hope, and perhaps hope will prevail over experience.

Senator Flynn: I do not know what hope we can have now.

Senator Roblin: I come from a part of the world that has a very direct economic interest in the working of the transportation system in Canada generally. The farmers of Manitoba use the port of Thunder Bay by and large but, nevertheless, I share the concern of western Canadian agriculture, generally, with respect to the effective operation of the port of Vancouver.

Therefore, I support the principle that brings that port back into operation, but why do you load the dice? Why do you refrain from taking advantage of a more conciliatory course that would enable arbitration to be brought into this issue rather than imposing the six-and-five per cent which really has a guillotine effect?

I do not see what advantage to the national interest can be gained by cutting short the collective bargaining process after the port is operational again. Get the port working and then there will be room for this conciliation that my honourable friend speaks of—which he is going to limit to five days. If there is no resolution after five days, he is going to drop the six-and-five per cent guillotine.

We have heard several eloquent, hopeful and convincing statements from the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. He explained to us his experience of last year at Thunder Bay where they were able to settle the matter in a less confrontational way than we are being asked to do this evening. He reported that the people of that port returned to their work with zest and got the grain moving. Does anyone think that sort of thing is likely to happen in Vancouver if we include this six-and-five per cent proposition?

I suggest that this arbitrary measure is counterproductive. It is not needed to get the port back to work, which is the essential public interest factor. It is unnecessarily violent to the principle of collective bargaining, and is simply the wrong way to go about this.

Why does the minister not re-think the matter and resolve it in a manner which is more congenial to our general way of settling these matters?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, thousands of railway workers are now under the six-and-five régime, as the honourable senator knows. A number of workers are affected by the present situation. We are acting under a restraint situation.

In this particular case, we are offering two options: One, to reconsider for the last time Commissioner Hope's recommendations between now and Monday night; and, two, following that, regretfully, to impose the six-and-five régime.

I think the honourable senator would be hard-pressed to come up with an approach that is more consistent with the commitment the government has already made to the six-and-five régime.

Senator Roblin: I do not know whether I would be hard-pressed as my honourable friend seems to suggest; it would not cause me any trouble at all. When we have had the psychological effect of the government's own conciliator talking about 12 per cent and 10 per cent—and I do not overlook the other factors in the recommendations he made—it seems pretty hard to say that the only way to go is the six-and-five régime.

The point we are making here is that there should be a resort to arbitration in this matter, which would be less harmful to the public interest as a whole than the rather arbitrary provision of clause 4 of this bill.

● (2250)

I have said the same thing three times, and it would be counterproductive to say it a fourth, so I will try to restrain my comments further on this matter. The minister leaves me quite unconvinced. He leaves me feeling that he has been persuaded by someone—I am not sure whom—to take a harsher line than the circumstances require. What the public interest requires is that the port should be working again. After it is working again, then one can surely be generous in providing a system of arbitration for the problems at issue, which would probably be more acceptable to the employers than what is being done now, to say nothing of the employees—because what is being done now with the six-and-five not only will result in a sulky and sullen work force, I am sorry to predict, but we will also find that the employers' points that they wish to make, about destuffing and jurisdiction, and the use of the port of Vancouver versus Seattle, are also left in limbo without any prospect of a harmonious solution, and that cannot be good for the Canadian economy, for the employers or for the employees. It is not the right way to go.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is the opinion of Senator Roblin—

Senator Smith: It is also my opinion.

Senator Olson: One or two other things should be said in reply to the assertion of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that we are doing damage to the collective bargaining process. The fact remains that if the collective bargaining process had worked, the bill would never have come here. The collective bargaining process has not produced an agreement. That is clear. It should be obvious. Therefore, as unpalatable as it may be to deal with these kinds of things, that is why the bill is here, because there is a lockout and a shutdown.

My honourable friend wants to make the other argument, unfortunately, that instead of the régime that is described in clause 4, we should set up a compulsory arbitration process—in other words, name an arbitrator and give him or her the right to impose compulsory arbitration. I believe that the Minister of Labour is being eminently more fair than that. He is giving the two sides an opportunity to come together on all of the conditions that are involved in this dispute, because there are others. My honourable friends opposite do not yet seem to have grasped the significance of those other matters that are involved. There are some advantages to the employers as well as to the employees association.

Senator Flynn: I can see that for the employers.

Senator Olson: It seems to me that the minister is being extremely fair in putting this in the terms contained in the bill.

Senator Frith: If I understand the essence of Senator Roblin's argument, it is that in effect this clause imposes six-and-five.

Senator Smith: Certainly it does.

Senator Frith: That does not seem to me to be true. I understand that the employers accepted the conciliation report at 12 per cent. So the employees simply need to say, "Okay, we accept it", and they get the 12 per cent.

Senator Flynn: No, you are wrong.

Senator Frith: Are you saying no?

Senator Flynn: You did not hear the minister. He said that he is resigned to the application of the restraint—

Senator Frith: I am not talking about that; I am talking about Senator Roblin's argument, which is that because of this clause the union must accept six-and-five. I say they need not accept six-and-five, because the employers have already accepted more, and all they need to do is stand up and say "Okay, we accept the report," and they can make an agreement.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: You say no, but that's it.

Senator Smith: Surely that is not the way things work. Employers are not bound because of what they did or said about the conciliation report. As I understand it, the whole subject is open to negotiation.

Senator Frith: The point is that there is room for negotiation. You are saying that there is no room for negotiation.

Senator Smith: How can you expect an employer to negotiate when he is assured that he can get a settlement for half the increase the board offered? I have never seen such a distorted picture in all my time here observing distortions of many kinds. I cannot understand how anyone can fail to see that this provision is simply coming down on the side of the employers with respect to this negotiation. All they have to do is sit tight for five days, or whatever the time is, and they are assured that the greatest increase in pay they will have to offer is the six-and-five. In fact, they will not even have to offer that because the government will do it for them.

● (2300)

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I think there is something more to this matter than what Senator Smith has just said. There is more encouragement than what has been described for the employers to agree, even to the 12 and 10 per cent settlement. It is true that the employers can sit it out and receive the six-and-five rate. The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but if the employers are willing to negotiate and are willing to accept the 12 and 10 per cent increase, which is the higher increase, the employers have something to gain by the report itself in that there is a suggestion that there should be a reduction in the shift differential for the graveyard shift and also for the night shift as well as the recommendations with regard to hiring casual employees and the stuffing and destuffing of containers. So, there is within this report what the conciliator, Mr. Hope, believes at any rate, to be a good deal for everybody. If the employees wish to accept the report in its entirety, my judgment is that the employers would settle and that a general settlement would ensue.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, would the minister indicate to us whether the employers' offer of 10 and 12 per cent is locked in or do they have the option of withdrawing it and negotiating a lesser amount? If the 10 and 12 per cent settlement is the locked and fixed position of the employers, obviously, the employees are not in the position we think they are. But if the employers can take back that 10 and 12 per cent increase and start from scratch again, then everything Senator Roblin has said is absolutely accurate. Which of the two positions is correct? Is the 10 and 12 per cent offer a locked offer on which they cannot renege?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators seem to have the impression that I am here to interpret the positions on either side of the dispute. That is not the case. All I can say to that question is that the employers have in the past accepted the wage proposals of Commissioner Hope.

Senator Flynn: But they are not bound.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: But some honourable senators seem to be making a wrong assumption and we seem to be in the realm of assumptions and hypothetical questions tonight. That wrong assumption is that there is no incentive for the employers on the productivity side. There is quite an incentive for the employers to obtain the highest possible productivity level in the package. So the position of the employers is not, as some have assumed, in my judgment at least, crystallized around the six-and-five rule. Over the long run, it is in the interests of the employers and the harbour and, I submit, the union as well to increase the productivity of this harbour, to increase the clause on containers and to make it the best possible from the point of view of the employer and the point of view of the productivity of the harbour.

Therefore, to make the assumption that six-and-five is a matter that is final is, in my submission, a wrong assumption at this point.

Senator Flynn: But that is the legislation as you presented it.

Senator Frith: But there are advantages to the employer going to the 12 and 10 settlement.

Senator Asselin: There are two parties.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Frith: But other parts of the package are advantageous to them.

Senator Roblin: Order.

Senator Doody: I can appreciate the—

Senator Frith: This Committee of the Whole is fun, I must say.

Senator Doody: I wonder if Senator Frith could allow me a few moments and then he can carry on. I can appreciate the minister's concern with productivity. We are all very much in favour of it, and we had a discussion on that very subject earlier in this chamber today. I did not mean to imply that anyone was crystallized around the six-and-five rule, although that could very well be. What I was asking is: Is the 12 and 10 proposal a crystallized fact? Is that a fixed position to which the companies or employers have locked themselves, or do they have the option of withdrawing that offer from the table, or is it in effect now withdrawn and is it now an open situation again? I am not asking for speculation or for assumptions; I am simply asking for a statement of fact.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: To the best of our judgment, if the union said that they accept the Hope report, then it would seem to me that the employer would be in a difficult position to withdraw publicly from this matter.

Senator Smith: But all the employer has to do is sit and wait until the five days have elapsed.

Senator Roblin: That is loading the dice.

Senator Buckwold: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that members of the opposition have a conception of the problems out there.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Asselin: Here is the light.

Senator Buckwold: There go the trained seals again, yapping away.

Senator Flynn: You are one of them occasionally.

Senator Buckwold: Occasionally, but at least I am reasonable. The fact is that wages are not the only factor in this settlement.

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Buckwold: You agree with that.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: Productivity, control over working conditions and improvement of harbour working relationships are just as important to the employer.

The port is not a highly productive one and I think that even the opposition would agree with that. I suggest that, if there is a settlement, it will not be six-and-five because it is in the interest of the employers to use the counterbalance of improving training, differentials on different shifts, and so on. I am told that the differentials are so high that it is difficult to get people to work on the day shifts, because it is so profitable to work the late night shift or the overnight shift where one can be paid double time.

If I were an employer, I would be saying, "I am willing to give more money, but let's be reasonable on these other aspects." I would suggest to the honourable gentlemen on the other side that in this particular case the settlement will be higher than six-and-five. Whether it will be 10 and 12, I do not know. Personally, I hope not.

Senator Asselin: Why is the matter before Parliament if six-and-five is not the issue?

Senator Buckwold: Because no agreement has been reached. I have the feeling that with this so-called threat of six-and-five over them, they will get together and there will be no confrontation.

If the final agreement is six-and-five, we do not gain very much. All we will do is give the employees lower wage increases and have poor productivity and the problems that have been referred to by the Leader of the Opposition. I suggest that this is really a very reasonable way to take a look at the entire problem. If the employers are responsible, and I think they are, they will soon start negotiating and trading, as all people do, around the bargaining table to improve work conditions, increase wages and arrive at some quid pro quo. So I will not support the amendment because I think they have a very good package in front of them right now.

Senator Flynn: I did not expect you to support my amendment. I suppose we should all thank Senator Buckwold for sharing with us this privileged information. It has been a veritable revelation. Thank God for Senator Buckwold and his insight. We know very well that there are matters other than wages involved, but I suggest that the honourable senator read closely the bill of which he speaks. Clause 3(2)(a) reads:

a revised collective agreement extending at least to December 31, 1983 is entered into by the employers association and the Union—

That subclause refers not only to wages but to everything. The minister has just pointed out that the parties have until Monday to accept this package. The minister has also indicated that section 4 would come into operation if no agreement is reached by Monday, which is only a few days away. He has indicated that the decision of the government would be to impose the restraint legislation. That is what the minister has just said.

● (2310)

In any event, I am sure in my mind that if no agreement is reached—

Senator Buckwold says that he is sure one will be reached.

An Hon. Senator: Good luck!

Senator Flynn: Well, if he is sure of that, then why do we have legislation like this before us? The point I was making is that, suppose no agreement is reached before Monday and the government imposes the restraint legislation, what will happen, as Senator Roblin asked, to the other aspects of the collective agreement under this restraint legislation? Will it mean that the present collective agreement, in all other respects, will continue to apply? I don't know.

There is one sure thing, and that is that, if the government has to move as is provided in this bill, and the minister has indicated that he thought the government would have to move, the consequences will be that on the west coast they will be subject to 6-and-5, while at the same time the minister might say to the east coast, "If you want to negotiate for 12-and-10, you can do that. We will not intervene."

It is contradictory and self-defeating. He has said that if they want to have 12-and-10 and the employers agree, they can have that; but, at the same time the government is imposing in its legislation 6-and-5 because that is government policy. I cannot reconcile those two things, nor can I reconcile the possibility that on the west coast there would be 6-and-5 and elsewhere there could be an agreement providing for 12-and-10 or maybe even 15 or 20 per cent increases.

As the legislation stands, it is not true that the employers have to agree to pay 12 and 10 per cent. That is not in the legislation and, if they find any other reason for not signing an agreement before Monday, according to what is provided in this legislation the government has said that it will intervene.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I understand the position taken by Senator Flynn. However, it seems to me that there is one thing we can reasonably agree to, which is not quite so hard-edged, if I understand the facts. It is not true to say that the employers have nothing to do but sit and wait and they will get 6-and-5, and that that will give them everything they want.

Senator Roblin: No, that does not follow.

Senator Frith: No, it does not. That is what I have said. Let us understand that.

It is a fact that from now until Monday is a short time, but we must understand that if this legislation passes there is a real advantage to the union in accepting the whole report, including the wage portion. If they do that, there is an advantage—not a guarantee, but an advantage—to the employers as well. But some of us seem to be looking at this with the assumption that there would be no advantage whatsoever for the employer to do anything except sit and wait for 6-and-5.

As Senator Buckwold and others have pointed out, the fact is that they must consider what their options are if this legislation is passed. The union can say, "Look. If we don't do something, we will be stuck with 6-and-5." So the union will probably say, "We will accept the Hope report, all of it, including all of the things we have said up to now are against our interests, such as productivity, and so on. We will accept the whole works, including the 10-and-12."

All right. Let us say they do that. Then, with respect to the employers, there would also be an advantage, because in that case the employers would be in the position of having, first, the public opinion problem, which is not a serious problem, and, second, which is a serious point, the real advantage to them of knowing that, despite having to pay the 12-and-10, the rest of the package would have been accepted. In other words, they would say, "Okay. We will pay you the 12-and-10. We will not allow that 6-and-5 guillotine to come down, but you realize that you are accepting the whole thing. That means you are not having the double wages at night; you will have to accept Mr. Hope's recommendation with respect to more reasonable overtime; you will have to accept Mr. Hope's recommendation as to productivity."

The point is that if this legislation is passed, there is an advantage to both sides to negotiate. Whether they will or not, we don't know.

Senator Flynn: Hah! Hah!

Senator Frith: And you cannot laugh that off, Senator Flynn. It is a fact.

Senator Flynn: I am not laughing it off. I am laughing at you.

Senator Frith: But why do you laugh? Why would anyone, in considering the advantages of settling this strike, laugh at the fact that what I have said is true?

Senator Flynn: No, it is not true.

Senator Frith: Well, let me ask again where it is not true. There is an advantage.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: Well, let's forget it. I will not talk about it to Senator Flynn. He is not going to change his mind. I simply ask those who are looking for a way to support this legislation in its present form to realize that, if it is passed, there will be an advantage to both sides to negotiate, and it will improve their position and it will improve the efficiency of the port, and that will be desirable.

The result of 6-and-5 is not automatic. There will be a real incentive with this legislation for the parties to come to an agreement that is in the interests of the employers, of the employees, of the port and of the country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: I want to get back to this point: How far apart are the parties? Let us say that for the package deal there is a 10 and 12 per cent which the employers are prepared to accept. Have the union people indicated what they would be prepared to accept on that? Actually, there is room for negotiation. Why couldn't the employers come up somewhat, if it is not high enough? The 10-and-12 are not like the 6-and-5. They could be negotiated. If the employer was reasonable, then to get the rest of the package he should come up on what he is prepared to pay.

Senator Frith: Exactly; that is the whole point.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I have always been greatly impressed by the complete confidence of Senator Buckwold that he knows everything about everything. I have never been so impressed, however, when the moment has come for him to reveal that knowledge, and I certainly was not impressed when he revealed that knowledge tonight, if he had any.

[Senator Frith.]

What did he say that the rest of us do not know? It may have pleased him to say it, but it did not advance the knowledge of a single member of this house, I suggest, and certainly not the knowledge of anybody on this side. For those of you who wish to come to his defence, I would say he can well look after himself. He is no doubt now thinking up another confident assertion of his knowledge to respond to me.

Senator Godfrey: At least he doesn't get personal.

Senator Steuart: But he is thinking of it.

Senator Smith: If anybody wants to get personal with me, come on! One at a time.

Senator Buckwold: You are trying to give us some of your knowledge now.

Senator Smith: I don't boast about it. I only state what I think I know and leave it to others to decide whether it is right or not.

I would just like to ask the honourable gentlemen opposite to consider when, in any dispute—and there have been many in respect of this very same subject matter, not necessarily the very same points but the very same subject matter on the west coast and other instances throughout Canada when Parliament has been called upon to legislate a return to work—there was ever legislation of this kind. So far as I can recall, not on one of those occasions—and there have been many, many of them—did Parliament presume to fix the rate of remuneration or the conditions of work.

Senator Roblin: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: But that is exactly what they are doing now so far as wages go. They have said, "If you fellows don't do what we want you to do—namely, agree—we are going to say that you will be bound by the provisions of 6-and-5." If that is not fixing the rate of wages, then I would be very hard put to find a provision which would fix the rate.

● (2320)

Why has the government decided to abandon the many precedents of the past when a return to work was being forced? Why does it decide to abandon the matter of compulsory arbitration so that both sides would have an opportunity to place their argument before some agreed person or persons and take their chance on showing that person or those persons that their claims are right and just, and that they have some entitlement to have those claims considered when their remuneration and working conditions are being fixed by an arbitrator?

Again, I ask why the government has decided to adopt this method and abandon all precedents which, while I certainly do not recall all of them, I do recall in many cases worked very successfully and satisfactorily?

Is it because it wants to start this slow—or, perhaps, rapid—advance upon the whole of the private sector to impose 6 and 5 per cent wage controls? Is that what it is after? What other reason is there for it to depart from the precedents which have worked so well?

How can it possibly expect the workers to feel that they are being treated fairly and reasonably, and that their right to bargain is not being taken away from them?

They are not in a mood, I suspect, to be very tolerant of anything which they believe forces them to do something which will affect their earnings and the conditions under which they work—and I had better stick to their earnings, because that is what the 6 and 5 per cent is all about.

How do you expect them to return to work with the joy in their hearts that Senator Argue so vividly described as being the case when the people at Thunder Bay returned to work in the past?

Do you expect them to be inspired with a desire to set new production records? I cannot think of a worse way to persuade them to do that than to compel them to forgo what Parliament has always granted in similar instances in the past—that is, the right to arbitration.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, earlier Senator Smith inquired about imposition of terms in the past. To the best of our recollection, there were at least two instances when this was done by Parliament: in 1968, regarding the grain handlers; and in 1975, regarding the longshoremen in Montreal.

In answer to Senator Macdonald's question regarding how far apart the parties are, it is our understanding that the unions accept that part of Commissioner Hope's report that deals with wages; on the other hand, the employer is pursuing the totality of Commissioner Hope's report, which includes not only wages but also productivity. The last time we were able to establish it, that is where they were.

I should like to take this opportunity, once again, Mr. Chairman, to reinforce what I said earlier—that is, that there is more at stake here than just the settlement of wages. There is the whole question of making this harbour productive, and the whole question of an employer who is keen and anxious to come to an arrangement that includes the totality of the package, inclusive of the wages. Therefore, there are interests at stake here that look at the future of the harbour, and we think that this approach is the one that will prevail in the end, and that will bring about a settlement between the two parties by Monday evening.

That is why the bill is phrased in the manner it is, and we certainly commend it to honourable senators.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Labour in order to be entirely sure of what the government hopes will happen in this situation.

As drafted, the clause we are discussing right now places the two parties in somewhat of a dilemma. If they agree, the 6-and-5 rule does not apply. Suppose, for instance, that they agree on the basis of the Hope Report which recommends wage increases of 12 and 10 per cent and contains other clauses, especially those regarding productivity. In that case, the 6-and-5 policy is set aside. Is the government hoping that the two parties will agree, thus implicitly relinquishing its 6-and-5 policy?

On the other hand, if the government wants to take advantage of the situation to broaden the application of its 6-and-5 policy, in that case it will hope the parties will not agree.

What exactly does the government want? Does it want the parties to agree? In that case, agreement will be reached at the expense of the 6-and-5 policy, and the policy will cease to exist. Or else it hopes that the parties will not agree in order to save its policy.

What exactly are the government's intentions? What else does it want to happen, aside from an end to the work stoppage? What kind of solution does it want? Should the parties agree or should the government have a chance to extend the 6-and-5 policy?

Senator Asselin: Very good.

[English]

Hon. Mr. Caccia: I do not know, Mr. Chairman. The hope of the government is quite different from the one the honourable senator has mentioned.

Senator Flynn: What is it?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: It is a clear signal to the world that disputes be settled by the parties themselves without having Parliament intervene.

Senator Flynn: What do you mean by that?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: That the matter be resolved by the parties to the dispute, which is the way most cases are resolved. It is a strong signal to the world that the parties resolve the matter among themselves. That is the hope of the government.

Senator Tremblay: We are not discussing that now, since we have a bill before us. If we had no bill before us, of course, there would be no problem.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Until Monday night there is not.

Senator Doody: I wonder if the minister could explain something to me. It seems to me that in the dispute that is causing all the problems, the one this legislation is attempting to resolve, there are obviously two sides with two very different positions, which positions they could not resolve through arbitration, conciliation or what-have-you.

In the clause of the bill we are now dealing with, it clearly lays down the punishment for the employees if they do not come to an agreement by the specified date. They are told that the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act will apply to them; in other words, that 6-and-5 will be their lot if they do not come to an agreement.

Is there any onus or any liability on the employers at all? Is there any punishment for them if they do not come to an agreement, or in this case is the onus strictly on the employees?

● (2330)

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, the penalty that the employer would incur if agreement is not arrived at by Monday evening by the two parties in the dispute would be that the six-and-five would prevail and other matters—

Senator Flynn: It is not a penalty.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: —that are very dear to the employers, of course, would not be before them any longer, particularly the question of efficiency and productivity. There is a recommendation in the report by Commissioner Hope that says that for one year there should be a suspension of the stuffing and destuffing of containers. At the expiration of that time the procedure would be resumed, but perhaps this year of experimental approach would be extended which would increase productivity in the harbour.

Evidently, there are penalties and consequences to the employers. Therefore, there is an incentive for the employer to reach a solution which would induce him to accept wages—it has been indicated at least until recently—that would be well above six-and-five per cent because they have indicated they would accept 12 and 10 per cent—

Senator Asselin: The employers did not accept 12 and 10 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: —because they look at the totality of the operations in the harbour. Therefore, they would have an incentive not to incur any penalty as the honourable senator so well puts it.

Senator Flynn: There is no penalty there.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: The incentive would be to arrive at a solution which would include wages, as well as productivity clauses, and this is the point.

Senator Doody: I have a supplementary. I thank the minister for his answer because it really brings me to the nub of the question. I was pleased to hear him mention on several occasions the productivity question which is one that is of great concern to everyone who has given any thought to the economic condition that our country is in. With that in mind and with the certain knowledge that the government and the ministry is quite aware of the productivity problem, why have we not addressed some of these points in the bill? Why are we saying it is going to be six-and-five and that is it? Why are we going to forget productivity and all the other problems and wash our hands of what is really underneath all of this and legislate the magic six-and-five? It seems to me to be an easy way out that does not resolve any of the difficulties that are either inherent in the economy or inherent in this particular labour dispute.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: The answer would be valid if there would not be any provision for five days. That is why there are five days provided for in the bill.

Senator Asselin: They had three months before.

Senator Roblin: What a hope!

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, in response to some comments I made earlier, the minister said that he could recall at least two occasions on which the legislation forcing a return to work had also fixed, or dealt, with wages—I am not sure which phrase he used, but I believe it was “fixed the wages”. That is the phrase I was using in any case. I thank him for that information.

[Senator Caccia.]

Could he also provide us with the information as to how many times since 1955 legislation has been passed by Parliament forcing the resumption of work in labour disputes in which strikes have occurred, in order that we can assess the value of the precedent set on two occasions as compared with all the other occasions on which the wages were not fixed?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Are you asking since 1955?

Senator Smith: Or any other date you want to accept. If the exact figures are not immediately available, then I am sure the minister would be able to provide us with an estimate for some considerable period of years, and he can pick his own years.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Not only do I have to pick my own years, but I also have to pick from the memory of Mr. Kelly, who is present and who embodies an encyclopaedic knowledge on the subject. He informs me that as of 1955, it occurred 16 times.

Senator Smith: Is the minister saying that 16 times legislation has forced the resumption of work in labour disputes, and on two of those occasions the wages have been fixed by legislation?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: We have to go back to the original question of Senator Smith, Mr. Chairman, when he indicated that Parliament had never fixed the terms of wages. We, therefore, brought to his attention the fact that in 1968, with the grain handlers, and in 1975, with the longshoremen in Montreal, Parliament did fix the terms.

Senator Flynn: I will have to look that up. I do not think it compares with the present situation.

Senator Smith: I understood that and I thank the minister for that information. I understand that the encyclopaedic memory of the distinguished gentleman who is assisting the minister this evening is able to recall that over a certain period—and I am not sure what period that was—there was a total of 16 times when legislation forced the resumption of work. Therefore, twice out of 16 times, insofar as we have heard, legislation has also fixed the wage.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: That is correct.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, as was expected, I am going to move an amendment, but before I do that I should like to make two comments.

The minister has mentioned that failing an agreement before Monday evening the government would impose the restraint legislation. If an agreement cannot be reached, but there is agreement on many issues such as the 12 and 10 per cent increases, and even on the productivity and all the advantages that he mentioned, will he agree that the government has no alternative under this legislation but to impose the restraint legislation? It has no room to manoeuvre. It cannot impose all the conditions on which there would have been an agreement if there is not total agreement between the parties. I think the minister would have to agree that the legislation does not give him any room to manoeuvre or to settle that problem.

My second point is that he has been telling us how beneficial all the conditions that have been discussed in the mediator's report are, and that there is a lot of incentive for the parties to agree to these conditions. If the conditions are so beneficial to both the employees and the employers, why has the government not imposed these conditions instead of applying restraint legislation, and why has it not changed paragraph (b), for instance, to say if they fail to reach agreement before Monday then the conditions embodied in the mediator's report would apply? We discussed the bill at second reading before the minister was before us, and the problem is that he is imposing a solution which, in my opinion, is unfair and discriminatory because it would apply to one section of the private sector by not applying it to others.

• (2340)

Therefore, in order to find a better solution, using the experience of referring the matter to arbitration, I move that clause 3 be amended by deleting paragraph (b) in subclause (2) and substituting the following therefor—I will not read it again, but will send a copy to the minister, and he can peruse it.

I move that this amendment be made to clause 3.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Flynn, and seconded by Senator Roblin:

That Bill C-137, intituled: "An Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast of Canada," be amended by deleting paragraph (b) in subclause (2) of clause 3 and substituting the following therefor—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Chairman: Is there any discussion on the motion?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, at this point in time I do not want to have a great deal of discussion on the motion because I believe that even Senator Flynn would agree with me that the discussion we have just had did, in fact, deal with many of the reasons he has advanced for moving this kind of amendment.

I also believe the Minister of Labour has given a number of reasons why the clauses in the bill, as presented to the Senate, would be more useful in this situation than accepting the amendment.

Senator Flynn: Does the minister agree with the statement of the Leader of the Government in the Senate?

Senator Olson: Yes, he does.

Senator Flynn: Senator Olson is very helpful.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the amendment please say "yea."

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: Would all those opposed to the amendment say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Senator Flynn: A standing vote is required.

The Chairman: I have had a request for a standing vote. Would all those in favour of the amendment please rise?

Would all those opposed to the amendment please rise?

The Clerk Assistant of the Senate: Yeas 12. Nays 27. Abstentions 1.

The Chairman: The amendment is defeated.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I might just explain that I abstained because I perceive there may be a possible conflict, although it is very remote. However, it is sufficient that I do not wish to vote.

The Chairman: Thank you, senator.

Is clause 3 carried?

Senator Flynn: No. Carried on division.

The Chairman: On division.

Is clause 4, respecting the amendment to the Public Sector Compensation Restraint Act, carried?

Senator Flynn: On division.

The Chairman: Is clause 5, regarding the coming into force of the act, carried?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: It is not the coming into force of the act.

The Chairman: You are quite right. It refers to section 4. Is clause 5 carried, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Since the chairman has mentioned the coming into force of the act, I would point out to the minister that clause 3 states:

(1) Forthwith, on the coming into force of this Act—

Assuming that Royal Assent is given this evening, does that mean the employees will have to resume operations this evening? Is it the intention of the minister to enforce the act this evening, or to wait until tomorrow morning?

Senator Roblin: When does "forthwith" not mean "forthwith"?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: It would be handled by means of a despatch system that would come into effect with the morning shift, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Flynn: I can understand that, but is the minister saying that they do not intend to enforce the act before a reasonable delay of, say, five or six hours?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Until they get the despatch going.

Senator Flynn: So it is a flexible "forthwith."

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Yes.

Senator Frith: They have to know about it.

The Chairman: There was an amendment in the other place to clause 6, which reads as follows:

That clause 6 of Bill C-137 be amended by striking out lines 17 to 22 on page 4 and substituting the following:

and who is a member of a union;
 "employee organization" means a union;
 "employer" means a company.

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I believe that copies of those amendments were circulated to all senators, and that the bill from the other place appears before us in its amended form.

Senator Roblin: What is their purpose?

Senator Olson: We can get that explanation.

Senator Roblin: We would like to have it.

Senator Smith: What is their significance?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: These are technical amendments for the purpose of clarifying the definition in the case of "employee organization" and "employer." They are technical in substance, and their only purpose is to improve the quality of the definition.

Senator Roblin: I do not like to fuss about this, but "technical in substance" does not mean a thing to me.

I wish the minister would explain just what the technicality is. I do not know whether the original definition of "employee" still stands. The definition of "employee organization" is much abbreviated, and the reference to "Part I" is deleted. What is it all in aid of?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, as I recall, there was a preponderance of words. An effort was made to improve the clarity of the definitions by deleting words that were not necessary in the legislation. This was put forward as a technical amendment in the House of Commons, and it was carried without debate.

Senator Roblin: What is the meaning of the original wording which is:

"employee organization" means a union within the meaning of Part I;

What on earth is the meaning of "Part I"? What does the change mean? Is there some kind of union that is not within the meaning of Part I?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, evidently, by deleting the words, "meaning of Part I," the net result would be that the word "employer" applies to the entire bill and not just to Part I.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

Senator Flynn: You are not too fussy about drafting.

● (2350)

Senator Smith: With respect, I find it a little difficult to accept that. Surely the effect is that the words "within the meaning of Part I" are struck out, and then one reverts to the definition of "union", which is to be found on page 2, line 15. They were unnecessary words used by the draftsman in the first draft; but some keener draftsman has seen that they were unnecessary, because "union" is defined, and he decided that the words should be struck out.

[The Chairman.]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Clerk has pointed out to me that the definition of "union" and "employer" is not in Part I. The definition section is before Part I, which is on page 2. I imagine that is why they deleted the words "Part I" and left it so that "employee organizations" means union and "employer" means a company. That gets us back to the definition section. I believe it was necessary for clarification purposes.

Shall the clause be adopted as amended?

Senator Roblin: It is not amended by us. It has been amended by the other place. So when it comes to us it is in its pristine, genuine, unchanged form. So we do not have to worry about amendments.

The Chairman: I shall accept that. Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I have a question on clause 7. Could the minister tell me what is the maximum punishment? The clause quite clearly says that an order shall be made to provide for compliance with the act and any employer or employee organization that fails or refuses to comply with any order can be punished by the courts. Is there no maximum punishment for this? If an employee does not find himself in agreement with the five-and-six per cent magic formula, is it possible that he could be thrown in jail for the rest of his life?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that the court sets its own rules and its own standards of punishment.

Senator Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: In the case of contempt, it sets its own standards and rules, and its own penalties, in the application of this particular clause.

Senator Doody: I can appreciate the fact that the court has a discretion to apply its own punishment in matters of contempt of court. I am asking the minister whether it would not be more reasonable, since this bill deals with the settlement of a labour dispute, to provide for some maximum punishment in the case of an employee who feels that the five-and-six per cent is not compatible with a decent wage. Is he to be subjected to the contempt of court provisions of the criminal law rather than to the act itself?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, I repeat what I said earlier, that in the case of contempt the court sets its own provisions.

Senator Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Yes, it does.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Senator Roblin: It is a very poor way of doing it.

Senator Frith: It is in the discretion of the court.

Senator Flynn: It is provided in the law and is not fixed by the court.

Senator Asselin: The court is not making the law.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, could we leave that discussion and get on to clause 8?

Senator Roblin: Mr. Chairman, I want to express my opinion, for what it is worth. In my view, it is a mighty poor statute that does not describe the penalty with some accuracy. We have here a statute which some of us consider is slanted against a certain interest in connection with this matter, who may be expected to view the imposition of the statute with some unhappiness. Yet if they do not knuckle under, there is a penalty. Well, that is what laws are all about.

But why do we not specify what the penalty is? I have no idea what a contempt of court punishment is.

Senator Flynn: Nor has the minister.

Senator Roblin: I believe he could jail a person. I am not sure that he could fine them, but I seem to recall people going to jail for contempt of court. What does it mean and how long do they stay in jail? The idea of passing a bill with a penalty clause of this sort, and simply saying, "Let the court decide", is a poor way of legislating an offence against a statute in Canada.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the reason behind the fact that a court sets its own penalty for a contempt arises from the refusal to obey an injunction—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: The refusal to obey an injunction can depend on circumstances. There may be a number of reasons why a court's order is not obeyed. Therefore, the courts have always said, with reference to contempt, "We cite you for contempt of an order. You must come and explain, and try to purge your contempt, and we provide the conditions under which you have to purge your contempt."

An Hon. Senator: That has nothing to do with the bill.

Senator Frith: It has everything to do with the bill. They are not talking here about specifying a penalty for a breach of the statute. They have said that the application is made to the court on the basis of the court's order not having been obeyed, and therefore it is the tradition and the law that the court, in those circumstances, decides what it considers to be the appropriate penalty for contempt—

Senator Flynn: But there is a maximum.

Senator Frith: Perhaps I may be permitted to finish what I am about to say. We all know that Senator Flynn disagrees with me, but let me at least finish the sentence, so that we will know what it is that he disagrees with.

Senator Roblin: You have said it two or three times.

Senator Flynn: You said "the rules of the court".

Senator Frith: No, I did not. I said "the law." If the Leader of the Opposition does not agree with it, then he does not agree with the Law Reform Commission whose report was tabled in this house a day ago. That report said exactly the same thing as I am saying, namely, that in the case of an application that someone be cited for contempt of the court's order, the court reserves to itself what conditions it will impose with reference to that contempt.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, let us assume that the Deputy Leader of the Government is right—although it is an assumption that I find a little difficult to make. Is it not most reprehensible to leave a statute of this kind in limbo? Who knows what the court will do? If members of this house cannot judge what is the penalty for failing to obey an order, then how can an ordinary workmen be expected to know? What kind of statute is this? Is it not intended to be a statute to be understood by everyone, so that everyone will know the consequences of failing to obey what happens under it?

Senator Frith: It is the same as an injunction. In labour disputes it is very common to have that happen.

Senator Smith: I understand very well what the honourable gentleman is saying about an injunction in a labour dispute. I also understand his assertion with respect to the jurisdiction of the courts generally in matters of contempt if an order of the court is disobeyed—although I find it a little difficult to agree that he is right in that wide-sweeping assertion. However, I am not dealing with that particular point at the moment. I am asking the question: Who in this house, including the deputy leader himself, knows the maximum penalty that the court will be empowered to impose on someone who disobeys this order? No one knows, so how can an ordinary workman be expected to know? Why does not this bill set forth the maximum penalty, so that everyone will know the risks of punishment that he runs?

Senator Flynn: I do not want to leave on the record the reply of the Deputy Leader of the Government that the court has discretion to impose whatever penalty it wishes. If that were true, they could decide to hang anyone who was in contempt of court or fine them $1 million or $1. I am quite sure that the maximum penalty is provided in the legislation dealing with the Federal Court. Possibly there is discretion under the penalty, but not in the way the deputy leader described it. I do not want the record to be wrong merely because the deputy leader thinks that he has the answer.

● (0000)

Senator Frith: Let us not have the record wrong. The point is—as I think Senator Flynn realizes, and as I know Senator Smith realizes—that if the route of contempt of court is taken, as opposed to establishing a maximum penalty, the normal position is that the condition is established until the contempt is purged, as it is said.

Let us apply that rationale to this particular case. Suppose there is an allegation that an employer or an employee has not obeyed the provisions of the act. The application is made, the court makes an order that they shall observe the provisions of the act, and the condition that is applied is at their discretion.

Senator Flynn: No. I have never heard such ignorance of the law.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, on that same subject—and I do not have the advantage or the disadvantage of being a lawyer, as do the three senators who are having their learned dissertation back and forth on the points of law—the point I was getting at in the beginning is that this legislation is being aimed at a bunch of employees working on the docks in British Columbia.

Senator Frith: And employers.

Senator Doody: We dealt with that a little while ago.

Senator Frith: It is right in the act.

Senator Doody: Yes, but the opinion that I am about to put forward is that the employees would have far less access to definitions of the process of law as explained by Senator Frith. I do not disagree with one word that Senator Frith has said. I am sure that his dissertation on the law and the enforcement of contempt and so on is absolutely accurate in every detail, as are the other lawyers in this chamber who disagree with him. What I am saying is that an enforcement provision should not be included in the legislation because it does not spell out the penalties for those who might feel that the law is unjust. If the five and six per cent settlement is not acceptable to the employees, then they should be told what will happen to them if they disobey the law. I think this is rotten legislation, that the whole thing is poorly drafted and put together and an insult to the people to whom it is directed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it may be no answer, but the fact is that this clause is not that unusual. It has been included in many previous bills of the same kind, except that they referred to the Superior Court rather than the Federal Court. I am simply saying that I understand the position taken by honourable senators opposite, that they feel it would be preferable, with reference to breaches of the act, simply to say that anyone who is in breach of the statute will be subject to a penalty of “not less than” “and not exceeding,” and so on. I am simply saying that there is another way. It is the standard way. We found today that some honourable senators find it unsatisfactory.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, the deputy leader has failed completely to give us the reason why this course was chosen, why it was decided not to put the maximum penalty in the bill. Perhaps the minister will be able to give that explanation. At least we should be told why that course was chosen.

Senator Frith: I think we have to distinguish between an explanation that will perfectly satisfy Senator Smith and a simple explanation. I believe that the simple explanation is that this form of dealing with breaches of injunctions in labour disputes is a common one. In other words, if there is a labour dispute, it is not uncommon at all to make an application to the court for an order requiring someone to desist from picketing, illegal secondary lockouts or strikes, and so on. The court then makes an order saying, “Desist!” It does not say, “Under the maximum penalty, desisting or failing to desist will involve the following . . .” It simply says, “Desist!” and if they do not obey the mandatory injunction the course of action is to do exactly what is provided for in this statute. Then you come back to the court and say, “Look, the other party has not followed the court order and we want them cited for contempt.”

Senator Asselin: And the maximum penalty is cited.

Senator Frith: No, it is not. It is hopeless. They just keep saying no.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, what the deputy leader has failed to understand is that we are asking him, not for an explanation of the law of contempt of court but for an explanation as to why this method of punishment was inserted in the bill instead of inserting that the punishment would be a maximum fine or a maximum term of imprisonment. Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate would do better to leave the explanations to the minister who, no doubt, knows very well why this wording was included.

Senator Frith: Let me try once again. If I understand everything correctly, this method was chosen because it is the common way of dealing with breaches of collective agreements or laws relating to labour disputes outside of legislation. Up to now, it has been the method that has been followed in every case, voted upon in the Senate and approved in the Senate. That is not a good reason as to why it has to be done this way. I know what Senator Smith is saying and that he is not accepting my explanation. I am simply saying that there is a reason, and the reason is that there is a common way of dealing with infractions in labour disputes—that being the method used in all statutes of this kind, that we know of, up to the present time. That may not satisfy Senator Smith, but that is the reason.

Senator Smith: All I asked for was the reason this method was followed. If that is the reason, then the honourable senator has answered my question, even though it is a very shallow and unconvincing answer.

Senator Marshall: There are too many lawyers.

Senator Smith: I still think the deputy leader would have been better advised and more prudent to have left the answer to the minister.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 7 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 8 carry?

Senator Smith: Let us look at this clause for a moment. Clause 8(1) reads, in part:

On an application under section 7 for an order directed against an employer, it is sufficient proof that the employer has failed or refused to comply with a provision of this Act to show that an officer, director or agent of the employer failed or refused to comply with the provision, whether or not the officer, director or agent is identified—

It strikes me that that wording is rather peculiar. In the first place, how can you prove “that an officer, director or agent of the employer failed or refused to comply with the provision” if you cannot identify him? If you do not know who he is, how will you prove that he is "an officer, director or agent"? It seems to me that this is another bit of loose and woolly drafting that has no place in this sort of legislation or in any other sort of legislation. Perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate will give us the reason why or, perhaps even better, he will leave it to the minister.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, the identification of the agent by name is not necessary, and that is why the legislation is worded as it is. It is my recollection that this wording has been used in previous legislation of this kind.

Senator Smith: The clause does not really say whether or not the officer, or so on, is named; it says "identified"; that is, as an officer, agent or director. The provision does not merely say that if you failed to name him.

Senator Roblin: If you cannot identify him, how can you charge him?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Identification by name does not matter. What really matters is identification of the function of the agent, as such.

● (0005)

Senator Smith: I did not say, for a moment, that the identification by name was or should be required. What I said was that this provision does not require identification by name, but it also does not require identification by any means. You do not even have to know who he is or what he is doing.

Senator Roblin: It is a silly clause, let's face it.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, it was written on the advice of the law officers of the Crown.

Senator Roblin: That is the worst representation you could make to us.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: We have merely accepted their advice. It has been the practice in previous legislation, if I recall correctly, as recently as 1975. This is the way it is done in matters of this nature.

Senator Smith: Well, I thank the minister for his answer, which I take to mean that he does not know why it is there, but it is there because the Department of Justice put it there, or the draftsmen did. If that is the answer, again I accept the answer, although I find it difficult to accept the reasonableness of the answer.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, I have a supplementary to Senator Smith's question. I was puzzling over this matter earlier. Perhaps the minister or some of his legal advisers can tell me what the protection is here for the person who is accused. It seems to me that it has always been a defence to say, "That person is not my agent." The employer has the right to say that. "You say he is my agent. I say he is not."

But it says here that the agent, identified or otherwise, is guilty under this act. Is it not unusual just to name him as an agent and automatically have it assumed that he is culpable or liable under this legislation?

Am I adrift on this one, too? In other words, if the employer or the employee says, "The person you say is my agent is not my agent," the act says it does not matter. I do not have to identify him at all. If I say he is the agent, you are liable. Is that correct?

Senator Frith: No, you have to prove the agency.

Senator Doody: It does not say that here. I think you should hire a couple of new draftsmen.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: I would invite the honourable senator to read on to line 22, where it says, "without its knowledge or consent", and the following line as well, which reads, "and that it exercised all due diligence to prevent the failure or refusal."

Senator Smith: With all respect, that has not the slightest bit to do with the question Senator Doody raised and I raised. It has nothing to do with it at all. They only happen to be words in the same clause, but they do not bear any relationship at all to the question raised.

Senator Phillips: Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to discuss the point raised by Senator Smith. I would point out, honourable senators, that the same objection applies with respect to subclause (3) of clause 8, as applicable to the union. In my opinion, it would be virtually impossible, in particular for a union officer, to prove that an unidentified person or unidentified persons had refused to comply with section 7.

The minister stated that the idea was in the bill because the Department of Justice had placed it there. I suggest, honourable senators, that it might be appropriate for us to have an opinion from our own law officer. I had been looking for an opinion from someone, and I would have been quite content to take Senator Godfrey's opinion, but he left. So perhaps we could have an opinion from our own law officer.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow.

The Chairman: If there is no further discussion, shall clause 8 carry?

Senator Phillips: Mr. Chairman, I believe, if we are in Committee of the Whole, I am entitled to an opinion from the law officer. Could I have a ruling in that regard?

Senator Frith: One senator is not entitled to a ruling. He can make a motion to that effect.

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, if I may intervene, the minister has already indicated that the wording here has been cleared with the law officers of the Crown, who are the legal advisers to the government and to Parliament. That assurance has already been given to Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: But the lawyers of the Department of Justice, Senator Olson, are entirely different from the law officer of this chamber. It is his opinion I am interested in. I am not interested in the opinion of the lawyers from the Department of Justice.

The Chairman: It would seem to me, honourable senators, that Senator Phillips has the right at any time to consult the law officer on a matter of interpretation. Beyond that, I suppose it is possible for him to move a motion that we seek the opinion of the law officer, and that would go to a vote before the Senate, if that were his wish.

Senator Frith: It would go to a vote before the Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Before the committee, yes.

Senator Phillips: I so move.

The Chairman: Is there a seconder?

An Hon. Senator: He doesn't need a seconder in committee.

The Chairman: The Clerk advises me that he does, indeed, need a seconder in Committee of the Whole.

Senator Smith: I second the motion.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith, that the Senate in Committee of the Whole consult the law officer of the Senate as to the meaning in clause 8 of the words, "whether or not the officer, director or agent is identified".

Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Chairman: All those in favour say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Chairman: All those opposed say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion, the nays have it. Shall clause 8 be adopted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried, on division.

Shall schedule I be adopted?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall schedule II be adopted?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, be adopted?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Senator Roblin: Mr. Chairman, before the title is carried and you ask whether the bill shall be reported, perhaps I could raise an extraneous matter, which I am prompted to do because I see the minister here. But, first, may I say that, personally, I am glad that the minister has been here. He has been a help to us in our discussions tonight.

The fact is, however, that we are dealing with a problem which has recurred several times over the past ten years, particularly in the port of Vancouver but in the transportation field generally.

[The Chairman.]

Referring to the port of Vancouver, has the department given any consideration to conducting an inquiry, either by means of a royal commission or in some other impartial way, which could start to dig into the roots of these problems? It is no pleasure for the members of Parliament; it is not healthy for democracy; it is bad for collective bargaining, and for other factors the minister would be aware of, that we, in Parliament, should every two or three years be called together to legislate in respect of problems of this kind.

Has the department given any consideration to an investigation into the situation in the port of Vancouver, with a view to arriving at some solution which promises a better and healthier management-labour relationship there than we have had in the past and which would be conducive to the best interests of the whole country?

The Chairman: Mr. Caccia?

Hon. Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, because of the recurrence of this problem, one would be inclined to conclude that a solution, were it easily available, would already have been found, since this matter has come before Parliament on so many occasions.

• (0010)

As to the proposal for an inquiry at this point, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the closest we can get to an inquiry, and the benefit of one, is the report itself from Commissioner Hope. It is a thorough report, and I commend it to honourable senators, in particular the analysis of the issues at stake and his recommendations. At this point in time it seems to me that that is the closest we can get to an inquiry of that nature in terms of timing and practicality.

That does not preclude, however, in the future, if it is proven that an inquiry might be necessary and desirable, the government from looking into that possibility.

At this point in time, as I said, the report of Commissioner Hope comes closest to providing benefits that would be derived from the type of inquiry the honourable senator has just raised.

Senator Roblin: With respect, that is not my point. I appreciate that we have the report of Mr. Hope. It is obvious that it is a failure, or else we would not be here. It is clear that it has not worked, and we have had the same situation four or five times in connection with Vancouver.

Let us take that report for what it is worth, but it obviously does not meet the case, otherwise we would not have this bill before us.

I am asking the minister where we go from here, and I am suggesting to him that he should give some serious consideration to an impartial investigation into the problems which are chronic in the port of Vancouver, both on the management side and the labour side, and everybody knows that.

There could not be a more convincing demonstration of the point I am trying to make than the telegram the minister himself wrote—perhaps I am using the wrong word—the telegram that the minister himself signed that went to Vancouver with respect to this matter. That put the thing in a nutshell. It exposed the problem.

Let him consider the suggestion that he do something constructive about it so we do not have to do this more often.

Hon. Mr. Caccia: I will take to heart the substance as well as the tenor of the honourable senator's views and sentiments. We are certainly open to new ideas. However, I would not agree with him when he says that the commissioner's report has failed. The report has not failed because this is Wednesday, and there are still five days to go.

Senator Roblin: Good luck!

The Chairman: Shall the title be adopted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, on your behalf I should like to thank the minister and Mr. Kelly for their attendance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-137, to provide for the resumption and continuation of longshoring and related operations at ports on the west coast of Canada, has considered the said bill and has the honour to report the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

PENITENTIARY ACT PAROLE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-32, to amend the Penitentiary Act and Parole Act.

Bill read first time.

Senator Olson moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, November 9, 1982.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83 (NO. 2)

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

November 4, 1982

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which was referred Bill C-128, "An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority (No. 2)" has in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, November 3, 1982, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, honourable senators, later this day.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, unless we are not sitting next week, I do not see why third reading should not be given the bill next week.

Senator Frith: Agreed, honourable senators. I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, November 8, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Leave is granted, honourable senators, because otherwise we would have to sit tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Leave is granted, if I understand correctly, but perhaps I could make a few comments.

Honourable senators, you may have noticed that the motion is for adjournment until next Monday at eight o'clock in the evening. Perhaps honourable senators are already aware that the other place is going to sit next week on Monday, Tuesday and probably and almost certainly on Wednesday. The 11th, that is Thursday, is a holiday, and in the other place, they have decided not to sit on Friday, which they normally do otherwise. We, of course, do not sit on Friday in any case. Since we are now considering three "S" bills, as they say, and since there is a possibility that we will receive other legislation from the other place at the beginning of next week, including bills arising from last June's budget, the Leader of the Government in the Senate feels that it would be a good thing for the Senate to sit next week, even if only for two days. We would be sitting Monday evening at eight o'clock and Tuesday at two o'clock in the afternoon, as prescribed in the rules, but not necessarily Wednesday.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, without being indiscreet, I must say that we had discussed what would be happening next week, with Armistice Day on Thursday and the very light workload the Senate has at this time. The deputy leader mentioned three "S" bills. The bills are of course important in themselves, but there is nothing particularly urgent about them. Now there is talk of having the Senate come back for Monday evening and Tuesday, although there seemed to be agreement on both sides of this House that this was an excellent opportunity to allow senators to go home, test public opinion and participate in Armistice Day ceremonies.

and so forth, without having to come back for a day and a half. It would seem, however, that the decision announced by the deputy leader did not originate in the Senate. In fact, we may well ask ourselves whether the new Leader of the Government in the Senate is not merely dancing to the tune of the government house leader in the House of Commons. It seems to me that we should be able to organize our work here in the Senate without getting instructions from the other place. I have no objection to coming back Monday. I do not think anyone could say that I am a shirker, but I think the servile attitude of the new Leader of the Government is ridiculous, and I wonder whether we were not better off with Senator Perrault, which is saying a lot!

However, if that is the decision of the Leader of the Government, who is incapable of standing up for the wishes of the Senate as to the manner in which we want to organize our work, that is up to him. I warn him that there may be times when he will have trouble obtaining co-operation from this side of the House.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I guess I reject—

Senator Flynn: You don't have to guess; we know.

Senator Olson:—and perhaps even resent the insinuation or inference of the Leader of the Opposition that we are subservient—whatever was the term he used—to the house leader in the other place. I reject that argument.

Senator Flynn: Then why are you acting the way you are?

Senator Olson: We then come to the next stage of his argument, with which I completely disagree. He wants to make the argument that the Senate sits only when there are urgent matters to be dealt with. I agree that Bills S-30, S-31 and S-32 may not be so urgent that they have to be passed by a certain deadline, but I do not share the view of the Leader of the Opposition that we sit only when we have something that has to be dealt with urgently. These bills are important.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: These bills were introduced in this place and we have the obligation to attend to them. Whether the Leader of the Opposition likes it or not, it is a fact of our bicameral parliamentary structure that we are, and ought to be, in a position to receive bills once they pass third reading in the other place, and deal with them expeditiously.

I cannot guarantee that more legislation will come to us, nor can he guarantee that more legislation will not come to us early next week. In the meantime, there are some important bills before us, although they may not necessarily be urgent bills. If the Leader of the Opposition looks at Bill S-32 and realizes its implication and consequences, he will agree with me that it is important. Therefore, it does not have to be in the "urgent" category before we deal with it.

I agree with his further argument that honourable senators should have some time to get acquainted with people who live in their various regions, but I remind him that if we reach the point where we can adjourn next Tuesday afternoon, honourable senators will then have a whole week, from Tuesday until the following Tuesday evening, in which to visit their regions. In my view, from late next Tuesday afternoon until the following Tuesday evening is a reasonable adjournment. It is not an unreasonably short period.

Under those circumstances, I believe we should accept our responsibility, and that when we have important, although not urgent, legislation to deal with, we should sit.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: What the Leader of the Government has spouted is pure hot air. There is nothing substantial in what he has said. It is not worthy of the intelligence accorded him by the press. From the discussions we had, I concluded that we would return on Monday, November 15. We would have been here on the Monday night and all of Tuesday, which is exactly the same length of time that the Leader of the Government is requesting that the Senate sit next week. Some honourable senators from the west coast will be coming here just for Monday night and Tuesday, which is absolutely silly.

• (1420)

With regard to the honourable senator's argument that we should be here, of course, we should be here, but we should also arrange our business differently. Bills remain on the order paper in the other place for weeks and weeks.

Hon. G. I. Smith: For months.

Senator Flynn: Yes, and months. The time, however, is not wasted because we have time to reflect. I said yesterday when we considered the emergency legislation that that was not the way to deal with such measures, that we should have time to think matters over. Even if we do not debate the bills that are before us immediately, it does not mean that time is lost. It does not mean the Senate is not working. I say again to the Leader of the Government that he had better change his ways and not take his instructions from somewhere else. He should be discussing the matter of the arrangement of the sittings in the Senate—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition):—with us.

Senator Flynn:—with honourable senators. That is all I have to say today.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that the Leader of the Opposition is being a little unfair. He knows, for example, that—

Senator Flynn: Do not put forward silly arguments.

Senator Olson:—we have to make some progress on Bill S-30, Bill S-31 and Bill S-32 here, even before we can refer them to committee.

Senator Flynn: We cannot send them to committee next week?

Senator Olson: Perhaps we can, if we start on them this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Not with the sitting you have proposed. Come on, be serious.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Where is Bill S-31.

Senator Olson: Furthermore, I know better than, or, at least, as well as, the Leader of the Opposition that there will be or could be a number of committee meetings next week on various matters, and if we can sit today and Monday evening and Tuesday, it may be that we could have all three of those bills referred to committee.

Senator Flynn: No.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Forget about it.

Senator Olson: We are going to try to follow that procedure. If the opposition wants to hold things up then that is their privilege.

Senator Asselin: We will.

Senator Frith: They don't want to sit.

Senator Olson: The opposition is trying to convey the impression that it is the fault of the government, or of the Liberal Party, that bills are on the Order Paper for months in the other place. It is up to the opposition to dispose, and that has always been the case throughout the parliamentary careers of us all.

Senator Flynn: You can impose closure whenever you want to. Don't be silly.

Senator Olson: I want to cool the Leader of the Opposition off a little bit because I think that he, too, on reflection, will see the logic, reasonableness—

Senator Flynn: I can reflect, but you cannot seem to do it yourself.

Senator Olson: —and so, of sitting for two days next week and then adjourning for a full week, so that we can refer these important bills to committee and make the progress that the public of Canada expects us to make.

Senator Roblin: May I offer a suggestion to my honourable friend in connection with the business of the house? I agree with him that we have a legislative duty to proceed with all due diligence with the work that is put before us. But it seems to me that part of the apparatus to ensure that this duty is performed is a certain degree of communication between the two sides of the house, and that when we are arranging the business of this chamber it should not be delivered from on high, as my honourable friend seems to be in the habit of doing these days without any consultation or discussion with this side. He assumes that we are so unreasonable that we will not agree to anything, which I think is a mistake. I am sure, however, that he is making certain that we are not going to be easy to get along with by never consulting us.

Senator Olson: That is not true.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Frith: We have been talking about this matter every day for the last week.

Senator Roblin: When did my honourable friend consult with the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the proceedings on Bill S-30, Bill S-31 and Bill S-32? I do not think he has ever done so. If these bills should be disposed of in an expeditious manner, then it seems to me to be the part of prudence to secure the willing co-operation of all members of this house, instead of issuing these injunctions which we get, such as we have received this afternoon. I think that is a poor way to do business. It seems to me that the honourable senator will go a lot further if he solicits the co-operation of all sides of the chamber rather than delivering orders.

Senator Olson: I want to say unequivocally that I solicit the co-operation of the opposition all the time.

Senator Flynn: You mean approbation, not co-operation.

Senator Olson: I do not want to go into the private conversations that several of us have had and report them here publicly, but both the Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition know that there have been discussions prior to this time.

Senator Flynn: Yes, and you disregard them.

Senator Olson: And they also know—

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege.

Senator Olson: Let me finish my argument.

Senator Roblin: Just a minute. Sit down.

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Roblin: You have made a misstatement.

Senator Olson: No, I did not.

Senator Roblin: You said that you consulted with me in respect to this business.

Senator Olson: No, I said that—

Senator Roblin: You never have.

Senator Olson: Well, then—

• (1425)

Senator Roblin: Never!

Senator Olson: Then you and your leader don't communicate. That is your problem, not mine.

Senator Roblin: You said that you talked to me. You have not talked to me, and you know that you have not.

Senator Olson: I did not say that.

Senator Roblin: You should retract that statement.

Senator Olson: Why don't you sit down and listen? I did not say that.

Senator Flynn: You did.

Senator Roblin: You did say that.

Senator Olson: I said that you knew that there had been communications. That is what I said, and I still believe that.

Senator Roblin: That is also a falsehood.

Senator Olson: All right, if that is what you want to think.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend ought to retract those statements, for which he has no grounds whatsoever.

Senator Olson: If you deny it, then I have to reach the other conclusion, which is perfectly obvious, that you and your leader do not talk to each other.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on. Be serious.

Senator Olson: Anyhow, let me get down to the next important thing.

Senator Flynn: Don't make a fool of yourself. I think you have done enough of that already.

Senator Olson: I like to have cordial relations between the opposition and the house leader here. It has always been that way, but the Leader of the Opposition has to recall, if he wants to be accurate, that when we had some discussion about this there was not at the time a clear indication of whether there would be a week's adjournment from Wednesday next week.

Senator Flynn: You just want the government to tell you what to do.

Senator Olson: He knows that. That is a fact, and we have found that out since.

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Olson: Since then, however, honourable senators, we have introduced more government legislation in this house.

Senator Flynn: That is not the reason.

Senator Olson: That is also a fact that was not known at that time. I think it is also understandable that we have the responsibility to deal with this important legislation.

I want to say this, too—and I repeat it for emphasis—I do not believe it is unreasonable for us to suggest that we want to be in a position where we can deal with these three bills. If the opposition is disposed to refer them to committee, we can get on with it, and then we can adjourn on Tuesday afternoon for seven days.

Senator Flynn: We can do exactly the same thing the following week. In any event, if it is the will of the majority here to follow the whims of the government as expressed by the Leader of the Government, that is all right. That is their own business. If they want to swallow everything that is offered to them, that is up to them.

However, we are trying to see that the Senate is allowed to work in a reasonable and efficient way. If they do not care about that, but are ready to vote any time, anywhere, and in any way the government directs them to, that is fine with me.

An Hon. Senator: They are just following their orders.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I may make a brief intervention, I consider it a part of my duties, certainly, to consult with the opposition.

An Hon. Senator: You do, too.

Senator Flynn: You did, but to no avail.

Senator Frith: Sometimes it is of avail; sometimes it is not. But I want to make it clear that I do not consider it part of my duty in all cases to have the consent of the opposition to do everything I do.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: But I do consider it part of my duty to consult with them, and I do not think either Senator Flynn or Senator Roblin will say that I have not, on this business and on most matters, consulted both of them, particularly the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is not calling the shots, and I blame him for none of this.

Senator Frith: I simply wanted to point out that I do not operate on the basis of non-consultation. I will leave it at that.

Senator Roblin: But my honourable friend, unfortunately, has not much to communicate sometimes, until he has received his instructions.

Senator Olson: That is an unfair statement, but we will let it go.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I just want to speak for a moment of the alleged desire of the Leader of the Government to be co-operative in arranging the business of the house. I only want to say to him—if he would rather listen to his deputy than to me, I don't blame him, because his deputy will have more cordial things to say than I will, and, as I understand it, cordial things are all he wants to hear.

I should like to say to the honourable gentleman that since he assumed the distinguished position he now holds, which I congratulate him for attaining—

Senator Frith: Excuse me, honourable senators. I think that Senator Smith speaks quite clearly and normally quite audibly and I have no trouble, normally, in hearing what Senator Smith has to say. But I think, in fairness, it is also part of my duties to remind honourable senators that some of us, at least, want to hear what is being said.

● (1430)

I am sure that some of the conversations that take place are sufficiently interesting that they could form part of an intervention but, in the meantime, I should like to hear what Senator Smith has to say.

Senator Smith: I thank my honourable friend for his assistance. I appreciate that very much. His desire to hear what I have to say might be lessened if he knew what I am going to say.

All I want to say to the honourable gentleman is that since he has assumed the distinguished position he now occupies, his conduct towards this side of the house has not been such as to cause us to be warmed by any feeling that he wishes to be co-operative.

All I have been able to gather from his conduct—and perhaps the deputy leader ought to obey his own injunction to others—since that time is that he wishes to co-operate when we do as he says. His idea of co-operation is his announcing what he will do, and our following him. That is what I understand from my observation of his attitude and conduct since he has assumed the position he now occupies.

I say to him as emphatically as I know how—and that is very emphatically, even though I say so in relatively low tones—that that is not the way to engender confidence in his willingness to co-operate, and it is not the way to advance the business of the Senate.

While I do not know anything about the rights or wrongs of the allegation that he consulted very carefully with this side about this matter, I am inclined to accept the view of my leader and deputy leader, knowing that I can depend on what they say and not necessarily having observed that same attribute in the honourable gentleman opposite.

Senator Flynn: Well said!

Senator Smith: I reiterate to the honourable gentleman that he should revise his idea of what is consultation and co-operation if he really wants co-operation on this side of the house. If he does not care—and I would hate to come to the conclusion that that is the case—or if he does not really want it—and I would hate even more to come to that conclusion—then, of course, he will continue as he has.

If the honourable gentleman opposite really wishes to get along, with a moderate sort of good feeling in arranging the business of this house, then I think he has to change his attitude.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I regret that Senator Smith feels compelled to make those kinds of observations. However difficult it may be, I have to tell him that I intend diligently to pursue the co-operation of the opposition on all occasions.

There is one thing that has to be understood, and that is that I believe the Senate has an obligation to sit when there is important legislation before it. That is the situation now.

There is one other thing I will comment on, and I hope I do not ruffle anybody's feathers by doing so—

Senator Flynn: You never worried about that before!

Senator Olson: —and that is that consultation does not necessarily mean acquiescence.

Senator Smith: Of course, honourable senators, no one suggested that consultation means acquiescence, but for my honourable friend opposite consultation means acquiescence on this side. That is his idea of consultation, and I hope he takes to heart his own words that “consultation does not mean acquiescence,” because until he learns that, until he practises that, he will have a very unpleasant and difficult time in his position.

Senator Olson: If we both do that, we will get along much better.

[Senator Smith.]

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR RELATIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—VANCOUVER HARBOUR—RESUMPTION OF OPERATIONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hesitate to put this question to the Leader of the Government because of what has just happened, so perhaps Senator Argue can answer it. He might know more about this than does the Leader of the Government. I would like to know if operations have resumed at Vancouver Harbour as ordered by legislation passed this morning.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I understand that the longshoremen are back to work. I am also informed that the grain handlers appear to be in the process of arriving at a collective bargaining agreement. I believe a vote has to be taken at a later date, but indications are that that situation can be settled by agreement.

I checked with my leader in the Senate about three minutes ago and the information he gave me corroborates what I heard a few hours ago. I think the situation is improving because the workers are going back to work, and it is hoped that the situation relating to the backed-up grain vessels can be corrected in due course.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is another aspect of the matter that my honourable friend might be able to report on relating to the continuation of the collective bargaining process. Last evening the Minister of Labour was very hopeful that between now and Monday of next week, which was the deadline, the collective bargaining process would be resumed and that a bargain could be struck which would avoid the necessity of invoking section 4, the 6-and-5 section, of the act we passed last night. Would the minister tell us if he has had any indication as to whether the bargaining process has been resumed?

Senator Argue: I do not have any information on that.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to add to the reply given by Senator Argue. I understand the concern which was expressed by members of the opposition that the employers' association could sit back and wait until the time had expired. They have announced publicly that they are willing to negotiate on the basis of the entirety of the Hope report.

Hon. Martial Asselin: In good faith?

Senator Flynn: They are sure they will not get the approval.

Senator Roblin: That is one side of the question, and I am pleased to hear it. Can the minister say anything about the attitude of the trade union leaders?

Senator Olson: I cannot be as specific about that because I am not sure that they have made a public statement insofar as the longshoremen, other than the grain handlers, who are involved are concerned, but I understand—and I do not want to repeat what the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has already said—that for that section of the longshoremen and related workers there have been positive statements made leading up to what he has just indicated to this chamber.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend be willing to clarify the situation for me because, if my memory is correct, my understanding was that the bill dealt only with the longshoremen, and yet the minister brought in the grain handlers, which is an extraneous question. Is my assumption correct that we are dealing only with the longshoremen?

Senator Olson: I think it is reasonably correct, although perhaps not in all its detail, because there are grain handlers and then there are some people working along the dock who might come into the longshoremen category. The sad part of it was that they shut down their operations as well to respect the picket lines of the other longshoremen, and I believe they too are now back to work.

Senator Roblin: The point I am making is that the legislation dealt only with the longshoremen, so that is the only point we are dealing with now. The rest is extraneous although welcome information, but it has nothing to do with the point.

Senator Argue: It has nothing to do with the legislation of last evening.

Senator Olson: But what they are doing is extremely important.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—CHARLOTTETOWN AIRPORT— CLOSING OF CONTROL TOWER

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on which I took the proper, but not popular, device of sending him notice. It concerns the reported suggestion that among ten airports in this country the one in Charlottetown will have a closing of the airport tower, resulting in forced unemployment of people working there and also resulting in a possible increase in safety anxieties which are connected with this very serious matter. Because there is some confusion, as I understand it, in the statement made by the Minister of Transport, could the Leader of the Government, after having had notice from me, indicate if, in fact, it is now a policy of the Department of Transport to close down towers such as that in Charlottetown, when it will take place, and if they had assured themselves that they are not violating safety regulations for the travelling public?

● (1440)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to apologize to Senator Macquarrie because, through some inadvertent action on my part or that of my office staff, I have received no notice of the question.

However, I will undertake to make inquiries immediately. If I can respond to the question later today, I will do so; but, if not, I will communicate the reply to my honourable friend between now and when the Senate resumes on Monday evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is a good reason for sitting on Monday evening.

Senator Macquarrie: I do not want to get into the "Monday sitting" debate.

I thank the minister for his reply. It almost looks as though some of his traffic controllers, in terms of communication, were not working. However, these things do happen, and we cannot take umbrage at them. I am sure it was not deliberate.

I would advise my honourable friend that we, in Charlottetown, have had enormous anxieties and frustrations over the development of the airport, and there is a cloud of depression and uncertainty settling down over this matter, so the sooner he can do something to alleviate that anxiety, the better.

Senator Olson: I shall take the question as notice.

GRAIN

EXPORT SHIPMENTS THROUGH WEST COAST PORTS

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in connection with the situation at the port of Vancouver.

It is my understanding that there has been a tremendous back-up of ships in that port, and a question as to whether some of them would remain there. Can the minister tell us what the situation is in regard to the loading of the ships and if there is, indeed, a threat that some of these ships may leave with a resultant loss of sales to the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, my understanding is that there are 35 grain vessels at Vancouver waiting to be loaded. I have been given no information that any of the vessels that came for grain have been diverted elsewhere.

These vessels are waiting to be loaded with 825,000 tonnes of grain. There is currently in store in Vancouver some 560,000 tonnes of grain. Once work begins, approximately 400,000 tonnes will be available for quick loading on to the vessels. The remaining quantity of 425,000 tonnes must be unloaded from rail cars, cleaned, and then loaded on to the vessels.

It is estimated that it will take at least two to three weeks for the loading of the 35 ships presently waiting in the harbour.

During this period of time, additional vessels will arrive, and it is anticipated that it will take all of November and all of December to come close to catching up with the backlog of shipments that has been accumulating since the lock-out.

Many statements have been made concerning the difficulties on the west coast and at Vancouver, but I would point out that last year Vancouver harbour cleared some 10.3 million tonnes of grain for export, which amounted to a 24 per cent increase over the previous year. The west coast record last year was excellent.

I would just express the hope that, with the workers going back to work, this backlog will be cleaned up and that, during the whole of this crop year, we will once again set a record.

THE SENATE

REFORM—REPORT OF DELEGATION TO AUSTRALIA

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. It has to do with the recent trip to Australia by five colleagues with a view, I understand, to evaluating the system of the upper house in that country, and whether it would be an appropriate alternative in terms of Senate reform.

Will the Canadian delegation commence preparing a report of its findings before the end of the session?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot guarantee that this will be done before the end of the session, but that is only because I am still not sure when the session will end.

However, I will undertake—and I say this with the consent of my colleagues on that delegation—to introduce an inquiry, during the course of which I will give my version or impression—and what I believe to be the general impression of those in whose company I was—of that trip. In a speech addressed to the inquiry I intend to introduce before the Christmas recess I will also outline some specific conclusions I have come to as a result of that visit. However, whether that will technically be in this session, or in a new session, I cannot say. If I introduce the inquiry in this session and the session is concluded, I will renew it in the next session. I intend to introduce such an inquiry within a month.

Senator Deschatelets: There is no doubt that the honourable senator's report would be most interesting to us all. However, I believe there is a feeling that it would be more appropriate for Senator Perrault, the minister who headed the delegation, to introduce the inquiry for discussion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think not, for the reason that since he is a member of the government he may feel a little diffident about introducing the inquiry for fear it would indicate formal government policy. I am in a position to introduce such an inquiry without that necessary implication.

Of course, Senators Flynn, Roblin and Buckwold will similarly be in a position to speak to the inquiry, as I believe they will in due course. If Senator Perrault wishes to add something, I am sure he will do so, but I do not think he will want to introduce the inquiry for the very reason Senator Deschatelets has underlined.

Senator Deschatelets: Is the Deputy Leader of the Government aware whether Senator Perrault, at any time since his return, has made a personal report to cabinet concerning this trip to Australia?

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Frith: As far as I know, he has not made a personal report to cabinet.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: As a supplementary question, would it not, in fact, be good government policy for anyone heading such a delegation to make a report to the Senate that does not involve a personal opinion?

I read with interest the report given by Senator Roblin, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen, the Globe and Mail and in the Winnipeg Free Press, but I think it may express only one point of view. I believe it should be the responsibility of the leader of such a delegation to make an unbiased report upon his return. Thereby, the Senate could immediately be brought up to date on what has taken place, and not have to wait days, weeks, or even months before a report is filed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I point out, in the first place, that the delegation was unusual in the sense that it was a rather ad hoc trip which resulted from responding to an invitation that was originally issued to the Speaker of the Senate. However, His Honour was unable to go, and the delegation took his place. Therefore, it is not directly on all fours with, or analogous to, an ordinary delegation that is authorized to go by the Senate and to report.

In the second place, I agree with the implication in Senator Guay's question that there is a distinction between what took place and what the members of the delegation got out of the trip.

Rather than trying to prepare a formal report, and spending the time trying to agree on every word, the feeling is that the Senate would be better served by the imminent introduction of an inquiry to air the views and impressions of the members of the delegation.

● (1450)

Hon. Jack Marshall: How does the Deputy Leader of the Government propose to share that information with his colleagues in the Senate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I propose to introduce an inquiry calling the attention of the Senate to the trip. After introducing the inquiry—first seeking to report on what took place on the trip, and my assessment of some of our consultations—in terms of what could be a workable system for Senate reform, particularly as it relates to an elected Senate—I then propose to leave it to my colleagues to add to that intervention. Discussion will be open to every senator, of course.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FORMER PRISONERS OF WAR, VETERANS, SPOUSES OF DECEASED VETERANS—COMPENSATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question which I will direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it has to do with veterans affairs. It seems obvious that there are more anomalies appearing in the veterans legislation.

I would like to obtain some information on a number of topics, one of which has to do with the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act. The Dieppe Veterans and the POW Association have made representations to the minister indicating that there seem to be unrealistic variations in compensation given to veterans who were incarcerated as prisoners of war for different periods of time. To illustrate my point, a prisoner of war who was incarcerated for as little as three months receives prisoner of war compensation of 10 per cent, while a veteran who was incarcerated for 30 months receives a pension of only 20 per cent. It is felt that that is unfair. The minister indicated that he was going to take this matter into consideration. I would like to receive some information on that.

The minister also indicated that he is looking into the casual earnings which a War Veterans Allowance recipient can earn without their being charged against his War Veterans Allowance benefits. All I can say is that it is high time these things were done. I have said this before and I repeat that the Second World War veteran is now almost 65 years of age. We hear of all of this good legislation and of all of the amendments which will be made. When will we see them? It is hoped that changes will be made before the end of this year.

My third point has to do with the recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which, to me, is a serious anomaly, in that the spouses of deceased veterans will have to stand a very serious reduction in the pensions they were accustomed to receiving over a period of years. For instance, a 100 per cent disability pensioner receives over $1,000 a month. Should he suddenly die, his widow immediately receives a pension which is reduced to $600 per month. Honourable senators, that is unfair.

I think it is time that we got some answers from the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I hope that I have explained these matters reasonably well so that the Leader of the Government can obtain answers to those questions as soon as possible.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I will take those questions as notice. We shall look carefully at Senate Hansard tomorrow to facilitate these inquiries. If there is any additional background information the honourable senator wishes to have, particularly with respect to the first subject he introduced, we would be glad to provide that as well.

LABOUR

GRANTS TO CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As he is aware, I have a friendly interest in the dilemma of the Minister of Finance, who is seeking areas where he can save money in order to finance other expenditures, although I am concerned about some of the areas he is looking at. Perhaps my question could be taken as an effort to assist his search.

I have before me an information bulletin which was issued by the Honourable Charles Caccia, the Minister of Labour. It reads:

Labour Minister Charles Caccia today signed an agreement with the Canadian Labour Congress which will provide $3.2 million for the Congress's labour education activities . . .

The Labour Canada education grants are part of an ongoing program in support of labour education introduced in 1977 and recently extended for another year.

Honourable senators, I have a further report from the minister which shows that, for the grant year of July 1980 to June 1981 the grants to the Canadian Labour Congress, both at the regional and national level, amounted to $3.8 million.

My question is this: Since the Canadian Labour Congress has now firmly established itself in the minds of the Canadian people as a quasi-political body, is it appropriate that we extend to such a degree grants to an organization which intervenes so radically in the political process in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as has been explained by Senator McElman, there are grants made for that purpose. It is also correct that the communiqué that the honourable senator has is one which was issued recently by the Minister of Labour announcing that the labour education program would be funded to the levels that he mentioned until the end of June 1983, I believe.

I have to advise my honourable friend, however, that the Canadian Labour Congress is not the only labour organization which receives these grants—the Teamsters Union does, and there are several others—although we know that the CLC is the largest such organization. Consequently, the largest amount of labour education grants is provided to that organization.

I could obtain a more detailed explanation of the government's reasoning, although it may already be contained in Senator McElman's information bulletin, but at this time I can say that these grants provide an opportunity for labour unions to train people in the art—which I think is the right word—of labour negotiations and the management of labour unions. Certainly, it is beneficial to the whole labour union movement and, indeed, to the country in general, that we have people with upgraded technical skills in this respect.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question which I direct to my leader in the Senate. Can any consideration be given to instituting a similar grant for area municipalities so that they, too, can get the benefits that the unions are getting?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take the representation of Senator Guay as having been put forward seriously and sincerely.

Senator McElman: I have a supplementary question as well, honourable senators. Before putting it I might say that, in light of the comment by Senator Guay, the listing for the second-last year of grants shows that labour organizations in many municipalities did in fact receive grants, as did the local federations for nurses' organizations and so on. I was not raising any question with respect to those organizations, because none of them has injected itself into the political process in Canada. The one I speak of, the CLC, has done precisely that.

The national office of the CLC received funding in the amount of $1.7 million. In addition to that, its regional offices, which are five in number, received in excess of $2 million. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate not agree with me that the government grant to the national office of the CLC would free up a lot of money that the CLC could use for those partisan political and interfering purposes to which the CLC is dedicated?

• (1500)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can understand that the indirect relationship Senator McElman puts on the use of these funds or, indeed, any public financial support to organizations that involve themselves in the political process ought to be prohibited. I can tell him this, however, that the utilization of these funds is carefully audited to make sure that they are used for the purposes that I described a few moments ago, and which I also believe is contained in a communiqué, although I do not have the communiqué in front of me.

TRANSPORT

AIR CONTROL TOWERS—POSSIBILITY OF CLOSURE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have just been handed a reply. It is not very long, but it is a response of the Minister of Transport to a question essentially the same as that asked by Senator Macquarrie a few minutes ago. I could read that much to him, and I will get him an expanded answer more particularly related to Charlottetown, which he mentioned particularly.

The minister says:

The possibility of closing air control towers in some airports of Canada is one that is being studied now. The events in the United States a few months ago respecting air control have indicated to the world that there are savings to be made in this particular area of air transportation. We are looking at it in that light, but I want to assure my honourable friend that safety will not be compromised.

INTERPRETATION ACT BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER FOR SECOND READING STANDS

On the Order:

Second Reading of the Bill S-30, intituled: "An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to Canada Day".—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Stand?

[Senator McElman.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): We can stand it, as far as I am concerned, but perhaps sometime soon we really ought to have a discussion to find out whether or not there is any validity to Senator Flynn's contention that it is out of order. I happen to think that there is not, but I am sure we would want to hear his arguments, and I should like to make some arguments. It does not have to be today, in any event.

Senator Flynn: If rule 47(2) applies, the question of the five days' notice will have been resolved by this bill's being moved next Tuesday. So I would not raise this objection; I would raise only the rest of the rule. I would not raise the question of five days' notice if the bill is moved; I would simply deal with the rest of the question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I suppose the question is whether anything is served by having a ruling on the point. I am inclined to think that is so. I should make it clear that, whatever the ruling is, we will, of course, abide by it, and we will abide by it with good humour. We are not in any big hurry about it. But, if honourable senators put their views forward for His Honour, we will have a ruling for our guidance in the future. Senator Flynn, who has raised the point, knows a good deal, certainly as much as anybody else in the chamber, about procedure. He can put his point forward and we can put our point forward, and then leave it to His Honour the Speaker to consider. We can leave it on the Order Paper until we get a decision.

Senator Flynn: Leave it until next week.

Senator Frith: Perhaps, as you say, we will leave it until next week.

Order stands.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83 (NO. 2)

ECONOMIC ASSESSMENT BY CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA— ANSWER TO QUESTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday during the debate on the borrowing authority bill Senator Murray asked me a question that dealt with an assessment by the Conference Board of Canada which he felt, if not explained, indicated a great discrepancy, or inconsistency with the prediction or analysis by the Minister of Finance. I undertook to try to get him an answer to that question during the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance which took place this morning. I have that answer, and I should like to put it on the record so that he can consider it and perhaps make it the subject of a further question, if he wishes.

The question, in effect,—I am not sure I have the precise wording, but I think I have the essence of what Senator Murray asked—was this: The Conference Board of Canada recently forecast that economic growth in Canada would be 5.2 per cent this year while the deficit would be $20 billion. The Minister of Finance, on October 27, 1982, stated he expected economic growth of 4.4 per cent and a budgetary deficit of $23.6 billion. What explains the discrepancy of, as he said, about $4 billion, or $3.6 billion?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am sorry to interrupt the honourable senator, but I should like to clarify this. He said that the growth rate would be 4.4 per cent. Is that not a minus figure?

Senator Frith: Yes. They are both minus figures.

Senator Roblin: I thought so.

Senator Frith: My note says that. I am sorry. I am grateful to my friend for pointing that out. Let us get that straight. It would be minus 5.2 per cent and minus 4.4 per cent. That is quite right. Wouldn't it be nice if it were otherwise?

Senator Roblin: Indeed.

Senator Frith: The answer I have been given by the officials, which I undertook to furnish to Senator Murray, is this. There are two factors explaining the difference. First, the Conference Board of Canada is referring to the calendar year. In fairness to Senator Murray, he said he suspected this might be one source of the discrepancy. The Conference Board of Canada is referring to the calendar year, while the minister was referring to the fiscal year. Secondly, the Conference Board of Canada was referring to the national accounts deficit, while the minister was referring to the budgetary deficit on a public accounts basis. The document accompanying the minister's statement to Parliament indicated that the fiscal year deficit on a national accounts basis would be about $22.4 billion. The fiscal year national accounts forecast by the Conference Board of Canada was $22.7 billion, or a difference of $300 million, rather than the $4 billion that Senator Murray noted.

If it would serve to help, honourable senators, I asked for an explanation, in general terms, as to the difference between those two bases; that is, the national accounts deficit versus the deficit on a public accounts basis. The national accounts deficit is a deficit computed essentially by Statistics Canada, and it is based on an analysis that furnishes statistics for, of course, domestic economists for analysis, but is also the basis used in the United Nations and, I believe, in the OECD, and therefore is essentially based on figures that would enable international comparisons. The budgetary deficit on a public accounts basis is dealing more with what is actually spent and is much more for domestic purposes than for statistical economists and statistical international purposes.

Senator Roblin: Would it not be true to say that the national accounts basis differs from the public accounts basis simply because it includes everything, whereas the public accounts basis manifestly does not? The public accounts basis does not include all the financial obligations of the government, but the national accounts basis does. That is the difference.

Senator Frith: That is a difference, but I do not think it is the total difference. It is certainly a difference and is a part of the different basis and different use for the figures, as I understand it.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION BILL

ORDER FOR SECOND READING STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-31, intituled: "An Act to limit shareholding in certain corporations".—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. Jack Marshall: On a point of order, on looking through my file of bills I find I do not have a copy of Bill S-31. To what am I giving unanimous consent?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Marshall is not giving unanimous consent to anything. I am sorry if he does not have a copy of Bill S-31 in his file. We are not giving consent; we are moving second reading of the bill.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe a point of order is involved. It is customary for bills to be distributed so that senators have an opportunity to read them before second reading. I may be mistaken, but I do not appear to have Bill S-31 in my own set of bills. I have now been handed a copy; but we should ensure that all senators receive a copy.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I will lend Senator Marshall my copy.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I understand the honourable senator's point of order—

Senator Marshall: There is a serious omission here. We have a system, and we should follow it.

Senator Olson: I am not quarreling with the honourable senator's right to have the bill. He should have had it yesterday. If there has not been a distribution of the bill prior to this afternoon, then perhaps we should stand this order.

Senator Roblin: I think we should.

Senator Olson: I was under the impression that it had been distributed.

Senator Roblin: I think the order should stand, as I would like to have an opportunity to read the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with what has been said. I cannot find any "S" bills in my desk. I do have a copy of Bill S-31, but not because it was in my desk. If we are going to stand this order, as I believe we should, we should ensure that all honourable senators get a copy of the bill before they leave, so that they may have an opportunity to consider and reflect on the bill, even though they are not doing so while sitting in the chamber.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I have all of those bills in my desk.

Senator Frith: But everyone does not, apparently.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I am pleased to hear Senator Hicks say he has all of these bills; but I have counted seven or eight honourable senators who have said they cannot find them. Senator Frith has just said that he does not have it in his desk. Apparently, it was distributed on a selective basis.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, those bills which were introduced earlier in the session are bound together with string on the left-hand side of the shelving under your desks; but you will find Bill S-31 on the right-hand side.

Senator Muir: The honourable senator should have told his deputy leader that.

Senator McElman: Never mind. The honourable senator had his say a moment ago. He should just relax. Bill S-31 was delivered to my office yesterday and I studied it last evening. There is one here in the lower part of my desk and I see that my seat partner also has a copy. If honourable senators check both sides of the shelving under their desks, they may find the bill. In any event, there was a distribution, whether full or not, yesterday.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: That is not the case.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we shall look into this. They should have the bill, which also should have been delivered to their offices or put in their mail boxes yesterday. If honourable senators say that is not so, then their request is a reasonable one and we should stand this order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that all additional orders and both inquiries stand. Senator Godfrey can speak to his motions.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, the first motion in my name stands, but I wish to withdraw Motion No. 2. I had placed it on the order paper to draw the matter to the attention of honourable senators and have a discussion on the principle. In view of what took place at a meeting of committee chairmen today, I do not believe it is necessary for us to proceed with it. I feel that I have accomplished my purpose, and therefore I wish to withdraw the motion.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, November 8, 1982, at 8 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES "B" REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(e):

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1983.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—ROLE OF SENATOR DAVEY

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. I think he has just tabled a document relating to the royal commission which is to be headed by Mr. Macdonald.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Who is he?

Senator Flynn: I was wondering whether this bright idea was suggested by Senator Keith Davey.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators are all aware that Senator Davey has had a lot of bright and, consequently, useful ideas over a long period of time and up to the present. However, I do not have any information as to whether or not this was his idea.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In the light of the resolution which was adopted at the Liberal Party meeting in Ottawa, which resolution suggested that Senator Davey should not continue in the same capacity, has the Leader of the Government something for him to do in the Senate over the coming months? We have not seen much of him recently. Perhaps he was preparing for the convention and other bright ideas for the Prime Minister. It appears, however, that the Young Liberals do not enjoy his contributions. I would like to know whether we could use him here.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: We sure could use him here, I can tell you that.

● (2010)

Senator Flynn: That may be, but I do not think he would be as brave as you are in yapping. He has been very silent.

Senator Steuart: Who are you kidding?

Senator Flynn: That is the only thing you can do as far as I am concerned.

Senator Steuart: On a little point of whatever it is, if you want to talk about yapping, you are one of the most constant interrupting yappers I have ever heard, and you can't take it when somebody puts you back in your place.

Senator Flynn: I can take it, but you will not be the one to put me in my place.

Senator Steuart: Why shouldn't I put you in your place? Somebody needs to.

Senator Flynn: Because you are too small and too narrow-minded.

Senator Steuart: If you want to come outside, inside, or here on the floor, I'll put you in your place any time you want.

Senator Flynn: Anywhere?

Senator Steuart: Anywhere.

Senator Flynn: You are just a little servant, a survivor; you always approve even when you are not convinced of what should be done. I have seen you voting against your own convictions here I don't know how many times, and you should shut up.

Senator Steuart: And I have seen you vote against I-don't-know-what. I don't know if you have any convictions. I don't know what they are and you don't know either, and I can prove it.

Senator Flynn: I can prove what I have said. You voted for the abolition of the veto of the Senate when you had spoken against it, and there have been many other occasions like that. You cannot tell us of one occasion where I did the same.

Senator Olson: I am not sure whether Senator Flynn has got a full and satisfactory answer to his question or not.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest that you should not add to it.

Senator Olson: I think the answer is even better than the question.

Senator Flynn: You would. That is your type.

Senator Steuart: You will have a heart attack.

Senator Flynn: Little yapping dog.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, being a very quiet, humble type, may I pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated on Friday that the government is holding up $5 million in assistance toward rebuilding the Sydney Steel Corporation mill, pending a review of the business plan. Would the Leader of the Government inquire as to how long this review is expected to take, and what terms or conditions the review will have to satisfy in order for this money to be released?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): The answer is yes, I will undertake to make an inquiry.

THE SENATE

PARTICIPATION OF SENATOR DAVEY IN PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, could I have the honour and the privilege of putting a question to Senator Davey?

Hon. Martial Asselin: No, you cannot.

Hon. Royce Frith: You are not allowed to.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You can put a question to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Tremblay: Could I ask the Leader of the Government to allow Senator Davey to let us hear his voice? Since I have not been in the Senate for very long—I was appointed to the Senate in 1979—as far as I can recall, I have never heard Senator Davey's voice, and so, if only for the sake of artistic appreciation, I would like to hear Senator Davey's voice, and I therefore ask the Leader of the Government how I should proceed in order to hear Senator Davey's voice in this house?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): If my honourable friend is asking a serious question—and I am sure he is not—then I know of no way except that if in the middle of a debate any senator attempts to take the floor and someone else is recognized, there is provision whereby he can move that a certain senator be now heard. Even if that motion passes, as far as I know there is no obligation to speak.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Flynn: You would have to show an intention.

● (2015)

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Am I to understand from the reply I have just been given that I am doomed to never ever hear Senator Davey's voice? Nevertheless, I really would like to hear his voice in this house, if only to appreciate from the point of view of artistic appreciations. I have never heard his voice for three whole years, and it seems to me that all my fellow senators would at least like to know what his voice sounds like. How should I proceed to get this voice to sound in this house, especially since according to what we read in the press, it does make itself heard in the government's decision-making. Here is a voice that speaks elsewhere but never here. I would really like to know what it sounds like, from the point of view of poetic appreciation. I would ask the Leader of the Government again how I should proceed to at least hear Senator Davey's voice?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to tell Senator Tremblay that the nature of his inquiry respecting the activities of another senator in this chamber is completely out of order.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Are you the Speaker?

Senator Olson: I have the right to interpret the rules, and from time to time present an argument. Senator Tremblay, under the rules, as I understand them—I hope that satisfies Senator Balfour—may make inquiries of the members of the government on this side of the house respecting government business, and he has not done that so far.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: My answer to that is, with leave of honourable senators, that the Leader of the Government has an advantage that I do not have. He probably hears Senator Davey's voice in Cabinet meetings and in consultations, while we never have that privilege. I would like to know and I would like to hear how Senator Davey's voice sounds when he speaks.

Senator Guay: We can hear yours!

Senator Tremblay: How should I proceed? That is my question. How should I proceed? Is there a rule of procedure that would let me finally hear Senator Davey's voice?

[English]

Senator Olson: I am sure that the honourable senator referred to is flattered by the admonition that he should be heard. I would conclude by saying that the honourable senator's attempt at wit is about as sharp as a wet cornflake.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I thought my colleague's wit was pretty sharp, and that it cut a bit.

Senator Guay: Not everyone would agree with you.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—DEADLINE FOR SUBMISSION OF REPORT

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am not going to try to ask the question to which my colleague failed to elicit a proper response; but I say en passant that despite what the minister may think of the senator, some of us here like him and support him. Some of us would like him to be the chief adviser to a certain leader for a long time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie: But that is en passant. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a little more about the proposed royal commission—the first word is an adjective I do not have to use all that often in dealing with the Liberal government, but it is a royal commission. I would like to know if this new venture in the economy, or through it, or for it—whatever it is—is an indication that for three years the Honourable Donald Macdonald will be on ice and unattainable and, therefore, not defeatable by the Conservative Party, and whether it is, in fact, an indication that someone believes that the economy will go totally bonkers in three years, or whether it will be cured in three years. What is the meaning of the three-year designation, and what is behind the suggestion that one of the chief architects of the failure of this nation's economy, namely, the former Finance Minister, is, in fact, a logical diagnostician of the ills he helped to create. I would like to know what that means. The Senate would like to have some serious answers to serious questions.

● (2020)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if Senator Macquarrie will read the terms of reference that I tabled tonight, he might find more of an answer and perhaps, if it is still unclear to him tomorrow, after he has had an opportunity of studying the document, we could go into it a little more. I do have a copy of the document with me, but the terms of reference are rather long and detailed. The nature of the question is such that to reply almost requires a debate.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I may say that the more reading I do, and the more reflecting I do, the more concerned I become, because I know some of the personalities involved. Since the Leader of the Government seeks to throw me off, perhaps I will ask whether this is a dodge to protect a certain leadership candidate—although how, in the name of God, anyone presiding over an inquiry into the Liberal-oriented economy would become a successful candidate, I do not know—or whether it is, in fact, a serious survey of our economy? I ask, again, whether there are some people around who think it will be all over in three years' time, or whether in three years' time we will reach the nadir of the whole wretched situation. I wonder what the "three years" means.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator had read the terms of reference carefully—and he claims that he has done so—then he would understand that as they apply to the nature and structure of the Canadian economy they are very broad in scope. The period of time seems to be a reasonable one under the circumstances, considering the time involved in commissions of this nature in the past. I would also advise the honourable senator—

Hon. Martial Asselin: They were failures.

Senator Olson: —that we do not share his concern—

Hon. Lowell Murray: —about the economy.

Senator Olson: —that Canada is going to oblivion economically. We believe that it is—

Senator Murray: It is the political oblivion that we are worried about.

Senator Olson: —one of the most fortunate countries in the world, and we have demonstrated that. The royal commission, after its in-depth study and along with its recommendations, may even enhance what is already probably one of the better positions in the world economy today.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am delighted with the predictions the minister has made for the royal commission.

Senator Olson: I was predicting for Canada.

Senator Macquarrie: If the commission comes out with that kind of casual, comfortable response, I shall be very much surprised. All I am asking is whether or not the minister can tell us a little more about the structure of this commission. Can he say whether or not the well-informed media are right in saying that there has already been a gentleman's agreement, if you will pardon the expression, that if the Honourable Donald Macdonald wishes to leave before the next Liberal convention, he will be allowed an escape hatch and to forget about the three-year situation? Is the situation so casual that a former Liberal minister or anyone who wants an escape hatch to head off John Turner is free to leave this very "serious survey into our economy"? Is that part of it, or are all the media people wrong?

Senator Olson: I think the terms of reference are pretty clear. I am tempted to read them in great detail to refresh the honourable senator's memory, but if he claims he has already read them and wants me to superimpose an interpretation on his interpretation, all I can say is that he will have to take them as he has read them. I am not prepared to give another interpretation.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government a factual question. On what date was the order in council establishing the royal commission and setting up its terms of reference passed?

Senator Olson: November 5, 1982.

Senator Murray: In that case, can the minister confirm the fact that the decision was made and the announcement leaked to the press before the Minister of Finance even knew that such a commission was being set up?

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: What difference does that make?

Senator Olson: No, I cannot confirm that.

Senator Murray: Can the minister explain why, when Mr. Lalonde was asked by journalists whether he had had any advance notice of the setting up of this commission, his answer was: "No comment".

Senator Olson: I shall have to make an inquiry of the minister.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He doesn't know.

Senator Olson: If the minister is ready to say something—

Senator Asselin: He should have known.

Senator Olson:—more than "No comment", then he can do so.

Senator Robichaud: It won't make any difference, anyway.

● (2025)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You are so right. I could not have said that better myself. I agree with my honourable friend; it would not have made the slightest difference.

I should like to ask my honourable friend the Leader of the Government something about this commission. I have not had the opportunity to read the terms of reference, and I am glad he has tabled them because I can now have a look at them.

What provision is made for other members to sit on this commission with the Honourable Donald Macdonald?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am looking through this document as rapidly as I can to see if I can find the appropriate reference to the number. After a number of other paragraphs it states:

Therefore, the Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, advise that the Honourable Donald Stovel Macdonald together with such other persons as may be named from time to time be appointed Commissioners under Part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire into and report upon the long-term economic potential, prospects and challenges facing the Canadian federation and its respective regions, as well as the implications that such prospects and challenges have for Canada's economic and governmental institutions and for the management of Canada's economic affairs.

I just read to the end of that paragraph, but, to try to answer the question specifically and precisely, as I always try to do—

Senator Flynn: Unsuccessfully.

Senator Olson: I repeat: "together with such other persons as may be named from time to time".

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for that information. So, we can have a committee of any size, it appears, to conduct this investigation.

Is there anything to be said for the statement that appeared in the press that Mr. Ian Stewart, the former Deputy Minister of Finance, would be among those to be appointed to this amorphous body?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: I am sure that that is just part of the press speculation that always arises. You can never tell what the speculation will be, but you can be sure there will be speculation. I do not think there is going to be any official, semi-official or leaked indication there, but I will make some inquiries and if the Prime Minister is ready to name additional members to the royal commission soon, no doubt he will do so. However, I rather doubt that the Prime Minister will speculate along with the press as to who may or may not be added from time to time.

Senator Roblin: I am willing to wait until the Prime Minister announces the other members of the commission, because it is quite obvious that there is no hurry about it. It is quite obvious that there is really no sense of urgency here. We only have the largest unemployment in our history, and we are offered a commission that will take three years to conduct its work and will report after this present administration has long since been dismissed from office. So I guess I am willing to wait for a few weeks, or whatever length of time it takes, to find out who else is on this commission.

I should like to ask my honourable friend the rationale for proceeding with such a leisurely examination of our economic affairs. I would ask my honourable friend to tell us how he relates the importance of a commission of this kind, that will be reporting three years down the road, with the problems we find in the country today. What relevance has this commission to the question of unemployment and lack of jobs, the collapsing of our manufacturing industry and all the other economic ills to which this country is subject at this time? Just how does he visualize this report three years down the road fitting into the problems we are facing today?

Senator Asselin: It's just a kind of camouflage.

Senator Olson: Well, there is a very important flaw in my honourable friend's argument. He is attempting to draw the conclusion already that this royal commission on structures in the economy, and so on, which is for the future, is intended to deal with present and short-term economic difficulties in this country which have come about as a result of a downturn in world economic activity. There is absolutely nothing in what the Prime Minister has said, or what anyone else has said, to indicate that this is an attempt to deal with present and short-term economic problems.

● (2030)

I can go over a long list of actions that have already been taken and announced by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other ministers so that we can do the best we can in the circumstances. Indeed, many of those measures or amendments to programs and the re-allocation of funding are significant. If my honourable friend insists on my repeating them, I shall be pleased to do so.

Senator Roblin: I do not insist on my honourable friend's repeating them because we have heard them several times. We have heard the same proposals dressed up in different words at least three times now, and we understand what they mean. They mean very little.

I am interested to know that my honourable friend disassociates the royal commission from the current problems in Canada.

Senator Olson: I did not do that at all.

Senator Roblin: We now know how to categorize it and where it fits into the scheme of things. We know that this is an investigation into the structure of the economy of the country. The commission is to report at its leisure some three years down the road, and will do nothing about our economic problems.

Senator Olson: That is about as inaccurate an interpretation as I have heard, although it comes close to being the champion.

What I said was that there were other measures that would deal with the current and immediate problems, but that the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada would deal with the longer term—three years—although three years is not considered long term either.

If my honourable friend wants to be somewhat better informed than he is displaying to date so that he can make a different interpretation of what I have said, I believe he should read the press release issued by the Office of the Prime Minister on November 5. If he wishes, I will read some excerpts from it to clear up the confusion that is obviously in his mind, but I believe he has a copy of it in his office.

Senator Murray: The story had already leaked by then.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend places any reliance on press releases from the Office of the Prime Minister, or from any other office, then he is a good deal more gullible than I thought he was. Everyone knows that that is a piece of self-serving advertisement, designed more to becloud the issues than to deal with the problems the public wants dealt with.

The leader has made the point perfectly clear; it is a long-term study into the ills and aches of the Canadian economy, and my honourable friend will be out of office long before he has to deal with that report.

Senator Olson: That is an assumption that the party to which my honourable friend belongs has made on a number of occasions in the past, much to its chagrin. I would not suggest they get too smug about that, because they know what some of the history is.

Senator Flynn: Us, smug?

Senator Olson: So that the record will be clear for the thousands of people who will read it, I think I should read the terms of reference as they appear in the press release. The Prime Minister stated:

The terms of reference are "perhaps the most important and far-reaching that have ever been assigned to any Commission in our history."

The press release continues:

The Prime Minister said that while short-term action is necessary to counter the adverse effects of the recession and lay the groundwork for the return to prosperity, "we must look further ahead to see in what ways the country and its institutions might change to take full advantage of future opportunities for development."

"We now live in a much more competitive, technologically-sophisticated and interdependent world environment. It is time we stood back to look at all these changes and, in the light of what has happened, to look ahead at what the next generation of development can bring."

And we usually do things right.

So, I say to my honourable friend that those who read this exchange will now have a better interpretation than the one my honourable friend is trying to put on my remarks.

Senator Flynn: What a joke!

Senator Roblin: That press release is even more platitudinous than such releases usually are. It is even more fogbound and unenlightening than the run-of-the-mill press release. My honourable friend ought to get better press release writers, but he does come through loud and clear that this is just another one of those gestures designed to give the impression of action. It is one of those theatrical proposals which may sound convincing when first heard but which, upon examination, proves to be so remote from the real problems that we are struggling with today as to attract very little interest or attention.

● (2035)

I hope my honourable friend's motives are well intended—indeed, I believe they are—but he is going to have to do more than read a press release from the Prime Minister's Office to convince me that this is nothing more than a long-term discussion of economic affairs which will turn out to be of remarkably little value to our suffering people of today.

Senator Olson: That is my honourable friend's opinion, however invalid it may be.

Senator Asselin: Camouflage!

Senator Olson: I suppose he thinks it is valid or he would not have put it. I could not disagree with him more, and I would refer him to the previous answers and point out that he is confusing things that are not the same.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary to the question asked by my deputy leader? The questions of Senator Roblin concerned the Macdonald Commission. We can call it by that name since the chairman has been appointed. However, I seem to recall that, last week or about that time, the federal Minister of Finance appointed a group of consultants to advise him on matters of economic development and on methods of dealing with the present crisis. I seem to recall that one of the members of this group—

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Ask your question.

Senator Tremblay: Does Senator Guay have something to tell me? I seem to recall that one of the members—

Senator Guay: You make a speech every time you ask a question.

[English]

An Hon. Senator: What's the question?

Senator Roblin: He wants to ask a question.

Senator Tremblay: Would you prefer that I speak in English?

[Translation]

Senator Guay: Every time you ask a question, you make a speech. This is what I wanted to tell you.

Senator Tremblay: What are you doing now?

Senator Guay: You should not ask lengthy questions so that other senators may also have an opportunity to ask questions.

Senator Tremblay: Did you time my introduction?

Senator Guay: Ask your question.

Senator Tremblay: If the Leader of the Government objects—

Senator Guay: We are not in a classroom, professor.

Senator Tremblay: I seem to recall that, last week, one of the members of the advisory committee established by the Minister of Finance noted that, because of the appointment of the Macdonald Commission—let us call it by this name for the reasons I have already given—he was no longer quite sure about his own work as an advisor to the Minister of Finance. My question is therefore as follows: How will the work of the advisory group appointed last week by the Minister of Finance to advise him on the problems responsible for the present economic crisis, fit into the framework of the review by the Macdonald Commission? How will the advisory group reporting to the Minister of Finance and the Royal Commission appointed by the Prime Minister harmonize their activities at least during the next few months?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the correct name for the royal commission is the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada.

● (2040)

I can make some inquiries of the Minister of Finance, if the honourable senator wishes, but it seems to me that both Senator Tremblay and Senator Roblin are trying to confuse matters. The group the Minister of Finance has said he might establish would be consulted from time to time on more immediate and more short-term matters than those within the reference of the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada.

Senator Asselin: Can the Leader of the Government tell us what budget will be allotted this royal commission?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, at the moment I do not know. I am not even sure that the budget has been established.

[Senator Tremblay.]

Senator Asselin: Will you inquire on behalf of the Senate and report next week?

Senator Olson: Yes, I will try to do that. However, I am not certain that the budget will be prepared by next week, but they certainly will have to examine the size of the task to some extent.

Hon. R. James Balfour: As a supplementary question, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain how the activities of the Macdonald Royal Commission, how the activities of the special committee established by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Lalonde, and how the activities of the cabinet committee of which the Leader of the Government in the Senate was chairman—namely, the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development—will intermesh?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will make some inquiries about that. However, I would point out that a full explanation would require a more lengthy answer than is acceptable by way of a reply to a question during Question Period. By the way, some of the questions are too long.

Senator Asselin: Can the leader tell the Senate if there is any possibility that the Honourable John Turner will be a member of the royal commission?

Senator Olson: I have no official information in that respect.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I would ask a supplementary question concerning the substance of the work to be performed by this commission. It is my understanding that a number of economists will be meeting with the Minister of Finance and that at the same time the Macdonald commission will be sitting. How do you reconcile the two approaches which will be taken by both bodies in an attempt to resolve the actual and present crisis and the so-called long-term perspective?

Further, it is my understanding that this consultation by economists with the Minister of Finance will be on a short-term basis, whereas the consultation with the Macdonald commission will be on a longer term basis. As the minister well knows, decisions made in the short term largely determine mid- and long-term decisions. Is there a way of reconciling this situation?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I see no problem of reconciliation at all. The government takes responsibility to devise and revise, whenever necessary, the best possible solutions for the immediate and the short term. We are asking a royal commission to do a study for some longer-term structures, and I see no problem of reconciliation whatsoever.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Do the terms of reference of the royal commission include presentation of reports and recommendations to the government? Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us with what regularity will these reports be submitted? Will it be every three months or every six months? Could the Leader indicate whether the commission will submit its report only when the three years are over?

[English]

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can look at the terms of reference. I certainly did.

Senator Asselin: Did you read them?

Senator Olson: I read them very quickly, but I am sure that by tomorrow my honourable friend will be much better informed.

Senator Asselin: If you do not know the answer, just say that you do not know.

Senator Olson: I was just trying to explain the situation to my honourable friend.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, could the minister who is responsible for this very serious chamber of sober second thought indicate if any consideration has been given to placing on that commission people who were not involved in developing the economic mess under which the country now labours? We do not want to sit and applaud the setting up of a group of foxes to check the chicken wire of the hen coop.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows, since it has been explained to him a number of times, that there has been some downturn in economic activity all over the world, but particularly in the western world.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Senator Olson: For my honourable friend to predicate his question by saying that there is an economic mess, when Canada's economy is probably in better condition than that of most other countries of the world, really ruins his question because that premise is not a very sound one upon which to base a question.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I do not have to predicate the economic mess. I am just asking my friend if he can tell this chamber if there are any people involved in this important three-year survey who were not major, minor or even medium contributors to our present situation through being Ministers of Finance, Deputy Ministers of Finance or other people involved. I am just wondering who these objective people are, and I am sure we would all like to know about them.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I answered a few minutes ago by saying that, so far, only the chief commissioner has been named, the Honourable Donald Macdonald. The other commissioners and others have not yet been named.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: That is precisely the point: we do not know the members of the Macdonald Commission. Right now, we know the members of the advisory group to the Minister of Finance. I am referring exclusively to the remarks of one of its members, whom I refuse to identify, but here is a clue: he is a former member of the Economic Council of Canada. He was answering questions put to him by newspapermen. When asked about the nature—

Senator Robichaud: Question.

Senator Tremblay:—of the advice he, as an economist, might give to the Minister of Finance—I always found out that when a question was embarrassing, either for Senator Robichaud—

Senator Robichaud: Ask your question.

Senator Guay: Do not interrupt him, let him speak.

Senator Tremblay: How then, this member of Mr. Lalonde's advisory group was wondering about the meaning—

Senator Robichaud: Question.

Senator Tremblay:—which those recommendations might have because, as an economist, he could not guess which way the economy would turn the following week, but he wanted to have an outlook on the over-all evolution of things.

Senator Robichaud: Enough is enough. On a point of order, I would like to ask a question.

Senator Asselin: Do you have a question?

Senator Robichaud: I wish my good friend Senator Tremblay would ask this question instead of making his third speech this evening.

Senator Guay: That is normal for him.

Senator Tremblay: I do not think I am making a speech.

Senator Guay: You think you are dealing with school kids here.

Senator Tremblay: This is merely the preamble of my question. I am not taking myself seriously, Senator Robichaud, so I hope you do not take yourself seriously either. When I make a speech, my comments are still longer.

Senator Guay: We could read them.

Senator Tremblay: You are not making a speech and your remarks are not even funny.

Senator Robichaud: You should not be boring but pragmatic.

Senator Tremblay: I would like to go on about the duties of the advisory group with regard to the Minister of Finance and the Macdonald Commission. Among the members of this advisory group to the Minister of Finance, there are some prominent individuals who will be asked not only to analyze present conditions but also to make projections.

Senator Guay: He is extraordinary.

Senator Robichaud: Put your question.

Senator Tremblay: I heard someone wonder about his role. This is why I am directing my question once again to the government leader who replied rather briefly.

The individuals involved are asking themselves questions. How will the Macdonald thing and the Lalonde thing operate? Finally, there are two things involved—a group of economic advisers working with the Minister of Finance and another with Macdonald. How will those two things operate? I am using the word “thing” to use a language that Senator Robichaud understands quite well, He makes me use terms such as "thing".

Senator Guay: We understand, but it does not mean anything. It is useless to reply.

Senator Tremblay: The simultaneous translation is perhaps a little slow.

● (2050)

[English]

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might pose a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government.

Many questions are being asked as to the complement of this commission. Some years ago a commission was set up to study Canada's economic prospects. Heading that commission was one Walter Gordon. One of the chief recommendations of that commission was to ship everybody out of the Atlantic provinces, second-class to Ontario.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure us, in the name of all that is sensible, that the same Walter Gordon will not be a member of this commission.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have indicated before that there has only been one commissioner named. When other names are brought forward, they will, no doubt, be made known to honourable senators.

TRANSPORT

AIR CONTROL TOWERS—POSSIBILITY OF CLOSURE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on November 4, 1982, concerning the status of the control tower at Charlottetown airport.

On Thursday last I undertook to reply to Senator Macquarrie regarding the possible closing of the airport control tower at Charlottetown. I brought to his attention the general reply on this question given in the house by the Minister of Transport.

I regret that I have nothing specific to report regarding Charlottetown. All control towers in the country are being reviewed to determine if their hours of operation are justified in light of the level of traffic. No decision, however, has been made about closing or reducing the hours at any specific airport. As the Minister of Transport stressed, the maintenance of a high level of safety will be a major consideration. Should a control tower be closed all or part of the day, pilots would be able to get necessary information through a flight service station, and hence would be able to operate safely.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable minister for his reply regarding the Charlottetown airport. While I consider it an interim reply, I would like to say that the suggestion I made on Thursday to the effect that his office was remiss in answering my question was in error. Whatever non-feasance of duty occurred was in my office. I should like to apologize to any of his people who may have felt that they were in error. The error was in my office.

Senator Olson: Thank you.

THE ECONOMY

BANKRUPTCIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by Senator Balfour on June 3, 1982, concerning the relative rates of bankruptcies in Canada and the United States. It is a fairly long answer and, if it is acceptable, I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answers follows:)

As the honourable senator has noted, figures published by Dun & Bradstreet do indicate that the bankruptcy rate in Canada was about two-and-a-half times that of the United States in 1981. However, let me add that levels of bankruptcy rates for the total economy are not really comparable across the two countries as indicators of economic conditions because of differences in bankruptcy regulations, in coverage of firms and in the nature of businesses operating in the two countries. What is relevant, however, is a comparison of changes in bankruptcy rates over time in the two countries. In this regard, I would like to mention that the bankruptcy rate in Canada actually declined relative to the U.S., from about 5 times in 1978 to two-and-a-half times in 1981. From 1978 to 1981, the bankruptcy rate in Canada increased 22 per cent while in the United States it increased 160 per cent. It has risen by similar percentages in both countries in 1982.

The government is, of course, concerned about the bankruptcy rate as an indicator of business difficulty and as a symptom of the severity of the recession. Special measures have been taken to provide interest assistance to very hard-pressed smaller businesses and farmers. The recent declines in interest rates offer a promise of a more fundamental improvement.

CANADIAN DOLLAR—PURCHASING POWER—COMPARISON WITH OTHER CURRENCIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Guay on July 7, 1982. The question was: How does the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar compare with that of the currencies of other countries such as the United Kingdom, Germany, France, the United States and others? Can we be provided with statistics covering the last few years concerning this particular question?

Honourable senators, that, too, is a somewhat longer answer. Accompanying it are two tables which would be helpful in understanding the reply to the question. If the Senate is in agreement, I will ask that this answer be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

No single measure is available which captures all factors influencing the exchange rate. One concept which has proven useful is that of an "effective" exchange rate. This measures a currency's average experience against other important currencies, with the relative importance of each typically gauged by that country's share in trade.

Table I attached shows the percentage changes in the (nominal) effective exchange rates which were calculated by Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. of New York for sixteen leading currencies. In the Morgan indices, the weighting system used to calculate the average rate is the bilateral trade shares. While changes in effective exchange rates for most currencies in recent years have been smaller than the more familiar changes in their exchange value vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar, Table I nonetheless shows that even on an effective basis these changes have been widely divergent. While the Canadian dollar declined by almost three per cent on an effective basis during the first eight months of this year, this experience followed two years during which the dollar had been relatively stable.

A "real effective exchange rate" adjusts the nominal effective rate for the inflation differentials which exist between the country whose exchange rate is being measured and the other countries making up the group against which the exchange rate is being calculated. This index is intended to gauge the relative competitive position of a country; if exchange rate movements merely offset inflation differentials, there will be no change in price-competitive relationships.

Morgan Guaranty also computes a set of real effective exchange rate indices keyed to wholesale prices of non-food manufactured goods. The movements in these indices over the same periods are shown in Table II. To the extent that Canada's inflation rate has surpassed that of its principal trading partners (particularly the United States), the decline in the nominal exchange rate for the Canadian dollar has overstated the true change in the competitive position of Canada. As the table illustrates, the real effective exchange rate for the Canadian dollar has also been significantly more stable in recent years than those for other currencies.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was hoping that my honourable friend would include a reply to my question about the Post Office with respect to the definition of a letter. My inquiry dates from last July, and has to do with whether there would be a parliamentary occasion upon which to discuss this whole problem before the federal cabinet acted.

If my honourable friend cannot reply this evening, would he let me have an idea as to when he thinks he could do so? The matter is one of some urgency.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will put what we might call an urgent tracer on the question, if that is satisfactory.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1982-83 (NO. 2)

THIRD READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-128, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

November 8, 1982

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 8th day of November, 1982, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a Bill.

I have the honour to be
Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I hope the Deputy of His Excellency will not have to wait for us as long as he did the last time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We all are in a better mood.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED—SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL REFERRED TO LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill S-31, to limit shareholding in certain corporations.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to address the proposed Corporate Shareholding Limitation Act.

A major reason for Confederation was to guarantee the free flow of goods and services between the provinces in 1867 and, as well, in today's renewed partnership of Confederation. I am sure that the Fathers of Confederation in 1867, and all those leaders who, together, renewed our partnership earlier this year, would wish to continue that guarantee.

Free trade, free movement of goods and services and free enterprise have served Canadians extremely well for more than 100 years. That is why this legislation is so important today.

In his recent addresses to the nation, the Prime Minister pointed out that we must look beyond personal or provincial interests and work towards the economic development of the nation as a whole. The Prime Minister urged us to "pull together" to achieve national objectives for all Canadians.

● (2100)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not fight everybody.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition should listen to the totality of this very good speech that is about to be made, without messing up the Hansard report, as he often does, every two or three lines.

Senator Flynn: It would be messed up, even if I did not intervene, just because of you.

Senator Olson: I am sure that all of us, including the Leader of the Opposition, wish to meet our present challenge to forge, as the Prime Minister said, "a new and enduring national partnership." I suggest that Parliament should provide the leadership and respond to our national needs. We must ensure that, in areas which are clearly within the federal sphere, any corporation of national importance is able to pursue its national purpose.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Who are the partners?

Senator Olson: Under the proposed legislation, effective as of November 3, 1982, a provincial government and its agents will be prohibited from owning or holding more than 10 per cent of any class of voting shares of a corporation engaged in international or interprovincial energy pipelines, railways, airlines, shipping, trucking, bus companies and commodity pipelines. In short, the bill will apply to all transportation undertakings to which the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada applies.

It is not a new concept for the federal government to protect and administer its own jurisdiction. The Bank Act of 1980 has a provision restricting provincial governments from owning banks. Parliament placed this limitation on bank ownership in recognition of their importance to the Canadian economy as a whole. The banking system is, and always has been, national in scope. The relationship between banks and every other sector in the economy is self-evident.

Similarly, honourable senators, in broadcasting, the federal government has also found provincial ownership not consistent with the free flow of ideas across the land. In 1970, the government directed that the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission not grant a licence to a corporation controlled by a provincial government or its agent. This, of course, does not apply to educational broadcasting; the Constitution assigns responsibility for education, as is well known, to the provincial governments. The policy in respect of ownership of non-educational broadcasting licences is founded on our serious concern for the preservation of broadcasting as an industry that is to serve the entire nation.

In satellite communications, once again we have seen the concern of this house for the ownership of undertakings clearly within federal jurisdiction. When Parliament passed the act creating Telesat Canada, we expressly prohibited any provincial governments from owning more than 2.5 per cent of voting shares in that company.

Canada is a large country. It is diverse in its cultural heritage, dependent on banking, broadcasting, communications and transportation for its industry and for its culture to flourish. It is essential that corporations in these vital areas of the economy be free to serve the interests of all Canadians, so that we may all benefit together. As a result of such policies, Canada has become a world leader in each of these areas; we have the respect of other nations—respect far beyond what one might expect for a country with a relatively small population.

Transportation is the other sector which is fundamental to the success and growth of our economy. In Canada, I think it is fair to say that the history of transportation is in many ways the history of the nation itself. Transportation not only links us one to another. Throughout our history it has often been the means of economic development. Maritime resource products; Quebec and Ontario manufacturing; Manitoba and Saskatchewan grain; Alberta oil and gas; British Columbia coal and lumber: for centuries Canadians have relied upon an efficient, dynamic, national transportation system.

To compete on world markets, international and interprovincial transportation ought to be under federal jurisdiction. The federal government has assumed its responsibility for jurisdiction over interprovincial and international transportation through various legislative and regulatory initiatives.

In 1975 the federal nature of the transportation system was challenged: the Alberta government purchased Pacific Western Airlines. While the federal government attempted to negate the purchase in the courts, there seemed not to be any legislative instrument relevant to this matter. Accordingly, in 1977, Parliament passed amendments to the Aeronautics Act which prohibited any province or its agent from acquiring any of the voting shares of an airline, without approval of the Government of Canada. At the time, it was recognized that this measure was rather limited, since it applied only to one segment of transportation. Therefore, honourable senators, the Corporate Shareholding Limitation Bill proposes the repeal of section 15.1 of the Aeronautics Act, and its replacement with a more comprehensive approach to restricting provincial ownership of corporations engaged in international or interprovincial transportation.

We believe that this bill will go a long way in preserving the transportation system for the nation as a whole. It will ensure that the international and interprovincial transportation sector will operate for the general benefit of all of Canada. The legislation will not affect existing holdings of provincial governments or their agents.

To remain flexible and to adapt to changing circumstances, the bill will empower the Governor in Council to exempt any new acquisitions from the application of this legislation. It is also important to recognize that this legislation does not prevent provinces from investing in transportation through non-voting shares or other financing instruments.

I think we are all aware that in certain areas the Constitution is very clear as to the division of powers between the federal and provincial jurisdictions. However, the federal government has not always chosen to exercise all of its authority in all areas. For instance, we do not regulate interprovincial trucking but delegate that authority to the provinces.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It seems to work all right.

Senator Olson: But the federal government has always reserved its right to exercise its powers for the greater good of all Canadians.

Provincial investment agencies now control the largest pools of equity capital in the nation. It is well recognized and accepted that they are providing for the financial future of their contributors and for the development of their provincial economies.

However, when such an agency makes substantial equity investments in corporations operating in federal fields, there is a potential risk that such corporations may be directed to adopt policies that are not consistent with the interests of other provinces, or the interests of the nation as a whole.

I believe, honourable senators, that this very important legislation will effectively allow the federal government to ensure that areas of national concern and importance continue to be effectively run by the national government for national goals.

● (2110)

In conclusion, I should like to ask our colleagues on both sides of the house to give consideration to sending this bill to a Senate committee as soon as possible. There are, I am sure, a number of questions that honourable senators may wish to put to the Honourable André Ouellet, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Not only to him.

Senator Olson: I understand that. It may well be that the members of that committee will wish to call in some witnesses, in order to hear other points of view; but no doubt they would want to call the minister first to explain the various clauses. In moving second reading this evening I have tried to outline the general principles contained in the bill, and I hope that we can move to the next stage, namely, the referral of the bill to committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the rather short speech of the sponsor of the bill gives no indication—something which he did admit indeed—of the very special significance of this bill. The reactions which have been provoked so far by the tabling of this bill are a clear indication indeed. A number of provincial governments see that decision as an assault against their jurisdiction, or at least against certain practices or certain policies they have established over many years.

It seems that the federal government did not consult the provinces before tabling this bill, so their governments were caught by surprise. Given current circumstances, of course, confrontation is the order of the day. Over the weekend, we saw the Prime Minister addressing his supporters and renewing his attack against the provinces. He suggested that any province that disagrees with the present government on economic issues is against federalism and against Canada. And, he added, if those people do not want to toe the line, there is only one thing they can do and that is to go away.

The Prime Minister made another rather amusing remark when he spoke highly of Quebecers and said that they showed a lot of maturity by voting for a separatist government in Quebec and a federalist government in Ottawa. Talk about maturity! That gives me, Trudeau, an opportunity to fight with the PQ government; it gives me a good excuse to offer them a chance to get re-elected, as I did in 1981. That is the result he got all right. If I were a provincial Liberal MNA—we have none here, even on the other side of the house—if I were a member of Quebec's provincial Liberal Party, I would be wondering, what kind of ally I have in the person of the present Prime Minister.

Never mind. What I wanted to say is that the way this bill was introduced amounts to another attack against the provinces; the government wants to achieve the goal of the Prime Minister, which is to gain full control over the economy at the federal level and to reduce as much as possible the provincial jurisdiction in that field.

I am not saying that upon close scrutiny the bill will necessarily have all those implications. But at the present time according to the interpretation given to it by the provinces, it is surely the case. Once again, action was taken surreptitiously and bluntly without previous consultation—

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Asselin: Secretly!

Senator Flynn: Secretly, of course. Nobody was notified in advance. It has all the marks of Trudeauism, namely a federalism which denies an economic role to the provinces.

We have seen the results, but once he is gone—I do not know when this will happen—we will assess all the damage which will have to be undone. However, now the Senate is not in a position to express its opinion on the principle of the bill as long as we do not know exactly what are the motives of the minister responsible for this bill, that is Mr. André Ouellet.

[English]

Senator Olson: That has already been explained.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: As usual, the explanations of the Leader of the Government are bombastic and of not much real value.

There is the Minister of Transport, not to mention others, whom we would like to question about this. We should like to be advised of the opinion of those provincial governments which were attacked by Mr. Trudeau over the past week-end. That is most important.

In any case, I suggest that the proper procedure at this stage would be for the subject matter of the bill to be referred to a committee before the Senate is called upon to deal with it on second reading.

Some Hon. Senators: Fine.

Senator Flynn: I do not know whether the Leader of the Government agrees with this proposal? If so, I could let him move this motion himself. If not, I would move it myself.

I do not feel we should be asked to vote on the principle of this bill on second reading now before we are given some explanation.

I would like to make one comment. By introducing this legislation, the government seems to be saying to the provinces: "Please look after the things that come constitutionally under your jurisdiction." I am not sure whether I have misunderstood the Leader of the Government, but if this is true, why do we need any legislation? We can easily ask the courts to tell the provinces: "You have no right to do such a thing, it is outside your jurisdiction." Why should we legislate if what has been done until now is legal? If it is legal, how can it be suggested that we should or could pass such legislation to prevent the provinces from doing certain things?

This is an important question which we shall perhaps be able to clarify in committee when we hear the arguments of this government on the one hand, and the objections that the provinces may raise on the other, concerning the serious consequences that this legislation could have.

In the hope that the Leader of the Government will agree, I suggest that the bill be not now read a second time, but that its subject matter be referred to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, since it deals mainly with federal-provincial relations. If he does not agree, I shall make this suggestion more formally, after he has indicated his disagreement.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I had not wished to enter into the debate, except for the matter that my honourable friend has suggested. It is really a point of order. I think we could agree to refer the subject matter of the bill to a committee. However, I want it made clear that it is not because I am impressed by my honourable friend's interpretation of a number of things.

• (2120)

Senator Flynn: Come on; you said you wanted to deal with the point.

Senator Olson: I want to make that clear, because if my honourable friend is of the opinion that some of the outrageous statements he made about the Prime Minister persuaded me at all, then I would not agree—

Senator Flynn: You will have a chance to reply when you close the debate.

Senator Olson: Very well, but it is obvious that the Leader of the Opposition would like to have more of an explanation of the—

Senator Flynn: Not from you.

Senator Olson: I understand that, but if the honourable senator wants more of an explanation of the bill, it seems to me that it would probably take no more time to refer the subject matter—if the honourable senator would so agree—to the proper committee, that being the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Olson: If it is a very narrow point concerning constitutional affairs only, then the bill should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Asselin: Yes, it is the basic principle.

Senator Olson: Otherwise, looking at this other matter, it seems to me that the bill should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Perhaps my honourable friend would like to consider the matter because it seems to me that we should refer the subject matter to the same committee to which we will formally refer the bill some time later.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not going to argue indefinitely as to what committee the bill should go to, but it seems to me that the whole thing is rather silly. The Senate is supposed to represent regional and provincial concerns, and the concerns expressed up to now have been by the provinces, and the object of the bill—this is what the government wishes to achieve—is to restrict the initiatives of the provinces in the purchasing of stocks in certain corporations. Therefore, the committee to which are referred matters dealing with federal-provincial relations should be the committee to deal with this matter as far as the provinces are concerned. We would be saying something to the provinces if we were to refer the bill to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee because it is a matter that concerns the provinces. But if the Leader of the Government insists on rejecting my choice, or on saying to the provinces that the government does not consider their concerns to be of great import, then he can have the bill referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. He has the majority.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was not intending to do that. The Leader of the Opposition has presented an argument, the substance of which, I said a moment ago, I do not agree with. However, he has made a suggestion that I am prepared to consider favourably, because I do not think there is any great difference between the committees and their activities while studying the subject matter of bills, or bills themselves. The Leader of the Opposition then suggested that the bill be sent to a different committee, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I can understand his point of view because it is in accordance with rule 67(1)(j)(i), which deals with the terms of reference of that committee.

However, I am sure that my honourable friend would agree that, since the bill involves the holding of large funds, shares of various types, including non-voting shares, investment and so on, traditionally, at least, it would be sent to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. The point that I wanted to make with the honourable senator is that we should refer the subject matter of the bill to the same committee to which we will formally send the bill some time later. It is not a case of using the majority; it seems to me that the provinces, and anyone else who wants to, can make representations before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and when the bill is formally referred to that committee, they will be familiar with it.

Senator Asselin: The committees do not have the same membership.

Senator Olson: Perhaps my honourable friend would like to make that suggestion.

Senator Flynn: On the other hand, the bill could be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to the Transport and Communications or to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee for the reasons you indicated. But at this point in time the main problem is one of federal-provincial relations, and that is why I suggested the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. If, after the bill is returned from the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee and has received second reading, you think that from a technical point of view of stocks, and how to proceed with an acquisition or the annulment of an illegal acquisition, the bill should be studied by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, you will receive no objections from me.

If the honourable senator does not want to appear to be worried about the objections raised by some provincial governments, that is fine, but I think that the best committee to study the matter at this point is the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I could make an equally good argument for the bill's being referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, which has as its first term of reference, "banking, insurance, trust and loan companies, credit societies, caisse populaires" and so on. But in the interest of being as co-operative as I can—

Senator Flynn: Good.

Senator Olson: —we will support the motion as it is moved by the Leader of the Opposition. I wonder if he is also prepared to give us an indication that the subject matter would be limited in that committee to the constitutional matter?

Senator Flynn: It would be up to the committee. As to the technical aspects of the bill, whether or not the committee deals with them does not present a problem. As I said before, if the Leader of the Government would like to have the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee deal with the rest of the problems involved in this legislation, I would certainly not object.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is one other point that I would like to make and it is with regard to Bill S-32 which will be coming before us tomorrow. That bill if it receives second reading, will also be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, because it falls within its terms of reference.

Senator Asselin: It is not an urgent bill.

Senator Olson: This raises the question of whether we should need two bills, which should be dealt with in the same time frame, to the same committee. Perhaps the committee can handle them, but it seems to me that by spreading the workload a little we could have both committees working concurrently. But if that presents no problem to my honourable friend, then perhaps he could move his motion.

Senator Flynn: Let us deal with Bill S-32 when it is before us. I suggest that there is no urgency there. That bill must be considered in light of the representations of the groups involved in the particular system of parole, and so on. It seems that the committee will be able to arrange the study of Bill S-32 in due course, even if it has to deal with this one at the same time or not.

Therefore, honourable senators, in amendment, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by Senator Roblin:

That the bill be not now read the second time, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority
(No. 2).

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

—————
The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 9, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, on Thursday, November 11, Canada will pay tribute to the many thousands of her veterans, men and women who served their country in time of war, and, particularly, will remember those who are buried in 70 different countries and in the seven seas of the world.

For the sixty-fourth time, ceremonies will be held at memorials across Canada with fewer and fewer veterans in attendance because age wearies them or they have passed on.

As veterans' organizations now look to replacing their diminishing numbers, they have turned to pass the torch to sons and daughters, our younger citizens, most of whom can think of wars only as parts of history books and television documentaries.

Let us hope that these young Canadians can reflect on the fact that those who lie in graves far away were also the youth of Canada during World War I, World War II and the Korean War, and that they gave their lives to preserve peace in Canada. The 714,000 of us who are left must never let them remove from their young minds that duty and responsibility to preserve peace in Canada.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the government and senators on this side of the chamber, I join with Senator Marshall in his tribute. As he said, we should never forget the tremendous sacrifice that has been made and that we, as a nation, recognize on November 11 each year.

I want to keep my remarks brief, but I should like to suggest that the passage of time, as has been pointed out, can lead to a diminishing of the recognition of the tremendous sacrifices that were made by those who were, in many cases, members of families. Indeed, a large number of the veterans who are still alive have to live, following that interruption in their lives during the period when they served, with very serious consequences.

With great sincerity we join in this tribute at this time.

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

RECOGNITION OF SIXTH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN HELSINKI MONITORING GROUP—MOTION REQUESTING RELEASE OF IMPRISONED MEMBERS

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to submit a resolution to be adopted by the Senate. This is a follow-up of the resolution that was unanimously passed by this chamber last year.

November 9, today, marks the sixth anniversary of the founding of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote Implementation of the Helsinki Accords in Ukraine. It is noteworthy that President Ronald Reagan of the United States of America has issued a proclamation designating this day to honour the sixth anniversary of this group, which is also the day of the resumption of the Madrid Review Conference.

I am now proposing a resolution to return to the defence of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, which has been virtually destroyed by the Soviet government. This matter has been discussed with the leaders of both sides of the chamber, and they have indicated their whole-hearted approval.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Yuzyk: With leave, seconded by Senator Andrew Thompson, I move the following resolution:

WHEREAS on November 9, 1976, the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords (known also as the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group) was established in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, to monitor the provisions of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, signed by the Soviet Union and 34 other countries, including Canada and the United States;

AND WHEREAS it was well-documented at the Belgrade and Madrid Review Conferences that the Soviet Union has violated and continues to flagrantly violate the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, as well as the Soviet Constitution, the United Nations Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

AND WHEREAS the Soviet Union has persecuted, imprisoned or exiled all 38 members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, and has been harassing the members of their families, thus increasing the tensions between the East and West and undermining the validity of the international treaties and agreements of the Soviet Union;

BE IT RESOLVED THAT on the sixth anniversary of the foundation of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords, the Senate of Canada pay tribute to the Group's persecuted members and request that the Soviet Union immediately release all the imprisoned members of this Group and cease the persecution of all those who are active in the defence of human rights in compliance with the Helsinki Final Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is proposed by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Thompson—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I certainly have no wish to withhold leave, but I should point out that the chairman of the committee, Senator Bonnell, is not present today. Perhaps Senator Marshall would agree to our taking this proposal as notice, to give us an opportunity to speak to the chairman about it. He can then move his motion next week when "Motions" is called.

Senator Marshall: I called Senator Bonnell and learned that he would be away today, and I then checked with the deputy chairman, Senator Bird. However, I am willing to wait.

Senator Frith: Perhaps, then, Your Honour, we may treat Senator Marshall's motion as a Notice of Motion, and have it appear on the Orders of the Day for next Tuesday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 16 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

AIRLINES

QUÉBECAIR—POSSIBLE EXEMPTION FROM PROVISIONS OF BILL S-31

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. The Senate will recall that for several months I have asked the government's representatives in the Senate about the status of Québecair, Nordair and Air Ontario. More specifically, I pointed out that it was essential to the survival of Québecair as a francophone carrier in Canada, that the government authorize the acquisition of Nordair. Not long ago we found out that in August, both Air Ontario and Québecair had made an offer to the federal government regarding the acquisition of Nordair. However, there was no satisfactory response from the Department of Transport. Today, the Canadian people and especially the people of Quebec are concerned about the future of this francophone carrier. In fact, not long ago the Government of Quebec intimated that if the federal government persisted in its desire to see Bill S-31 passed and thus limit investment by provincial governments in airlines, as the province of Quebec is doing in the case of Québecair, that its shares could not exceed 10 per cent since this would not be authorized by the Department of Transport.

We were told that if this legislation were passed, it would be the end of our francophone carrier, Québecair. It was also said that the airline's administrators were ready to cease operations this Friday, if they had no positive response from the Minister of Transport and the federal government.

My question is as follows: Does the government, in view of Bill S-31, intend to rescue Québecair by exempting it from the provisions of this legislation?

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I realize that the Government of Quebec has clearly chosen or, at least, it is reported to have chosen this opportunity to blame the federal government for Québecair's problems. Nothing could be further from the truth. Bill S-31 does nothing to inhibit the Quebec government from giving grants or other contributions to that company. Bill S-31 does nothing to alter the Quebec government's hold on the investment it now has in Québecair.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It adds to it.

Senator Olson: In 1977 the Parliament of Canada placed a prohibition on the ability of provincial governments to hold debt and equity in airlines operating interprovincially and internationally. The Québecair-Nordair case was already subject to the provisions of the Aeronautics Act, which are well known to my colleagues and particularly to Senator Asselin. In fact, Bill S-31 would give the provinces the ability to hold up to 10 per cent of an airline's equity.

In any event, the subject matter of Bill S-31 has now been referred to a committee, and I expect that the minister who is directly responsible for such matters, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, will be at the very first meeting of the committee, at which time this matter can be pursued.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. There is a great deal of concern and confusion about Bill S-31 which is now before the Senate for consideration and which yesterday was referred to committee for study, namely regarding the manner in which it is to be interpreted and implemented. To reassure the employees and the board of directors of Québecair, could the Leader of the Government ask the Minister of Transport whether the government intends to exempt Québecair from the provision of Bill S-31? I do not share the opinion just given by the Leader of the Government regarding the interpretation of Bill S-31. It is clear that with this bill, the federal government wants to limit to 10 per cent the number of shares held by provinces in airlines and other companies under federal jurisdiction that are mentioned in the bill.

I feel that some clarification is called for, and I would ask my honourable friend to ask the Minister of Transport whether he could make a statement indicating that Québecair would not be affected by Bill S-31 and that there will be discussions with the Government of Quebec to give that government the assurance that in future it will be able to take an interest of more than 10 per cent in this air carrier.

● (1415)

[English]

Senator Olson: Well, the Honourable Senator Asselin is correct. Bill S-31 does provide that the Governor in Council may make an exemption for any specific purpose. However, rather than asking the Minister of Transport now, it seems to me that he would need to have before him a specific proposal, and I do not believe he has one at the moment.

In any event, Senator Asselin is correct in saying that there is provision in Bill S-31 for a specific exemption regarding a specific proposal respecting the amount of shares which a provincial government or its agent may hold.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have another supplementary directly related to the previous one. As I said earlier to the Leader of the Government, last August the Governments of Quebec and Ontario submitted an offer to the Minister of Transport for the acquisition of Nordair by Air Ontario and Québecair. Their offer was not acknowledged, however.

In the circumstances, why did the Minister of Transport, just a few days ago, use his discretionary powers to grant Air Ontario an exclusive licence to provide air services to Toronto,

[Senator Olson.]

Ottawa and Montreal on a route that was already partly being used by Québecair?

Was this a way of heading Québecair off at the pass and letting it know indirectly that the offer made in August, namely, that Air Ontario and Québecair could acquire Nordair if they did so jointly, was no longer open?

[English]

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is asking for an explanation from the Minister of Transport respecting his interpretation of what happened, and I will accept that and ask the Minister of Transport for that kind of explanation, but I will not accept the argument my honourable friend has just made.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc: With respect to Québecair, honourable senators, if the Quebec provincial government wants to continue to bail out that company as it did in the case of Tricofil, which is an unprofitable concern, can it not continue to do so for Québecair in spite of Bill S-31?

Senator Asselin: No.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What has Tricofil got to do with it?

[English]

Senator Olson: I am sorry, senator, but I did not hear the whole of your question.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: There is precious little to understand.

[English]

Senator Leblanc: What I was asking was this: If Bill S-31 is passed, will the Government of Quebec be prevented from helping Québecair, if it wants to? According to my understanding of the proposed legislation, they will still be able to subsidize a non-operating or non-profit-making company—and, certainly, that company has not made any money in the past, and I doubt if it will in the future. If the government wants to continue to spend the Quebec taxpayers' money on Québecair, it can do so, I believe, despite Bill S-31.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Asselin: No.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Leblanc is correct. I shall repeat one sentence of what I said a few minutes ago, and it is that Bill S-31 does nothing to inhibit the Quebec government from giving grants or other contributions to that company.

Senator Flynn: Contributions, but not to acquire control.

Senator Asselin: They cannot acquire control. Be honest!

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: I have a supplementary. If I understand correctly, before Bill S-31, and under section 16(8.1) of the Aeronautics Act, the Government of Quebec was allowed to invest, as it in fact did, about $15 million to finance Québecair, and according to the section to which I just referred, permission from the governor in council was required, even in legislation previous to Bill S-31. At least, that is how the section reads.

Was permission in fact granted? And if permission was granted, could the minister now say whether, in the event of a future request or application for the same permission, that permission would be granted, since the same passage appears almost unchanged in Bill S-31?

[English]

Senator Olson: There is no doubt in my mind that all of these questions can properly be directed to the minister when he appears before the committee. He will have not only his legal officers with him but also senior officers from the department who can review the history and answer Senator Tremblay's question.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI FINAL ACT—REQUEST FOR UPDATE ON MADRID REVIEW CONFERENCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government, today or at a later date, be able to provide us with an up-to-date review of the resumption of the Madrid Review Conference of the Helsinki Final Act, along with the compliances and violations of signatory countries?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as mentioned earlier today, that meeting is scheduled to resume today in Madrid. I shall ask for a review from the Department of External Affairs as soon as one is available.

SPORT

WINTER OLYMPIC GAMES, CALGARY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

On November 2 I asked the minister a couple of questions on the Winter Olympic Games to be held in Calgary in 1988. I am not satisfied that I asked the questions clearly enough—and I am not being critical of the answers given.

Would the minister confirm what I understood his answer to be, that the $200 million commitment to the Calgary Olympic Games is a commitment that will be lived up to by the federal government, notwithstanding revenues from lotteries, stamps or what-have-you; that is, that it is a firm $200 million commitment?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, that commitment to Calgary will not in any way be diminished as a result of certain events which have occurred with respect to sports pools in certain provinces.

Senator Nurgitz: So I trust that the Calgary Winter Olympic Games will receive $200 million from the federal government, notwithstanding other events of any kind.

Senator Perrault: The offer to Calgary is to contribute up to $200 million to the Winter Olympic Games to be held in Calgary in 1988.

I may say that I am planning to fly to Calgary this evening and that there will be an announcement made in Calgary tomorrow morning with respect to the federal government's participation in the Winter Olympic Games.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Why not make that announcement here?

Senator Nurgitz: My next question is not in the category of a supplementary question, but is directly connected to the Winter Olympic Games which will take place in Calgary.

In a newspaper account, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport has indicated that federal participation in various national sporting groups will have to be diverted or changed somewhat, and that some emphasis ought to be placed on the kinds of games that would be played in Calgary, so that, as a host country, we will do better.

● (1425)

Could the minister list for us those various sporting organizations that will either no longer receive funds from the federal government or that will have reduced funds?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there has been a speculative story in at least one newspaper suggesting that there would be cutbacks in certain sports grants in order to facilitate a better performance by Canada at the forthcoming Winter Olympic Games. I have not issued any statement of that type. First, I have said that we will co-operate with the Calgary organizing committee, an excellent committee, to ensure that these are the most successful winter games ever held in Olympic history.

Secondly, we believe that all Canadians would wish Canada to perform as well as possible at those games. We are considering, in co-operation with the provinces, a program which will develop more high performance Winter Olympic Games athletes by 1988. We are looking at programs which involve not only western Canada but also eastern Canada. There is an enormous amount of talent in all parts of the country. There are young people who have great talent and whose skills can be assisted by access to good coaching and training facilities. We intend to do our very best with the provinces to assure a good Canadian performance at the Winter Olympic Games in 1988.

We were not satisfied with all aspects of the Canadian team's performance at the Brisbane Commonwealth Games. Although there were outstanding performances, I feel that most Canadians would have wished that we had won more of the events. We want to make sure that Canadian Winter Olympic Games skills are honed to the highest degree possible in time for the events, which does not mean significant cutbacks for other sports.

Senator Nurgitz: I thank the minister for his answer and apologize for not indicating that it was a matter of speculation, but his answer is certainly an indication that various sporting groups, which are now funded by the federal government, need not fear any cutbacks in future in view of Canada's being the host at the 1984 Olympic Games.

Senator Perrault: We are looking at the general budget available for fitness and amateur sport. There may be adjustments in certain sections of the program, but no final decisions have been made. There are continuing requests for funding for various sports and activities. Requests have come in for federal funding for the martial arts. At the present time we are providing assistance for over 60 different sports, covering a great many sports in the spectrum, but there are still others which do not receive either provincial or federal funding. We hope that the negotiations, which will begin very shortly with the Calgary Olympic Committee, will be completed by the spring of 1983. There are many complicated agreements to be put in place.

The honourable senator asked, in one of his earlier questions, how the federal money is to be spent. Until we get into the negotiations we will be unable to say how much money will be allocated for each site. The Calgary committee, as honourable senators may be aware, is attempting to determine the final site for many of the events. Until we know that, it will be difficult to say how much money will be spent.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—TERMS OF REFERENCE—
FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONSTITUTIONAL MEETINGS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, which is based on the terms of reference to the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada.

The terms of reference mention a number of governmental institutions and arrangements that have been the subject matter of constitutional meetings between the federal and provincial governments.

Does the fact that these matters are now referred to a royal commission indicate that the meetings will be cancelled, or that such matters will be before federal-provincial meetings and the royal commission at the same time?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I should take that question as notice so that I can look into the matter more deeply. However, at first blush, I would think that the commitment that the Government of Canada made respecting a certain number of constitutional meetings and their subject matter will continue, even though certain aspects of constitutional arrangements have been assigned to this commission.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

THE ECONOMY

NOVA SCOTIA—GLACE BAY AND PORT HAWKESBURY—
RUMOURED CLOSING OF HEAVY WATER PLANT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Muir on November 2 concerning what he termed the rumoured closing of Glace Bay and Port Hawkesbury heavy water plants.

I have made further inquiries regarding the rumoured closing of the Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay heavy water plants, and at this time I have nothing further to add to the reply I gave Senator Muir last week.

However, concerning the status of the negotiations with the Government of Korea for the sale of a second CANDU reactor, I have a fairly lengthy reply which I would be happy to file with Hansard so that it may be taken as read, if that is satisfactory.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, because of the importance of these negotiations to all senators, if the answer is not too long and, since I am sure everyone is interested in whether we do sell a second CANDU reactor to Korea, I think it would be in the best interests of this chamber to have the answer read.

Senator Olson: My answer to that part of the question is as follows:

The present CANDU project in Korea, Wolsung-I, is proceeding well with the station expected to be in operation by the end of 1982. The customer, the Korea Electric Power Corporation, KEPCO, is pleased with the progress and AECL's performance on the project.

KEPCO has delayed plans for commitment of additional nuclear units, previously scheduled for commitment in 1982, due to faltering growth of electrical demand which is largely due to the world-wide economic recession.

AECL now expects KEPCO will be inviting bids on its next multi-unit, 2,000 megawatt stations in the spring of 1983. AECL expects to participate in this competition.

KEPCO has indicated that further commitments to CANDU will await satisfactory operation of the Wolsung-I plant. Provided the early performance of Wolsung-I meets expectations, there may be an opportunity to negotiate a second 600-megawatt unit contract prior to the inquiry for the next 2,000-megawatt station. AECL is currently prepared for such negotiations on short notice.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTING PRACTICES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Charbonneau concerning whether the government would change its accounting practices as a result of criticism by the Auditor General. The reply in this case is quite long, and therefore, I ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The government has initiated a study on the purposes and objectives of its financial statements, taking into account the needs of Parliament, the people of Canada and other particular classes of financial statement users. The study is being undertaken by the Office of the Comptroller General and preliminary terms of reference and time schedules have been submitted to the Public Accounts Committee, which will be monitoring the study's progress. To date, the study is progressing as planned. The outputs of this study will be reviewed by a steering committee composed of senior representatives of the Privy Council Office, Treasury Board, the Departments of Finance, Supply and Services, Statistics Canada and others. The Government has informally asked the Auditor-General to assist this steering committee, in an advisory capacity. The study will closely parallel research currently being undertaken by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and therefore, consultations with the CICA will also take place.

In 1981-82, the government undertook a study to apply alternative accounting policies to its financial statements. Illustrative financial statements (unaudited) were prepared including a revised Statement of Assets and Liabilities with the equity and value of government-owned enterprises recorded as an asset and a Statement of Revenue and Expenditure which included the net results of operations of these enterprises. In addition, the Statement of Assets and Liabilities included estimates of all government liabilities and all government assets, such as inventories and fixed assets not intended to be converted into cash, as well as summary disclosure of the financial position of government-owned enterprises. When it came to assessing these efforts, it became obvious that the criteria by which to evaluate them was lacking. The purposes and objectives of the illustrative financial statements had not been established beforehand, nor had any alternatives to the concept of the reporting entity been agreed upon for purposes of the exercise. Therefore, the study was abandoned in favour of the study outlined below.

In 1982-83, the government began a study of the purposes and objectives of the financial statements, the terms of reference for which read as follows:

"To study the purposes and objectives which should underly the financial statements of the government of Canada, taking into account the information needs of Parliament, the people of Canada and other particular classes of financial statement users."

The terms of reference clearly understood that the purposes and objectives put forward were to provide reference points for initiating discussions on a rational evolution to the financial statements that would be satisfactory to Parliament and the public, acceptable to the accounting and auditing profession, and wholly appropriate for their purposes as management statements of the federal government. A draft Discussion Paper has been prepared, certain members of the Auditor-General's staff have been briefed on its contents, and will be ready for public discussion in the new year.

The study is a tremendous effort that will involve all government central agencies, many government departments, the Auditor-General and the CICA. A timetable has been provided to the Public Accounts Committee and the study is meeting this timetable.

THE ECONOMY

INDUSTRIAL STRATEGIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the last delayed answer I have is in response to a question asked by Senator Murray on November 2 concerning the report of the Task Force on East Coast Fisheries.

I have made inquiries and have been informed that the report of the Task Force on East Coast Fisheries will indeed be made public. The report should be out by early in the new year.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

GENEVA MEETING—WHEAT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin concerning the composition of, and the position that will be taken by, the Canadian delegation at the GATT meeting in Geneva.

Perhaps this answer could be taken as read, and printed in today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Subject to the right to ask further questions.

Senator Argue: Yes.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister of State for International Trade, the Honourable Gerald A. Regan, will be leading the Canadian delegation to the GATT Ministerial meeting.

The Canadian delegation will be comprised of officials of a number of departments which will, of course, possess the necessary expertise on the various agricultural issues and commodities being dealt with at the meeting, including grain.

Minister Regan and his delegation recognize that Canadian agriculture and particularly the grain sector make a very important contribution to Canada's external accounts. They appreciate that if Canadian agriculture and the grain industry are to realize their productive potential, export expansion is critical given the relatively small size of our domestic market.

Unfortunately, the agricultural policies of a number of countries are increasingly distorting international markets and trading patterns for agricultural products such as grain. What Canada will be seeking at the GATT Ministerial meeting in Geneva in late November is agreement that it is urgent to address these problems and to initiate work aimed at developing solutions.

In this regard, the Canadian delegation will attach particular priority to bringing direct and indirect subsidies affecting agricultural exports including grain under greater international discipline and providing a greater degree of predictability in terms of access to markets.

A further objective or priority at the GATT Ministerial meeting will be to move towards a redressing of the current imbalance in GATT obligations among countries in this sector.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

UNIVERSALITY OF OLD AGE SECURITY AND FAMILY ALLOWANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourables senators, while we are on the subject of delayed answers, and before Senator Austin leaves, I am wondering if he is now in a position to reply to the questions put by this side and, more convincingly, by Senator McElman last week.

In view of the meeting of the Liberal Party over the weekend, is he in a position to give a clear and definite answer to those questions?

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Indeed, I am, honourable senators. My answer of October 27 still stands.

Senator Flynn: It did not appear to be satisfactory to Senator McElman, and it is not satisfactory to me. I am merely trying to assist the Senate and even Senator McElman.

Perhaps the honourable senator has a secret reply.

Hon. Charles McElman: I keep no secrets from you.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-31, intituled: "An Act to limit shareholding in certain corporations".—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not know whether I am out of order but, since the subject matter of this bill has been referred to committee, I do not think we can continue the debate until we have a report from the committee. I, therefore, do not think the bill should stand on the Order Paper. I think it should be deleted from the Order Paper and reinstated when we have a committee report, since that is the essence of the decision taken by this chamber last evening.

[Senator Argue.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we can look into this question during the adjournment.

In the meantime, I think it is in order that it stand on the Order Paper because it has not received second reading. However, that does not mean that we have to stand it every day; we can adjourn second reading debate for a week if we wish.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: We can adjourn second reading to a named day.

Senator Flynn shakes his head, so perhaps we should look into both questions. Is it regular that it remain on the Order Paper for second reading, since it has not yet been given second reading and the bill's subject matter has been referred to committee? And, if it does remain on the Order Paper, is there anything out of order in adjourning it to a date when we can anticipate the committee might report? If not, we can adjourn it from day to day, providing the answer to the first question is "yes".

Senator Flynn: The wording of the motion passed last night was "That the bill be not now read the second time," and that means that the debate be not continued at this time but that the subject matter be referred to a committee. That means we will continue with the second reading debate when the bill comes back from committee; otherwise it is nonsensical.

Senator Frith: I do not interpret the words as Senator Flynn does. The motion "That the bill be not now read the second time" does not have the same effect as adjourning the debate.

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Frith: Let us remember what happens at the conclusion of the debate. His Honour the Speaker says: "It is moved by the Honourable Senator (so-and-so), seconded by the Honourable Senator (so-and-so), that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?" That is the motion, that it be read the second time.

We had before us the motion that it "not now be read the second time, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred" to committee.

Senator Flynn: Please, please!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I feel precisely the same way, but I do not shake my head as Senator Flynn does. It is just possible that someone who disagrees with a viewpoint of Senator Flynn's might, once in a while, be making some sense. Senator Flynn shakes his head again, indicating that that is a virtual impossibility.

I nevertheless suggest that we consider the matter during the adjournment and, if necessary, ask for a ruling. Let us both look up the authorities and see whether there is anything irregular in having a bill remain on the Order Paper.

● (1440)

Senator Flynn: It has never been done.

Senator Frith: It certainly has been. It happened with the Canada Day Bill. It stayed on the Order Paper and came up on the Order Paper exactly as it was. I am simply suggesting that we both look at the authorities to see whether there is anything irregular in the adoption of such a procedure.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): It is regular. Order stands.

PENITENTIARY ACT PAROLE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the second reading of Bill S-32, to amend the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill deals primarily with the release of an inmate from custody for the last one-third of his sentence, which period is called remission, which Parliament decided can be served, not in custody but in public, under certain terms and conditions, and those terms and conditions are known as mandatory supervision.

Remission is not new. Remission of a sentence in custody has been used in Canada for over 100 years. It has been accepted throughout the enlightened world with respect to the administration of corrections. The last three reports of inquiries into the corrections process in Canada—the Fauteux report, the Hugessen report and the report of the Senate on parole—all supported the principle of remissions, but under different names and under different conditions. The Senate committee, under Senator Goldenberg, recommended, as I recall, that the last one-third of a sentence be served under a different nomenclature, and it was to be called minimum parole.

However, as we found in our study of parole at that time, the release of inmates was one subject that was totally misunderstood, not only by the judiciary, as between the judiciary and custodial officials, but, indeed, as between the public and the inmate. That also holds true with respect to the last one-third of a sentence, remission. We concluded from our study that it had to be recognized that a sentence by a court was a sentence, and that it was the intention of society that that sentence be served. Where it was served and how it was served was left to Parliament to decide. Parliament, in its wisdom, has decided that the last one-third can be served, subject to certain conditions, outside of custody; the authority to release inmates into society, under certain conditions and circumstances, in the first two-thirds of the sentence being delegated to the paroling authority.

Parliament has made that decision as to where and how an inmate will serve his term, and he can serve it under maximum security, medium security, minimum security, minimum-minimum security or out on the street. We have delegated authority for that first two-thirds to the Parole Board. On the last one-third, we must assume authority for the inmate being released, because it was the Parliament of Canada which passed the act providing for the remission of the last one-third of a sentence to be served on the street.

Before 1970 an inmate, through his good conduct while in custody, was permitted to earn remission, and he added to that statutory remission which represented about one-third of his sentence. So, at the end of two-thirds of his sentence he was free to go, with no strings attached.

On the sound principle that an inmate being released from custody is in need of support, provided he accepts it, and also that society is in need of some protection, we decided that we would institute this process called mandatory supervision, which meant that instead of going free to do as he wanted for that last one-third of his sentence an inmate was released to the supervision of the National Parole Service, where he was required to undertake practically the same conditions as an inmate released on parole.

Hon. Martial Asselin: After one-third?

Senator Hastings: For the last one-third. He was under practically the same conditions as an inmate released on parole, because he needed the same support, if he was wise enough, as any inmate on parole. This was called mandatory supervision, and it has been in effect since 1970.

I want to say a word, if I might, about supervision. I think there is an element of public protection, but I do not think we do justice to the public by conveying the impression that supervision of an inmate released from a penitentiary will convey any great deal of public protection. Supervision is not surveillance. Supervision consists of an inmate's reporting once a week—"Where are you? What are you doing?" He is free the rest of the week to do whatever he wants and to go wherever he wants, provided he stays in the locale. But it does, I will concede, grant a measure of public protection, in that perhaps slipping into criminal activity can be detected and he can be returned to custody fairly quickly.

In March 1979 the Solicitor General of the day appointed a committee of his department to conduct an examination. It was authorized to evaluate the effectiveness of mandatory supervision and to make appropriate recommendations. That committee met for a year and a half. It used the consultative process by consulting all the groups included in the correctional process—the field staffs, the unions, the Solicitor General, the police, private agencies and inmates. Of course, it received, as you might suspect, various degrees of response to its inquiries, from those who said, "Leave them in there for the whole sentence," to the inmate who wanted to be out scot-free at the end of two-thirds of his sentence.

The bill before us is an attempt to reach a compromise, to give that certain degree of support to the offender and, as I said before, a degree of protection to society.

The history of mandatory supervision is not bad and it is not good. It has been found that 23 per cent of those released from mandatory supervision have had to be returned to institutions due to the commission of crimes; 18 per cent have had to have their mandatory supervision revoked due to violations of the conditions of release. However, when you look at the 23 per cent who are convicted of crimes, you find that 60 per cent of those crimes were against property, 12 per cent were against persons, mostly assault, 15 per cent were robberies, 4 per cent narcotic offences and 8 per cent miscellaneous violations. The most significant figure is that 6.3 per cent involved violence, including homicide and manslaughter, but principally robbery and non-fatal assault.

● (1450)

So, in an attempt to answer public criticism of the startling and violent acts that have been perpetrated, the Solicitor General has brought forward Bill S-32, to amend the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act.

As I have said, many views have been expressed on it. Inmates are opposed to it because they see it as taking back a right which they think they have earned, and most private care agencies support the views of the inmates. On the other hand, the majority of prison staff support the amendment because they believe it corrects a weakness in a system which is basically sound.

The bill attempts to take both sides into consideration. It is a carefully balanced piece of legislation. It is responsive to the concerns of the public and the police without, at the same time, being Draconian. It maintains the principle of the program, that the inmate can be released after two-thirds of his sentence, under certain circumstances and conditions. However, it does provide that once the terms and conditions of his release are violated, he must be returned to custody to serve out that one-third of his sentence, and he cannot again be released on mandatory supervision.

We have got ourselves into a "revolving door" situation. Under the present system, if a man is released under three years' mandatory supervision and he commits a crime during that time—let us say, within one year—on return he immediately starts to earn remission again. Therefore, he has to be released into society again, and if he violates mandatory supervision, yet again, he is returned and again starts earning remission.

This legislation will end this "revolving door" syndrome. Inmates will be given one chance, and if they fail to live up to the terms of the agreement of their release, or if they are convicted of an offence and have their mandatory supervision revoked, they will serve that portion of their sentence, and the only possibility of release during that term will be by the Parole Board. Essentially, we are protecting society to the extent that we are putting an end to the "revolving door" approach.

If the bill receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I am sure that honourable senators will have questions to ask, not only with respect to the bill but also with respect to other matters under the direction of the Solicitor General.

[Senator Hastings.]

Speaking for myself, I would like to know—and I am sure the chairman of the committee will want to know—why such legislation is always drafted in terms of the masculine third person singular. It continually refers to an inmate as "he". I notice that the Penitentiary Act continually refers to the Commissioner of Penitentiaries as "him" and "he". In these days of women's liberation, I should have thought that with a little imagination the draftsman could have drafted bills in terms of the neuter gender. I would also like to ask the officials a question regarding the change of name to the Canadian Correctional Service. To the best of my knowledge and belief, Parliament decided it was to be called the Canadian Penitentiary Service. Suddenly, we are now calling it the Canadian Correctional Service. I am wondering who makes these decisions when Parliament makes others.

Section 5 of the Penitentiary Act states:

The Minister may appoint officers of the Service to be known as Directors of Divisions and Regional Directors.

"Regional Directors" have suddenly taken on the nomenclature of "Deputy Commissioners." I should like to ask the officials: When Parliament makes these decisions, under what authority are these changes of name taking place?

I commend the bill to honourable senators.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate the honourable senator on his lucid explanation of the bill. I am aware of his deep interest in the subject.

May I ask him a question regarding the number of parole officers in Canada? It is my understanding that such officers are already carrying a heavy caseload, and nowhere in the bill do I read that there will be an increase in the number of parole officers.

Senator Hastings: Possibly that question would be better directed to the minister or his officials in committee. The honourable senator is quite right. We found, in our examination of parole, that not only do we have a woefully inadequate number of parole officers, but we have an inadequate number of qualified correctional personnel throughout the whole system. The honourable senator might wish to pursue that subject further with respect to medical and psychiatric treatment, and so on. This underlines the risks in releasing men from custody. It is a very inexact science. No matter how much thought is brought to bear on the matter, mistakes will be made both by the Parole Board and by Parliament, which authorized release for that last one-third of a sentence.

It seems to me that if we are willing to grant release, then we must understand that there are likely to be "failures". At the same time, we must predicate it on the assumption that a former inmate is returning to society. Unless an inmate is sentenced to life, you cannot keep him in custody forever. Therefore, methods and means must be found to protect society by bringing him back into society as quickly and as kindly as possible. The best protection we could have is to have an inmate back in society fulfilling a useful purpose, in contrast to the adverse aspects of having him remain in custody.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Would it be possible for representatives of the inmates to testify before the committee?

Senator Hastings: That would have to be a decision of the committee.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

SPRING MEETING, FUNCHAL, MADEIRA, PORTUGAL

Hon. Earl A. Hastings rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 3, 1982:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Spring meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Funchal on the Island of Madeira, Portugal, from 28th to 31st May, 1982 and to the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, my first observation must be to apologize for the length of time this inquiry has been on the Order Paper; but I assure honourable senators that a rendezvous with a cardiac surgeon and convalescence during the summer recess necessitated the delay. On the other hand, in light of recent comments in the media, perhaps a response is more timely now than earlier. It seems to me that the press, in picking up this story, reported in a completely uninformed manner as to the purpose of parliamentary associations and what membership in those associations is all about. I propose to deal quickly with the North Atlantic Assembly, but what I am about to say will no doubt apply to all the parliamentary associations, whose purpose is to impart information amongst parliamentarians.

• (1500)

I believe it was John F. Kennedy who, when asked at the time of the Cuban crisis 20 years ago, "What great lesson did you learn from that crisis?" said that by far the most important lesson was to keep in contact, in communication with your adversary in time of crisis. If it is important to keep in contact in time of crisis, then is it not just as important to keep in contact with your allies and friends in time of peace? That is the purpose of parliamentary associations, and it is just as important for parliamentarians to be in contact as it is for the executive and the civil service. Parliamentarians, through these organizations, perform a role in building bridges of understanding between nations, and attending conferences is part of the function of the membership of those organizations. As a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, we are automatically a member of the Assembly and, therefore, we expected to participate in the work of that Assembly.

I think that Canadians should be made to feel proud of the participation of Canadian parliamentarians in such organizations, instead of being exposed to such crummy, journalistic attacks. For example, some news articles commented on the fact that Mr. Michael Forrestall had attended 15 meetings of the North Atlantic Assembly Military Committee, and referred to the "15 junkets" he had taken, without referring to the reason he attended them. The fact is that Mr. Forrestall is a valued member of that committee and of the House of Commons Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. He works very hard on the NATO Defence Committee, but none of the articles said anything about that; they merely said he had made 15 trips abroad. Rather, if the reporters had told why the members and senators were on these trips, the public might have better understood their purpose.

With respect to the North Atlantic Assembly, it is operated under the committee system with six committees. Canadians occupy executive positions on five of those six committees. Mr. Leonard Hopkins, with Mr. Michael Forrestall as his alternate, have been appointed to the Standing Committee. I serve as the special energy rapporteur on the Economic Committee. Mr. J.-R. Comtois serves as rapporteur on the Education, Cultural Affairs and Information Committee. Mr. Michael Forrestall serves as the general rapporteur on the Military Committee, and Mr. Tom Lefebvre serves as general rapporteur on the Scientific and Technical Committee. These Canadians who are taking a part in the North Atlantic Assembly will be called upon to go to meetings of these committees whether they be in Europe, the United States or Ottawa. I feel there is no need for me or anyone else to apologize for the part we play for Canada in these assemblies.

With regard to the meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly this past spring in Madeira, and for the benefit of the Calgary Herald reporter who wanted to know why it was necessary to send 14 members "when one would have done," we are members of the Assembly, and when it holds meetings we are expected to send delegates. We sent a complete delegation, numbering 14, to these meetings. The 14 included: Mr. Leonard Hopkins, the leader of our delegation; Honourable Senators Haidasz, Leblanc, Macquarrie and me; Messrs. Harvie Andre, William Blaikie, Michael Forrestall, Hal Herbert and Tom Lefebvre, and Mrs. Ursula Appolloni.

Another question asked by the press was, "Why did you take members of the staff?" Every delegation that travels is in need of secretarial and clerical support. In this case Mr. Stephen Knowles accompanied the delegation as secretary. I would like to pay tribute to him for his dedication and work on behalf of the delegation.

What did we do? Did we tan in the sun? I am going to use as an example the Economic Committee, but I am sure what I am about to say applies equally to all six committees. Four meetings were held in two days. One day, the Sunday—and I think we are allowed to take Sunday off—was spent on a bus tour of the Island of Madeira. At each of these committee meetings we discussed the current economic situation with respect to our allies, areas of economic agreement and areas of disagreement with respect to economic policy. From that session each member gained a little knowledge and shared a little knowledge with his fellow parliamentarians from the other countries. The remaining day was spent in a plenary session. One of the subjects under discussion was Poland in its time of crisis. Every honourable senator here would have been proud of the contribution made to that debate by the Honourable Senator Haidasz particularly, as well as the contributions made by the delegation in general.

If we are going to participate in international organizations, we must contribute to their operation in a manner which is suited to us. I am proud of the contribution we make to the North Atlantic Assembly, just as I am proud of the contributions we make to the other parliamentary associations. I have no apology whatsoever to make to the media for Canada's role in such organizations.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered debated.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment, which will be effective until next Tuesday, I am sure that across this country your attendance at Armistice Day services is eagerly awaited, and I wish you a safe journey to those very events.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 16, 1982, at 8 p.m.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-90, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Haidasz be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Hayden on, and the name of the Honourable Senator Giguère be added to, the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

QUESTION PERIOD—ABSENCE FROM CHAMBER OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before Question Period commences, I should like to inform the chamber that I have received a memorandum indicating that Senator Austin will not be in attendance this evening or tomorrow, as he is required to be in Vancouver on public business. However, he does expect to be present for Question Period on Thursday.

I received this memorandum this mid-afternoon, and I apologize for not having informed the opposition of it since I know that they naturally wish to prepare questions. I am sorry I did not inform them, as I ought to have done, as soon as I received the information.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The problem is not with the questions we prepare; it is with the answers we get.

Senator Frith: Send us a copy of the questions then.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Better questions; better answers.

Senator Flynn: You should not be the one to say that.

QUESTION PERIOD

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

INDIA—CANDU REACTOR—SUPPLY OF HEAVY WATER

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sorry that I have not been able to give him notice of it.

I am sure he is aware that India is experiencing a compulsory 35 per cent reduction of its energy consumption, and that this is causing major concern and infinite hardship in that country. At the same time, India has a Candu reactor which cannot be started up because there is no heavy water available for it.

I am sure the honourable leader realizes that we have two heavy water production facilities in Canada, which are either shut down or are about to be shut down because there is no market for their product.

● (2010)

My question is: Is it the policy of this government to cut off our noses to spite our faces by not selling heavy water to India under circumstances of extreme hardship in that country?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can answer the operative part of the question quite easily. It is not the policy of this government to cut off our noses to spite our faces, or, indeed, to do hardship or to cause distress to any people anywhere in the world.

I will take the question as notice, but I am sure that the Honourable Senator Lang realizes that, some time ago, there was what Canada believed to be something of a violation of the agreement with respect to the use of the by-products from that plant. That caused some difficulty, but I do not want to get into this subject without having an immediate reference so as to bring myself up to date on the situation.

In answer to the other part of the question, we agree that it would be highly desirable for us not only to sell additional quantities of heavy water but also to sell the other fuel for these Candu reactors. Certainly, however, those must be sold under terms and conditions which allow Canada to honour its commitment to nuclear non-proliferation.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I am anticipating that, in the considered response to my question, the Leader of the Government will advise this chamber that India has refused to sign the non-proliferation treaty. When he is considering that as a response, would he also consider whether the fact that Argentina has subscribed to such a treaty makes it a more reliable customer for our Candu reactors?

Finally, does not the government realistically anticipate that, in the final analysis, our refusal to make heavy water available to India will undoubtedly result in Russia fulfilling that need?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take those comments under consideration in the reference that I will make to the Department of External Affairs for a reply.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question pertaining to a matter I raised with respect to the layoff of employees at the two heavy water plants. The minister indicated that, at a later date, he would possibly have some further information as to what the future may hold. He also intimated at that time that press accounts to the effect that there were going to be layoffs were erroneous.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a large number of delayed answers this evening, and I was just glancing over the list. I do not believe that the answer to that question is included among them, but I will attempt to obtain it as soon as I can. However, I must qualify my honourable friend's interpretation of my remarks as to the information with which I was going to provide him.

Senator Muir: Does the honourable gentleman know that he is still arguing with himself and with the record of Hansard?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to set the record straight in the event that the honourable senator attempts, as he just has, to put words in my mouth. I think that perhaps I am the greatest and probably the best interpreter of what I meant and what I said.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are the only one who can interpret it.

GRAIN

WHEAT—PROPOSED CARTEL OF EXPORTING COUNTRIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question or two to the honourable minister in charge of the Wheat Board. I am glad to see that he has made such a quick transit from his previous responsibility in the Soviet Union.

My particular point this evening has to do with wheat. Last October there was a press report about a meeting held in Hecla, in the province of Manitoba, which was attended by representatives of the Wheat Board. The gist of the report was that some efforts had been made at that meeting to sow the seeds of a cartel with respect to the sale of wheat. I understand that that has since been denied by some of the people who attended that meeting. I notice, however, that the minister is now being credited with having renewed his campaign for an alliance of grain exporting countries to help squeeze better prices for farmers out of the present world market. That arises, I believe, from his appearance before the Manitoba Pool Elevator just a short time ago.

The minister and I are much interested in this topic. We have had some previous discussions on the matter. I should like to know if there is any substance to this report, that he has a campaign for an alliance with the grain exporting countries with a view to promoting an improvement in the price of export grains.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I would not define it as a campaign, but certainly I believe it would be in the interests of the exporting nations—as, indeed, it was when both Senator Roblin and I were attending meetings—to endeavour to arrange a system that would improve world grain prices.

With regard to the meeting at Hecla, Manitoba, I understand that the Wheat Board was represented. I believe that also in attendance were 10 or 12 representatives from various farm organizations in the United States, as well as persons representing farm organizations in Canada.

I did not attend the meeting, but my information is that there was an exchange of views on the operation of the two systems, the Canadian and the American. The current situation and difficulties regarding low world prices and increasing costs were discussed. It is probably fair to say that there was a good deal of support among the farm representatives for the proposition that if at all possible something should be worked out between our two countries, and the other exporting countries, to endeavour to improve world prices.

I certainly feel strongly that the exporting countries should co-operate in an effort to improve world grain prices. There has been a modest improvement in recent days, but prices are still too low. The Americans have certain policies in effect in their own country which are possibly contributing to improving prices; but further efforts should be made to seek closer co-operation among exporting nations to improve prices.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the minister whether he has any information concerning the policies of the United States government with respect to the export of grain, because at approximately the same time, October 19, that the meeting was being held at Hecla, Manitoba—at which there were present representatives from the United States Wheat Association and the National Association of Wheat Growers—the American government was introducing a new policy of interest subsidies, I believe, for the support of American sales to certain consumers abroad.

I am wondering how that particular policy fits in with the minister's goal that we should have an understanding about export markets rather than this kind of competition which probably will have an adverse effect on Canadian sales. We hope it will not, but it is certainly possible that it might.

In any event, there appears to be a certain amount of confusion here regarding policy. I should like to ask my honourable friend whether he has had any conversations with the American government regarding that policy, and, if so, whether he can tell us anything about them.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, certainly Canada does not support a policy of subsidizing, by way of interest rates, exports of grain from Canada. As I understand it, the United States has put into effect a policy that provides for a certain element of interest subsidization within total sales of some $1.5 billion. That is to be spread over a period of three years. It represents an objective of sales of approximately $500 million a year. As I understand it—and here I am speaking from memory—the blend is to have $100 million of that amount interest free. So there is an element of interest subsidization in this total package. I have written to the American authorities, to Secretary of Agriculture Block, regarding this situation, expressing my own view, and that of the government, that this is not the way to go. I expressed our concerns about this policy and our hope that, indeed, as Senator Roblin has expressed it, it will not be a particularly adverse factor as far as Canada is concerned. I understand that a good part of the credit has already been used. Upon further study, with regard to the interest-free element of the credit, I learned that while the loan is interest free at this time, the interest is to be repaid at a later date. So, although the total package is perhaps not unduly disturbing, it is, in my judgement, going in the wrong direction because anything that adds to the subsidizing of interest rates on grain exports is not something to be desired.

● (2020)

Senator Roblin: I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to table that piece of correspondence.

Senator Argue: Yes.

Senator Roblin: On the question of subsidizing interest rates with respect to grain sales, I would like to ask the minister where we stand with respect to Poland, or, indeed, any other country behind the Iron Curtain. Have we reached the limit of our credit allocation to Poland, which I think expires at the end of this year? Could the minister tell us whether the repayment terms of that loan have been met; whether there are any outstanding deficiencies, either in principal or interest; whether the loan is delinquent in any respect? I would also like him to let us know as soon as he can what the policy of the government is going to be with respect to the financing of grain sales to Poland after the present allocation expires at the end of this year.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, approximately $500 million in credit was provided to Poland last year. That credit will be used up by the end of the current calendar year. Poland has had a great deal of difficulty meeting its payments. Certain elements of the credit provision have been rescheduled, and the information, as I remember it coming to me a few days ago, is that they have been keeping up the rescheduled payments on the outstanding credit.

I think there is some misapprehension or misunderstanding as to what is the real purpose of the credit. Some people seem to think that the loan was made so that Canada would have a market for its grains. I do not think that was the reason at all. I think that the reason Canada provided credit was because Canada thought that Poland was in great need of credit and that, as a consequence of making that credit available, of course, there would be certain purchases of grain from Canada.

The policy on this matter, for this coming year, has not been decided, so I am unable to provide any information as to what credit, if any, will be provided to Poland by Canada in the coming year.

Senator Roblin: If I may ask my honourable friend a further question about the Polish deal, could he furnish the chamber with the original terms of the loan offered to Poland as well as the revised terms? Certainly, Canada has plenty of company on the rescheduling of debts with Poland, as everybody is in the same boat. But I think that the Senate ought to be informed as to what the elements of the subsidy are in that particular respect, because it is a question of some public interest and something we are paying for.

The other question I would like to ask my honourable friend is: Is there any element of subsidy in the interest rate offered the Soviet government in the recent, very large sale of grain to Russia?

Senator Argue: I shall endeavour to get the detailed information asked for by Senator Roblin, and I will certainly give him anything that is available for public consumption and anything that I can obtain for him.

With regard to the major credit provided to the Soviet Union, it was done by way of guarantee. The credit was obtained on the basis of the Canadian commercial rates and carries no element of subsidy whatsoever. The term of the credit is six months, and in the international grain market six months' credit is considered to be short credit. Of course, after the six months have elapsed repayment will begin. One can appreciate that after a number of months what one really has is a revolving credit system, if the credit continues to be used.

● (2025)

When the credit was being considered, there were those who said we should not be in the business of providing this kind of credit. I felt that, although it was obviously in the interests of the grain producers, it was also very much in the interests of the whole country that this kind of credit be provided to the Soviet Union. After all, this was not only a very large customer but was one that had fulfilled all of its contracts with Canada in the last 25 years.

So the credit terms are in place. The credit is being repaid on time, and the information we seem to be receiving is that the credit position of the Soviet Union has been improving, and that, although this is just speculation, there may not be the credit requirements in the future that there have been up to this time. To answer the question specifically, there is no element of subsidy in the credit.

Senator Roblin: If there is no element of subsidy in the credit, I do not think there is any cause for concern.

However, I do wish the minister would answer my first question. I asked him about what has been described as his renewed campaign for an alliance of the grain exporting countries to get better prices. Is there such a campaign? With what countries has the minister been corresponding, and can he report what reaction there has been?

Senator Argue: I do not know that you need to call it a campaign. My position has been quite consistent over the years. I feel that exporting countries should co-operate in an endeavour to return to their producers reasonable prices. Indeed, I believe that has been the policy in the Conservative Party; I believe it is the policy advocated by Conservative Party members of the House of Commons; I support it and I will continue to support it; but just what I am able to do about that from time to time I guess only time will tell.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): You have a good record.

Senator Roblin: We are going to watch you on this cartel business.

[Senator Roblin.]

WINTER OLYMPIC GAMES, 1988

APPOINTMENT OF EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF FEDERAL SECRETARIAT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: How many pounds has he lost?

Senator Nurgitz: My colleagues are urging me to ask the minister how many pounds he has lost.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): It is a weighty subject.

Senator Nurgitz: If he will take that question as notice, I will get on with the next one.

I notice that the minister has appointed one Anita Szlazak as the Executive Director of the Federal 1988 Winter Olympic Games Secretariat. Can the minister tell this chamber what Miss Szlazak's duties and responsibilities will be, and where she will carry them out?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we have put in place what we believe to be a most effective federal team to assist the Calgary organizing committee. With respect to the roles of Miss Szlazak and Mr. Harold Millican, they are to provide as effective federal backup support as possible for efforts to stage a successful 1988 Winter Olympic Games in Calgary.

Miss Szlazak, as Executive Director of the Federal 1988 Winter Olympic Games Secretariat, will direct the secretariat responsible for co-ordinating all federal activities in support of the 1988 Winter Olympics. She will be responsible for liaison and negotiations with the key bodies associated with the organization of the Games. She will help to put in place the complicated and numerous agreements which must be achieved over the next few months. She will be in continuing contact with government departments and representatives in Ottawa. It is expected that Miss Szlazak will be located part of the time in Ottawa and part of the time in Calgary. She will do a considerable amount of commuting.

The Regional Director, Operations, will be Mr. Harold Millican, who, among his many achievements, has had 20 years practical construction experience. Mr. Millican, who I am certain is known to the honourable senator, has established an excellent "track record" in all of his endeavours.

It is hoped that negotiations with respect to the projects which will form the Calgary Olympic site can be concluded over the next few months—desirably by the end of the spring, I suppose; however, they could take longer than that.

I might add that Miss Szlazak has a most enviable track record in negotiating important international agreements on behalf of this nation.

● (2030)

She played a key role for Canada in negotiating successfully with several countries a series of airline route agreements. Miss Szlazak also played an important role for Canada as Director General, International Telecommunications, in negotiating a number of important agreements relating to telecommunications.

Miss Szlazak was selected from a list which totalled almost 100 very able people. I think that she will bring real ability and talent to her important responsibilities.

Senator Nurgitz: As a supplementary question, could the minister tell us whether this lady has had any experience in organizing sporting events, particularly those of an international nature?

Senator Perrault: No, she has extensive organizational experience but she has not organized an Olympic Games previously, but very few people have done that. She does have outstanding knowledge of government organization and operational procedures as well as international negotiating. In her own right she is a talented equestrian, and has a lively and active interest in several sports.

She was raised in the province of Saskatchewan and has an excellent knowledge of western Canada, which is a further consideration.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You said it all! There is nothing more to add.

Senator Nurgitz: I did not ask the minister whether she had organized any Olympic Games; I asked if she had any experience in sporting events, particularly international sporting events. Has she had any experience in organizing international sporting events?

Senator Perrault: I would have to discuss with Miss Szlazak her previous experience in sports. She reports to me as the minister responsible for the Olympics, so I shall discuss that question with her.

She has certainly impressed the members of the Calgary Olympic Committee. In conjunction with a press conference, we met with Dr. Leighton and certain other members of that committee last week. It was a successful meeting.

There had been an unanticipated delay in appointing an executive director with respect to the federal presence, but I think the choice that has been made is an excellent one.

Mr. Millican, of course, was born in the province of Alberta, and again he has—

Senator Flynn: What do you mean by “of course”?

Senator Perrault: —considerable knowledge of the province of Alberta, its people and the areas that are to be developed into Olympic sites.

If the honourable senator has any ideas with respect to how the Olympic Games can be staged more effectively, or ideas on ways in which we can improve the federal contribution, I would welcome his proposals. Indeed, at some time in the future I propose that a meeting be held in Ottawa involving Miss Szlazak, Mr. Millican and parliamentarians. It may be of value to have a progress report for interested members of Parliament, be they members of the Senate or members of the House of Commons. I feel that members may wish to be kept informed of developments regarding the Calgary Olympic Games.

If the honourable senators see some value in such progress reports, I would be pleased to attempt to have them made.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is a fair offer.

Senator Nurgitz: As a further supplementary question, I assume from what the minister has said that members of the Calgary Olympic Committee were consulted before these two appointments were made and they gave their approval.

Senator Perrault: There was a preliminary meeting held, not publicized at the time, between officials of the Calgary Olympic Committee and Miss Szlazak. That meeting was held so that certain officials of the committee could discuss with Miss Szlazak her views with respect to the Olympic Games, and also gave an opportunity for Miss Szlazak to discuss with members of the committee some of her ideas.

I must say that the meetings were very friendly—a good omen for the future.

Senator Nurgitz: I will repeat my question. I take it that members of the Calgary Olympic Committee were consulted and approved both appointments?

Senator Perrault: They have agreed with the two appointments with apparent enthusiasm. The procedure was to have Miss Szlazak visit Calgary in a preliminary way, and talk informally with Dr. Leighton and certain other members of the committee. There were no objections that I know of entered with respect to Miss Szlazak's appointment.

Senator Nurgitz: I assume that the minister is aware of the position of Chief Operating Officer of the Northern Pipeline Agency, which position is occupied by Mr. Millican. Is that position considered to be a full-time position by the government, and, if so, is it allocated a full-time salary? Further to that, will Mr. Millican be paid an additional salary for being the Regional Director of Operations?

Senator Perrault: Mr. Millican will not be paid an additional salary; he has been seconded from the Northern Pipeline Agency, since there has not been as much activity as had been anticipated.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Perrault: It is felt by the Calgary Olympic Committee that his services will be of great value.

As far as payroll arrangements are concerned, those details are in the process of being worked out.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There are reports that the Honourable Donald Macdonald, before accepting to chair the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada, first obtained the assurance that if a leadership race were opened in the Liberal Party, he could resign at any time. Could the government leader confirm whether such a declaration was made?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): No, I cannot confirm that, although I read some of the same press reports, or press speculation, whichever you like to call it.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. If such a statement was made by the Honourable Mr. Macdonald, is it not the view of the Leader of the Government that it could seriously affect his credibility as chairman of a royal commission of inquiry?

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think Senator Asselin has made a mistake, probably inadvertently. He has answered his own question by saying "if that is the case."

Senator Asselin: You said "yes".

Senator Olson: No, I did not; I said that I had read some of the press speculation, and then you asked a question predicated on "if that is the case." Of course, I cannot answer the question if I do not know that that is the case.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask Mr. Macdonald himself whether such a statement was made? Could he find out whether the Prime Minister promised him that if there was an opening in the Liberal Party leadership, he could resign his functions to become a candidate in that leadership race? Could the Leader of the Government inquire of the Prime Minister whether such a promise was made before he was appointed as chairman of that commission?

[English]

Senator Olson: Yes, I can make an inquiry, but I do not think my honourable friend should make the assumption that he has a right to know all of the details of a conversation.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Oh, yes.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: On a point of order, the Leader of the Government in the Senate says that I have no right to know whether such a promise was made by the Prime Minister to the Honourable Mr. Macdonald, who has been appointed chairman of this royal commission. I believe that the public is entitled to know whether such a promise was made by the Prime Minister. If it was, it is obvious that the credibility of the chairman will be seriously affected, because instead of serving the interests of Canadians, he will serve his own interests and those of the Liberal Party. The Canadian people have a right to know. The Leader of the Government should reply to this question.

[Senator Asselin.]

[English]

Senator Olson: My honourable friend, of course, is making some assumptions that are wrong and is asking a hypothetical question. I said that I would make some inquiries. I just want to be sure my honourable friend understands that he has no right to—

Senator Flynn: We understand you very well.

Senator Olson:—ask for all that depth.

Senator Flynn: We understand you are hiding everything you can.

Senator Olson: No, we are not hiding anything. I will make inquiries, but there is one rule to the effect that one is not supposed to ask whether a statement found in the press is correct or not, and unless you have something more substantial upon which to base your question than some press speculation, I do not think we should take it as seriously as you do.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I shall be satisfied to know after the Leader of the Government has inquired from the Prime Minister whether this promise was really made to the Honourable Mr. Macdonald before his appointment. This could confirm whether the press reports are true or not.

I have another supplementary. We have been told that the members of this commission will be appointed shortly. Will they be appointed by the chairman of the commission, by the Prime Minister or by the Governor in Council?

[English]

Senator Olson: I would hazard a guess now and will check it later to ensure that I am right. I expect that the balance of the members of the commission will be appointed by order in council.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Can the minister tell us, first of all, when the other members of the commission will be appointed, how many there are going to be, and whether in fact Mr. Macdonald has been assigned the duty of recruiting the other members of that commission who, of course, would be appointed by order in council?

● (2040)

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice, too, although I have replies to a number of questions, two of which were asked last week by Senator Balfour and Senator Phillips, that will shed some light on this situation.

Senator Asselin: Presumptions!

An Hon. Senator: Saved by the bell!

Senator Olson: However, my friends opposite are extremely anxious to anticipate all of these things, because I said very clearly last week that when further members are added and dates are known and so on, we will let you know. When we get to delayed answers you will find that that is exactly the reply I intended to give.

Senator Murray: It is obvious from the long delay in completing the membership of the royal commission that the economic prospects of the country are not a matter of great urgency with the government—

Senator Olson: That is a wrong assumption.

Senator Murray: —or that perhaps the appointment of Mr. Macdonald was something hurriedly patched together by the Prime Minister to placate the restless Liberals at the convention here a couple of weeks ago.

I did want to ask the minister, however, whether he knows how many members will be appointed to the royal commission in question.

Senator Asselin: He is not saying anything more in the cabinet.

Senator Olson: No, I do not. The rest of the preamble to the question is so speculative, and whatever is not speculative is so erroneous, that it has no substance.

Senator Flynn: When did you learn about the appointment of Mr. Macdonald?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He read it in the newspapers.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

ANNUAL SEAL HUNT—RESOLUTION OF EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT—POSSIBILITY OF RETALIATORY MEASURES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the warning given by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on retaliation if the Europeans ban the importation of seal products. I realize that the minister will have to take the question as notice. The only retaliation I think he can take is to refuse to grant fishing permits within the 200-mile limit. Could the minister get a list of those countries that have permits to fish next year, so that we will know what retaliating measures he will take? Would he also find out what formula he will use to put into effect those retaliating measures?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will refer those questions to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for a reply because I am not quite sure whether the minister used the term "retaliatory," which is a rather strong term, but it is, of course—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is the word used by the minister.

Senator Olson: —known and I think accepted by almost all biologists, who know about these things, that if there is a proper and controlled harvesting of seals there is, indeed, a higher fish population for the fishermen. I have been told that a seal consumes a tonne or more of fish in a year. Therefore, if there is not controlled harvesting of them, there is a deterioration in the fisheries that is of interest to many countries that fish those waters.

Senator Marshall: The Leader of the Government has pre-empted one of my supplementaries concerning the international study indicating that there is a population increase despite the fact that other countries and some terrorists like Brian Davies say that we are destroying the seal herds.

Could the minister advise us as to the steps the government is taking to notify those people who are being falsely informed that there is a danger to the seal population that that is not the case, as has been proved by an international study?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will have to get more specific details, but I think it is fair to respond immediately to that question by saying that the government has made a great deal of effort in attempting to give the correct information respecting the biological facts surrounding the seal population and also the facts respecting the fish population that are so important not only to Canadian fishermen but also to fishermen from other countries who harvest the fish from those waters.

[Later:]

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask my last supplementary on the question I raised earlier. In view of the fact that the industrial giants, or whoever they are, in the European Economic Community are buying whitecoat or blueback seal skins evidently to produce goods which are sold throughout the world, and in view of the fact that there is so much unemployment in Newfoundland and there is a need for expanded employment opportunities, has any discussion taken place between the federal government and the Government of Newfoundland to try to initiate such an industry in order to take advantage of the availability of seal pelts if they do not want them over in Europe?

Senator Olson: In order to be specific, precise and accurate in my reply, as I always wish to be, I will have to take that question as notice.

THE LATE LEONID BREZHNEV

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT FUNERAL

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. This morning on the television news we saw Senator Argue attending the funeral of Leonid Brezhnev. I would like to know whether it was Senator Argue or the Prime Minister who was representing Canada at the funeral.

Hon. Jack Marshall: It was Michael Pitfield!

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What was the minister doing over there?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): That is not a very sensible question. Obviously, the Prime Minister was representing Canada. I was invited to accompany him, and I was honoured to be able to do so.

Senator Asselin: We thought you were representing the Canadian Wheat Board on that occasion.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO KOREA

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On November 2 I posed a question with regard to the status of negotiations with the Government of Korea for the sale of a second Candu reactor. On November 9 the leader responded as follows:

The present CANDU project in Korea, Wolsung-I, is proceeding well with the station expected to be in operation by the end of 1982. The customer, the Korea Electric Power Corporation, KEPCO, is pleased with the progress and AECL's performance on the project.

Some of us in this chamber have had a chance to visit Wolsung-I and observe that. He went on to say:

KEPCO has delayed plans for commitment of additional nuclear units, previously scheduled for commitment in 1982, due to faltering growth of electrical demand which is largely due to the world-wide economic recession.

Since the Leader of the Government always appears to be well briefed, could he inform us if it was not the question of increased interest rates on the proposed second Candu that made the Koreans, or KEPCO, back off, or was there anything to that?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when there are negotiations going on for what I think could be described as significant, if not massive, amounts of funding, of course interest rates at any given time are important, and, indeed, there has been a history recently, although not in the last few months but prior to that, of some competitive factors surrounding the rate of interest that is used in these long-term, large, multi-million or multi-billion dollar deals. I am sure there was a time when it was an important factor in the competitive position of the Canadian bid. However, I guess that we have to accept what is said in the second paragraph of the reply I gave on November 9, that for the moment there is less than anticipated growth in the electrical demand, and that is, therefore, the reason given why KEPCO is not as interested in accelerating or, indeed, coming to a commitment for the second reactor in 1982.

Senator Muir: I have a supplementary. Since I have reason to believe that the response he gave on November 9 is not written in stone, and since, again, I believe the minister is generally well briefed, is he aware that there is at least one other country and, possibly, two others that are competing strongly against Canada? Let us hope we can do our best.

• (2050)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we do too.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT AID—GUIDELINES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have 10 delayed answers which I should like to give today.

[Senator Asselin.]

The first is in response to a question asked by Senator Doody on June 9, 1982 concerning clarification of the government's policy and guidelines regarding assistance to industries facing economic difficulties; and in response to a similar question asked by Senator Doody on June 11, 1981, which pertained particularly to alleged federal "disinterest"—that is his word, not mine—in continuing to provide support for the domestic nuclear industry.

It is a very long answer, and I would ask honourable senators to accept it as though it had been read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, economic pressures on individual industries or companies can stem from a number of sources and are, in fact, an integral part of doing business in a market economy. As a government, we have encouraged firms to make the adjustments dictated by market signals but have retained the option to cushion the sometimes excessive burden these adjustments can create for sensitive sectors. Honourable senators should be aware of the circumstances within which the government has exercised that option by introducing such measures as the ILAP, the CIRB and initiatives to ease the financial difficulties of both large and small firms.

Under the Industry and Labour Adjustment Program, $350 million has been allocated over four years to promote industrial restructuring. A further amount, possibly in the area of $100 million, will be directed to that purpose as a result of measures announced in the June 1982 budget. ILAP assistance is designed to deal with situations involving permanent, large-scale dislocations having significant adverse effects on local unemployment. To date, ten communities and two industries—major appliances and auto parts—have been designated for assistance.

A similar purpose is served by a special allocation of $267 million to assist the adjustment of the domestic textiles, clothing and footwear industries. Expenditures from this allocation and through other federal programs of assistance to these industries are co-ordinated by the recently-formed Canadian Industrial Renewal Board. The purpose of this Board is to develop viable firms and create employment and investment opportunities in communities adversely affected by competitive difficulties in the clothing, textiles and footwear sectors.

In some instances, the risk of corporate failure and the size and scope of the repercussions of those business difficulties may demand action by the government. For example, severe corporate financial difficulties have prompted federal assistance to such firms as Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson, Dome Petroleum and Maislin Industries. By nature, this assistance is exceptional and must be tailored to the particular circumstances of the involved firm.

The financial difficulty of small businesses is a more pervasive problem. To counter the adverse effects of prevailing interest rates on the expansion of small businesses, Mr. MacEachen provided $400 million in his June 1982 budget for the purpose of reducing interest charges to small businesses by up to 4 percentage points. This program supplements the Small Business Bond tax provision and other federal financial and tax instruments of direct assistance to the small business sector.

This range of initiatives is well directed to situations of industrial difficulty. Particularly given present economic circumstances, however, we must continue to work in support of industry to ensure that the investments required to facilitate private sector adjustments, and to lay the basis for renewed growth, are made on a timely and economic basis.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Smith on October 26. He asked for a status report on the plans to extend the TQ&M pipeline to Atlantic Canada. This too is fairly long and, if it is acceptable, I will file it with Hansard so that it may be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

The honourable senator will be interested to know that while no pipeline construction will take place either in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia for at least a year, pending decisions about Sable Island gas potential, the federal government has offered the TQ&M pipeline company a recoverable contribution—the Maritimes Engineering Program (MEP)—to undertake engineering work.

Under MEP, the federal government will meet the full cost of engineering and possibly surveying work, to be carried out by TQ&M, on the gas transmission system between Quebec City and the Atlantic coast. The work funded will consist of all aspects that can be performed prior to a decision on gas sourcing. Maritime firms will be provided with the opportunity to participate in the tendering process for MEP-related work and thus improve their chances of participating directly in the construction phase of the pipeline, in addition to work related to the implementation of the distribution systems in the maritimes.

IMMIGRATION

CUTBACKS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie respecting immigration from Lebanon and the Caribbean. This is also a fairly long answer, and I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Last year's Annual Report to Parliament on Immigration Levels announced the federal government's acceptance of one of the recommendations of the Task Force on Labour Market Development. After consultations with provincial governments and non-governmental organizations, it was announced that there would be room in the annual immigration movement for up to 20,000 to 25,000 workers selected abroad for their needed skills, if these needs could not be supplied from the domestic labour force.

In view of current employment difficulties, however, the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced that, effective May 1, 1982, a temporary restriction on selected workers from abroad would come into effect. The restriction applies to all immigrants who are subject to labour market criteria in the immigration selection (point) system, except those with pre-arranged employment in validated jobs.

The general restriction followed a similar one which was applied to the mining and construction sectors and for about 20 sub-groups in the manufacturing sector in December 1981, because of increasing layoffs in these areas.

The restriction on selected workers does not affect family class or refugee immigrants, nor entrepreneurs or self-employed persons who contribute to economic development in general and job creation in particular.

This restriction has helped to protect those who might otherwise have come to Canada during a time of employment difficulties only to find—as have some recent arrivals—that they would experience layoffs shortly after commencing work. Those hardest hit have been recently arrived refugees, because of their relative lack of skills and lack of knowledge of one of Canada's official languages.

The Commission of Employment and Immigration is continuing to develop computer-assisted techniques to match applicants with needed skills to validated jobs in Canada. These techniques could be implemented after an economic upturn and the removal of the current restriction on selected workers. The aim of these techniques will be to increase the proportion of immigrants with arranged employment.

As for the Latin American and the Caribbean allocation in the Annual Refugee Plan, it has been augmented from 1,000 in 1982 to 2,000 in 1983 according to expected resettlement needs, particularly in Central America, and to help political prisoners and other victims of oppression in South America. As internal conflict in El Salvador continues and violence is reported to be increasing in Guatemala, resettlement outside of these regions is becoming necessary for increasing numbers of Central Americans. Many of these refugees will likely be urban dwellers for whom rural relocation in Central America is not a durable solution, and others whose personal safety will be endangered there.

Lebanese victims of civil war and invasion are being assisted through a modified program applicable to persons with close relatives already in Canada. Under the special measures implemented last summer, Lebanese visitors in Canada may, if they wish, as their status expires, extend their stay for up to one year with permission to work. At the end of the year, each case will be reviewed and decisions made as to landing in Canada. So far, 300 Lebanese visitors have applied to remain.

Also, Canadian citizens or permanent residents having relatives in Lebanon who are facing hardships will be permitted to sponsor such relatives even if they cannot meet regular selection criteria. No one under order to be removed from Canada will be returned to Lebanon until the situation there returns to normal.

The visa office in Beirut has resumed normal operations. So far, relatively few Lebanese residents appear to be contemplating emigration but the relaxed measures that I just described are being applied to displaced Lebanese who indicate they wish to join relatives in Canada.

LABOUR

GRANTS TO CANADIAN LABOUR CONGRESS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator McElman on November 4 respecting grants to the Canadian Labour Congress, which includes a table showing the total amount of grants extended to the labour organizations in the country. The answer is about four pages in length, and I would ask that this be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

1. The labour education program was introduced in 1977 as part of a series of initiatives by Labour Canada, aimed at improving the process of labour management relations. Special considerations that motivated the government in adopting this Program included recognition that:

- (a) better educated and informed labour movement can contribute to improved labour management relations in Canada;
- (b) that existing education and training activities undertaken by the labour movement should be substantially expanded in order to develop the new knowledge and expertise required to cope with the increasing complexity of modern industrial relations;

(c) that extensive federal funding is already being provided to educational institutions in support of management studies; and

(d) that federal funding in direct support of labour education could help materially in achieving the objective of a better educated labour movement and at the same time "balance-off", to a degree, federal funding of management studies through educational institutions.

2. The Program makes financial assistance available to legally constituted labour organizations in Canada to develop educational activities for their members and to individual union members to attend courses and to conduct research. The purpose of the financial aid is to enable existing and potential union leaders to acquire the knowledge and skills necessary to effectively discharge their respective union responsibilities and community roles.

3. On July 20, 1982, Cabinet approved $4.9 million to extend the Program for a one-year period ending June 30, 1983. The distribution was made as follows:

|--|--------------------|
| Canadian Labour Congress | $3,224,236 |
| Confederation of National Trade Unions | 306,796 |
| Canadian Federation of Labour | 283,492 |
| Canadian Conference of Teamsters | 143,188 |
| Centrale de l'Enseignement du Québec | 117,776 |
| Centrale des Syndicats Démocratiques | 77,108 |
| Independent Unions | 697,404 |
| Individual Union Members (bursaries) | 50,000 |
| | $4,900,000 |

All contributions were based on $1.40 per member. The CLC received the largest amount since they represent about 65 per cent of the total unionized workforce in Canada.

4. The Program was surveyed twice by independent evaluators during its first five years of operation. On each occasion the report was positive and confirmed that the funds were applied to educational activities aimed at helping union members broaden their knowledge of the union movement and the factors governing labour relations. The evaluators observed that the federal funds have helped promote greater interest and increased participation in training activities on the part of the membership. Union members, at the lower level, who have increased their knowledge about the labour movement through participation in the Program, are gradually moving into positions of leadership where the impact of their new qualifications will be felt more extensively. The evaluators reported that the activities conducted by the unions clearly complied with the conditions and objectives of the Program of assistance for union education and endorsed the continuance of the funding. In addition the educational activities of the principal recipients have been subject to a thorough review by the federal auditors who have confirmed that the monies have been properly expended.

5. The evaluators expressed their conviction on the value of the Program and of the immediate and long term benefit to the people of Canada and the labour movement. Improved industrial relations is an area where the impact of the Program should be felt, since more than 50 per cent of the educational activities have a direct relationship to the collective bargaining process. Some of the most common subject matters include occupational health and safety, trends in collective bargaining, labour economics, leadership training, arbitration and contract law, union counselling, legislation affecting collective bargaining, women in the workforce, job evaluation and pension plans.

6. Surveys carried out by the evaluators and the federal auditors confirm that the educational activities of the Canadian Labour Congress were clearly in accord with the conditions and objectives of the Program. It would be inappropriate to give the CLC a share of the public support for leadership development that is inferior to the share being granted to other union organizations. Unions affiliated to the CLC are legal entities, recognized under labour relations acts, that democratically represents the interests of millions of Canadian workers. Educational activities conducted with the federal funding increase the knowledge of many union members on socio-economic problems. This educational training is developing new leaders that may well have a much more cooperative oriented attitude than their predecessors for dealing with the establishment of progressive industrial relations.

7. The labour education contract between the CLC and Labour Canada requires that the CLC maintain a National Labour Studies Centre and five Regional Centres and specific programs and educational projects necessary for the conduct of its labour education program. Funds used by the National Centre are directed to staff training throughout Canada and to the production of training aids in support of the regional activities. Consequently, the expenditures of the National Centre form part of the overall labour studies program of the CLC. Any reduction of the funding to the National Centre would jeopardize the complete operation of the CLC's program of labour studies. Although the CLC might be involved in political action, it must be reiterated that both the independent evaluators and the federal auditors reported that their labour education expenditures were fully in accord with the conditions and objectives of the program, i.e., all monies received from the Government of Canada were spent on labour education studies.

8. The purpose of this Program is to achieve a more equitable distribution of the public funds made available for educational purposes. As a group, labour leaders have had less access to publicly funded educational programs than representatives of employers, with whom they must deal across the bargaining table in the day-to-day administration of labour management relations. Consequently, no consideration has been given to extend this financial assistance program beyond the scope of legally constituted unions in Canada.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—DEADLINE FOR SUBMISSION OF REPORT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Murray on November 8 concerning whether the Minister of Finance wished to comment further on the establishment of the Macdonald royal commission. This is very short, so I will read it.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance informs me that he has no further comment to make at this point in time.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You know where you stand.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, on this same subject, Senator Tremblay on November 8 asked a supplementary question regarding the advisory group reporting to the Minister of Finance and the Macdonald royal commission. The answer is only one page in length but, in any event, I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, Economic Advisory Panel reporting to the Minister of Finance has nothing directly to do with the Macdonald Royal Commission. The role of the panel is to advise the Minister of Finance on general fiscal and monetary matters. The panel is made up of outstanding Canadian economists from universities across the country. The panel's mandate is to provide information, suggestions, opinions and ideas to the Minister on a wide range of topics. The panel's mandate does not include advising the Minister on tax policy and tax reform measures.

I think honourable senators will agree that the mandate of the panel acting in a personal advisory capacity to the Minister of Finance on short-term matters is not the same as the mandate contained in the terms of reference of the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada. There is, therefore, no need to harmonize the activities of the two bodies which have been established for distinctly different roles.

ROYAL COMMISSION—BUDGET ALLOCATION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I also have a reply to Senator Asselin's question of November 8 respecting the budget to be allocated to the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada. Since this answer is not very long I will read it.

Honourable senators, until the royal commission meets to define its program for carrying out the terms of reference and to establish its staff requirements, it will not be in a position to know what the total costs will be.

Hon. Martial Asselin: That is not an answer.

Senator Olson: When the royal commission does establish what its costs will be, a normal submission to Treasury Board will be made, subject to the normal rules in the public service and subject to ministerial approval.

Senator Asselin: Who wrote the answer?

Senator Olson: The officials who are very competent at writing these answers.

ROYAL COMMISSION—RELATIONSHIP TO CABINET COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a further supplementary question raised by Senator Balfour on November 8 concerning how the activities of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada and the activities of the Cabinet Committee on Economic and Regional Development will intermesh. The answer is a little more than half a page in length, and perhaps I may file it with Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the normal business of cabinet committees is not usually related to an ongoing long-term study. Therefore, the normal business of the Cabinet Committee on Economic and Regional Development, as with the business of other cabinet committees, will not stop because of the activities of the royal commission.

On the other hand, situations may arise which are so fundamental that decisions could be suspended pending the report of the royal commission. However, no specific instances are foreseen at this moment.

ROYAL COMMISSION—TERMS OF REFERENCE— FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONSTITUTIONAL MEETINGS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised by Senator Phillips on November 9 concerning matters which may fall before the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada and federal-provincial meetings at the same time.

Honourable senators, there are now no meetings scheduled to deal with constitutional matters other than that on aboriginal rights, which is to take place by April 17, 1983.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On April 17?

Senator Olson: April 17.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Not on—before.

Senator Olson: On or before April 17.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Flynn: Not later than.

Senator Tremblay: The Constitution Act, 1982 says “before.”

Senator Olson: On or before.

As in the case with other broadly-based royal commissions, the appointment of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada does not mean that the normal business of government will be stopped in any way.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HELSINKI FINAL ACT—REQUEST FOR UPDATE ON MADRID REVIEW CONFERENCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my last delayed answer is in response to a question raised by Senator Haidasz on November 9 concerning the Madrid Review of the Helsinki Final Act. It is a rather long answer, and I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Canada recognizes the value of the CSCE process and shares the concern that a failure to resume serious negotiations in Madrid might well endanger that process. Our objective is a successful conclusion with a balanced and substantive conference document.

In light of events in Poland, it must be expected that there will be an extensive review of implementation of the Helsinki Final Act by the participating states, and that any negotiations are likely to be long and difficult. For our part, we will be making known our deep concern about the Polish situation, including the recent dissolution of Solidarity, and about the increased suppression of human rights in the Soviet Union.

With our Allies, we shall be resuming active negotiations on the basis of a package of amendments designed to strengthen the Final Act and reflect what has happened in Poland. We shall be working, for instance, to obtain a provision on trade union rights. We shall continue to press for the convening of a Human Rights Experts Meeting which we believe can make a contribution to improved East-West understanding. Provision for such a meeting is included in the draft concluding document tabled by the Neutral and Non-aligned participating states.

In answer to the second part of Senator Haidasz' question, Canada does not formally maintain an inventory of compliances and violations of member countries. Canada is constantly monitoring the situation, however, and is aware of the general performance of the CSCE.

We have made and will make specific representations where they are warranted and make general representations at meetings of the CSCE.

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: I am sure the Leader of the Government will agree that it is not very efficient to give 10 delayed answers in one evening—many of them incomplete.

In view of the fact that some time ago there was a suggestion that the government appoint some very capable senators as parliamentary secretaries in order to assist with the preparation of delayed answers so that the process may be speeded up, I should like to know if that idea has been developed any further.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Where do you see those?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that, especially on this side of the chamber, there are some very capable senators who could do an excellent task of responding to questions raised by members of the opposition.

However, I have to agree that not a great deal of consideration has been given recently to that suggestion. I would suppose that is based on the fact that, in reviewing the questions asked and responding, most of the time we are up to date.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when the minister announced that he had 10 delayed answers, I held my peace, feeling certain that the question I was interested in would be among them because it has been outstanding since last July.

My question has to do with the proposition that the Canadian Post Office should not be allowed to define its own monopoly by means of an order in council without some parliamentary examination of the subject. As the order in council is due to become law on November 26, which is just around the corner, I ask the minister whether he can give us an affirmative answer to that matter tomorrow.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I anticipated that Senator Roblin would ask that question again this evening. However, I have nothing to add to what I said the other day. However, just so that the record is straight—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The record is straight with you.

Hon. Robert Muir: It is pretty bent.

Senator Olson: The members of the opposition have a bad habit of putting an interpretation on things that does not stand up under examination.

Senator Flynn: You provoke it.

Senator Olson: The inference is that the Canada Post Corporation can pass an order in council containing what it wishes by itself, but that, of course, is not true. Orders in council are passed by the Government of Canada.

Senator Roblin: I quite agree with my honourable friend. I hope I did not leave any impression with him that the Canada Post Corporation was passing orders in council—he and his colleagues have to take responsibility for that.

What this country wants is some public examination of this question before it is done in a hugger-mugger way behind the facade of the Privy Council. We, on this side, are asking that this question of the monopoly position of the Canada Post Corporation be something which receives decent and appropriate public discussion, and that it not be decided merely by a ukase issuing from the Privy Council Office in the form of a regulation by the Governor in Council that really will not do.

If my honourable friend has been examining the course of events of the subject over the past few weeks and months, he will have found that practically every responsible group in Canada, which would have a legitimate interest in this matter, has been asking for some kind of parliamentary review of this subject so it can be discussed and decided in a proper manner.

If the Canada Post Corporation has a good case, what is to prevent it from making that case to the people of Canada rather than just to the Privy Council?

● (2100)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will attempt to get a more detailed answer to that question immediately. I want to tell my honourable friend, however, that, with respect to this particular order in council, the government is not doing anything that is not a long-time tradition of this government, the previous government, and all governments prior to that. If he tries to throw up the bogey-man that we are doing something different and, therefore, degrading, he is wrong.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am not saying that it is degrading; I am saying that it is foolish. I am saying that this matter ought to be discussed in public and should be subject to a full public review.

As to orders in council and legitimacy, I ask my honourable friend to remember the order in council made by this government with respect to the price of postage in Canada. It was declared, by the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, to be illegal. They did not do a darn thing about it; they just said, "Try and stop us." Nobody could stop them, so they went on doing it.

If that is the kind of precedent that my honourable friend is pointing to, I am not much impressed. What I want him to do—and perhaps I had better address this matter in a more conciliatory fashion if I want him to do anything—is to say, "Yes, a committee of the Senate or a committee of the House of Commons will examine this question of the monopoly position of the Canada Post Corporation."

Most monopolies have to make their cases before some public body. Surely that is an appropriate thing for the Post Office to do. If it has a good case, it will be able to convince any committee of Parliament, I am sure. In that event, those who have other points of view will have had their day in court, and that is really what we are looking for.

I urge my honourable friend to consider the advisability of opening up this process to ordinary parliamentary scrutiny.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have heard my friend not only ask the question but submit a partial argument. I have nothing to add to what I have said. I will try to get a reply as soon as I can.

Senator Roblin: Can my honourable friend undertake to bring me a reply before November 26?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, I will undertake to bring a reply as soon as I possibly can.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend mean that he is simply going to let the passage of time make it impossible to have a parliamentary reconsideration?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there have been many—I would think hundreds—of cases in the past where some examination has been made post facto on an order in council coming into place. We have a joint committee of both houses which is specifically charged with the responsibility of looking at those matters.

Senator Roblin: Surely my honourable friend knows perfectly well that that committee does not deal with policy. He knows perfectly well that it deals with the legalities of the question—whether or not the strict letter of the law has been conformed to. That is not the issue here. The issue here is one of policy, and my honourable friend knows that the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments does not deal with matters of policy. Such matters are out of the ambit of that committee altogether. Therefore, there is no question of the matter being dealt with by that committee in the way that he suggests.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend also knows that both houses of this Parliament made a policy decision when they set up a crown corporation known as Canada Post. Therefore, there is the authority and the policy upon which that order in council is based.

Senator Roblin: If that is my honourable friend's argument for doing nothing, then I am ashamed of him.

Senator Olson: That is not an argument for doing nothing. My honourable friend was questioning the policy.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUNNYBROOK HOSPITAL, TORONTO—SUPERANNUATION OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, may I add to the burden of the Leader of the Government in the Senate? I only do this in extremis, and because I have been trying for two years to deal with this problem in other ways.

My question involves Veterans Affairs. In 1966, Sunnybrook Hospital was taken over from the federal government by the University of Toronto through the Ontario government. At that time, the employees of the hospital came under the Public Service Superannuation Act. The federal government, at that point, made a commitment that the employees' benefits would be maintained at the same level as they would have had they continued under the jurisdiction of the federal government. This commitment has not been honoured. As a result, many of these people—at least half of them who are retired—are in dire straits today.

I have tried everything within my power, through the Department of Veterans Affairs and elsewhere, to remedy this problem and to see that that commitment is honoured. I have failed. Even though I have reached the point where I have learned from the department officials that the matter is before Treasury Board, still nothing has happened. This is becoming a major concern to many retired ex-government employees who were employed at Sunnybrook Hospital.

Honourable senators, I would not raise this question on the floor of the chamber if I had not exhausted every other recourse available to me to try to remedy it. I would ask the Leader of the Government to please look into it, through the appropriate minister, in order to see if this matter cannot be rectified? I think it is a travesty of justice and a form of inhumanity to people who are the responsibility of this government. That commitment must be honoured.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take careful note of Senator Lang's comments as they appear in Hansard, and will make the inquiries he has requested.

QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, might I bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government Question No. 59, which has been on the order paper since April, 1981, and which has to do with President Reagan's visit? I am getting a little concerned because he only has two more years to run. I should like to have an answer before that time.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will draw that question to the attention of my staff.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second Reading of the Bill S-31, intituled: "An Act to limit shareholding in certain corporations".—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this order should stand until the committee reports.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this point of order was raised by Senator Flynn—

Senator Flynn: It is not a point of order.

Senator Frith: In that case, I raise, as a point of order, the question as to the regularity of this order staying on the order paper.

On the last occasion we spoke about it, I suggested that we have a look at the precedents in order to see what the recommended procedures should be. I have found a precedent prior to this session respecting the subject matter of a bill being referred to committee before second reading, which occurred in 1946. The subject matter of Bill, Trade (195) was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce before the bill received second reading. The bill remained on the Orders of the Day at the second reading stage, and the order was called each day but was postponed until the report of the committee had been presented to the Senate. On the day that the report was tabled in the Senate, the Order of the Day for second reading resumed, the bill received second reading and was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

I have the precedent in excerpt form from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: What does that prove? Don't be silly.

Senator Frith: Incidentally, honourable senators, I should make it clear that, as I suggested when this matter came up before, I have no illusions about convincing Senator Flynn that it proves anything. To me, however, it shows that we have a precedent showing how the same situation was dealt with in the past when a bill was referred to a committee before second reading.

I also draw to the attention of the Senate, and, in the event that a ruling is necessary, to the attention of the Speaker, that the Canada Day Bill remained on the order paper and came up on the order paper exactly as it was. The same is also true of Bill C-127, the Criminal Code amendments.

The 1946 precedent, in my opinion, indicates that the order was called each sitting—

Senator Flynn: What purpose does this serve? It is all very well to repeat that something happened, but what purpose does it serve?

Senator Frith: May I have the floor? Honourable senators, I emphasize that, as I said on the last occasion, I know that what I am suggesting indicates that the opinion of Senator Flynn is not right. I am aware that that is a totally unacceptable allegation to him; however, it may be acceptable to other honourable senators.

The 1946 precedent clearly indicates that the order was called each sitting. It was a precedent reflecting exactly the same situation as that which we now have; namely, the reference of the subject matter of a bill to a committee before second reading. I suggested that the Senate may decide that the debate on Bill S-31 should be postponed until the committee has tabled its report. If that is the case, I suggest that, when the order is called, as it has been this evening, it ought to be postponed until the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the subject matter of the bill has been tabled in the Senate. The bill could then remain on the order paper under the heading:

To Be Called on the Day that the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the subject-matter of the Bill S-31, intituled: "An Act to limit shareholding in certain corporations" has been tabled in the Senate.

Honourable senators, this procedure would be similar to that followed earlier this session during the debate on the Address concerning the Constitution. That is my suggestion, honourable senators.

• (2110)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): And it is a good one.

Senator Flynn: I thought it was mine.

Senator Frith: Then you agree?

Senator Flynn: If you had only read the conclusion, we would have gained that much time. Agreed, Madam Speaker.

Senator Frith: I have to do things my way, and Senator Flynn does things his way.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: The same thing.

INTERPRETATION ACT BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT CANADA LABOUR CODE

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-30, intituled: "An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to Canada Day".—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Does this item stand? It would appear to be in the name of Senator Olson. If the honourable senator moves second reading of this bill, I will raise a point of order; but until he moves second reading, I cannot do so.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will move second reading at any time that the Leader of the Opposition wishes to proceed with his point of order. I had hoped that we could deal with Bill S-32, but we have now gone beyond that item. I am rather anxious that that bill be sent to committee.

Senator Flynn: There is no rush.

Senator Olson: Some people believe that a great deal of importance attaches to that bill. In any event, that argument does not need to be made now because we have gone beyond that order. Perhaps I should move second reading of Bill S-30 if Senator Flynn is prepared to proceed with his point of order.

Therefore, I move the second reading of Bill S-30, to amend certain acts in relation to Canada Day.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the honourable Senator Frith, that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Madam Speaker, that I rise on a point of order will not surprise honourable senators. The basis for my point of order is rule 47, which reads as follows:

(1) A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.

(2) An order, resolution, or other decision of the Senate may be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescission.

To make my point, I would first note that the Senate, during the same session, has already decided on a motion that is the same in substance as the one we are now being invited to decide on; and, secondly, if that is the case, we must decide whether rule 47(2) would apply.

I will deal first with a minor problem which has been resolved by the passage of time. I refer to the question of five days' notice. Since the bill was tabled on the order paper, more than five days have passed; so there is no question of using that argument. My point of order will be to ask the Chair to rule whether this bill, in order to pass, would have to receive the approval of two-thirds of the senators present; and, if it does not, whether it should be considered as having been defeated. That is the main question.

Senator Olson: By "defeated", do you mean out of order?

Senator Flynn: I do not mind how you interpret it, but, in fact, the bill would not pass. If the bill received the approval of, let us say, the equivalent of 60 per cent of the senators present, that would not be sufficient to conclude that the bill had passed. If our rules require that two-thirds of the senators vote in favour, and that number is not reached, then the bill does not pass. It is the same as if the bill were defeated by one vote, or whatever margin you would suggest. That seems to be quite obvious. If the minister wishes to put another interpretation on it, and the conclusion or result is the same as I suggest, then there is no problem.

The first point that I wish to establish is that the Senate, during this session—namely on October 25, 1982—has already decided in substance the same question that is applicable to this bill. On October 25, we were dealing with Bill C-201, to amend the Holidays Act—the Canada Day bill—and if honourable senators will refer to page 4831 of Debates of the Senate of October 25, 1982, they will see that I moved a motion in amendment to add to Bill C-201 exactly the provisions that are contained in Bill S-30. Regarding the main provision of Bill C-201, it was merely a question of form; but the remainder of that motion in amendment is, word for word, the same as what is contained in Bill S-30. Therefore, in my view, the Senate has, during this session, resolved that question in the negative.

If the government now wishes to put the same question to the Senate, it cannot do so unless it meets the requirement of rule 47(2) concerning a favourable vote of two-thirds of the senators present.

Technically, it is a rather difficult matter; whether we should have a motion that the decision made on October 25 be rescinded. I do not believe we should interpret our rules to mean that if a motion for the second reading of this bill is approved, there should be a motion to rescind the decision made on October 25. I suggest that the bill, in order to pass, must receive the approval of two-thirds of the senators present.

The question of not putting the same motion, in substance, before Parliament during the same session goes back a long way. I am not sure whether it is necessary to refer to all of the authorities in support of this rule. However, I would refer Your Honour to May's Parliamentary Practice, Seventeenth Edition, at page 396. There are also several references in Beauchesne. I refer honourable senators to Beauchesne, third edition. There are references at page 132, number 325, and page 134, number 332. Other references can be found at page 518, where there is a ruling by the Honourable James Cockburn made in 1869; at page 570, where there is another ruling of the Speaker; and, finally, at page 632, where there is a ruling by the Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux made in 1927. All these precedents will establish that it is not a question of having, word for word, the same motion, but the substance has to be the same.

I suggest that in this case there is no doubt about the identity of the two motions because you merely have to read the substance of the motion itself which can be found in the debate. In fact, the idea is to move the consequential amendments to Bill C-201 to make other statutes conform with the decision taken, in substance, in Bill C-201. Bill S-30 says, clearly, to the Senate, "You decided in the negative on October 25, and now we invite you to decide exactly the contrary during the same session." I could argue on the basis of the substance or the motives behind this bill, but that would not be relevant at this point.

If the point of order is dismissed by the Chair, I could very well move a six months' hoist on the basis of the fact that we are asking the Senate to do exactly the contrary to what it did on October 25. The point is that the presentation of the bill during the same session requires the enforcement of rule 47(2), and the bill cannot be passed in this session unless it receives a favourable vote of two thirds of the senators present.

I suggest to the government that it might be wise to do what was first suggested to the committee by the Honourable Serge Joyal when the bill was in committee, that in due course during the next session he would introduce in the House of Commons a bill for that purpose. That was his argument for telling the Senate to defeat any amendment along the lines of the one I proposed and which was, in fact, defeated for that very reason.

To me, there is also the question of dignity. We might as well say that the bill is out of order right away and that we will not accept it, rather than make fools of ourselves, as the government would have us do, by asking us to decide exactly the contrary to what we decided approximately one month ago. In any event, I think the rules are a protection for our dignity, and I hope that the Chair will sustain the point of order I have made.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to make a few comments about the point of order raised by Senator Flynn because I think we accept his argument that some of the consequential amendments are in essentially the same words and, therefore, the substance of Bill S-30 which is now before this house. However, Senator Flynn left out one of the most important points, and that is that that is not all that was in his amendment. Senator Flynn's motion in amendment of October 25 also included, "by deleting clause 1 and substituting the following" which was, as I argued at the time, a complete substitution for Bill C-201. However, I did not win that argument. The motion was thought to be in order, so it was moved and later negated.

The strange thing about this debate is that now Senator Flynn is arguing that we should accept his argument to deny the Senate the opportunity to vote on exactly what he moved that day. Is that not a strange situation? He has now set himself up as the stumbling block for the Senate to have an opportunity to vote on what he himself moved as a desirable, substantive matter at that time.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: As you did on October 22.

Senator Asselin: You should apply the rules.

Senator Olson: But let me come to my point. We understand that Senator Flynn has narrowed his point of order—now that the five days are no longer required because time has run out in that respect, rather than voting positively on Bill C-30 in the former way which requires a majority vote—to rule 47 so that a two-thirds majority is required.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Olson: That is what you argued a few minutes ago.

Senator Flynn: It is not a majority; it is a plurality.

Senator Olson: Rule 47(2) reads:

An order, resolution, or other decision of the Senate may be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescission.

Senator Flynn is saying that if we follow this procedure we will rescind a decision that was made some time ago, although the rescission would be of a much larger package than is contained in Bill S-30. That is so, because what are contained in Bill S-30 are simply the consequential amendments. What was contained in Bill C-201 was the substance of an idea in the form of a bill, that of changing the name "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day". The consequential amendments relating to the other three statutes—namely, the Bills of Exchange Act, the Canada Labour Code, and the Interpretation Act—were not included. That is what Senator Flynn is asking us to rescind, and we do not wish to rescind that substantive matter. Bill S-30 was created to make the consequential amendments to changing the name "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day".

Senator Flynn: As is my amendment.

Senator Olson: If we accepted Senator Flynn's argument, we would have to rescind the decision that was taken on his amendment. And the matter goes deeper than that, as Senator Flynn fully understands. So I hope honourable senators will not be dragged into the situation which Senator Flynn is spinning for us, because it would be a wrong approach to a substantive matter which the senators have already passed, that of changing "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day".

All we are trying to do in Bill S-30 is to finish the job and make the consequential amendments which involve the changing of one word for another in each of the three statutes. Therefore, honourable senators, I would not think it appropriate for us to accept Senator Flynn's amendment. What is more, I think he must make these arguments slightly tongue in cheek, because what we are doing with these consequential amendments in Bill S-30 is exactly, right to the word, what he wanted done in his amendment. That is what we are now prepared to do.

● (2130)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I find my honourable friend's argument a little difficult to follow.

Senator Olson: It is too logical.

Senator Roblin: I suspect he does, too; I can tell from the way he presented his argument. He did not have quite that fervour we might have expected had he been satisfied as to the rightness of his point of view.

I find it incredible that he should now say that Senator Flynn wants to oppose doing what he proposed to do on a previous occasion, when my honourable friend prevented him from doing so, because he refused to accept his amendment.

If my honourable friend thinks that my colleague Senator Flynn is remiss in this connection, what must he think of himself, because he was the man who led the charge on the other side, saying, "Away with all these consequential amendments to the bill. We will not have them in this form."

Senator Olson: On a point of order, I gave an undertaking at the time that a bill sponsored by the government to deal with those three words, commonly referred to as consequential amendments, would be introduced. So my honourable friend cannot make that argument.

Senator Roblin: Yes, but I presume my honourable friend would agree that any bill that he introduces has to conform with the rules of this house. It is not good enough to say that he will do so-and-so, if that does not fit our rules. That is an idiotic position to take, and yet that is the position he is taking because he is convinced that his view on this matter is right.

What happened back in October? Two propositions came before the house. One had to do with the substance of the matter, namely the changing of the name of the day from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day." What happened to that? It carried. Did Senator Flynn ask that that substantive motion be changed, when his amendment came along? No. He repeated it, to make sure that the position would be perfectly clear.

What Senator Flynn did suggest was that not only would we repeat the substantive motion insofar as that amendment was concerned, but we would add on these other consequential matters that are under discussion tonight. Now that is the substance of the matter.

When my honourable friend talks of Senator Flynn trying to deal in some peculiar way with the substance of the name of the day, he of course knows that he is completely wrong. All one has to do is analyse the sequence of events. It is only necessary to analyse the wording of the amendment Senator Flynn submitted. When one has done that, it becomes as clear as can be that what we are talking about in Bill S-30 is the substance of the amendment that Senator Flynn proposed.

Senator Olson: Part of the amendment.

Senator Roblin: He did not propose to amend the "Canada Day-Dominion Day" principle. That was exactly as stipulated in the measure which my honourable friend was responsible for introducing to this house. Senator Flynn's amendment had to do with the consequential matters, and them alone. I must say that I almost thought my honourable friend was a member of the legal profession, he argued his case so adroitly; but perhaps not.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He should go back to school.

Senator Roblin: Whether he should go back to school or not, the substance of the matter is the same in the two cases, and it seems to me, not to prolong the argument, that the correct course for the government to follow would be simply either to give us five days' notice of a motion to rescind an amendment that was defeated or, if it does not want to do that, to let the matter stand until the next session of Parliament. Then there would be no question of the legality or the propriety of the matter.

An Hon. Senator: It would show people that you are sincere.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in making a ruling on this subject the Speaker, I am sure, will refer to the points made, with or without fervour, on the interesting point of order raised by Senator Flynn. I just wish to bring to the attention of the Speaker one or two further points he might consider in making his ruling.

Rule 47 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada states that:

(1) A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question—

Whether for good reason or not, our rules define "bill" and "motion" in two separate definitions. Rule 5(a) defines "bill":

(a) "bill" means a draft Act of Parliament and includes both a private and a public bill;

Rule 5(h) defines "motion":

[Senator Roblin.]

(h) "motion" means a proposal made by a senator that the Senate or a committee thereof do something, order something to be done, or express an opinion concerning some matter;

Whether the other provisions in the various texts dealing with motions and bills mean to make a distinction between a motion and a bill is a question I am sure the Speaker will consider in making his ruling. However, it is a fact that rule 47 refers to motions but not to bills.

I should like to make two other references which might be of some assistance to the Speaker. In the Nineteenth Edition of May, at page 492, there are two headings that might be relevant. The first reference, under the subject "Proceedings in Passing Public Bills" and objections based on the same basic principle as that raised by Senator Flynn, is as follows:

(i) When previously decided question related to an amendment on second reading—

Which was the case here.

On 31 March 1859 an amendment was proposed, but not made, to a proposed amendment on the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill, expressing an opinion in favour of the ballot; but this was held not to preclude a motion on a later day for bringing in a bill for the taking of votes by way of ballot.

My second reference is to paragraph (iii):

(iii) When the later bill is the same in substance as an amendment rejected when offered to an earlier bill—

Which seems to be exactly the case here.

The National Insurance (Widowed Mothers) Bill (1961-62) was allowed to proceed although a new Clause to the same effect had been rejected when offered to the Family Allowances and National Insurance Bill.

Honourable senators, I have just one other reference to make for the benefit of the Speaker. In the Fourth Edition of Bourinot, at page 546, again dealing with the question of rejected bills that are not to be revived, the author makes the point:

Or, if a bill be altered in any material point, both in the body and title, it may be received a second time.

Honourable senators, I add those references for the Speaker to consider in making his ruling on this point.

Hon. John Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am rather confused as to what this debate is all about. Obviously, if we give the five days' notice and there is a vote, the opposition, which actually proposed the original amendment, surely cannot vote against this bill which is doing what they want. I see no problem, because, regardless of the ruling, they cannot possibly vote against it.

Senator Roblin: You can tell us how. You did it.

Senator Asselin: You did it before, yes.

Senator Flynn: The question of how we will vote may be of some concern to us, but it is none of your business. That is the first point. We will deal with that question when the time comes.

Right now we are dealing with a point of order, but you are always butting in and, as usual when the occasion presents itself, you have put both feet in your mouth. Your intervention serves no useful purpose at this time. When the matter comes to a vote we will decide what we will do.

Right now I am simply drawing to the attention of the Senate, and especially to the attention of the majority who voted against my amendment, just what the government is asking the Senate to do, namely, swallow the decision it made less than a month ago.

With respect to the substance, I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate will agree that, if it was not defeated, it would have been decided that my amendment would not have changed the substance of the bill; it would have changed only the wording of the first section, and that, substantially, the amendment would have brought in the consequential amendments that are contained in Bill S-30. There is no doubt about that.

Both May and Beauchesne clearly say that no question or bill shall be offered in either house that is substantially the same as one on which judgment has already been expressed in the current session. Judgment has been expressed against these consequential amendments in this session.

● (2140)

The point Senator Frith raised was whether the bill should be considered as a motion. If the Chair rules that what we must do is move that the decision of the Senate of October 25 be rescinded, then I do not mind that, but it seems to me that moving a bill which contains exactly the same matter which was decided against one month ago is a motion of some kind, and that means simply that this cannot pass unless it has received the approval of two-thirds of the senators present. That is quite clear.

With regard to the substance, the honourable senator has said that we were in favour of it, but I am not discussing that; I am simply discussing the "about face" of the government. Why did you not vote for the amendment that I moved? That would have been the proper thing to do. You have a majority, and you voted against that amendment, and I know that that was for partisan reasons because many did not want to do that. That is your problem, but do not try to make fools out of us now. We voted for that amendment. I do not know why you are now asking us to vote for it again.

What is silly is to ask people who voted against that amendment less than a month ago to vote for it now. If Senator Godfrey is not concerned about that, that is his problem. If he is ready to change his vote, he may do so, but as far as we are concerned, we will do what we wish. That is our business.

Again, one must remember that the rules are there to be followed, and the rule requires two-thirds of the senators present to vote for the amendment. If you say that the rule does not apply, then let us just tear that page out of the book and forget about it.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to point out to Senator Flynn that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, of which he is an active member, as a general rule, does not propose amendments to bills but obtains undertakings from ministers that consequential or other amendments will be made. That is what we are doing now, which is the usual practice in committees.

So, we are not reversing ourselves in any way, but are following a practice that is well established in Senate committees. I do not see how my honourable friend, Senator Roblin, can say that it is idiotic, because we are now doing what you want, which is bringing in consequential amendments, so I would suggest that it would be idiotic of you to vote against them.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, it is quite improper to make that kind of reference to the undertakings asked by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. In those cases, the Senate does not have a question before it and a decision is not taken on the question. That bears no relevance to what has been argued or can be argued under this rule.

I raise this in the interest of keeping the desirable practice followed by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce clear of any improper impression that might be presented in the debate on this matter this evening.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I shall be very brief. If Senator Flynn wishes to continue to argue that somehow we are making fools of ourselves, and that it is the senators on this side of the house who are doing a reversal, nothing could be further from the truth. I want that on the record.

All of Bill S-30 deals with consequential amendments. The fact of the matter is that there was more than that in Senator Flynn's amendment. When he moved that amendment, he moved an amendment to the substantive part of the bill, which he denies now. He had similar wording, and perhaps identical wording, but he did indeed do that. Whatever his motives may have been at the time they are of no particular interest now because that bill has been passed, although I know what his motives were.

I just want to make it clear that we are not making fools of ourselves but are doing things in the proper procedural order. I hope that honourable senators opposite will support us in completing a task which was undertaken.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, we made fools of ourselves by accepting the bill in the first place. We should have torn it up and thrown it out. We are not only making fools of ourselves now, but are making ourselves prostitutes to the system.

Senator Olson: I do not believe that Senator Marshall has any more right than any other senator to reflect on the votes taken in this place.

Senator Marshall: I do because I was, and remain, embarrassed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The Chair will take Senator Flynn's point of order under advisement, and report later.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall, pursuant to notice of November 9, 1982, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is Senator Marshall going to say a word or two in support of his motion?

Senator Marshall: It was, and is, my thought and suggestion—and I discussed this with the Chairman of the Standing

Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science—that this might be an opportune time to look into any changes that are required to veterans legislation. There are many anomalies and inadequacies which have arisen because of the changing times and conditions. This might give us an opportunity to call witnesses before that committee to debate changes to that legislation on behalf of the veterans of Canada.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have heard what Senator Marshall has said. I must say that, prima facie, what he has said seems to support his motion. I have checked and know that what he has said is true—that the chairman of the committee to which he wishes to refer these estimates will cooperate and supports such a reference.

Therefore, I move the adjournment of this debate, and hope that we can dispose of this motion favourably by the end of the week.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, at four o'clock in the afternoon, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to solicit a clarification from the Leader of the Government with respect to the meaning and implication of the terms of reference that have been provided to what I will call, for lack of a better description, the Macdonald royal commission. The terms of reference, on page 2, state:

The Committee further advise that the study include an examination of and a report on . . .

(b) the appropriate institutional and constitutional arrangements to promote the liberty and well-being of individual Canadians and the maintenance of a strong and competitive economy including consideration of the following . . .

And this is the nub of it.

—changes in the institutions of national government so as to take better account of the views and needs of all Canadians and regions, and to encourage the further development of the Canadian economic union.

My question is: Does this clause in the terms of reference indicate that the government expects this commission to undertake some studies with relation to the future of the Senate, or Senate reform? The Senate is certainly an institution of the national government, and one's curiosity is naturally aroused as to whether or not this term of reference indicates that the government expects this commission to consider the constitutional future of the Canadian Senate.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I will make some inquiries about that more specific question as to the interpretation, and give the reply as soon as I have it. I hope to have it very shortly.

ROYAL COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT—ROLE OF DEPARTMENT
OF FINANCE, ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA AND HELLIWELL COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask the minister whether he has had an opportunity to obtain a reply to my question of last week on the subject of the Macdonald royal commission? The minister will recall that I had quoted the Honourable Marc Lalonde as having replied, "No comment," when asked whether he was consulted by the Prime Minister on the establishment of this royal commission. Further to that, the Prime Minister has indicated that only the Deputy Prime Minister knew of his intention to set up this royal commission. Will the minister clarify that situation for us?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I undertook then to try to get further comment on the so-called, "No comment," and I will do that as soon as I can.

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about pursuing my question of yesterday?

Senator Murray: At the same time, if it happens that in fact the minister and the Department of Finance were not consulted by the Prime Minister on the establishment of this royal commission and the appointment of its members, will the minister undertake to bring a statement into the Senate indicating just what role in the policy-making process the department and the Minister of Finance are expected to play in the present government?

● (1410)

At the same time, will the minister undertake to obtain for us an indication of the respective roles of the Economic Council of Canada, the committee headed by Professor Helliwell, whose appointment was announced by Mr. Lalonde a couple of weeks ago, and the new royal commission headed by the Honourable Donald Macdonald?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, yes, I will include that in the inquiry that I send to the Minister of Finance.

ROYAL COMMISSION—TENURE OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may continue the line of questioning begun by my colleague, I would like to ask the minister to clarify the position of Mr. Macdonald as chairman of this royal commission. Mr. Macdonald has stated, as reported in the press—and he has not disavowed the statement—that he has taken on the task of heading the commission on the condition that he was free to step down to run for the Liberal leadership if Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau retires before the commission's three-year mandate expires.

My question is: In the event of that happening and Mr. Macdonald's stepping down, as he says he is entitled to do, what plans has the government got for maintaining the continuity of the work of the commission?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, essentially the same question was asked yesterday, and I gave an undertaking that I would check it out. I am sorry that my honourable friend is repeating exactly the same thing as he said yesterday. That is, he is really asking whether or not a statement that appeared in the press is true; but he has put it in the context that he wants me to ask whether or not the press statement can be verified, and I will endeavour to do that.

Senator Roblin: I am really not concerned whether the statement appearing in the press is true. I am concerned whether the statement made by Mr. Macdonald, that he is going to step down from the chairmanship of the royal commission in the event that he chooses to run for the Liberal leadership, is true. That is the question to which I want an answer.

Senator Olson: I understood that part of the question. I also understood the explanation of where my honourable friend got the information. I do not believe he has a letter or some other document of greater substance than a press report. I believe that is where he got the information from, and that is why I gave the reply I did a few moments ago.

Senator Roblin: I would remind my honourable friend that a good deal of the information that he dispenses comes to us in terms of press reports and press releases, so he need not be the slightest bit surprised if we pay some attention to them. This is from a report of a telephone conversation with Mr. Macdonald. There is little point in trying to fudge the issue with some reference to press reports. We want the facts, and the minister will undoubtedly get them for us.

Senator Olson: That is right, and I have given an undertaking to do so. But I would like the honourable senator to understand that I do not accept prima facie that press reports are facts.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We all know that.

Senator Roblin: No one is asking my honourable friend to accept any press report prima facie or any other way, although he is the author of a good many of them, as he must admit.

[Senator Olson.]

Even if he does not choose to believe himself, I am not sure whether he chooses to believe Mr. Macdonald. We do not care about the press report; what we care about are the facts. What about the chairmanship of this royal commission? Is it to be headed by a man who is ready to cut and run if he sees the chance to run for the Liberal leadership? That is the question we want answered.

Senator Olson: I understood that, and what I said a few moments ago is just as valid now as it was then.

THE CABINET

ABSENCE OF MINISTERS FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government advise us if the Minister of State for Social Development and the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport will be in the chamber today?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, no, they will not be here today. Indeed, the house leader advised honourable senators yesterday that the Minister of State for Social Development would not be here today.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PLIGHT OF CERTAIN WOMEN BELOW AGE SIXTY-FIVE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government concerning the widows in this country who are below the age of 65, and also those women who are divorced, separated, deserted and living alone. For the many years that I have been in the Senate, nothing has ever been done for them. I have heard nothing but statements that funds are not available.

• (1415)

Considering the way inflation and the state of the economy are going, I think it is about time that these people across the country be given some help. Granted, the honourable senator may be getting some advice right now that this matter falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but I think the federal government should show some leadership in this area and provide widows throughout Canada with some help—help which they deserve. Right now they are well below the poverty line.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I shall take the question as notice and get a detailed answer for the honourable senator, but I do not accept the premise on which the question was based, that nothing has been done. When Senator Marshall receives the answer he will see that a number of substantial things have been done by a government that has a very keen social conscience.

Senator Marshall: The honourable senator can make that comment all day if he wants, but what the government has done so far is not to my satisfaction.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PLIGHT OF VETERANS RESIDING ABROAD

Hon. Jack Marshall: I would like to turn to a problem with regard to veterans affairs, and such problems come to my attention on a daily basis. For some reason or other, Canadian veterans who decided to stay in foreign countries after the war—for health reasons, because they like the warmer climate, or what have you—have to return to Canada for 365 days in order to qualify for war veterans' allowances. The irony of the situation is that if a veteran returns from, say, England to Canada, he immediately receives his war veterans' allowance, but he has to remain in Canada for one year, separated all the time from his family and children. At this stage of the game, when World War II veterans are in their sixties, some relief must be given so that these people can qualify, no matter where they are located.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government could bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs so that it may be considered in the very near future, before it is too late.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I will take the question as notice.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

MCDONALD'S RESTAURANTS OF CANADA LTD.—ISSUANCE OF PERMIT FOR IMPORTATION OF BUNS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Some time ago I sent a copy of a Manitoba Government, Information Services Branch, news release to the minister. It related to a problem in Manitoba concerning the importation of buns by McDonald's and the fact that there was a permit issued by the Canadian Wheat Board to permit this even though it seems to go against the policy of "Buy Canadian." Since then I understand that the Wheat Board has issued a further permit. I wonder if the minister could tell me what is the situation in this regard and whether or not the government intends to take action on the matter?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): I thank the Honourable Senator Molgat for having sent me notice of his question.

Hon. Martial Asselin: A planted question.

Senator Argue: I have received representations on this subject from a number of people, including the Minister of Labour of Manitoba, the Honourable Mary Bert Dolan. I, too, am concerned that the decision not to buy buns from McGavin's, which is a Canadian company, has reduced sales and forced layoffs in this Canadian industry, in a number of provinces. However, while I share the concerns, I must point out that there are a number of factors to consider in regard to this matter.

Canada enjoys a substantial surplus in the two-way trade in bread and bakery products with the United States. In 1981

Canada exported about $58 million worth of bread and baked products to the United States while it imported $29 million worth of similar products. That means, of course, that Canada exports twice as much as it imports. I understand the value of the McDonald's imports is about $8 million, so even with this large sum under consideration we still have a very favourable balance.

I suggest that we must be concerned about the possibility that Canadian protectionism to limit imports could lead to retaliation and a limit on our exports. We could, in fact, stand to lose more jobs than we might hope to gain by the action being requested. Also, since Canada is a signatory to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, any actions we take must be consistent with the GATT agreement.

Finally, regarding the import permit issued by the Canadian Wheat Board, this was a 45-day permit. The honourable senator is quite right that it has been re-issued. The permit was approved on the understanding that McDonald's would provide progress reports on their efforts to find a Canadian source of buns. McDonald's has cancelled its contracts with McGavin's because of dissatisfaction with the quality of buns supplied by McGavin's in certain provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. It is worth noting that the Calgary plant continues to supply Alberta buns. Indeed, one of the options being considered is to supply some of its prairie outlets from the Calgary plant.

I have urged McDonald's to return to a Canadian supplier as soon as possible. The company has since assured the Wheat Board that importing hamburger buns is only an interim measure and that alternative sources of supply, as I have outlined, are being pursued.

The Canadian Wheat Board has issued an import permit for 244,000 dozen hamburger buns during the 45-day period from November 16 to January 1. The buns covered under this permit will be imported for McDonald's Restaurant outlets in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The board issued the permit on the basis of a progress report provided by McDonald's Restaurants on efforts to obtain a Canadian source of supply.

Senator Asselin: This is a speech you are making.

Senator Argue: Well, it is a fairly comprehensive answer.

Senator Asselin: May I have a copy of it?

Senator Argue: The Canadian Wheat Board is satisfied that McDonald's is actively pursuing a Canadian source of supply for its buns. My office has been in consultation with Ron Marcoux, Executive Vice-President of McDonald's western region, who confirms that René Fleury has received a contract from McDonald's to build a bun plant in British Columbia.

An Hon. Senator: Ha, ha!

Senator Argue: I think this information is rather encouraging, in light of the difficulties that have arisen in British Columbia. Honourable senators may laugh, but it is important to the people of Canada to have these jobs available. The situation is improving in British Columbia, and efforts are being made to have supplies provided in Canada that are of an adequate quality.

We are trying to ensure that McDonald's Restaurants in Canada are a market for Canadian products, but we do not want to follow the kind of advice that would have us putting an embargo on imports from the United States, thus interfering with what is now a good balance in trade in favour of Canada, and interfering with our standing in the GATT.

Senator Molgat: Judging from the laughs across the way, it would seem that some honourable senators do not consider this a serious matter. I regret that, because it does happen to involve a fair amount of employment in my province.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Thank you very much for the lecture.

Senator Molgat: For that reason alone it is indeed a serious matter.

Has the minister any knowledge whether or not the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, for example, has become involved in the discussion? I understand there is an argument whether or not the quality provided is adequate. That is an argument between McDonald's and the bakeries.

Are there any means by which the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce can help to resolve this matter, if, in fact, it is the heart of the problem?

Senator Argue: I do not really know what the answer to that might be, unless the honourable senator is suggesting that perhaps the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should provide some grants for the building or improvement of facilities.

The Canadian Wheat Board has issued permits for 45 days on the understanding that McDonald's will do everything possible within that 45-day period to find a Canadian source. McDonald's is under a good deal of pressure from the Canadian Wheat Board, and from others in Canada, to attempt to find a satisfactory Canadian source of supply.

The evidence is that the situation in British Columbia will be corrected, so we have done quite well out there. The problem then is to have the situation in Manitoba and Saskatchewan corrected as well, and I will be very happy to inquire whether the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce either has a role to play or is already playing a role. Certainly, the pressure is on Canadian suppliers to come forth with a bun of adequate quality for McDonald's.

• (1425)

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Perhaps I did not hear the minister correctly, so I should like to ask him, as a supplementary question, when the proposed plant to be located in British Columbia will be built.

The minister keeps saying that the permit or certificate allows the company 45 days to consider the possibility of improving the situation. Is there simply a proposal to construct a plant in British Columbia, or is it a fact that the plant will be constructed?

[Senator Argue.]

Further, I should like to ask the minister whether the Minister of Employment and Immigration has been consulted, and, if so, whether he agrees with the policy with regard to the 45 days to consider the possibility of improvement. I realize the unemployment that this will create in Manitoba, and must agree with Senator Molgat that this may cause a serious problem in the area.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have not consulted with the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Jobs in Canada are very, very important, and I do not think we should take precipitous action that might result in a major net loss of jobs, because we are exporting to the United States twice as much in bakery products as we are importing from the United States.

I have the situation in Manitoba very much in my mind. I am obviously not responsible for the provision of facilities to bake buns, but I am encouraging the Canadian Wheat Board to continue its monitoring of the situation and to continue the pressure to get buns produced in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The Saskatchewan situation is similar to that in Manitoba, and the product is of adequate quality.

Senator Guay: Would the minister answer that part of my question regarding the proposed construction of a plant in British Columbia?

Senator Argue: That has been announced in the newspapers. While one cannot always believe what is in the newspapers, it seems fairly clear that a gentleman in Vancouver has announced that he is in the process of establishing a $2 million bakery capable of turning out 54 million hamburger rolls a year.

When that plant is in operation, which it is expected to be 1983, the McDonald's British Columbia market will be fully supplied with rolls that this man believes—and I would agree—are likely to be of the quality that McDonald's will accept. Further, there will be many jobs provided while the construction of the plant takes place.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EAST-WEST DÉTENTE—POLICY OF U.S.S.R.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister has recently returned from Moscow, having attended the funeral of the late Leonid Brezhnev.

Hon. Martial Asselin: He was representing the Canadian Wheat Board.

Senator Bosa: I am wondering if the minister could inform the Senate whether he has had any political contact with the new leaders of the U.S.S.R. concerning their intentions as to the policy of détente.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): I am afraid I did not get that far during my visit to the Soviet Union. I attended the funeral of Leonid Brezhnev and did go with others to the reception where we met the Soviet leaders.

On the question of what I did in addition to what I have now said—and I was there for only a very short time—I had an opportunity to meet with officials of Exportkhleb, which is the importing grain organization in the Soviet Union, and discussed the sales that we have agreed to and our delivery of those sales. I must say that the officials of that organization were very optimistic that Canada would meet its current contract in every way. They said that, while they were interested in what had happened regarding the dispute on the west coast, based on Canada's record they felt that this was a very temporary situation and that we would meet our commitments in full for the current year; and I agreed with them on that.

We did discuss or raise the possibility of additional sales to that market during the current year. From the views that were exchanged, I personally feel that there is a real possibility of additional sales during the current year. Of course, there is the matter of guaranteed credit having been provided to the Soviet Union, but, as I said earlier, there was absolutely no element of subsidy. It is perfectly clear that the repayment terms will be fully met. The information I received or the opinions I heard would indicate that there may not be the same kind of need for credit in the foreseeable future that there has recently been, which, to me, just underlines how important it was to provide that 180-day credit, how wise it was from a business standpoint, and how fortunate we were, from the standpoint of the producers of western Canada and the economy of Canada, to be able to make such a huge and satisfactory sale.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

LABOUR RELATIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—VANCOUVER HARBOUR—RESUMPTION OF OPERATIONS

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of Her Majesty's Government in the Senate. Of great concern to us on the west coast is the recent order of Parliament for longshoremen to resume work at the west coast ports. Is there anything that we can do to ensure compliance with that law if longshoremen do not adhere to this order? The problem that we are faced with is that there are perhaps four months of backlog to unload or to load, and ships are in demurrage situations, and so on. The longshoremen are not supplying sufficient crews to carry out this work. Due to insufficient workers, companies trying to load lumber, grain or whatever, are now looking at 18 days instead of 8 days to complete that work, and thousands of dollars a day in demurrage. In the meantime on Vancouver Island there are breadlines in various Pacific coast ports consisting of people who are willing to do that work, but apparently the longshoremen's union will not provide extra labour, or train them. Of course, we are losing contracts and people who are shipping are saying, "Sue me. I will not carry on with it; I will go through Seattle and order from somebody else." It is a terrible situation for the British Columbia ports.

How can we ensure compliance with this legislation that was recently passed by Parliament?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I noted the remarks of Senator Bell, but I do not believe that I should comment on them at the moment. As a matter of fact, I think the vote of the union membership to ratify the tentative agreement that has been worked out between the employers and the unions is being held either today or tomorrow. I do not think that any discussion or any comment from me, or from the Minister of Labour, would be helpful in this situation.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. Would the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board have any comment to make on this subject, as he could probably inform us regarding the flow of grain.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, as I recall the bill, I do not think there is anything particular in it concerning a settlement coming about because of negotiations, or a tentative settlement, at any rate, being reached before the deadline. My leader mentioned that there is to be a meeting tonight of the longshoremen to discuss the proposed settlement. I have been endeavouring on a daily basis to keep track of what is happening on the west coast regarding the grain situation. What is happening out there gives us much reason for optimism.

The grain handlers have a tentative settlement. They are prepared to work overtime and, in fact, they are doing so.

It is true that when they request a certain number of gangs, as I understand the situation with longshoremen, they are not always able to get the number they request. A 40,000-tonne loading into a ship per day is considered about average. There have been days since this tentative settlement when the loading of a ship amounted to 60,000 tonnes and 50,000 tonnes. The work is going forward.

Yesterday at the terminals there were some 543 car unloads. A 3,500 car unload week is indicative of a pretty good week. Some weeks they can exceed that, but, nonetheless, 3,500 car unloads at Vancouver is indicative of a good week's work. Therefore, in a five-day week—and sometimes a week may be longer than five days—an unload of some 700 cars per day is close to maximum performance. I think that is very good progress.

The information I have today indicates that one vessel is loading at Prince Rupert and two vessels are waiting. Six vessels are loading at Vancouver and 26 vessels are waiting. Six vessels are due into Vancouver this week, and only one vessel is due into Vancouver next week.

Since the tentative settlement, up until now, the loading of ships has been equal to the arrival of ships. My information is that, if there can be some reasonable increase in the loading of ships and since, as time goes on, probably fewer vessels will arrive, there will be a catch-up.

Not one single sale was lost. Not one single grain boat was dispatched to some other port.

We are fortunate in that there appears to be every chance of a settlement by the longshoremen's union and by the grain handlers' union. Work is progressing. The car unloads are getting close to a fairly normal level and, with goodwill and with some good luck, we can catch up with the backlog that occurred during the time this dispute was in effect.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.— CANADIAN OWNERSHIP CHARGE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to the Canadian ownership charge which was imposed, as I understand the situation, to produce sufficient revenue to defray a high percentage of the cost of the purchase of Petrofina by Petro-Canada.

Is the Leader of the Government in a position to indicate to us how much money has been raised by that charge to date, and how near it is to reaching the objective for which it was imposed in relation to the purchase price of Petrofina?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the specific figures up to any given date, but I will try to get them, perhaps up to November 1 or any other particular date.

I believe it was projected that the pay-out for that purchase would be completed in about the latter part of the first quarter of 1983.

Senator Smith: On the same subject matter, is the leader able to assure us that this charge will not be extended to help defray the cost of the British Petroleum purchase?

Senator Olson: Yes, I can give that assurance, but I would remind my honourable friend of the announcement to the effect that, if the offer made by the chartered banks involved and the federal government with respect to Dome Petroleum were accepted, the charge would be applied long enough to take care of the federal government's commitment to that deal.

● (1440)

Senator Smith: My next question was going to be in connection with Dome Petroleum, and I think that the minister may have anticipated it. Just so that I may be clear whether he did or not, is he saying that the charge will be extended to cover the extent of the government's financial involvement in Dome Petroleum?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was repeating an announcement that was made at the time. However, my honourable friend should be aware of the fact that what is now being considered by Dome and a number of other financial institutions involved is an offer that has not yet been accepted. Therefore, it is not known for certain that the Canadian ownership charge will be carried beyond the date I mentioned with respect to Petrofina for the purpose of the Dome situation.

Senator Smith: Perhaps a further supplementary question would be permissible. In view of the Leader of the Government's answer, can he give an estimate as to when the situation will have gelled, if I may use such a word, as to the acceptance or otherwise of the proposal or offer?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not believe that I can answer that question today as precisely as I am accustomed to doing. I am not sure, quite frankly, how long the offer is to be outstanding, or, indeed, if there is a termination date on it.

Senator Smith: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would not mind ascertaining what he can about the matter and informing the Senate in due course?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would be glad to do that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You are really improving!

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to comply with the request that was made by Senator Roblin yesterday, which was to bring back as complete an answer as I could tomorrow—that is today—and here it is.

On July 20, Senator Roblin asked for the contents of the representations sent to the minister and the corporation regarding the definition of a letter. Disclosure of this information would have been improper at that time, as it would be now.

A letter between two individuals, whether it be a minister of the Crown or not, is privileged material. It would be inappropriate to have the recipient or a third party, Canada Post Corporation, release the contents. Many of those who submitted briefs made the contents available to the press at the time and subsequently. I am told that Senator Roblin was advised of this at the time.

When Parliament passed the Canada Post Corporation Act, it unanimously agreed to the principle of a national postal service. Indeed, it agreed that the corporation should forthwith bring forward a definition of a letter to circumscribe its monopoly, or, legally speaking, its "exclusive privilege." This is necessary to ensure a revenue base with which to support the national service.

At the same time, Parliament created in the act a unique process that would allow for the protection of the public interest when the corporation sought to make any major changes. This process involves the publication of a proposed regulation, public comment and discussion and consultation, amendment by the corporation and submission of the amended version to the Governor in Council. Cabinet then has 60 days within which to review and either accept or reject the proposal.

This is a dynamic process which allows for far greater flexibility and future change than would an amendment to an act with full parliamentary debate.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would my honourable friend mind repeating that last sentence?

Senator Olson: Cabinet then has 60 days within to review and either accept or reject the proposal. Honourable senators, the last sentence is as follows, and I will go over it carefully: This is a dynamic process which allows for far greater flexibility and future change than would an amendment to an act with full parliamentary debate.

Senator Roblin: Surely my honourable friend did not expect me to accept that answer as being adequate in the circumstances?

Senator Olson: It is just a statement of fact, that is all.

Senator Roblin: It may be a statement of fact, but it is a fact that we have to deplore.

To make a statement that it is more democratic or effective to proceed in the way in which the government is proceeding rather than to seek to amend the statute is not addressing the point that I was making. It is quite within the power of the government to permit—permit, if you please—a parliamentary discussion of this matter, so that those people who want to say something can give their views and Canada Post can give its point of view. To leave the impression, however, as he does with me, that that sort of thing is not democratic, really surprises me. I think it is the way to go.

I know that my honourable friend has made his statement. I am not going to change his mind. I have to admit that he is within the four corners of the statute; that is perfectly correct. However, I think that, as a matter of public policy, it would have been much wiser to have some parliamentary discussion of a matter which is going to be very important in the light of the economy of the country.

It is a generally agreed proposition that monopolies have to justify their positions before some reasonably competent tribunal. It seems to me that Parliament constitutes such a body.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I should comment that Senator Roblin, after he receives the reply, then wants to debate the substance of it—at least that part of the substance which concerns the process that is involved. I think my honourable friend should go back and consider carefully what I have just said. I have not yet provided him with a copy of the reply, but he will have one. He will then see that this process involves the publication of a proposed regulation, public comment and discussion and consultation, amendment by the corporation and submission of the amended version to the Governor in Council. I think this process goes a long way farther—that is why it is unique—than does the making, or, indeed, the amending, of regulations of a new act.

It seems to me that Senator Roblin, with his usual generosity, should accept that this is a tremendous improvement over simply going without that 60 days' notice within which to receive any comments.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I appreciate that this is not the place to debate the subject, but I want to make one final observation. I really do not agree that it is a contribution to the advancement of our public affairs to make sure that these matters are dealt with by arbitrary bodies without any process of public discussion, such as would be ordinary in the course of any other monopoly justifying its position. There certainly has not been any public discussion. We do not even have the full documentation which was available to the government. To simply say that the executive, in its wisdom, will decide what is right is not an advantageous way to do things when the matter could well be debated by Parliament.

Senator Olson: Senator Roblin is really challenging a practice that has been carried on by every government, both federal and provincial, since Confederation. Governors in Council, or Lieutenant Governors in Council, make regulations by order in council. The process to which we are referring today is even more wide open, in that the Governor in Council does not proceed until there has been a debate for about 60 days. It seems to me that Senator Roblin is being unfair in saying that this represents some restriction when it really is an expansion of the public debate that took place.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend obviously did not mean what he said, because he said that there has been a debate for 60 days. Where is that debate, pray? The debate consists of correspondence between a number of people and the Governor in Council. I am asking for a real debate; that is what I want.

Senator Olson: There has been a great debate in public about it.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he is aware that, in following this procedure, he is adopting the procedure which was recommended in the report of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments with respect to reform of the government regulatory process as to notice and comment procedures. I must say that I am delighted that the government is doing so in this instance. It should be made compulsory, as recommended in our report.

Senator Olson: In reply to Senator Godfrey, I must say that I was not aware that we were precisely following those instructions. However, I, too, am delighted that he has drawn that to our attention.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have a great respect for Senator Godfrey and his committee. If he has been able to introduce some improvement in our procedures, who am I to object? I simply say that, as a result of my observations in Australia, in that country the Senate has the power to rule on the validity or the policy content of orders in council. It is my hope that, some day, Senator Godfrey's committee may be empowered to do the same.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Perhaps, honourable senators, we can consider this delayed answer debated.

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while we are on delayed answers I should like to point out that, some time ago, I asked the predecessor of the Leader of the Government a question regarding the law of the sea. At that time I was concerned about the fact that, while Canada was going to be a signatory to the Law of the Sea Convention and the treaty, the most powerful countries in the world, such as the United States, Russia and West Germany, were not going to sign the treaty. There has to be some basis for that reasoning. In view of the fact that the Law of the Sea Treaty will be signed in Jamaica on December 6, could the Leader of the Government make a statement on the position of the Government of Canada with regard to the Law of the Sea Conference, as opposed to the position taken by, especially, the United States.

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I will take that question as notice, honourable senators.

INTERPRETATION ACT BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT CANADA LABOUR CODE

SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the second reading of the Bill S-30, intituled: "An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to Canada Day".—(Speaker's Ruling).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, last night when the debate took place a point of order was raised on procedure. If honourable senators see no objection, I should like to think it over until tomorrow before I give my decision. It is a very complex matter, it is important, and I should like to give the best decision I can.

Is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NATIONAL FINANCE

"GOVERNMENT POLICY AND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT"—
CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 27, the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance entitled Government

[Senator Roblin.]

Policy and Regional Development, tabled in the Senate on Monday, October 25, 1982.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, on October 27, immediately after Senator Everett and Senator Stuart had spoken on this report, I made a brief comment, the substance of which may be found at page 4870 of Debates of the Senate of that day.

Therein I indicated that the report, as presented verbally and eloquently by Senator Everett, did not sound the same to me as I had read. While I still stand by that statement, I think my comment was unfair to Senator Everett, because I think the difference can be accounted for very simply in two ways. The first is the difference between the presentation of a subject verbally and a somewhat lengthy written text. And the second way in which I think the difference may arise is that the words of Senator Everett, when carefully scrutinized, seem to me to be somewhat more precise and present the matter more succinctly than the report itself did. So far as that comment goes, I believe I was being unfair to Senator Everett, and I extend to him my regrets for having thought even for a moment that a senator with his long service and great distinction would somehow go astray in presenting the contents of a report to the Senate.

However, there are a couple of things that I noticed in this more careful scrutiny of the matter that I should like to make reference to. In looking at the list of witnesses contained in the report, I think it is very difficult to avoid the conclusion that the mixture of views was preponderantly that which emanated from academic people and members of the bureaucracy, without a great deal of leavening by testimony from people who have had in the past, and have now, the responsibility, as elected persons, of dealing with the subject of regional disparities. I suspect that had that leavening been on a somewhat more generous level, some of the comments in the report, although not necessarily the remarks of Senator Everett, might have been somewhat modified. However, I do not intend to make any further comment on that point.

The second matter is that it seems to me, in a general way—and I shall be very brief on this—that the report tended to consider disparities wherever they might exist in a province rather than what I think is the major problem in our country, which is disparities that exist in a whole region of the country, such as the one from which I come. It seems to me the treatment of these two kinds of disparity must be very different and must present very different problems, and present them to different levels of government.

Having said that, I say it is perfectly clear that the report is a very careful study of the problem and should make a valuable contribution to its understanding, if not its solution. I congratulate the committee on what was obviously the product of a lot of very hard and diligent work.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I apologize, because I thought one of the senators on the other side of the house would adjourn the debate and subsequently rise to speech. Perhaps I waited a little too long, but I do intend to speak.

Thus, with leave of the Senate, I move the adjournment of the debate on the report of the National Finance Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Agreed.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMY

ECONOMIC, FISCAL AND ENERGY POLICIES OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—ORDER DISCHARGED AND MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk:

That the Senate of Canada do urge the Federal Government to re-direct its economic, fiscal and energy policies, and bring forward as soon as possible a new budget; such budget to provide proper economic direction, improved employment opportunities and measures to restore national confidence in the economy.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think this motion has become obsolete, and I ask leave to withdraw it, purely and simply.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Could we have it stand until the next budget?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You have had two already.

Senator Flynn: I would like to clean up the order paper as much as possible as far as I am concerned.

Senator Frith: We will try to do the same.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF FIRST REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Monday, June 28, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs entitled: "Manpower in Canada's Armed Forces", tabled in the Senate on February 10, 1982.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, back in June the then Leader of the Government in the Senate gave us what I took to be the official response of the government to this report. He began his reply on June 23 and concluded it on June 28. In so doing he went through all of the proposals that had been made by the committee. It is not my intention today to go step by step through all the recommendations. I think there has been a good deal of discussion on the subject already. However, I should like to focus on one recommendation in particular, and that is the first—the whole question of a white paper on national defence.

Before doing that, I want to say how pleased I was that the Minister of National Defence received our report as openly as he did, and I thank him for the very generous but accurate comments he made regarding the work of the committee. His comments were not, of course, made in this chamber because he does not come here to speak, but I was privileged to hear him in Toronto when Senator Hicks and I represented the committee at a meeting of the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies. The minister was present at that meeting, and spoke in the evening. Perhaps I might put on the record some statements he made at that time with regard to the committee's work, because I believe it is important that we have a rapport with the minister, that he understands what we are trying to do, and that we work together. That evening, when speaking at the dinner, he said:

• (1500)

I must highly commend the late Senator McDonald's initiative to establish a Senate Subcommittee on National Defence. Under the leadership of Senator Lafond, the subcommittee has proven highly successful, and provides a valuable service to Canada. In fact, I believe it has become, after the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the most active committee of the Senate. Certainly, in its deliberations and output, the Subcommittee on Defence gives the nation clear evidence of both the intent and the qualities of the Senate. They are deliberations which illustrate the benefits of their experience, their wisdom, and, most of all, their overarching commitment to the present and future interests of Canada. I look forward with anticipation to the next installment of the subcommittee's report on the Armed Forces—that on the Maritime Command.

It is pleasant to hear those nice things said about the work of the committee, but the question, of course, is: Where do we go from here and what, in fact, is going to happen?

Perhaps I might digress briefly, before moving to the specifics of what I wish to say regarding the white paper, to express my personal opinion—an opinion which has already been expressed by some of my colleagues—with regard to a commitment which Canada has accepted under our European alliance, namely, to provide a special force, called the CAST force, for Norway. Meanwhile we have a partial brigade in continental Europe.

I personally disagree with that particular commitment and believe that as Canadians we should look at it carefully, because we are in a position where we have a brigade on the ground in Germany that is not a full brigade. It is not a fighting brigade in the normal sense. It is incapable of performing the task allocated to a brigade. Meanwhile we are dividing our efforts by accepting another commitment in Norway, which I believe we cannot realistically fulfill, and, if we were able to fulfill it, we would still leave our brigade in Europe in a state of less than effective capacity.

I believe we do not have the right to send young Canadians to those positions unless we equip them properly, and we have a properly structured fighting force. If we are not prepared to do that, then we should not be there at all.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molgat: I believe it is absolutely unfair to our young soldiers to put them in that position. Therefore, I believe we should review that whole commitment very soon, and that is one of the recommendations of the subcommittee.

This brings me to the whole question of where do we go in this matter of national defence. Again, speaking at that meeting in Toronto, the minister made some specific comments regarding a white paper. He said:

Recommendation one states that a White Paper on Defence should be undertaken immediately. As far as I am concerned, white papers generally, and white papers on defence in particular, have been used mainly as vehicles by which the government has laid before Parliament and the public its defence policy. They have provided a means for explaining decisions which the government has taken either on major new policies or on major changes in policy. White papers have, in other words, been vehicles for announcing policy decisions resulting from a process of policy review by the government rather than vehicles for stimulating public debate on policy issues and policy options.

The minister went on to say that he felt there was a need for a public debate on the issue, and he commended the Senate and House of Commons committees for the work they were doing and the public discussion they were generating on national defence. He felt, however, that it had to go further, and, later on, when speaking about the work of the Senate and House of Commons committees, he said:

I am, however, considering how this work might best be integrated into a more comprehensive study in which Parliament clearly should be a leading participant. The parliamentary reports already referred to will prove useful additions to the substance of the department's strategic overview.

So the minister seems favourably disposed, but at this point, if I understand him correctly, he feels that we are not ready for a white paper as such. Well, I accept that. I really do not care if it is a white paper, a green paper or a grey paper; but I believe that what we need is a national debate on the whole question of national defence and armaments. If we said that some months ago, when we produced our report, then it is even more important today, because since then there have been further events. We need only look at recent newspaper stories. I read one that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of Monday, October 18, 1982. The heading was: "MPs call for cuts in arms spending." We had three members of the House of Commons travelling across the country in connection with the program Operation Dismantle, and speaking on behalf of disarmament.

Recently in connection with the decision of the government to increase the amount of money to be spent on job creation, we found that the defence budget was going to be cut by approximately $245 million. Yet, in our report, as a result of the committee's study, we found that there should, in fact, be an increase in expenditures if we are to meet the commitments we have accepted, and if we are to fulfill the tasks that we have set ourselves. From a national defence standpoint, the committee found that we needed greater expenditures. We also know that in connection with the recent municipal elections there were votes taken on the whole question of disarmament. Therefore we must have a comprehensive debate on this whole subject.

As the economic situation becomes more difficult, and as there are more pressures on budgets, undoubtedly there will be some people who say that we should cut national defence further. Unless Canadians get involved in this discussion, how can we get a reasonable solution to the problem?

I agree with the minister that a simple white paper produced by the Department of National Defence is not enough, because if we are going to get a solution to this problem, there must be substantial public approval. If taxes are going to be spent on national defence then the Canadian public has to know why, and there has to be majority support for what it is that we are trying to do.

Therefore, I believe that we should move along in this matter, and, in my opinion, the solution is to have a joint committee of both houses. Let us have a real Canadian debate on what it is that we want to do in this regard. I fully sympathize with those who say, "Yes, we want disarmament". Obviously, if we were asked, "Are you for disarmament?" most of us would answer yes. We would be for disarmament, but under what conditions? Surely it must be mutual; it must be verifiable. There are many conditions. It is not simply a question of whether we are for disarmament. Unless there is a debate going on in the country, I do not believe we will bet the right solution. Therefore, I hope that our committee continues to complete its work on maritime defence and that, in the meantime, we move on to have a public discussion on the issue of national defence.

• (1510)

There are not too many people in Parliament today who remember the days between 1930 and 1939 when Germany was busy re-arming, and the rest of the democratic world was standing by watching the events. Had there been a public debate at that time, possibly the posture of the free countries would have been different in 1939. In fact, the events of 1939 might not have happened at all had the free world reacted somewhat earlier, but everyone was putting the subject aside as though it were not to be discussed openly. Granted, here and there some bold politician, notably Sir Winston Churchill, would make a speech on the subject, but it would be pooh-poohed because it was not the popular thing to say.

I think the failure was to get the public involved in the discussion. So, honourable senators, I would hope that if the subcommittee has done nothing except awaken public opinion, that in itself is a major step forward. However, I think we must go on from there and participate in a national debate on the subject. If we can prove that what we are recommending is right, then, perhaps, we can get public support and do a proper job, which, in the opinion of the committee members, is a big one.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to have an opportunity to discuss this report and perhaps enlarge on some of the points the honourable senator has made. I am not prepared to do it today and, therefore, with the consent of the Senate, I move that this debate be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Smith, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES 1982-83

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, June 22, the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1983.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I do not intend to speak to this report. If no other senators wish to speak, I suggest that we consider the matter debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this report is considered debated.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF ELEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 10, the debate on the consideration of the Eleventh Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I want to apologize for having left this matter on the order paper for such a long time. Quite honestly, it had passed from my mind and I should have responded quite a while ago. At the time it was put on the order paper I had a rather comprehensive report ready, full of awesome and extravagant praise for our esteemed colleague, but on sober second thought I thought it better not to honour him from this side of the house as he is in enough trouble as it is.

The report, which is one of many tabled by Senator Godfrey from that prolific committee, is an extensive one and deals at great length with various matters of interest to the committee. We had several hearings in this particular regard, one of which sticks in my mind—the one dealing with a tailings problem in an area of British Columbia and the strenuous attempts we made to get the Minister of Fisheries of the day to appear before the committee and give testimony. Eventually, he did arrive, flanked by two lawyers from two departments in the grand American tradition. He said very little, obviously not wishing to incriminate himself in any way. I have no doubt that the tailings coming from the particular factory are still running into the particular reserve in British Columbia.

In any event, that is not for want of effort by Senator Godfrey and his colleagues. As I said, I wish to commend him on his efforts. It is a committee that perhaps does not have all the glamour of some of the other committees, but it does grind heavily on untutored and unlettered souls such as I from time to time. However, it is a necessary committee. I commend this report to the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this report is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE FRED A. McGRAND

ESTABLISHMENT OF LECTURESHIP ON CHILD WELFARE,
ST. THOMAS UNIVERSITY, FREDERICTON, NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, I think you will be as pleased and proud as I am to know that St. Thomas University in Fredericton, New Brunswick, is setting up a Chair which will be called the Honourable Senator F. A. McGrand, M.D., Lectureship on Child Welfare.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-135, to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2).

Bill read first time.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA EVIDENCE BILL, 1982

FIRST READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-33, to give effect, for Canada, to the Uniform Evidence Act adopted by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada.

Bill read first time.

Senator Olson, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 23, 1982, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM—STATISTICS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the Small Business Development Bond program. No doubt the minister will recall that in November of last year, when we received budget model A, a change was made in the Small Business Development Bond program to convert it into one for those in "dire straits". I am anxious to know if he can tell me how many small business bond transactions have been entered into since November of last year, and the amounts of the loans?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is statistical information which I will seek to obtain as soon as possible.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question which was asked by Senator Asselin on November 16 and by Senator Roblin on November 17 concerning the terms of the appointment of the chairman of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada. This answer was available earlier to my honourable friends who read the record of the other place, but I have taken some excerpts from that which I think will be enlightening.

Honourable senators, yesterday the Prime Minister answered a similar question in the other place. I would like to quote his answer:

—I want to make it clear that there is no clause and no opting out provision in the contract . . . if Mr. Macdonald chooses to quit in some hypothetical situation where I would be resigning my job—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Martial Asselin: We call that the grandfather clause.

Senator Olson: It would be helpful, honourable senators, if I could give you the entire answer at once. Any comments, verbal or otherwise, can then be made about it.

Senator Asselin: We know the answer; we read Hansard yesterday.

Senator Olson: The Prime Minister said:

—if Mr. Macdonald chooses to quit in some hypothetical situation where I would be resigning my job, then surely he is free to do that. To be quite thorough in my answer, the matter did come up. I told Mr. Macdonald that I could not bind him forever.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Prime Minister continued:

I told Mr. Macdonald that I could not bind him forever, that he was raising a hypothetical situation and he would just have to take that under consideration in deciding whether he would accept it or not.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Do you call that enlightening?

Senator Olson:

I think that the same reasoning applies to some 12 or 14 other members of the Commission whose names will be announced very soon. I do not think that they are bound forever, either. There are some former Conservatives on the list, and I suppose they too could resign to seek the leadership of the Conservative Party.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For once he is humorous!

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions which were asked on the same day by Senators Asselin and Murray concerning the method of appointment and numbers of other members of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada.

The Prime Minister has announced that another 12 to 14 members of the royal commission will be appointed very soon. He has also stated that Mr. Macdonald has been consulting with other participants. Members will be appointed by order in council.

Senator Flynn: Is Senator Davey on the list?

ROYAL COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question which was asked by Senator Murray on November 17 concerning a statement made by the Minister of Finance.

Honourable senators, this question was answered on November 16, 1982. Senator Murray may find the answer on page 4987 of Senate Hansard of that day.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA TREATY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to a question asked by Senator Marshall concerning the Law of the Sea Treaty, the answer is:

The American position on the Law of the Sea Treaty is that they do not like it and will not sign it. However, it is not for the Canadian government to comment on the reasons for the Americans' not signing it. Canada regrets the American attitude and has brought this point of view to the Americans. Canada supports the treaty and Cabinet is considering our position in regard to signing the convention.

Honourable senators will note that I am reading all of the delayed answers because they are rather brief.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Especially as we have ample time.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question, asked by Senator Roblin on October 25, concerning statements about FIRA made at the recent meeting with U.S. business leaders sponsored by the Niagara Institute.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Regional Economic Expansion informs me that I was correct in saying that no promises that the act would be amended were made. In the minister's remarks to the group, he spoke about the steps we have taken, and will be taking, to streamline the review process. With respect to possible changes in the legislation, he indicated that he had asked for recommendations from the agency, and that the legislation had been in effect since 1974 with no review in the interim. However, he also indicated that it was highly unlikely that any legislative changes would be enacted in the near future.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I agree with that.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

INDIA—CANDU REACTOR—SUPPLY OF HEAVY WATER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Lang on November 16, concerning Canadian policy with respect to the sale of heavy water to India. The answer is somewhat long. Perhaps honourable senators will accept it as having been read.

An Hon. Senator: You read very well.

Some Hon. Senators: Read it.

Senator Olson: The answer is as follows:

Canadian non-proliferation policy has two main objectives: First, to ensure as far as possible that Canadian nuclear exports do not contribute to further proliferation; and, secondly, to advance the evolution of an effective, internationally agreed non-proliferation régime.

Canadian policy has been designed to achieve those objectives by making nuclear co-operation contingent on, first, the conclusion of a bilateral agreement incorporating provisions specific to Canadian-supplied nuclear items—for example, non-explosive use, prior consent on retransfers and reprocessing, fallback safeguards, and physical protection—and, secondly, for non-nuclear weapon states, NPT ratification or an equivalent non-proliferation commitment and acceptance of fullscope safeguards.

Canada, in May 1976, formally terminated nuclear co-operation with India when that country refused to meet those two fundamental requirements of Canadian policy.

This and previous governments have clearly advised the Government of India on numerous occasions that further nuclear co-operation, including the supply of heavy water, is not possible unless and until that country fully satisfies our policy requirements.

As for the difference between India and Argentina, Argentina has signed a bilateral safeguards agreement with Canada to cover the operation of the Embalse nuclear plant.

However, no further new co-operation with Argentina is possible unless it agrees to Canada's present full nuclear safeguards policy, which includes signing the Non-proliferation Treaty.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: May I ask the minister a supplementary question in relation to the answer he has just given?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Hicks: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if, in conjunction with his answer respecting the sale of heavy water to India, he is aware that the Russians are already selling heavy water to India? Granted, they are selling it only in quantities that would take several years to make up a reactor-load to activate the Candu reactor in India. India itself has the capacity to manufacture 300 metric tonnes of heavy water per year, although at the present time their plant is not working very well and they are making only about 50 tonnes per year. There are also heavy water plants being constructed in Romania and Argentina.

● (1420)

Does the minister not think that in view of all these activities Canada's attitude in refusing to sell heavy water to India is unrealistic in the present circumstances?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I suppose the honourable senator is asking whether or not I support government policy. The answer to that ought to be obvious. In any event, I do not think it would be particularly useful to add to what I have said, except to repeat the information contained in one of the paragraphs in the letter I received, and that is that Canada's view is that any co-operation—if that is the right expression—or trading relations with countries which have not signed the non-proliferation agreement is contrary to Canadian government policy.

Hon. G. I. Smith: May I ask a supplementary on the same point, honourable senators? As I understand it, the policy of Canada is not to sell heavy water to India unless India conforms to certain requirements. I cannot help but recall that Canada is today manufacturing heavy water but is rumoured to be about to cease that so far as two plants in Nova Scotia are concerned.

I should like to know what advantage there is to that policy of Canada when it allows potential Canadian jobs to be replaced by jobs in Russia.

Senator Olson: I do not think that is really the question before us. The question is whether or not Canada, when it comes to nuclear technology, will carry on trade in co-operation with trading partners who do not adhere to the non-proliferation agreement which Canada supports.

Senator Smith: But surely, honourable senators, if, as I believe is the case, Senator Hicks is correct that heavy water is being manufactured in Russia and exported to India, and we do not sell heavy water to India and are about to close at least some of our heavy water plants in Canada, then we are exchanging jobs with Russia, and putting Canadians out of work while seeing Russian employment enhanced.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: In principle, two wrongs don't make a right.

Senator Smith: That observation is not out of order.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, no doubt when Senator Hicks and Senator Smith read the answer I have given, which should be available to them in a short while, they will see that I did give a complete answer to the question.

Senator Smith: With respect, honourable senators, I must disagree with the honourable gentleman. I do not think he gave any answer at all.

Senator Olson: I stated the government policy.

Senator Smith: Yes, and I asked a question with relation to that government policy which you have not answered.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

SALE OF APARTMENT UNITS TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he tell this chamber whether FIRA has been formally asked to investigate the sale by Cadillac-Fairview and others of 11,000 apartment units to foreign interests.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice because I do not know if they have or not. I shall try to find out for the next sitting.

● (1425)

Senator Haidasz: In view of the fact that one of the deals in that transaction was performed by a Greymac corporation, one of which has recently been sold to a Mr. William Player, a realtor from Elmvale, Ontario, can the minister tell this chamber whether the depositors in the Greymac companies are endangered in any way above the $20,000 insured by the Canada Deposit Corporation?

Senator Olson: I shall have to take that question as notice, too. But when I do make the reference, I am not sure that we can get an immediate response because I expect that some judgement will have to be made, after some investigation, before a reply can be given.

Senator Flynn: That is not your position anyway.

INTERPRETATION ACT BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT CANADA LABOUR CODE

SECOND READING—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER— DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Olson, for the second reading of Bill S-30, to amend certain acts in relation to Canada Day.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on November 16 Senator Flynn raised a point of order with respect to the motion by the Honourable Senator Olson for the second reading of Bill S-30, intitled: "An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to Canada Day". Senator Flynn's point of order was as follows, and I quote from page 4992 of the Debates:

My point of order will be to ask the Chair to rule whether this Bill, in order to pass, would have to receive the approval of two-thirds of the senators present; and, if it does not, whether it should be considered as having been defeated. This is the main question.

Senator Flynn's argumentation was based on the provisions of rule 47 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, which reads as follows:

47. (1) A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.

(2) An order, resolution, or other decision of the Senate may be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescission.

[English]

Senator Flynn argued that the text of Bill S-30 is identical to the amendment which he proposed to Bill C-201. Since his motion in amendment to the third reading of the bill had been defeated, he feels that it is irregular that the same text can be offered during the present session and he is, therefore, asking for the strict application of Rule 47.

For his part, Senator Olson recognizes that Bill S-30 covers substantially the same subject-matter as the rejected amendment proposed during the debate on Bill C-201. However, Senator Olson feels that the bill now under debate covers only in part the rejected amendment. The question, therefore, is whether the omitted section—that is to say, that part of the amendment which does not appear—is sufficient to establish whether or not the question is substantially the same.

Before I made my ruling, I wanted to study the rationale of Rule 47. The purpose of this rule is to prevent the house from repeating the same debate—that is, going over the same material—at a time when the conditions surrounding the debate have not sufficiently changed. On this point I have to acknowledge that the lapse of time between October 25 and November 2 does not meet this condition. On the other hand, I remember reading that Senator Flynn said that it was not a matter of delay but a matter of having Rule 47 apply.

The main question remains to be answered, namely, the degree of similarity necessary for the application of this restrictive rule, which must be interpreted to the letter.

After having studied the two texts submitted to me, I have concluded that they sufficiently differ, and that Rule 47 does not apply. To be very strict, the purpose of the motion of Senator Flynn was to amend a bill, while Bill S-30 has as its purpose the amending of an act, but I do not want to rely on this distinction. I would rather rule that Bill S-30 does not contain the first three paragraphs of the amendment offered on October 25, paragraphs which constituted much more than a preamble and implicitly constitute the rejection of what was intended to be amended. In fact, it was a question of not amending the bill but of replacing it by another bill.

In other words, if the amendment offered on October 25 had only requested the consequential amendments and had not attempted to amend the title and the first clause of the bill, I would be obliged to conclude that the two texts are similar. There is no doubt that there is similarity between the two texts. As the present bill proposes only the consequential amendments, there is no need to invoke the application of Rule 47.

These differences are essential and I would refer honourable senators to the following authorities. Bourinot, 4th edition, page 546, states:

Or, if a bill be altered in any material point, both in body and in title it may be received a second time.

May, 19th edition, page 492, states in paragraph (i):

When previously decided question related to an amendment on second reading.—On 31 March 1859 an amendment was proposed, but not made, to a proposed amendment on the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill, expressing an opinion in favour of the ballot; but this was held not to preclude a motion on a later day for bringing in a bill for the taking of votes by way of ballot.

And May on the same page, in paragraph (iii), also states:

When the later bill is the same in substance as an amendment rejected when offered to an earlier bill.—The National Insurance (Widowed Mothers) Bill (1961-62) was allowed to proceed although a new Clause to the same effect had been rejected when offered to the Family Allowances and National Insurance Bill.

● (1430)

So, I think it was unnecessary for the Leader of the Opposition to amend the title and the substance of the bill, but he could do so.

My first reaction when I heard the amendment was that I could not accept it, but while reading Beauchesne I noticed that it could be accepted provided the substance is taken back in the amendment.

So, I think that Senator Flynn's amendment was entirely in order. That is why at that point I insisted on asking Senator Olson if he was raising a point of order, and he said that he was not. Had he been raising a point of order, I would have had to make a ruling on that.

I can see a senator voting against Senator Flynn's amendment and voting for the bill. It is possible that someone who had been opposed to the change from "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day", once it is incorporated in the statutes, may very well vote for these amendments.

As I said, there is a substantial difference between the two texts, and that is why I rule that rule 47 does not apply.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): With all due respect, Your Honour, I would certainly ask the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to consider whether it would not be a good thing to delete rule 47 altogether. We might as well forget about that.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Bill S-30 is a very short bill and deals only with consequential amendments that are required to the Interpretation Act, the Bills of Exchange Act, and the Canada Labour Code. Indeed, there has been sufficient debate on this already. Therefore, I will not repeat that debate, and I commend the bill to honourable senators.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): If no one else wishes to speak on this order this afternoon, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to this motion today.

As I understand the substance of these amendments, they are to change the name "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day".

Senator Olson: That bill has already been passed.

Senator Thompson: I know it has been passed, but what I say is still implied in the amendments. Certainly, the words in these other statutes have to be changed.

Some Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Thompson: As I understand it, what we are discussing, basically, are national symbols, and I think we should be looking at the characteristics of a national symbol. A national symbol usually recalls an historical occasion or a landmark which indicates the striving by a nation to achieve independence and freedom. In my opinion, the word "dominion" uniquely evokes a spiritual as well as a political quality in reaching that goal.

However, having said that, I should like to point out some national symbols in this chamber. Honourable senators can look at the paintings adorning the walls of this almost sacred chamber, which impress upon us constantly the sacrifices that men and women made in the past as they strove for the freedom and independence of our country. We can look at the mace—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I hesitate to interrupt my good friend, Senator Thompson. However, it seems to me that he is engaging in a debate on a bill that has already been passed. The bill that was passed changed the name of Dominion Day to Canada Day. What we have before us now are amendments to three other acts that are technically required in order to give effect to the original bill. I regret that Senator Thompson was unable to be here when we debated Bill C-201, thus depriving us of hearing his views on that matter at that time. It seems to me that in opening the whole question of whether or not the name "Dominion Day" should be changed to "Canada Day" he is not debating the bill that is before us. What is before us is strictly a question of whether, as a result of the passing of Bill C-201, we should make these consequential amendments.

If Senator Thompson is saying that even though the name of the day has been changed, it should not be changed in the Bills of Exchange Act because of the great tradition that goes with the Bills of Exchange Act, or the Interpretation Act, or the Canada Labour Code—

Hon. Lowell Murray: You did not give him a chance to say that.

Senator Frith: I did give him a chance to say that. That is precisely why I did not make this point at the beginning. It seems to me that what Senator Thompson has said so far is out of order, and not related to the present bill. We should understand—I say this on behalf of this side and other honourable senators who supported Bill C-201, the original bill, while respecting those who did not—that we cannot debate Bill C-201 again in our consideration of Bill S-30.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think Senator Thompson needs a defence from me but, nevertheless, I want to come to his assistance. We have a fairly relaxed style of operation in this house. We have not usually been sticklers for the rules, and having operated in other chambers where the rules were very important and, in fact, applied with a lawyer-like intensity, I have always been pleasantly surprised and spiritually refreshed in witnessing members of this house being allowed to speak in general terms on issues that come before us.

● (1440)

Apart from that altogether, I have not the slightest doubt in the world that if my honourable friend will listen to the rest of Senator Thompson's speech he will be able to see that Senator Thompson can clearly establish a connection between his views on Canada Day and the propriety of amending other statutes in our system of laws to reflect that change of name. There is just no question in the world that if he wants to establish that connection he can do so.

Senator Frith: You would dissolve in laughter over there if I were to maintain that.

Senator Roblin: I think I will let him say how he is going to do it, because I feel confident that he is able to do that. I do not think it would take a parliamentarian as clever as the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Government to structure his speech in such a way that it bears on the principle of this bill, which is, namely, whether or not we should apply the name "Canada Day" to Dominion Day, as it appears in the Interpretation Act, the Bills of Exchange Act and the Canada Labour Code, and perhaps some other statutes. I think Senator Thompson should be given the privilege of addressing this house and expressing his views.

Senator Thompson: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for raising the point, and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for explaining to the Deputy Leader of the Government what the point obviously is. Parliament having previously enacted that Dominion Day should be called Canada Day, we are now moving on to the procedure for making consequential amendments to other legislation, the principle being established. Now, on second reading, as I understand it, we can debate the principle of amending these other statutes. It is on that basis that I wish to speak.

As I was saying, the regalia and the ritual in this chamber causes us to ask ourselves: As a symbol, what does the whole chamber represent to the Canadian people? I look, for example, at the mace. I think, as Lord Campion said, that there is a halo about the mace. I am broadening now to go into other areas of symbols, and, therefore, I refer to the mace. I suggest that the mace does indeed have a mystic and spiritual quality to it. It reaches back into the myths of early civilizations; to Moses, when he, with his rod, came down from the mountain.

I want to emphasize the significance of the mace in this chamber. To me, it represents the courage that has been shown in our long history of evolving constitutional government, of fighting the autocratic powers of the Crown, which had the authority and the symbol of the mace. I am sure every honourable senator knows that the mace was carried by the Sergeants at Arms of Richard I of England, and Philip II of France, to ensure their authority. Over the centuries the authority of the king, through the symbol of the mace, became the protection of the Speaker, and then the authority to the Speaker, and thus of the whole of this assembly and the people.

I should like to recall in this debate the accountability of the executive, or the Crown, to the people and to Parliament. I should like honourable senators to be imbued with pride in the knowledge that we sit here because of the struggles and achievements of men through the centuries.

I think of the absolute power of the monarch during the Tudor period. I recall to your memory Queen Elizabeth I of England, with all the awesome authority that she could command, and her impatience at having to listen to the forum of Parliament. I recall Sir Edward Coke's being called before the Bar and told, "What we expect is that you say aye or no, and we do not want anything else." When he returned to Parliament, Peter Wentworth stood on his feet, and against the wishes and desires of the monarch moved the resolution of succession. What was the fate of Peter Wentworth for doing that? He, of course, was sent to the Tower, where he remained.

When I follow the roots of this chamber and the symbolism that is with us, I think in terms of the Stuart period. With all respect to His Honour, I think of another Speaker in another time, Sir John Finch, and the irritation, impatience and fury of the king concerning Parliament. Speaker Finch refused to put Sir John Eliot's protestations and was about to adjourn the house by the king's command, but he was held in the Chair, cringing and crying, by Holles and another member. The Speaker understood the awesome power of the king, and he wanted the members to keep quiet. However, there were men like Eliot and Holles who refused to be intimidated, and who demanded that decisions respecting the law and the treatment of subjects be made in Parliament, even though they were sent to jail.

This, of course, again symbolizes the struggle of the monarchy, with its feeling of Divine Right, to avoid, at all costs, having to face the forum of Parliament.

We think, honourable senators, of Charles I, and how he, impatient with Parliament, which was trying to check his methods of taxation by going outside Parliament for tonnage and poundage, and doing it by asking for loans from people, with all the coercion that the monarch could exert, made the blunder of going down to the House himself. He was the first and only monarch to cross the Bar of Parliament. When he walked up, there was an intense silence throughout the House. Parliament knew he was coming to arrest five members, and leave was given to those five members to absent themselves.

● (1450)

King Charles strode up to the Speaker and said, "By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your chair a little." He then turned and called the names of two of the members he intended to arrest on a charge of treason. He turned to Speaker Lenthall, who, in a few words, made a speech which should ring out a message to all of us. In essence, he said that he had "neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak" but as the representatives of the people were pleased to direct him.

Honourable senators, Speaker Lenthall stands out like a beacon for his courage in demonstrating and asserting the independence of Parliament.

I refer to Cromwell and his impatience as an executive of Parliament. I am sure that his reference to the mace as a "bauble," which he demanded his soldiers throw out with the wronged Parliament members, stands out in all our memories.

I would now turn my attention to Canada and what this chamber should denote and signify to us as senators and Canadians. In this context, I am reminded of the fight for responsible government against the Family Compact. The executive had no patience with their leader.

During the summer, while reading The Hansard Chronicles, written by John Ward, the present Editor of House of Commons Debates, I was reminded of what befell Francis Collins, the first Hansard reporter in Canada, who was unknown to me until I read this particular book. This courageous Canadian insisted on reporting the debates of the Legislative Assembly of Upper Canada. Robinson, of the Family Compact in Ontario, with others, had him tried for libel and thrown into prison. An outcry ensued and an appeal was made to the King. He was finally released only to die shortly thereafter. That again was a prime illustration of the Family Compact's arrogantly and arbitrarily wanting to avoid the arena of Parliament.

When we think of Mackenzie, surely we must derive a feeling of the immense responsibility which we have, as senators, to ensure accountability by the executive to Parliament. I am aware that the executive is not accountable to this chamber but, honourable senators, if we sense the slightest attempt by the executive to by-pass Parliament, then, surely, it is up to us to stand on our feet and demand that it stop.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I would suggest that Edmund Burke was the greatest parliamentarian. In his letter to the constituency of Bristol, he said that he would not be tied down by any party when it came to using his own judgment. They could demand his industry, but no man, no set of men, could demand his judgment.

I was relieved to read in a press release a number of years ago that the Prime Minister said the kind of parliament he respected was a parliament based on the Burkean idea. In the past, Mr. Trudeau has expressed his utter contempt for people who he felt had corroded into party hacks.

I now propose to read from Pierre Elliott Trudeau's writings on Federalism and the French Canadians.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: What year?

Senator Thompson: I do not know when it was published, but I should make it clear it was prior to his joining the Liberal Party.

Referring to representation in the House of Commons, he wrote:

The party strategists had but to find an acceptable stable master—Laurier, Lapointe, St. Laurent—and the trained donkeys—

And I would certainly never use words like that, but our Prime Minister did.

[Senator Thompson.]

—sitting in the back benches could be trusted to behave.

With respect to this bill, honourable senators, I am concerned that we in this chamber do not behave like trained donkeys but, rather, as men of the calibre of Holles, of Eliot, of Pym, of Howe and of Mackenzie. I single Senator George McIlraith out as one of that calibre.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thompson: Let us remember our historical strength as a free and independent people, and that freedom, in the words of Tennyson, can be lost "from precedent to precedent".

● (1500)

I wanted to say this as I watched the private member's bill develop, in some way, into a government bill, and as I watched the tiptoeing through the tulips that went along with it. I wanted to be able to state that I shall include myself in the ranks of those courageous men who stood out, over the years, to develop an accountability by the executive. Those men, no matter whether they went to jail, stood by their consciences in the House of Lords, the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Would the honourable senator accept a question? I wonder if he would mind giving us just a hint as to what that speech had to do with the amendments to the Interpretation Act, the Bills of Exchange Act and the Canada Labour Code?

Hon. Martial Asselin: Sit down!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Thompson: In reply, it is especially important if you cannot see its aptness.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, without prejudicing my right to speak later, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning Bill S-30.

Is he aware of anything in the rules that would prevent the Senate from giving credit to the real author of the bill, namely, Michael Valpy of the Globe and Mail?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not aware of any rule that would prevent my honourable friend from giving credit to whomever he wants to give credit to.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND —SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. George van Roggen moved the second reading of Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act.

He said: As some honourable senators may have noticed, this bill is very short, being only two pages in length. I recall that, some time ago, a confrère of mine on this side of the house said that a certain bill was very short and simple, that it would not be necessary for him to dwell on it too long, and that it need not go to committee. I will not repeat that mistake. The bill, while it is very short, touches upon important matters; namely, Canada's participation in the Bretton Woods Agreement and, through that, in the World Bank and its subsidiary organizations.

Honourable senators will recall that the World Bank was established, together with the International Monetary Fund, in 1944 at Bretton Woods. I believe it was Lord Keynes who said that they had succeeded in establishing a bank which was a fund, and a fund which was a bank. That, nevertheless, is not to detract from the fact that both organizations have operated, for the past 35 years, very successfully in stabilizing economic arrangements between the nations of the world.

As honourable senators will recall, the World Bank was first used as an instrument for the reconstruction of Europe. With that concluded, however, it turned its attention to the countries of the Third World, and has since been fostering economic development in those countries. At its founding, some 44 countries were members of the World Bank, with a total subscribed capital of approximately $10 billion. Since that time, the membership has increased to 143 member countries, with a subscribed capital of more than $80 billion, if we include the proposed refinancing in which this bill involves Canada.

The World Bank is the largest single development agency in the world. Together with the International Monetary Fund, it plays an important role in maintaining international economic and financial stability. In 1982—and any dates to which I refer will relate to its fiscal year, which ends in June—the World Bank approved some 150 loans, totalling over $10 billion.

The World Bank finances its lending program through two types of contributions from its member countries. If I could use an analogy—a simple corporate comparison—authorized capital is established at X billions of dollars. The donor countries are required to actually pay in, at this date, 10 per cent of that amount, the rest remaining as callable capital. On the strength of the guarantee of that callable capital from all of the donor countries, the bank goes to the ordinary money markets and borrows, at competitive interest rates, the other 90-odd per cent of its authorized capital, which makes up the majority of the funds it uses in its work.

I think it is important to point out that at no time in the history of the World Bank has a call ever been made on any of the donor countries. The bank also has a remarkable record of success in its lending, so that it does not have defaulted loans and there is no likelihood of calls being made on the donor countries, at the present time or in the foreseeable future. This is because the projects of the bank are carefully chosen and evaluated by World Bank staff, along with local authorities, in order to ensure that the projects are of a high calibre and have a high rate of economic return to the countries in which the developments are taking place.

In order not to take too much time this afternoon, honourable senators, I will try to move more quickly through my notes. In addition to the multiplier effect which results from the borrowing that is made possible because of the callable nature of the authorized capital, commercial banks have developed a custom of joining in the funding of projects which the World Bank has approved. That the banking community will join as partners on the basis of the World Bank's assessments of the projects in which it is going to invest is surely an indication of the thoroughness with which the World Bank analyses those projects. The banking community must feel that its loans are virtually safe.

Because of this policy of the World Bank to see that loans are commercially justified, and as a result of the need to pay commercial rates to lender institutions for the money it borrows from them, the bank has, of necessity, developed a practice of making the majority of its loans to the better developed countries. This left a problem insofar as the poorer Third World countries were concerned. To that end, in 1960, a subsidiary agency of the World Bank, the International Development Association, or IDA, was created. The bill now before honourable senators amends not only the Bretton Woods Agreements Act but also the International Development Association Act—the two acts under which the Canadian Parliament has authorized the participation by Canada in the World Bank and in the IDA.

I might add that the IDA, generally speaking, extends not only soft loans but long-term loans at basically no rate of interest to countries with a per capita income below $730 per annum. These loans, while repayable in theory, are, basically speaking, outright grants to those countries, and for this reason the IDA, unlike the World Bank, requires a replenishment of its capital at regular intervals. From time to time the 143 members of the World Bank need to agree on the amount of the replenishment, and also their individual participation in that replenishment. I will not say that there is a scientific formula by which the contributions of different countries are arrived at, but it has a bearing on a number of factors including their respective gross national products.

● (1510)

The last replenishment was to be for the years 1981, 1982 and 1983, being a three-year replenishment. Unfortunately, the United States felt that it was contributing more than its share to the World Bank and the IDA, and indicated—and eventually made it firm—that its three-year replenishment would extend over four years through 1984. That would have resulted in a serious shortfall to the poorer countries of the Third World during that fourth year, if the other countries did not cover the American shortfall. However, they did not wish to do this by simply increasing the amount of their contributions. So they decided to provide bridging funds for that fourth year. That is also provided for in the moneys being sought from Parliament in the legislation now before us.

I might also point out that since the inception of the World Bank, and the creation of the IDA in 1960, additional funds have been provided by Canada to those agencies by $1 items in the estimates. Concerning this particular refreshment, as they call it, which started in 1981, the first contribution from Canada of $147 million in that year was done by that historic method, which had been carried on for a number of years and was followed by both the previous Conservative and Liberal governments. However, in 1981 the Speaker of the House of Commons ruled that it was inappropriate to make those expenditures through $1 items in the estimates and, as a result, legislation was brought forward for the 1982 advance of $164 million. That was authorized by Bill C-71, as an amendment to the original act.

We now have before us Bill C-129, which covers the remaining contribution which Canada must make during 1983 of $260 million. I mention this in order that honourable senators will understand the reason for the amount of $601.81 million referred to in the bill. That amount covers the whole three-year replenishment, including the amount paid out in 1981, the amount paid out in 1982 under Bill C-71 following the Speaker's ruling, and the amount now required to be paid out. Those three amounts total the figure referred to in the present bill. When a subsequent replenishment is necessary, a further bill will have to be brought before Parliament.

Honourable senators, I do not believe that I need stress the importance to the stability of the world of the successful operation of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, and also the importance to Canada, one of the great trading nations of the world, of a stable world trading system, which is so greatly assisted by funds such as those from the IDA. I merely mention that for the record, but I know that all honourable senators are in agreement with Canada's support of those agencies.

That concludes my general remarks, and I now turn to the bill itself. As I mentioned, it is a brief bill. Clause 1 is exactly the same as that contained in the original Bretton Woods Agreements Act, which is in the last revision of the Statutes of Canada. I cannot remember the year in which it was actually passed, but I believe it was 1946 or 1947. The words added in clause 1—and this is a legal nicety—are “and exercising any rights”. Apparently it was decided that subscribing our share to the bank by purchasing our 7.5 per cent or 10 per cent of the authorized share capital is a right rather than an obligation. I would hope that we will treat it as an obligation as well as a right; but that is the reason for the addition of those words.

In clause 2, the word “subscription” has been changed to the word “subscriptions”. It says:

—subscriptions required or permitted from Canada, that is to say, two billion, one hundred and seventy-eight million—

That is the cumulative total since the beginning of the Bretton Woods Agreement. I might say that those moneys are arrived at in Canadian dollars that are converted to 1944 American dollars.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is that in gold? It says “weight and fineness”.

[Senator van Roggen.]

Senator van Roggen: The reason for the reference to “weight and fineness” is that the Americans were then on the gold standard. They are not any more and “fineness” does not really apply. It is not a conversion to 1944 dollars allowing for inflation. It is only a conversion to 1944 American dollars as a constant, as between the values of different moneys in the world. Today our dollar is calculated at 1.48 Canadian for the American dollar in 1944. I assume that the Swiss would be less than par after so many years, their currency having increased against the American currency. So it is not an inflation conversion.

If, for the sake of argument, our dollar today is 20 per cent below par, if we calculate it all the way back to 1944 it is 48 cents below; so that today the conversion factor is $1.47 or $1.48.

Clause 3 refers to the International Development Association Act passed in 1960. Again honourable senators will see that subsection 2(2) is amended only by making this reference to an exercise of rights as opposed to an obligation.

In clause 4 there is reference to a sum of “six hundred and one million, eight hundred and ten thousand dollars”. That is the amount which I tried to describe in my general remarks as being Canada's portion of the refreshment for this current three-year period, part of which was paid out in 1981 by a $1 item, and part of which was paid out in 1982 under the previous bill. The balance is now covered under the present bill. This sum covers all three of those sums.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, I think that concludes any remarks that I have of a general nature relative to the bill. I shall be pleased to endeavour to answer any questions that you may have.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Williams, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-28, intituled: “An Act establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day”.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Stand.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, since Senator Williams, the sponsor of Bill S-28, is no longer a member of the Senate, this order should be discharged if no one takes his place.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think it is a good suggestion that, if no one wishes to take Senator Williams' place in sponsoring the bill, this order should be discharged. However, it may be that Senator Adams, who seconded Senator Williams's motion, will wish to sponsor the bill.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He would need a seconder. He cannot both move the motion and second it.

Senator Frith: That is true. I was about to suggest that Senator Adams might wish to consider over the weekend whether he would like to act as sponsor of the bill, assuming he can get a seconder, in which case we would have the bill stand in his name.

Order stands.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY VETERANS AFFAIRS EXPENDITURES IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)— DEBATE RESUMED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 16, the debate on the motion of Senator Marshall.

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures pertaining to Veterans Affairs set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend quite simply to second the motion. In the meantime, Senator Everett has informed me that he would like to make some comments in the debate on this order. Thus, with leave of the Senate, I do adjourn the debate for Senator Everett.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Everett, debate adjourned.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

TWENTY-EIGHTH GENERAL CONFERENCE, NASSAU, BAHAMAS— INQUIRY STANDS

On Inquiry No. 2 of Senator Rowe:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-eighth General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held at Nassau, Bahamas, from 16th to 22nd October, 1982, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to stand Inquiry No. 2 in the name of Senator Rowe until next Wednesday, since he has informed me that he intends to make his comments at that time.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 23, 1982, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 23, 1982

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Renaude Lapointe, Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE RESOURCES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would clarify one question for me. It was reported in the St. John's Daily News that the Government of Canada is in the process of reconsidering its position on the offshore situation. I think that that report has been received with some doubt by both sides.

Could the Leader of the Government tell us exactly what the government's position is right now? Has there indeed been a change in the thinking of the Government of Canada, or is the situation as it was when last discussed by the representatives of both the federal and the provincial governments?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice and refer it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for his comments. However, I would not like to take as notice a request to either confirm or deny that a speculation in the press is true or untrue.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is your problem? Why do you always worry? When you take a question as notice, you take it as notice and that is all.

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF BP CANADA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is it correct that the cost of the take-over of BP Canada by Petro-Canada is not $350 million, as was originally stated by the government, but more in the order of $570 million?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to check those figures as well, but I believe that the amount is closer to $350 million, as was stated by either an officer of Petro-Canada or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources when the transaction was consummated.

Senator Balfour: Is the honourable senator not aware that today, before a committee of the other place, the chairman of Petro-Canada conceded that the actual price was of the order of $570 million?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was not aware of that. I suppose that illustrates the risk involved in trying to answer these questions before making the necessary inquiries, however rapid I like to be in responding to all the questions from the opposition.

Senator Balfour: Would the honourable senator not agree that a discrepancy of some $220 million between the originally stated price and the price that was conceded today, if it is correct, constitutes a serious misstatement of fact on the part of the government?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to concede anything, because the conceding that I would have to do would be on the interpretation that my honourable friend is bringing to the Senate from whatever he may have heard reported. Therefore, I need to be a little careful. I should also take into account the calculations that have been done in one respect vis-à-vis another, because it is, of course, quite possible to provide two or more answers depending on what you add up.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You know that.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. If it should prove to be the case that the price is $220 million greater than that originally announced, would the leader state whether or not he agrees with the assessment given by the chairman of Petro-Canada that this acquisition will not cost Canadian taxpayers a dime?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, before my honourable friend asks me to agree with a hypothetical situation, it would be extremely useful to both of us, and also to the minister directly responsible, if we first ascertain the facts. When I have provided those facts for my honourable friend, perhaps some of these questions may then be placed in their proper perspective.

Senator Balfour: Would the Leader of the Government ascertain the facts and make a statement on the situation in this chamber tomorrow?

Senator Olson: I have already given an undertaking that I will refer the question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Whether or not I should make a statement is something that I will have to consider at that time. It may be that my honourable friend's information may or may not be somewhat exaggerated, but until I know that it would be imprudent of me to give that commitment.

AIRLINES

QUEBECAIR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government.

Last week, the Minister of Transport revealed a plan apparently intended to rescue Quebecair by creating another company called Quebecair 2, which would be owned jointly by Air Canada and the Government of Quebec, with both parties investing $15 million.

It seems the minister said that the new company would not be responsible for debts contracted by the old Quebecair company. Have we understood correctly the decision of the federal Minister of Transport, namely, that the former company's debts would not be honoured by the new company, Quebecair 2?

I also would like to know to what extent the Minister of Transport has guaranteed job security for Quebecair employees.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have brought with me this evening a copy of the telex that was despatched to Mr. Michel Clair, the Quebec Minister of Transport, by the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, the federal Minister of Transport. It is in both English and French. It might be useful if I were to table these documents, which are about seven or eight pages in length. I believe they will answer completely many questions that my honourable friend might wish to ask. In any event, if he wishes more detail, after he has had an opportunity to read them, I will try to provide it or I will refer his question to the Minister of Transport.

If it is satisfactory to honourable senators, I will table these two documents.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have no objection to the honourable minister tabling it. I agree to that—we are always most cooperative with government ministers.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): A bit too much!

[English]

Senator Asselin: We do agree that these documents can be tabled.

[Translation]

Apparently the main concern of Quebecair employees is that the minister's statement did not guarantee their job security, and we are told that since Minister Pepin made his statement, those employees are most nervous. They wonder why the minister could not reassure them by stating that their jobs will be protected. Could the Leader of the Government inquire with the Minister of Transport and ask him to make this commitment?

● (2010)

[English]

Senator Olson: I shall do that, but I can read one small portion of the telex. It says:

Another major social and financial aspect of my proposal is concerned with the welfare of the employees of Quebecair. I propose that our two governments develop a plan to ensure that all employees of Quebecair at the time of the creation of Quebecair 2 are protected from the negative consequences that might result.

So I am sure that my honourable friend understands that it is already clear in the telex that an attempt will be made to work out this arrangement. Until such time as that has been done, there is no further reply that I can obtain from the Minister of Transport.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Could the government leader tell us whether the Quebec government, through its Minister of Transport (Mr. Clair), has approved the terms put forward by the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin)? We have been informed that the Quebec Minister of Transport was to give his reply on behalf of the Quebec government this afternoon. Could the Government Leader enquire about such a reply and tell us about it?

[English]

Senator Olson: I am not aware of whether a positive or a negative reply has been received to the proposal, but I will try to find out.

Senator Asselin: Can the minister secure for us the reply of the Quebec Minister of Transport, Mr. Clair, and will he table it, if it is possible, in the Senate in the near future?

Senator Olson: If such a reply exists I will attempt to obtain it. Of course, the usual courtesy must be extended, namely, the federal Minister of Transport will ask the Quebec Minister of Transport whether he wishes his reply to be made public.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question with regard to Quebecair. Keeping in mind that the Government of Quebec is a separatist government, does the minister really think that that government will be interested in joining in a partnership with the federal government?

Senator Olson: I am not sure that my opinion on this matter is particularly valid at this time.

Senator Flynn: I am sure it is not.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thought you would be sure of that.

Senator Olson: As I understand the question, I am being asked whether I think the Quebec government will take one position or another. I have to say that I have not had a sufficiently close liaison with them recently to form that opinion immediately.

Senator Frith: They can flip-flop with the best of them.

Senator Leblanc: If I understand the proposition with regard to Quebecair 2, there would be an equal partnership between the Government of Quebec and the federal government—

Senator Asselin: Not with the federal government—with Air Canada. That is very different.

Senator Leblanc: I do not think you are right.

Senator Asselin: I am right.

Senator Leblanc: If I understand the matter, what is being proposed is an equal partnership between the provincial government and the federal government on a fifty-fifty basis. We would put up, I suppose, $15 million each and work out a new corporation.

● (2015)

However, this is my problem: As we are putting through such a proposition, which is to my mind at least the best one, it would be under the administration or the management of Air Canada—

Senator Flynn: Or Nordair.

Senator Frith: No, definitely not.

Senator Leblanc: —which certainly has the competency to do the work. I do not see why they would refuse such a proposition, which is the best one they have ever had. It would save them from bankruptcy with respect to Quebecair.

Senator Flynn: If you want to make a speech, give notice of an inquiry.

Senator Frith: It's an offer they can't refuse.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Leblanc will see that the details of this are given on page 5 of the document I have just tabled. However, he might find one paragraph of particular interest:

Quebecair 2 would be funded and owned 50 per cent by Air Canada and 50 per cent by the government of Quebec through any means it would determine including private sector participation. However, during the initial period of the new company's existence, Air Canada would have management control of Quebecair 2's operations to facilitate its becoming a commercially viable air carrier.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question. If Mr. Pepin's proposal were accepted, would the government exempt Quebecair 2 from Bill S-31 as the government is prepared to exempt Quebecair 1?

Senator Asselin: Touché.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we must take one step at a time.

Senator Asselin: Touché.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows what the situation is. The exemption has already been announced by the government, even in anticipation of the provisions of Bill S-31.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Flynn: It would put Quebec on the same footing as the federal government with respect to investing in transportation companies. What Bill S-31 wants to prevent now would be acceptable, if both Quebec and Ottawa were on an equal footing.

Senator Frith: If you want to make a speech, launch an inquiry.

Senator Flynn: I am asking you if that is the understanding.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: There is a big question mark at the end!

[English]

Senator Flynn: Well, there is a question mark for the benefit of Senator Frith.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my friend the Leader of the Opposition is asking whether Quebec and Ottawa will be on an equal footing.

Senator Flynn: Under Bill S-31.

Senator Olson: Under Bill S-31 it is not intended that the federal government will be on the same footing as the provincial governments, and that is for the very simple reason that the Crown in right of Canada has jurisdiction over interprovincial and international transportation activities.

Senator Asselin: I think you had better wait for the judgment of the Supreme Court.

Senator Flynn: Is the Leader of the Government suggesting that owning shares and having control of the operations are exactly the same thing?

Senator Olson: No, he does not.

Senator Flynn: Thank God. You would not dare say that.

Senator Asselin: You'll learn, Bud, you'll learn.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—RELOCATION OF OFFSHORE SUPPLY BASE AT MULGRAVE, NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to Petro-Canada and its offshore supply base at Mulgrave, Nova Scotia. Is it a fact that Petro-Canada is about to move its supply base from Mulgrave to some other location?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to make inquiries about that. I am not sure of the answer at this point in time.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his undertaking to make inquiries. Will he be kind enough, should the answer be yes, to ask why the supply base is being moved, where it is being moved to, when the move will take place and how the present employees will be affected by the move.

Senator Olson: All of those questions will be included in the inquiry.

Senator Smith: Thank you.

SPORT

REGULATION OF BOXING

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. It concerns the recent tragic death of a young Korean boxer, Duk Koo Kim. My interest in this stems from my years as an amateur boxer in the navy.

Would the minister tell us if he is considering examining the procedures and regulations governing boxing so that it becomes a sport and not a hazard to the lives of participants?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators I thank the honourable senator for his question.

The problem of violence in boxing, which, over the years, has led to the deaths of certain participants in the sport, is a matter of real concern to me and the department. I have held meetings—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Is there something other than violence in boxing?

Senator Perrault:—during the past month with respect to proposals from various parts of the country to reduce or, hopefully, to prevent ring deaths and injuries. These submissions have led me to the belief that if negotiations can move forward successfully, we should have in Canada a co-ordinator of boxing to ensure that those who step into rings in any province of Canada are physically able to participate in pugilistic contests.

Unfortunately, certain provinces do not have provincial boxing commissions. Ideally, it would be helpful to have commissions located in all of the provinces. Perhaps we require a central information clearing agency—and this surely cannot be beyond the bounds of technology today—a computer-assisted agency to provide computer access to dossiers on all participants to those commissions to ensure, for example, those boxers who have suffered brain damage, those who have been rendered senseless or who have received significant injuries do not participate in boxing contests within a few days of sustaining such injuries and receive competent medical clearances before they fight again.

I must say that some of those provinces where boxing matches are staged on a regular basis have shown a high degree of co-operation in efforts to assure reasonable standards for the sport. There is less interest in certain other provinces where boxing matches are not held on a large scale.

After recent events in the United States, it would be very tragic were someone to die in a boxing ring this week in Canada. In my view, we must move quickly to do what we can to ensure that we do not have a repeat, ever again, of the recent ring tragedy that occurred in the United States.

I am making the problem one of my priorities as the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Hon. Joseph-Phillippe Guay: It is common knowledge that one can step into the ring and be physically fit in all respects. You can have a commission to ensure that boxers are physically fit before they go into the ring, but after being hit in the second round the injury may not be noticed until the seventh or eighth round. That is the problem facing boxers today.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has made a good point. There has been a suggestion that pre-fight brain scans should be made mandatory to ensure that there are no people physically incapable of participating in boxing matches.

Of course, regardless of precautions, there are no fail-safe measures, and we all understand that. A number of hockey and football injuries, some serious, still occur despite the fact that equipment has been dramatically improved over the years. But perhaps we can minimize sports risks, and I feel that we should attempt to do so.

As far as a central co-ordinator of boxing is concerned, I am not thinking in terms of some super-czar located in Ottawa or Toronto who will dictate what should be done in all of the provinces, but rather a person and an office to assist the provincial boxing commissions with information regarding ring records, physical and medical records. We want the maximum degree of protection for people engaged in the sport of boxing.

Hon. C. William Doody: I have a supplementary question for the minister. Could the honourable minister tell us whether boxing is one of the so-called sports that his department will continue to fund and encourage, or is it one of those less desirable types of athletic competition in terms of human destruction and injury?

● (2025)

Senator Perrault: It is our view that boxing can be a safer sport under the proper conditions—for example, if proper headgear is used; if the weight of gloves is such that fists are not going to cause serious physical injury; and if the competence of the referees is such that contests will not proceed beyond a point where serious physical injury is possible.

Assisted by the federal government, Halifax has one of the best boxing training programs in Canada. Indeed, honourable senators, the maritimes can be very proud of the standard established in Halifax for the production of good, competent amateur boxers. Almost all of the abuses that are taking place are in the so-called professional ranks. I have reports of situations in certain parts of Canada where teams of three or four boxers, some of whom should not even be participating in the sport, are moving from town to town and nobody knows their records. One of these boxers could be knocked out two or three times a month. He might participate in a bout, in order to earn $50, having been knocked out a couple of nights before in another small town. That kind of abuse is the beginning of tragedy. The good amateur program centred in the great city of Halifax has been a marked success.

Senator Doody: I should like to repeat the question. Would the minister indicate whether or not his department will continue to fund this so-called sport which encourages young people to get into this sort of life?

Senator Perrault: The program will be continued because if it is conducted under proper, safe auspices, it is a good conditioning sport, a good training sport and a good sport to inculcate discipline. Similarly, if football and other sports are not supervised properly, they can be dangerous as well. We intend to continue our efforts. In the recent Commonwealth Games held at Brisbane, Canada did quite well in boxing and there were no serious physical injuries to any of our participants.

Senator Doody: That we know of.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, as a further supplementary question, could the minister tell us, with respect to professional boxing, whether he has considered the report of Mr. Justice Hewak of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench, who undertook an extensive study of boxing in that province as a result of a death that occurred seven or eight years ago?

Senator Perrault: All of these studies are being considered. At the present time we are receiving excellent help from the Province of Nova Scotia. One minister's office there is providing great assistance to the federal government and other provinces in attempting to develop a regulatory program which may be of real help to all of Canada. The ultimate plan, I believe, may be to have provincial access to a pool of computer-stored information about boxing participants, perhaps from all over North America. An information retrieval system of that kind would cost money, which is an important factor. The funding of such a program, of course, would be a major consideration.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: May I ask a supplementary question? Is it the minister's intention to call a conference on this matter with heads of the boxing commissions that exist in four or five of the provinces?

Senator Perrault: We have had a preliminary meeting in Saskatoon, with constructive results, with the ministers responsible for fitness and amateur sport in the provinces. It was agreed at that meeting that we would try to take action in this area. As I said earlier, our main boxing facility for Canada is in Halifax, and because of Nova Scotia expertise in that field an official of the Province of Nova Scotia will be producing some proposals shortly. I think it would be of real benefit for the heads of the boxing commissions to meet. Senator Deschatelets has advanced an excellent idea.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Well, it is from an expert.

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN DOMESTIC FARES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding big-hearted Air Canada. The advertisement in today's newspaper says that Air Canada, in consultation with the Canadian Government Office of Tourism, will issue cost-cutting coupons to Canadian travellers, which will allow them to save on hotel accommodation and car rentals. However, the advertisement mentions nothing about cutting the cost of air fares to assist those who cannot afford to visit other parts of Canada.

● (2030)

As an example, many Newfoundlanders who work in Toronto and wish to return home for Christmas will have to pay over $500 to fly to Gander. The return fare to Stephenville is about $450.

Can the Government of Canada induce the big-hearted Air Canada president to cut air fares, which, in turn, will mean that more seats on planes will be filled and, thereby, the airline will make a profit instead of gouging the poorer people who can least afford to travel across their own country?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is very interesting to hear Senator Marshall's views on what Air Canada is outlining in some of its promotions. I wish neither to agree nor to disagree with him, although I think he will understand that there is far more involved in an advertising and business promotion scheme than some of the comparisons he has made.

Senator Marshall: That is a good answer.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): For once.

Senator Marshall: The advertisement states:

Whether you just want to visit the family back home without sleeping on a cot in the livingroom or you've always dreamed of doing Canada in style, now is the time.

Now is not the time because, even while we are talking about Canadian unity, people living in the far reaches of Canada cannot travel across the country unless there is a reduction in air fares. It would be more useful to lower the fares than to try to entice people to travel by offering them cheaper hotel accommodation.

THE ECONOMY

PRICE RESTRAINT IN FEDERAL PUBLIC SECTOR

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers. The first is in response to a question asked by Senator Roblin on July 21 concerning price restraint in the federal public sector.

To my knowledge, those bodies that are subject to the six-and-five restraint program would include all organizations listed in the federal telephone directory plus crown corporations. This gives the widest possible scope to the policy which is aimed at restraining all prices established, directly or indirectly, under federal jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, I also have a response to a question asked by Senator Roblin a little later on the same day concerning the publicity the government intends to give to any cabinet decisions which approve deviations from the 6 per cent rule on account of exceptional circumstances.

I have made inquiries and have been informed that only in exceptional circumstances will an exemption to the administered prices six-and-five policy be considered. Arguments in support of exemptions of individual cases would be submitted by the sponsoring minister for a ruling by a special committee of ministers, and the results would, necessarily, be communicated by the minister responsible.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 17 concerning the terms of reference of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada as they relate to changes in the institutions of national government.

Honourable senators, the answer is fairly short, and I could read it, but I would ask that it be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, whether or not the Royal Commission wishes to consider changes in the institutions of national government such as the Senate would, of course, be up to the Royal Commission.

From the government's point of view, the terms of reference would certainly allow the Royal Commission to examine the reform of the Senate in the context of national policy-making relating to economic development.

Therefore, the Royal Commission would not be a major forum for ideas on Senate reform, but could study the institution in the context of how to make better national economic policy.

ROYAL COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT—ROLE OF DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE, ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA AND HELLIWELL COMMITTEE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on this same subject I have a response to a question asked by Senator Murray on November 17, 1982 concerning the respective roles of the Economic Council of Canada, the committee headed by Professor Helliwell and the new royal commission headed by the Honourable Donald Macdonald.

The terms of reference of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada are a matter of public record and were tabled in the Senate on November 8, 1982.

The Economic Council of Canada was created by an act of Parliament, which is also a matter of public record.

The role of the Economic Advisory Panel reporting to the Minister of Finance is outlined in an answer given to a similar question asked by Senator Tremblay at page 4987 of the Debates of the Senate of November 16, 1982.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I would ask the minister to go back and try to obtain an explanation for the existence, at public expense, of these three bodies which are doing work that is remarkably similar, if not overlapping, in this world of six-and-five and ostensible government restraint.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Murray can make that argument if he wishes.

Hon. R. James Balfour: It is a statement of fact.

Senator Olson: It is an opinion, and many senators opposite have a great deal of difficulty separating opinion from fact.

In any event, I will do what the honourable senator asks. It would then be factual to take excerpts from the terms of reference to which I have just referred. I am not sure that would help Senator Murray's argument very much, but I will respond precisely to the question he has asked.

Senator Murray: I would thank the minister and the government for doing so as soon as possible.

THE ECONOMY

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BOND PROGRAM—STATISTICS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Roblin on November 18 concerning the number of small business bond transactions since November 1981 and the amounts of the loans.

Honourable senators, the answer is rather long and contains two tables, Table A and Table B, which give better meaning to the response being conveyed. I would, therefore, ask that the answer, containing the two tables, be taken as read.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to furnish Senator Roblin with the latest available statistics on the Small Business Development Bond Program.

Table A provides statistics on the Small Business Development Bond Program under existing legislation and takes into account information available, which is as of January 15, 1982. This Program was directed to corporations for development purposes and to assist those corporations in financial difficulty. Table B provides statistics on the Small Business Bond Program, as of April 28, 1982. This Program was provided for in the November 12, 1981 Budget. The Small Business Bond program will cover, in addition to corporations, unincorporated businesses and partnerships, including farmers and fishermen, in financial difficulty.

INTERPRETATION ACT
BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT
CANADA LABOUR CODE

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the second reading of the Bill S-30, intituled: "An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to Canada Day".—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Stand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that it will come as no surprise that the government takes the position that Bill S-30 represents an irresistible and purely technical corollary to the passing of Bill C-201—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That is not the view of His Honour the Speaker.

Senator Frith:—and the consequential amendments follow quite naturally from that. For that reason, and since the introduction of Bill S-30 was in fulfillment of an undertaking to introduce the consequential amendments—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: No, not in the Senate.

Senator Frith:—I should like honourable senators to realize and understand that the government will not support the position that this purely technical debate on the bill be continually adjourned. The government will ask that at some point—and I would respectfully suggest within the next two weeks—the matter be put to a vote. For that reason, I do not think honourable senators should assume that we will always accept adjournments of the debate.

Senator Flynn: On that point, since the Speaker's decision we have been trying to ascertain what the substantial difference is between the amendment, which was defeated, and this bill.

His Honour ruled that we could vote against this bill even if we voted in favour of the amendment which was introduced by this side some weeks ago.

This is an important matter because the Speaker did indicate to us that there was a substantial difference between the amendment and this bill, and we have to consider that matter.

Therefore, I do not see that we can accept the view that this is a technical matter. If it were a technical matter, of course, our point of order would have been maintained, but it was not maintained, and we are going to take all the time that is required to consider our position.

● (2040)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think there is a point of order. I am not sure that Senator Flynn intended to raise a question with respect to the Speaker's ruling, because the fact is that when that ruling was given there was also given a complete explanation as to why it was made.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Olson: The ruling is not an examination of the wording of Bill S-30 and an amendment that was moved some time earlier.

Senator Flynn: We heard it. You do not need to go through it again.

Senator Olson: If you heard it, then you will realize that "detailed examination" does not fit with the rest of your argument, because there were a couple of other paragraphs included in your amendment that are not contained in Bill S-30.

Senator Flynn: In any event, that does not change our stand.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, it seems to me that a new matter has been raised tonight. The Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate has asked that Bill S-30 be proceeded with in a manner that is not in accordance with the usual practice in the Senate.

I have just been looking at the order paper, taking note of some of the bills listed there. I notice such measures as: Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act; Bill C-135, to amend the National Housing Act; Bill S-33, to give effect, for Canada, to the Uniform Evidence Act adopted by the Uniform Law Conference of Canada; Bill C-90, to amend the customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof; and Bill S-32, to amend the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act.

Honourable senators, I am inclined to believe that those are important bills. I am not inclined to believe that there is such great urgency attached to Bill S-30, because I have in my mind that July 1 is a few months away. Is the matter of such great urgency that the bill should be dealt with in a manner different from that in which bills are usually dealt with in the Senate? I want to put the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate on notice that, as a senator, I am not willing to acquiesce in that unusual practice.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise to ask the senator who first spoke to this order if he will permit a question? I have a question which I would like to address to him. I take it that the honourable senator assents.

Honourable senators, my question is a simple one. I understood the honourable senator to say that an undertaking was given such that Bill S-30 would be introduced. My question is: Was he referring to the undertaking which was given by Mr. Joyal, the Minister of State? Did the honourable senator understand at the time, as I did, that Mr. Joyal was saying that there will be a bill with consequential amendments introduced in the House of Commons? Was I incorrect in that understanding?

Senator Olson: Yes, I think the honourable senator might have been wrong—

Senator Donahoe: Excuse me, honourable senators, my question was addressed to the Deputy Leader of the Government, who was the first to speak on this order. I would like to have an answer from him, if I may.

Senator Flynn: Give him a chance.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I shall deal first with the point raised by Senator McIlraith with reference to what he called an unusual procedure. I take it that, in his opinion, it is unusual not to constantly agree to all suggestions for the standing of orders. He and I disagree on that point.

Senator Flynn: What difference does it make?

Senator Frith: I was merely trying to be courteous to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: That is, I was trying to advise honourable senators that it cannot be taken for granted that we will always agree to the adjournment of this particular order.

Hon. Eric Cook: Who is the "we"?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I spoke on behalf of the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Flynn: What do you mean by "the government"? Do you mean the Prime Minister of Canada?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I mean those of us who represent the government. The government's point of view is what I put forward. That is what I said when I began to speak, and that is what I meant by "we." Therefore, I have nothing more to add to what I said when I first spoke to this order.

As to the question raised by Senator Donahoe, my recollection of what was said, both by Mr. Joyal and by Senator Olson, is that legislation would be introduced—

Senator Flynn: Senator Olson did not speak in committee.

Senator Frith: That may very well be. I am speaking now about the statement I made earlier to the effect that an undertaking was given by and on behalf of the government that this legislation would be introduced.

Senator Flynn: In the next session.

Senator Frith: It may well be that Mr. Joyal, in committee, used the words "in the House of Commons." I do not remember his saying that. However, Senator Donahoe apparently does remember his saying that the legislation would be introduced in the House of Commons. I will not quarrel with him. I am quite sure that the undertaking given by Senator Olson in the debate in the Senate was to the effect that such legislation would be introduced. I am sure that, during the debate in the Senate, Senator Olson gave the undertaking that the government would introduce the consequential amendments. I certainly do not recall his saying "in the House of Commons."

Senator Flynn: You wouldn't. Your memory is short when it is convenient.

Senator Donahoe: I thank the honourable senator for his answer. If I may be permitted, I should like to expand upon my question.

In the first instance, and for the sake of clarity, I was referring to the undertaking given by Mr. Joyal before the committee. It is not right to assume that I understood him to say, or that he did say, "in the House of Commons." I cannot say, from my own memory, whether those words were used. I can say, however, that I was left with the definite impression that he was saying that the government would introduce the bill in the House of Commons. In saying "we will introduce it," he was not speaking for the senators; he was speaking for the members. He was speaking for the government, the executive. That was my understanding of what he said.

The expansion of my question is simply this: Was I mistaken in such an understanding, or is that a proper understanding of what he said?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Donahoe has said that he was left with a definite impression. I will not quarrel with his definite impression. That was his impression. If he had it, he had it. I will not say that it was incorrect for him to have that impression.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, I rise with a little apprehension because of the esteemed reputation of the Deputy Leader of the Government with respect to his understanding of legal technicalities, with which I am unacquainted.

I suggest—and I would like him to clarify this—that he talks of the consequential amendments as though there is not much substance in them; as though they are more procedural in nature—a means by which to tidy up the legislation that is on the books.

If I may, I would like to raise another dimension which might be considered by him. Referring back to the effect of Bill C-201—which is now law, and which I accept—it was to amend the Holidays Act in order to change the name of the July 1 holiday from Dominion Day to Canada Day. Bill C-201 amended the Holidays Act, but did not, as a consequence of that amendment, change the references to Dominion Day in the acts referred to in Bill S-30 which is now before the Senate. I believe we are all aware of that. The result of that deficiency in Bill C-201 is that there is an inconsistency in the statutory law. I believe we are all agreed on that.

[Senator Flynn.]

• (2050)

I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government is aware that this inconsistency can be corrected in one or two ways. The government, by introducing Bill S-30, is proposing that it be corrected by changing the remaining references to Dominion Day in our statutory law to Canada Day. The other possibility is to change the one reference in our statutory law to Canada Day back to Dominion Day, and that can be done by repealing Bill C-201.

I believe that the Deputy Leader of the Government, as well as the Leader of the Government, when I spoke last Thursday on substance, felt that they were being charitable to me. I suggest that I had a right to speak on the substance of Bill C-201, because it follows that the government, by introducing a bill which invites one remedy, surely opens the opportunity for senators to talk on its principle and to discuss the point that there might be other remedies. When the Deputy Leader of the Government keeps referring to "these consequential acts," and saying, "Let's get on and tidy it up," and "We don't want too many adjournments," does he see this other alternative which raises some very substantial questions?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, to use one of Senator Thompson's own expressions, I thank him for the charitable way that he, in turn, has presented this so-called alternative. I can see that there appears to be an honest difference of opinion and perspective. It is technically true that if a bill states a principle, and that is followed by a bill that makes amendments consequential upon that principle, and if someone is against the original principle and, therefore, is against the consequential amendments, then the alternative of repealing the original principle exists. Of course, that possibility does exist. However, the perception that we are having difficulty with here is that it seems to us—and I wish quite courteously to make our position clear—that once the principle has been passed, then the consequential amendments that flow from it are purely "consequential and procedural". Of course, the alternative of repealing the original bill, as a way to avoid the consequential amendments, always exists, but that, we consider, is undesirable.

Senator Flynn: It stands, anyway; and it is going to stand for a long time.

Order stands.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill C-135, to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2).

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to take a few minutes to explain the purposes of Bill C-135 now before us. The essential purpose of the bill is to improve the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan by making it more appropriate to the current needs of Canadian families and to make its benefits available for another year.

As honourable senators will recall, when this plan was first described by the Minister of Finance in November 1981 the situation confronting homeowners was quite different from what it is now. Mortgage interest rates were very much higher; but that was not the only problem. They were rising so quickly that homeowners had little chance of making the necessary adjustments in their household budgets to anticipate the new charges that would be levied when their mortgages came up for renewal. Many people found themselves in difficulty when their monthly payments rose by 25 or 30 per cent, or more, virtually overnight.

The Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan was introduced, not as the ultimate solution of all the country's housing problems, but simply as a way of giving some temporary help to those Canadians who were hardest hit by high and volatile interest rates. The plan fulfilled a promise made in the Throne Speech which opened that session. A commitment was made, in the words of the speech, "to assist those unable to bear the burden of renegotiating their home mortgages in the present abnormal situation so that the spectre of foreclosure will be avoided."

There was a good deal of discussion, at one time, as to who were the people most in need of help. In order to define such individuals, the government applied a well established criterion. Assistance would be offered to those who, upon renewing their mortgages, would have to make monthly payments that exceeded 30 per cent of household incomes. There was speculation at that time—a year ago—about how many Canadian households would meet that criterion and qualify for help.

I recall that the minister who was then responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation said that the number of families qualifying would depend very much upon what happened to mortgage interest rates. At that time they were ranging around 20 per cent, and the minister said that if rates remained at about that level for the next 12 months there would be about 50,000 households whose mortgage payments and taxes after renewal would represent more than 30 per cent of their household income.

I am happy to say that that particular scenario did not prevail. Mortgage interest rates did not remain at such high levels throughout the following 12 months. They are now substantially lower than that and have been dropping consistently during recent weeks. Applications for assistance under the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan now amount to about 10,000—not 50,000—and involve a commitment of just over $4 million.

As honourable senators may be aware, assistance under the plan was offered in two forms: as an outright $3,000 grant for qualified homeowners who had little or no equity in their property, and as interest-deferral guarantees for those who had

5 per cent or more of equity. The interest-deferral guarantees gave some homeowners the opportunity to make use of the equity in their homes to keep monthly payments to a manageable level during the time of high interest rates.

Deferring interest, however, was not a permanent solution. The unpaid interest was added to the principal amount of the mortgage and the debt was increased. As the price of houses declined in the ensuing months, however, and as owners saw their equity in their property being reduced, many people felt that deferring interest payments was not the best solution to their particular problem.

This preference was recognized in the budget speech of June 29 when the Minister of Finance announced his intention to withdraw the interest-deferral provisions of the plan and to make the outright $3,000 grants available to everyone who qualified for assistance under the plan, regardless of their equity. At the same time, it was announced that the plan would be extended to the end of 1983.

Those changes are, of course, the ones we are asked to approve by passing the bill now before us, and I hope that honourable senators will see their way clear to give effect to this legislation as quickly as possible. There are some 6,000 people waiting to receive assistance under the plan and CMHC cannot issue the cheques without the authority of Parliament.

It is just as important, however, to remember the thousands of additional families who will qualify for this assistance during the coming year—people who bought their houses confident that, with hard work and some sacrifice, they would be able to make their monthly payments and enjoy the pride and security of owning a place of their own. Through no fault of theirs, many of these families now find that the terms have changed, that monthly payments have risen to a level that threatens to deprive them of their home.

For these people, the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan represents the difference between giving up and hanging in for another year. They will still have to work hard and make sacrifices, but the $3,000 brings their hopes and dreams back into the realm of the possible.

● (2100)

I believe that the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan is a sensible and practical way of helping many Canadian homeowners to help themselves, and that is why I will support this bill and ask for your support. The mortgage renewal plan, however, does not stand by itself. It is part of a comprehensive package of measures which address the whole range of housing needs.

The Canadian Home Ownership Plan provides $3,000 grants to help Canadians acquire a home. The Canadian Rental Supply Plan encourages the construction of housing for rent in areas across the country that have the lowest vacancy rates. The Non-profit, Co-operative and Rural and Native Housing Programs are designed particularly to bring assistance to people who, for whatever reason, are not able to provide for themselves. The Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program provides loans and grants to people of limited income to restore their homes to acceptable standards of health and safety. The Canada Home Renovation Plan encourages people to invest their own money in home renovation as a way of creating jobs.

In addition to the long-standing and highly successful programs which help to give Canadians access to affordable housing in a good community environment, the government in recent months has invested close to $1 billion in new housing initiatives designed not only to provide housing but also to create 120,000 or more new jobs. I think that this is the context in which we should see the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan and the legislation now before us. They are part of a broad-ranging response to the housing needs of Canadians and an essential part of the strategy that will lead us to economic recovery.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill C-90, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-90 proposes several important amendments to the Customs Tariff. The bill also introduces a number of technical housekeeping changes to the tariff. The provisions of this bill were originally introduced in a Notice of Ways and Means motion which was tabled in the other place in conjunction with the presentation of the budget of November 12, 1981. You may recall that the subject matter of the bill was given careful study by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce which made its report to the Senate on May 11, 1982.

Having in mind the time which has elapsed since then, I think it would be useful were I to review the highlights and follow them with a more detailed explanation of the key provisions of the bill. The bill proposes a number of improvements in the general preferential tariff for developing countries, the GPT. There are reductions in rates on products of interest to developing countries as well as special measures for the least developed of the developing countries.

The bill establishes a tariff item which would provide duty-free entry for goods specially designed for the use of disabled persons. It introduces a new tariff schedule for goods used by dentists or dental laboratories. It also provides authority for the government to convert existing units of measure in the Customs Tariff from imperial to metric, following industry practice. The bill updates a number of tariff provisions contained in the former Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement of 1932 to reflect the Trade and Economic Co-operation Agreement which has replaced the old agreement. Finally, the bill introduces a number of miscellaneous tariff changes in response to representations received from interested parties in Canada.

[Senator Stanbury.]

I would now like to discuss in more detail some of the measures I have just outlined. First, I shall deal with the general preferential tariff—or the GPT, as it is commonly known. Honourable senators are aware of the important role played by the preferential tariff systems introduced by Canada and other developed countries in assisting the growth of exports and balance of payments positions of developing countries. The bill provides several significant improvements in Canada's GPT which will benefit less developed countries or LDCs, without having any adverse effect on the Canadian business community. There is a new duty-free entry provision for goods covered by the general preferential tariff, that are imported from countries designated by the Governor in Council as being least developed developing countries, or LLDCs. In addition, the bill liberalizes the rules governing the origin of the imported goods to permit tariff-free entry on goods partially produced in one LLDC and finished in one or more other LLDC's.

The purpose of these measures is to offer LLDCs potential new export opportunities by removing the duties on goods that qualify for the GPT when imported from LLDCs. Roughly one third of the items covered by Canada's GPT system are currently dutiable. The concessions in the bill will provide free entry to LLDCs on about 600 tariff items. There is also authority which would enable the government to implement tariff rate quotas as a way of providing Canadian industry with temporary relief from imports from developing countries which cause or threaten injury to Canadian production.

The schedules of GPT rate changes in the bill include a number of reductions which will benefit LDCs. These reduced rates were based on recommendations made by the Tariff Board in Part I of Reference No. 158. In order to determine whether access to the Canadian market for products of developing countries could be improved, the then Minister of Finance in July 1980 had directed the board to study and report on the likely impact on Canadian production of providing lower rates of duty for certain products currently eligible for general preferential tariff treatment. Part I of the board's report was tabled in Parliament on May 20, 1981. The broadened product coverage under the GPT as well as reduced rates of duty on a range of products of interest to LDCs resulting from the board's study will improve the terms of access to the Canadian market for about $50 million in imports from LDCs. I might mention that Part II of the board's report was submitted to the government in April 1982 and is now being reviewed.

The new tariff item in the bill is goods for disabled. Under this item the government will be authorized to provide by order in council duty-free entry for products that are specially designed for disabled persons, enabling it to respond quickly to future requests for the removal of the duty on specialized goods for the disabled which are not available in Canada. In addition, the duty-free provisions in the bill for electronic selector control devices to enable the disabled to control such things as appliances and for electronic devices to aid persons with speech impediments will be of immediate benefit to the handicapped who have need for this specialized equipment.

Under dental products, the new schedule of tariff items covering materials used by dentists and dental laboratories will result in duty-free entry for a number of materials such as dental cements, pins, posts and screws not made in Canada and unlikely to be made here, and reductions in duties on several other materials, such as dental amalgams and similar filling materials and impression compounds. The consolidation of all these materials in one short schedule will simplify import procedures and related paperwork.

With regard to metrication, many of the provisions of the Customs Tariff are described in imperial units of measure. The authority provided for in the bill to convert these units to the metric system by order in council will enable the government to give priority to introducing the metric system where it is being used by industry sectors, and to leave the existing system in place in those sectors where metrication has not yet taken place.

Although Canadian producers in many sectors, such as sugar and textiles, have completed their conversion process, many others have not. Some of those that have completed conversion have asked that the Customs Tariff be metricated, since they now buy and sell goods almost exclusively in metric units and would like to make all their reports and customs entries in metric units of measure. They are faced with additional record-keeping costs as long as they must deal in two measurement systems.

In order to accommodate these industry groups, the government would like to be able to proceed with the conversion of the relevant sections of the Customs Tariff within the next few months. However, it is premature to convert all sections of the Customs Tariff since a number of industries, such as iron and steel, still deal in old imperial measures or a combination of the two systems and will complete their conversion process at a later date.

The main reason why authority is being sought to metricate the Customs Tariff by order in council is that it will provide some flexibility in dealing with individual industrial sectors and will ensure that consultations can be held with them in order to discuss any concerns. I would point out that proposed section 22(2) will strictly limit the amount of deviation possible from existing rates of duty to ensure that existing levels of tariff protection are maintained for Canadian industry.

With regard to the Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement, there are a number of purely technical measures in the bill relating to the new Trade and Economic Cooperation Agreement between Canada and New Zealand. The agreement provides for the continuation of existing preferential rates accorded to New Zealand goods under the old Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement. Bill C-90 brings the Canadian legislation up to date by repealing the 1932 New Zealand Trade Agreement Act and related clauses in the Customs Tariff and by replacing them with new provisions to reflect the cooperation agreement. I would emphasize that these amendments do not involve any change in the tariff rates on goods from New Zealand.

The new agreement does, however, require changes to our legislation with respect to the rules governing the origin of goods imported from New Zealand. The old agreement and the act based on that agreement stated that goods would be deemed to be the produce or manufacture of New Zealand if they complied with the laws, regulations and conditions in force in Canada for the application of the British preferential tariff. The rules of origin under that tariff permit entry at preferential rates of any goods that have been substantially manufactured in one or more of the countries entitled to the tariff. This means that goods manufactured in New Zealand using component parts or materials imported into New Zealand from Britain, Australia or other countries entitled to the benefits of the British preferential tariff qualify for the tariff preferences. Since Canada is phasing out the tariff preferences for Britain and since New Zealand has already terminated the preferences which it previously accorded to Britain, the Canadian and New Zealand governments have agreed that neither country should any longer provide for cumulative origin in the bilateral agreement but, instead, that a system of "single country" origin should be adopted. This part of the agreement, which we intend to implement by means of regulations pursuant to the legislation proposed in Bill C-90, will not come into force until the legislation has been approved.

Honourable senators, the matters contained in Bill C-90 provide a number of improvements in the Customs Tariff. The general preferential tariff measures, for example, provide important benefits to developing countries, particularly those who are among the least developed of the developing countries. At the same time, these have been carefully designed to ensure that they do not have a harmful effect on Canadian production and employment. The measure in the bill which will enable the government to remove customs duties on goods designed for the disabled reflects the government's recognition and willingness to make changes which will provide relief for the disabled.

I should add that there are no changes in the bill before us from the bill studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and, as I said, reported by it under date of May 11, 1982.

I trust that these provisions meet with your approval and that we can deal with the bill expeditiously.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

PENITENTIARY ACT PAROLE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 9, the debate on the motion of Senator Hastings for the second reading of Bill S-32, to amend the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am sure I speak for all of you when I express to my good friend Senator Hastings our thanks for his excellent presentation and explanation of Bill S-32.

While in general I agree with the position taken by Senator Hastings that the current situation is not acceptable, I am not necessarily in agreement with the proposed amendments as outlined in the bill. Certainly, in my view, they do not go far enough to achieve the stated purpose of the bill, which is to correct a series of serious flaws in the whole of the "early release" aspect of our penal system. Indeed, I truly regret that Bill S-32 goes such a little distance in dealing with that problem. I also regret that the bill, as Senator Hastings presented it, does not concern itself with the problems of, for lack of a better word, the victims of early-released criminals; and, in simple terms, there are many people who are adversely affected by criminals receiving early releases.

However, let me first deal with the mover's comments. Senator Hastings made reference to a report made a couple of years ago by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, under the chairmanship of Senator Goldenberg, which concluded that it had to be recognized that a sentence by a court was a sentence and that it was the intention of society that that sentence be served. I find no difficulty in accepting that principle as expressed in those words, the words of the committee as related by Senator Hastings, but I do have some difficulty accepting the notion, as expressed by Senator Hastings, that where the sentence is served and how it is served are matters that have been left to Parliament to decide and that Parliament, in its wisdom, has decided that the last one-third of the sentence can be served, subject to certain conditions, outside of custody.

I suspect that, in eliciting people's opinions, Senator Hastings and I must definitely be talking to different members of society, because, to my way of thinking, the majority of the people of Canada believe—but it is only a delusion—that a 10-year sentence is a 10-year sentence; that a five-year sentence is a five-year sentence; that a serious crime is accorded a long term of imprisonment; and that the criminal ought to serve that sentence.

The concept that Parliament has the authority to reduce sentences seems to be foreign to most Canadians, and I would suggest to honourable senators that, if they understood it, most of them would find it unacceptable. The common belief is that conviction of a serious crime calls for a serious punishment, a heavy penalty, not a penalty that only appears heavy but at some later date has a discount attached to it.

Honourable senators, there are several good reasons why there should be lengthy terms of imprisonment for serious offences. First, there is the deterrent factor; then there is the rehabilitative factor; and then there is the essential aspect of the protection of society.

• (2120)

I am not convinced that discounting takes all of those factors into account. For example, the protection of society is not at all covered when, often for little reason, a lengthy term is cut short.

What about uniformity? We pass laws in the name of, and for the sake of, uniformity. I cannot find an excuse for the passage of poor legislation. Even if it is not necessarily a good law, let us at least make it uniform.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): But there are really worse reasons.

Senator Nurgitz: Not many, but there are worse ones.

As to the question of penalty imposed on two different persons who have committed the same offence but in different parts of the country, one would hope they would receive, if not the same, at least similar sentences. One would hope there would be some uniformity in the penalty we impose on those who breach the rules of our society. Uniformity is not only desirable, it is the only fair thing.

Last week I talked with two judges. Because I know that we are not against legislation by poll, I conducted a poll.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are not permitted to talk to judges.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, and I plead guilty to that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): But not by telephone.

Senator Nurgitz: No, not by telephone.

Senator Frith: Nor about cases that are before them.

Senator Nurgitz: The conversation might have been regarding cases before them, but I would have no way of knowing.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Were they from Manitoba?

Senator Nurgitz: I am not going to disclose that on the grounds that it might incriminate me.

What I want to point out to honourable senators is that, of the two judges I spoke with, one told me that in many instances, but not in every instance, he takes the discount factor into account. If there is a serious case before him, he looks at what he thinks is the appropriate sentence to be served by the accused if found guilty, and then takes into consideration the one-third, and then adds half.

The other judge I spoke with said—and I am not so sure he is far wrong—that he has to determine what penalty he metes out, and that it is not his responsibility if another authority reduces that. There is another rule and another reason.

Honourable senators, those two judges were from the same province. I confess to Senator Guay that they were both from Manitoba and both have what I suggest are contrary views. Talk about losing uniformity! That is a serious problem.

The major criticism I have of the 1971 bill and this amendment is that they contain the words "mandatory supervision." Honourable senators, talk about public deception! What do those words mean? As I said, I conducted a poll—and I only did so in my native province. I talked with two gentlemen on an aircraft today, one is a manager of a community organization, the other is in the meat business. I asked them what the words "mandatory supervision" meant to them. They both somewhat agreed that "mandatory" was a strong word, that it meant "compulsory" or "no way out." They agreed that "supervision" had an aspect of control to it—"overseeing" or "watchfulness", and so forth.

Honourable senators, I watched the television program The Journal on the CBC in which a parole officer, heavily involved in mandatory supervision, talked about what he does when he has an inmate entrusted to his care. He said that his contact with him was of a social nature with a visit on a weekly or monthly basis, depending upon the region the inmate is from.

Senator Hastings, in his comments on November 9, agreed with what this parole officer said. His questions to them are: "Where are you? What are you doing?"—as if a person would walk in and say that he was living with another criminal and committing offences.

Whether or not we can get a better system than we have, I do not know, but I am sure that we can call it something better than "mandatory supervision", because I think it deceives the public, and gives them a false sense of security. It affords little protection to the public.

Let us really think about that for the moment. To the criminal who is about to embark on a further career in crime, this is an opportunity for him to deceive the person to whom he has to report.

For the inmate who intends to go straight, as they say, I have feelings of regret and sorrow. We do not need protection from him. The system has no mechanism built in to provide protection against the one we need to be protected from. So what does the system do? As I said, it protects us from those we do not need to be protected from—that is, those who are going straight—and leaves us terribly exposed to those we need to be protected from.

Several citizens' groups have been organized as a result of this early release system. A group formed in British Columbia as a result of some serious problems that arose there has called itself "The Citizens United for Safety and Justice." I was somewhat impressed with the material that that group has distributed in attempting to get some semblance of what they consider to be sanity, and particularly protection for young people.

In one of their initial releases they said that in their community and elsewhere in Canada there has been an understandable arousal of feeling within ordinary citizens as a result of certain events relating to the early release of prisoners. They went to great lengths to stress that their objectives were of the most common variety. Under no circumstances were they encouraging the promotion of a vigilante or hysteria-motivated organization. They were not interested in permitting a radical element to infiltrate their group. What they were asking was simply that their representatives explain to them the reasons for the obvious failure of Canadian law to protect children and other members of society.

Before I leave that subject, I should like to discuss the disgusting incident of last week. I believe the Globe and Mail called it the "Sleazy heroics of Francis Simard". Here is a young man who was released—and I am not certain whether he was released under the mandatory supervision program or the parole system—earlier than his sentence provided for and who is profiting from royalties on a book he has written. What is he saying about the incident that put him in prison to start with—the brutal slaying of a Quebec cabinet minister, Pierre Laporte? He talks about it in a very cold and calculating way. He talks about the carrying out of the death as being a matter of discussion. He says it was agreed to and carried out as a means of letting the world know of their particular beliefs. His words were: "It was a decision of sincerity and conviction." One newspaper account said that the closest his approach was to remorse seemed to be that he thought it was a tough decision. That is a pretty sad commentary on the early release system, whether it be parole or whether it be the so-called mandatory supervision program.

● (2130)

Senator Hastings referred to the Solicitor General having conducted a departmental study that commenced in 1979 and completed in March 1981. The statistics provided by the Solicitor General's department are staggering if not sickening, I think, to most decent Canadians. Between January 1975 and December 1979—five full years—no fewer than 70 Canadians died at the hands of convicts who had earned early release from penitentiaries. The Parole Board said that 18 of the deaths were the work of convicts on parole, so we have to leave that number out. It still leaves 52 prisoners released under so-called mandatory supervision. That is almost one a month who commits murder.

Senator Frith: One a week.

Senator Nurgitz: I said 52 in 5 years. I meant one a month. In 60 months there were 52 culpable homicides, because many of them ended up being manslaughter. If we are getting technical, not all of them were convicted of murder.

I want to address another problem. Whether we take the likes of a Simard or another murderer released under mandatory supervision, suppose he holds up a bank tomorrow and kills one or more people in that bank, he cannot even be charged with first degree murder. He goes back to prison and serves another term much less than I think our system requires. That bothers me a great deal. I have spent some time at the criminal bar defending many people, and I am somewhat bothered to have to speak out on this matter, but, as I said when we were debating the amendments to the Criminal Code dealing with sexual offences, I am staggered to stumble upon the fact that if a murder is committed in the course of an armed robbery the accused is not charged with first degree murder but second degree murder. It does not matter how many times, because we are now talking about people who have already been convicted of serious offences and have been released under some system that we are building in.

We do know that less than half of those released under the mandatory supervision program are returned to prison either for breach of the terms of the release or for the commission of a further crime—and in more cases than not for the commission of a further crime. It is regrettable, because one can say that, indeed, the program is not that bad, that 50 per cent of the people who are released, at least for a time, lead useful lives. We do not have to house them and we did not have to feed them, but I think it is a sad day when a program is failing for almost half of those to whom it is applied.

Honourable senators, we never seem to direct our attention to another matter, why a sentence could not be a sentence, since we already concede that the only people who are helped by this kind of program are those who need and want help and who will take advantage of the system that is provided for them. Why is there never a program for those who serve a full term? There is not, other than that of the John Howard Society and some of the helpful groups in the community.

Having said that, I think we have to cut out the excesses contained in the current Penitentiary Act and Parole Act that allow this revolving-door system that Senator Hastings talked about. If, as and when the committee examines this bill, it ought to examine the entire early release program and hear from groups such as the Citizens United for Safety and Justice, the John Howard Society of Ontario, who have written to the members of my party and, I am certain, to the members of the other parties, opposing the bill but asking that it be referred to committee quickly, and the Attorneys General for the provinces.

Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add. I see that Senator Hastings is not present, but I am reasonably satisfied that no one else on this side wishes to participate in the debate. Consequently, I have no objection to the bill being referred to committee.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise on a matter of privilege. Bill C-31 was introduced for first reading in this chamber, and was subsequently passed. This evening there arose a discussion between myself and the deputy leader as to what undertakings had been given with respect to that bill. I was unable to get any statement from him as to the undertaking, or what he understood the undertaking was, given by Mr. Joyal before the committee.

I refer to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Issue No. 26, proceedings held on October 13, 1982, and I ask permission to quote one brief paragraph from page 83. The minister said:

● (2140)

It is a great privilege, honourable senators, to be able to meet your expectations and inform you, on behalf of the Government of Canada, that the government intends to introduce, when the next session of the House of Commons of Canada begins, a bill to supplement the bill you are now studying—

That is in accordance with my recollection.

When I asked my questions previously, I had intended to follow by asking the question: What transpired between the date on which Mr. Joyal spoke and the date on which the bill was introduced not in the House of Commons but in the Senate?

Hon. C. William Doody: Another Liberal government commitment.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are in the midst of a debate on another bill, but, of course, a question of privilege can be raised at any time. I have no comment to make on this question at this stage except to say that I am glad that Senator Donahoe's recollection and strong impression are supported by the transcript of the proceedings before the committee.

Honourable senators, I have Senator Hastings' authority to say that he has nothing to add to what he has already said on second reading.

It is clear from the excellent intervention by Senator Nurgitz that the issue has been joined and it is, accordingly, appropriate that this bill be referred to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN-INUIT WEEK BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER DISCHARGED AND BILL WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Williams, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of the Bill S-28, intituled: "An Act establishing Indian-Inuit Week and Inuit-Indian Day".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the last sitting of the Senate, Senator Flynn suggested that, since this bill was sponsored by Senator Williams, who is no longer a member of the Senate, having reached the mandatory retirement age, it would be best if this order were discharged if no other senator wishes to speak to it or sponsor it.

Over the weekend I found a precedent regarding a similar, although not exactly the same, situation. Without going into any detail, it is quite obvious that Senator Flynn's original suggestion seems to be the preferred procedure in this situation—that is, that the order be discharged, it being perfectly clear that another senator is, without any impediment, free to introduce this or a similar bill again.

It appears that there would be no problem with the so-called "question of anticipation" since the bill has not been debated, it having received, in effect, only first reading and been stood over since.

Honourable senators, with that background, I ask, with leave, that this order be discharged.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRSREPORT OF COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs entitled: "Certain Aspects of the Canadian Constitution", tabled in the Senate on 26th November, 1980—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to a question by Senator Deschatelets a week or so ago concerning the trip made by certain senators to Australia to consider the Australian experience of an elected Senate, I said that I intended to initiate an inquiry on that subject to share with honourable senators my impression—and, I hope, the impression of other senators who were members of the delegation—of the Australian experience.

Since I gave that response in this chamber, I have decided that I should like to intervene on the subject of an elected Senate for Canada, as it relates to my impression gained in Australia, in the debate on this inquiry. Several aspects of the so-called "Lamontagne Report" would compare with my views on the question of an elected Senate for Canada.

Therefore, I am respectfully asking Senator Macdonald to allow the order to stand in my name and, within the next week or so, I hope to make an intervention along the lines I have just described.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: That is perfectly in order.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Do the Australians have a national holiday called "Dominion Day" or "Australia Day"?

Senator Frith: They call it "Australia Day." You picked the wrong country to ask about.

Senator Marshall: I should have known better.
Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, November 24, 1982

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF BP CANADA

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Does the leader have anything to add to the responses he gave last night to my questions concerning the transaction between Petro-Canada and British Petroleum?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have anything of substance to add to the question; but I can advise the honourable senator—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not the question; the answer. You do not add substance to a question.

Senator Olson: The response to a question, I presume by extrapolation, is the answer, and for that I do not have anything of substance to add. But I can advise Senator Balfour that we have made the necessary inquiries to get the detailed, technical calculations of the matters he has raised.

Senator Balfour: I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Jack Marshall: A technical corollary.

Senator Balfour: In the course of his inquiries, would the minister either confirm or deny that the one-cent-per-litre gas tax is to be extended in order to fund the acquisition by Petro-Canada of the assets of British Petroleum?

Senator Olson: I believe it is fair to say that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources announced some time ago that the Canadian ownership tax would not be extended or used for this acquisition by Petro-Canada. I think it might also be helpful if Senator Balfour would care to look at the committee proceedings to which he referred yesterday.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you?

Senator Olson: I do not think they are available yet.

Senator Flynn: Then read about them in the press.

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator will look at those proceedings as soon as they are available, he may find a great deal of detailed information that is in line with the questions he has raised. Of course, I can do that research for him and bring in an answer based on the proceedings, but I am sure that the transcript will be available to Senator Balfour as soon as it is available to me.

Senator Balfour: I take it, then, that the minister is giving the Senate an assurance and a confirmation that the one-cent-per-litre tax will not be extended, contrary to reports on the CBC this morning?

Senator Olson: This points up the problem I have with confirming, denying, qualifying, modifying, or whatever, reports that my honourable friends opposite hear on the radio or read in the newspapers. What I said was that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—and I am subject to correction, though I am pretty sure that what I am about to say is true—said that he did not intend to extend the Canadian ownership tax for the financing of that acquisition of marketing outlets by Petro-Canada.

Senator Flynn: But even if we heard about this matter in the press, I am quite sure that it is in the minutes of the proceedings of the committee of the other place that the cost of the acquisition of BP is about $200 million more than was first indicated. I think that what the Leader of the Government is being asked to do, and he should be able to understand it, is to inquire of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as to whether or not he was wrong in his earlier calculations and the cost will be $200 million more than was initially indicated. That is the question.

Senator Olson: There is no doubt in my mind as to what the question is. The doubt seems to be in the minds of the members of the opposition and now, unfortunately, in the mind of the Leader of the Opposition as well.

I gave Senator Balfour a firm undertaking—and I do the same for the Leader of the Opposition now—that I would make those inquiries and bring in a reply as quickly as I could. However, they do not seem to be satisfied that I have given that undertaking. They want me to answer before I receive a response to the inquiries. I do not think it would be prudent for me to do that.

Senator Flynn: I agree with you on that, but it would have been quite simple for you to have said, "I have not had time to discuss this matter with the minister." That is all you needed to say, instead of beating around the bush.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Opposition likes to put words in my mouth, but—

Senator Flynn: I would like your words to be clearer; that is all.

Senator Olson: But if he cares to examine what I have said, I am sure he will see that it amounts to almost exactly the same as he has said just now.

Senator Flynn: You can never be direct in your answers, can you?

Hon. Lowell Murray: The kind of information being sought by honourable senators in this matter must surely be within the knowledge of a minister of the Crown, if these transactions are subject to the approval of the government as such.

My supplementary question to the minister is to ask him whether at some point he will enlighten us as to what the process is with regard to transactions of this kind undertaken by a crown corporation with the backing of the government.

It appears that this is a major transaction involving guarantees, perhaps even some use of the government's taxing power, and we would like to know whether such deals are made by the crown corporation simply with a wink and a nod from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, or whether there is some process involving the cabinet.

Senator Olson: I am not sure just how naive Senator Murray is in these matters—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is not one of his mega-weaknesses.

Senator Olson:—but it does not appear to me—

Senator Flynn: Be sensible!

Senator Olson: Perhaps Senator Flynn would let me reply to the question.

Senator Flynn: I thought you were not ready to do that.

Senator Olson: It seems to me that Senator Murray is asking for a detailed play-by-play description of what goes on in cabinet. I know that he is not that naive. He knows the kind of discussions, consultations and exchanges of information and opinion that take place in this kind of process. Senator Murray may also recall that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was, indeed, involved in the public announcement either at the same time or very nearly at the same time as Petro-Canada made its announcement that it intended to acquire this portion of BP.

An Hon. Senator: Had acquired it.

Senator Murray: On whose behalf was he speaking?

Senator Olson: Well, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources speaks as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Surely I do not have to go through a detailed description of what his responsibilities are.

Senator Murray: What is your responsibility? That is what I want to know. And what is the responsibility of your colleagues in the cabinet on this matter?

Senator Olson: In any event, this is one of those situations in which certain information, although it is not exactly hearsay, does fall into the category of what some senators believe they heard or read in the paper about the way numbers were added to come to $347 million or $400 million or $600 million, and so on. I have already given an undertaking that I would get a compilation of all those figures.

Senator Flynn: Not next year.

Senator Olson: When I have a compilation of all those figures I will bring it to honourable senators, and I am sure that will completely satisfy their curiosity. However, in the event that their curiosity is not satisfied then, after we have had that clear, comprehensive compilation of the numbers, perhaps they will wish to ask further questions.

Senator Murray: There is one question I would like to ask right now, and I will try to put it in words the minister will understand.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: There is no use. Don't bother.

Senator Murray: I think members of the Senate and the Canadian public have a right to know what the relationship is between this crown corporation on the one hand and the Governor General in Council, the federal cabinet, on the other. I would be grateful if the minister were to bring to the Senate in writing a statement of that kind at his earliest convenience.

Senator Olson: I can do that, and I will be glad to, but what it really amounts to is my doing Senator Murray's homework for him.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: I say that because, if he wishes to look at the statute, and the authorization that was given to the government in the first place for setting up Petro-Canada, he will find there precisely, and in legal terms, the answer to the question he has just asked.

• (1410)

Senator Balfour: As a further supplementary, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would agree, in responding to my inquiry, to reduce his response to simple terms, namely, the total consideration being paid by Petro-Canada to British Petroleum for the assets and undertaking being acquired by Petro-Canada.

Senator Olson: I understood that to be the basic substance of the question in the first place.

Senator Balfour: No smoke and mirrors.

Senator Olson: I thought that for accuracy my honourable friend should have the totality of the factors that went into the compilation.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question supplementary to the question raised by Senator Murray.

I just want to know a simple fact. Did the Government of Canada approve the purchase of BP by Petro-Canada, or did it not?

Senator Olson: I will go back and obtain the statement, comment or answer—and I am not sure which category it falls into—of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources at the time.

Senator Smith: I did not ask what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said, with respect, honourable senators. I asked for the disclosure of a simple fact—whether the Government of Canada approved this purchase or whether it did not.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I gave that reply because it is more accurate than any other reply I could give, because obviously the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources speaks for and on behalf of the government when he comments on such matters.

Senator Flynn: That does not mean he says everything.

Senator Smith: That does not mean that he received the formal approval, or that the government approved the purchase.

I do not know what all this beating around the bush is about. My question is a simple one; it is a perfectly straightforward question. I am being factual and am not being hypothetical, and there is no question of opinion. Did or did not the government approve the purchase?

Senator Olson: Perhaps Senator Smith does not understand the beating around the bush, but I can tell him, Senator Flynn and Senator Murray that I understand what the beating around the bush is all about. Therefore, I am being extremely careful and accurate in the responses I am giving.

Senator Smith: I have not heard a response to my question yet.

Senator Murray: The scandalous thing is that he does not know the answer.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF "LETTER"

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to refer to another matter, namely, the definition of "letter" as perceived by the Canada Post Corporation. I note that the cabinet has decided to reject the definition that has been received.

My question has to do with the procedure that will be followed from now on. I have been attempting to obtain information as to the objections or comments that have been made by various parties respecting the first definition which was offered. I believe the first definition was amended in some respects. I do not know what the definition is that the Governor in Council has ultimately decided to reject, but I should like to know whether the minister can tell me what the procedure will now be, apart from referring the matter back to the Canada Post Corporation.

Will there be an opportunity for interested parties to know what is in the proposed new amendment before it is proceeded with; will there be an opportunity for the members of this chamber to find out what the representations were; and will the government inform the chamber as to what the new suggested amendment is?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Lowell Murray: He does not know.

Senator Olson:—Senator Roblin is aware that there was a precedent set in that the proposed regulations concerning the Canada Post Corporation will require 60 days' notice before being approved by the Governor in Council and becoming effective.

To answer the first part of his question, I am not aware of any change in the process that has been established and, indeed, practised with regard to regulations of the Canada Post Corporation.

Senator Roblin: What I have been trying to get my honourable friend to consider is the possibility that the government might be willing to make known to the public, who will be asked to pay the bill, exactly what it is the Canada Post Corporation is now recommending, and if the government will be willing to make available to the public—who have a general interest in this thing—what the general representations were that were made in respect to this matter. It ultimately leads to the conclusion that the present system with respect to this is so unsatisfactory, as has been proven by current events, that the government would be well advised, in my view, to consider the possibility of having some kind of parliamentary or public review of this matter. I have made this appeal on numerous occasions, but now that the government is back to square one with Canada Post, would they not be kind enough to consider the advisability of some method of public ventilation of this matter so that it can be dealt with in an open framework and so that all those concerned can take part in that process?

• (1415)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the implication is that it is not an open process, and I cannot accept that. It was known some time ago—in fact, more than 60 days ago—what the definition of "letter" was to be, according to the submission that was made by the Canada Post Corporation for ratification by the Governor in Council. I expect that that process will be followed again whenever Canada Post is ready to put forth a substitute or another definition of "letter".

The next question that Senator Roblin was asking was whether or not there could or would be parliamentary debate, in one form or another, on that subject, and I will convey his views about that. I am not in a position now to give any undertaking that there will be that kind of debate. However, I cannot agree that it is not open, because it is known 60 days before ratification.

Senator Roblin: May I try to explain to my honourable friend some of my concerns with regard to this matter? It is open insofar as the Canada Post Corporation has to publish in the Canada Gazette its new definition when the time comes. What is not open is the bargaining process for changes that goes on between the interested parties in the industry and the Governor in Council. That is highly confidential, as far as I can ascertain. I have been asking my honourable friend, to no avail, to table the documents affecting those suggestions for changes in the definition. Therefore, it seems to me it is definitely not open. I think there is a large element of public interest here, and the minister would be well advised to consider making it an open review. I am not so concerned about a parliamentary debate—no doubt that would arise—but I am more concerned about committee hearings that might enable all parties to express their views.

The minister has made a small concession to me by agreeing to consult with somebody as to whether or not this can be arranged. I hope he will be able to report in a short time and before the deadline of April 30 next, when this new regulation is to come in, so that we can come to grips with this matter again.

Senator Olson: I accept that, and I will make Senator Roblin's representations known.

I should like to point out, however, that the procedure followed to date is much more open, with the requirement for public information at least 60 days in advance, and, furthermore, that procedure is following accurately the recommendations that were made by the joint committee of the two houses.

Senator Roblin: I do not know what the joint committee is. All I know is everybody is concerned about this matter. I agree that I am only on the periphery of the discussion because I simply put 30 cents on my piece of mail like everybody else. Those who were really concerned about this matter have been asking for a more public and open discussion, and I am glad to hear that the minister will consider that, and I hope he will give us an answer soon.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION

PERCENTAGE OWNERSHIP OF CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may proceed to another topic, I should like to address this question to Senator Austin, the minister of state in charge of the Canada Development Investment Corporation. He is the presiding genius of that yet unformed amorphous body and today he might be able to tell us the framework under which this new body will act.

My specific questions have to do with the plans that are in hand for disposing of the percentage that it owns in the Canada Development Corporation, which I think is 49 per cent. I will give the minister an opportunity, when he answers that question, to fill us in further on the plans he has in mind for this new body.

● (1420)

Hon. Jack Austin (Minister of State for Social Development): Honourable senators, in response to Senator Roblin, I would say that the Canada Development Investment Corporation was formed as a Canada business corporation in May or June of 1982. It was formed by the Canada Development Corporation pursuant to an agreement of May 27, 1982, which was announced at that time, and approved by the Canada Development Corporation shareholders on June 29, 1982.

The essence of the agreement was that the government's share interest in Canada Development Corporation would be held in the form of a holding company which is CDIC, and that the shares owned by the government and held in CDIC would be offered for sale to Canadians at such time as market conditions and a fair return on investment allowed.

I regret to say that those market conditions and that opportunity for a return on investment have not yet materialized. I have not been approached by anyone in the Canadian private sector with a proposal to acquire any of our shares of CDC, but they remain on open offer to Canadians to discuss their interest in CDC with us.

On the second limb of Senator Roblin's question, I am in a position to advise that the same mission of CDIC—that is, to offer to the Canadian investment community assets of a commercial nature now owned by the Government of Canada—will be advanced.

The Government of Canada desires to have CDIC represent a centre of commercial and financial expertise in the government. It will continue to be owned wholly by the Government of Canada and will actively seek to recruit some of the best talent in the private sector so that assets now owned by the Government of Canada can be developed in a way which will allow those assets to be offered for private Canadian shareholder acquisition at the earliest possible time. In other words, CDIC is the instrument of the Government of Canada to privatize some of its present commercial holdings, which are not required to be held in perpetuity as a matter of state presence in certain areas of our economy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What a word.

Senator Austin: If Senator Flynn is not becoming impatient with me, I could add some further information.

Senator Flynn: On the contrary, I am becoming more and more interested.

Senator Austin: At 3.30 this afternoon I will issue a press release, the details of which I would now like to share with honourable senators.

Hon. Lowell Murray: We are honoured.

Senator Austin: The government has transferred to me and to Canada Development Investment Corporation the responsibility for Canadair; de Havilland; the equity held by the Government of Canada in Massey-Ferguson; the shares of Eldorado—

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about Quebecair?

Senator Austin: —and the shares of Teleglobe.

Senator Asselin: Chrysler?

Senator Austin: These corporations will be, therefore, the subject of discussion between the Government of Canada and the private Canadian investment community concerning the interest of that community in participating at an equity level.

Again, those activities will not take place until there is an appropriate investment opportunity in those companies for Canadian investors, and that requires, as honourable senators well know, an attractive commercial record for those companies and an opportunity for the Government of Canada to receive a fair return on its present investment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (1425)

Senator Roblin: I think I struck pay dirt this afternoon.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): You always do.

Senator Roblin: We have actually heard a statement made by a minister of the Crown that the government is considering a program of divesting itself of some of its present commercial activities. I think that, as a general rule, I am bound to approve of such a move on the part of the government. I would like to ask a few questions, however, with respect to the present situation.

What responsibility will the CDIC—the minister's creation—have with respect to these companies which he is going to prepare to divest? For example, with respect to the Canadian Development Corporation, which is now showing a loss for the current year of over $100 million, it is quite clear it is not going to be easy to let that go at the present time. The opportunity has been missed. I am concerned, however, about this question of 49 per cent control residing in the CDIC. Is the government still exercising the same 49 per cent influence as it did before the CDIC was created?

If I may just elaborate on the same line of questioning, to keep the minister from bobbing up and down, what will be the operational or managerial relationship between the CDIC and the de Havilland Corporation, Canadair and those other companies which are now tagged as being available for purchase when the appropriate time comes? Is the minister in a position to tell us who is going to be responsible for this? There is a fellow Manitoban, who is known rather well to the minister, and who I think is active in the CDIC at the present time, if my information is correct. I would like to know if Mr. Maurice Strong will continue to occupy a role. I have heard that Mr. Barney Danson will be active in one of these subordinate companies. I am curious to know whether or not that is correct information. Perhaps the minister will give us a more rounded statement of how he visualizes this divesting procedure will take place.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I truly welcome Senator Roblin's interest. The situation with respect to the Canada Development Corporation shares which are held by me but which are to be held by CDIC with the approval of Parliament is as follows: The government has never, at any time, exercised its shareholding position in CDC so as to affect its business judgments. The president and chief executive officer, Tony Hampson, has stated publicly that at no time has the government sought to influence the business judgments of that entity over any matter. Accordingly, the government is indeed one of the most silent of its shareholders.

As a result of the May 27, 1982, agreement with the Canada Development Corporation, our shares are on the market and we will continue not to attempt to participate as a shareholder in the business governance of the CDIC. We will leave that to the Canadian investor shareholders, who also have a substantial interest in CDC.

With respect to CDIC and its role relating to the assets I have mentioned, including the shares of CDC, the operating relationship will be that of a holding company, investment manager and financial partner. In other words, it will be a hands-on relationship between the 100 per cent shareholder—the Government of Canada—and the corporations, Canadair, de Havilland, Eldorado and Teleglobe. That is a relationship which is quite common in business where the corporations are governed by their directors. Those corporations will continue to be governed by their directors, but the shareholder will be represented on the board of directors, and the shareholder qua its role as a provider of funds will indeed wish to have an arrangement with those corporations relative to their operating plans, their corporate purposes and their use of those funds. Those are normal commercial operating circumstances.

With respect to the executive personnel, I would like to advise honourable senators that Joel I. Bell has today been appointed president and chief executive officer.

Senator Roblin: Of what?

● (1430)

Senator Austin: Of Canada Development Investment Corporation. Hitherto he has been Executive Vice President of Petro-Canada and has done an outstanding job as a senior officer of that company in its corporate acquisitions and financing program. I believe that Petro-Canada stands as one of the outstanding illustrations of the role of a crown-funded commercial activity.

An Hon. Senator: Time will tell.

Senator Austin: With respect to Maurice Strong, who indeed is one of the most distinguished people to come from Manitoba—he comes from Oak Lake—he is the Chairman of the Board of Canada Development Investment Corporation. He will devote approximately half of his time to the affairs of CDIC. The corporation will shortly be announcing the appointment of additional senior executive personnel to assist it in its role.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would ask one further question, to make sure that I have the situation correctly visualized in my mind. I take it that the Mr. Bell referred to is the one who received such prominent notice in a book known as The Sorcerer's Apprentices, which I had the pleasure of reading over the weekend, and which I consider should be on the desk of more than one member of this house, having regard to his interest in public affairs.

From what the minister has said, I can now look to him with respect to certain aspects of the management of those companies. He has told me that he is going to operate as a holding company, which means that the CDIC will make itself responsible for the capital budgets of those companies, for their operating budgets, and for their profit plan, and that the government itself will hold the purse strings. Therefore, it would be legitimate for me to ask the minister from time to time what progress is being made in those companies, not from an operating point of view but from the point of view of the holding company responsibility that he has outlined.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, with respect to Canadair, de Havilland, Eldorado and Teleglobe, I will stand in the same position, in reporting to this house, as the previous respective ministers did in reporting to the other place. With respect to CDC, my role will be that which I have described on several occasions in response to questions from Senator Roblin, which is that I do not report to this house respecting CDC because CDC is not a crown corporation or public corporation, but a private corporation operating as any other private corporation.

With respect to Massey, I have a position analogous to that of CDC. We are relatively small shareholders in that private corporation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—CANADA-FRANCE MARITIME BOUNDARY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the Prime Minister's recent visit to France. I should like to know if any discussions were held dealing with Canada's position concerning St. Pierre and Miquelon, particularly with regard to the ongoing negotiations that are not settled on the boundary lines between Canada and France, which has such an effect on the economic zone and the 200-mile fishing zone.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, from memory I do not recollect that the subject was on the agenda. However, I will make inquiries of the Prime Minister's Office and will ascertain whether or not it was discussed.

Senator Marshall: If the subject was not discussed, in view of the fact that press reports indicate that there now exists a good relationship between Canada and France, possibly this is an opportune time to pursue that matter, which is so important to Newfoundland and the country as a whole.

Senator Olson: Yes; we want to acknowledge that there are good and improving relations between Canada and France.

LOTTERIES

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Am I correct in presuming that the minister is responsible also for lotteries?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport): Honourable senators, at the present time the federal government is not involved in lotteries. We have made an arrangement with the provinces that in return for a designated annual amount, which is paid by the provincial lottery corporation to the federal government, we will not be directly involved in lotteries.

Senator Marshall: I am not sure to whom I should put this question, but a problem arose in the Hamilton area when a local veterans' association sold tickets at 25 cents each in a small lottery. The police intervened and stopped the association from holding the lottery. That intervention has some effect on the government's responsibility toward lotteries, and since it was such a small lottery, it would appear to be a matter for the federal government to intercede to see why such discriminatory action took place.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a 25-cent lottery would hardly lead one to believe that a police dragnet would be required. However, that is not within the responsibility of my department. I suggest that an inquiry should be directed to the local police officials in the community affected.

Senator Marshall: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would bring that matter to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to see if there is any legal responsibility toward Canadian veterans in whatever phase of activity they participate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, certainly the honourable senator's observations will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I would suggest also that the president of the veterans' association concerned, which was subjected to police action, should direct letters to the provincial attorney general and the head of the police commission. Those should be the first two steps to be taken, I would suggest.

THE ECONOMY

NOVA SCOTIA—GLACE BAY AND PORT HAWKESBURY— RUMOURED CLOSING OF HEAVY WATER PLANTS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. On November 2, the leader, in response to a question by Senator Muir concerning the Nova Scotia heavy water plant, said that he did not know that any decision to close the plants would be made imminently.

Would the leader put to rest all the doubts that now exist in the minds of hundreds of people who work in those plants by saying that the government does not intend to close them?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I gave what I considered to be a fairly full answer to the question that was asked by Senator Muir, although he did ask an additional question, or an extension, somewhat along the lines of the question that Senator Donahoe is now asking. I give the honourable senator the same reply, namely, that we hope there will be a market for the product of those plants. My honourable friend knows that there has not been a brisk demand for heavy water and that most of the production is being stockpiled. That, of course, is an unhealthy and difficult financial situation.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, do I understand that the minister is saying that the future wellbeing of those who work in the plants is solely and utterly dependent on market conditions?

Senator Olson: I did not say that. I said it was difficult, but, like almost any other production of any other commodity, there is a direct relationship between the financial health of those companies and whether or not they can sell what they are producing.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a further question on that subject. Without regard for press reports, the actions and agenda of the cabinet, or of the future market for heavy water, but merely as a matter of fact, will the minister answer this one question: Will the plants remain open?

● (1440)

Senator Olson: The answer is that the plants are open now and, indeed, the federal government has been involved in providing financial underwriting to keep these plants open for all of the obvious good reasons, and for a long time after the production of these plants commenced being stockpiled.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, one is tempted to be quiet and one is also tempted to ask a further question. Will the assistance alleged, at least, by the Leader of the Government to be given by the government to those plants—which, as I understand him is responsible for their being open—continue to be given?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I should make a reference to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the other ministers involved. What my honourable friend is asking of me now is that I, on behalf of the government, give an undertaking that there will be this kind of financial assistance in perpetuity or, at least, over a longer term. I have to tell the honourable senator, quite frankly, that I do not have the authority to give that kind of assurance now.

AIRLINES

QUEBECAIR—POSSIBLE EXEMPTION FROM PROVISIONS OF BILL S-31

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question concerning Quebecair asked by Senator Asselin on November 9. While I have answered a number of these questions to date, I now have a much longer and more detailed reply, and I would ask that it be incorporated in Hansard as though it had been read.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, Senator Asselin stated in the Senate on November 9, 1982, that the government had not given a "satisfactory response" to the proposed Quebecair acquisition of Nordair. The Minister of Transport gave the government's response through a telex sent to his counterpart in the Province of Quebec. The minister stated in the other place on November 9 "that the Snow-Clair proposal has not been received very enthusiastically by the various parties involved. First of all, Air Canada was to participate in the merger, but without voting rights, a condition that Air Canada did not find very attractive. On the other hand, Nordair employees were not very enthusiastic either, and furthermore, parties from the private sector in Quebec and Ontario were, it seemed, either not very willing or not able to make substantial investments in the company that would be created as a result of a merger. In other words, a great many people did not seem to find the Snow-Clair plan very attractive, and I therefore hope that we shall be able to take a more realistic approach, for instance, in discussing Air Canada's participation in the merger, as a voting participant and not as a participant who provides funds without having a say in how they are spent."

To answer the second part of Senator Asselin's question, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs announced on November 9 that the cabinet had ruled that in accordance with Clause 6 of Bill S-31, Quebecair would be exempted from the provisions of the bill as soon as they take effect.

Senator Asselin asked whether there would be discussions with the Government of Quebec on this issue. The answer is yes. The Minister of Transport, the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, met with his counterpart, the Hon. Michel Clair, the Minister of Transport of the Province of Quebec, on November 10.

Senator Asselin asked why the Minister used his discretionary powers to grant Air Ontario an exclusive licence to provide air services to Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal on a route that was already partly being used by Quebecair. The Minister of Transport reversed a CTC decision regarding Air Ontario, thereby giving Air Ontario the authority to operate Sarnia-London-Toronto-Ottawa-Montreal without traffic rights between Ottawa and Montreal. As there are many non-stop flights between Toronto and Montreal (Quebecair, Nordair, Air Canada, CP Air), it is unlikely that passengers wishing to travel on this route will be diverted to the slower and indirect Air Ontario service. The main purpose of the Minister's decision was to provide passengers from Sarnia and London with same-plane service to Ottawa and Montreal.

Therefore, to answer Senator Asselin's final question, this did not mean that the federal government was no longer open to the Snow-Clair proposal.

ECONOMIC UNION AND DEVELOPMENT PROSPECTS FOR CANADA

ROYAL COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT—ROLE OF DEPARTMENT
OF FINANCE, ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA AND HELLIWELL
COMMITTEE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply for Senator Murray, who asked a number of questions concerning the respective roles of the Royal Commission on Economic Union, the Economic Council of Canada and the Economic Advisory Panel to the Minister of Finance. In my reply to the honourable senator yesterday I identified several places where he could get the terms of reference with respect to each of these entities. This document not only identifies them but, indeed, identifies the full text of those terms of reference. The document is rather long and it could be printed in Hansard, but for Senator Murray's information, perhaps it would be satisfactory if I simply tabled it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I trust that before long the minister will bring to the Senate the name of the royal commissioners who will be joining the Honourable Donald Macdonald on this excursion that was announced a few weeks ago by the Prime minister.

Senator Olson: Without agreeing that the commission is an excursion of any kind, I can assure Senator Murray—as I indicated in the firm, unequivocal undertaking that I gave to this question when it was first asked—that I will bring that information to this chamber as soon as it is available. I am not backing away from that undertaking at all.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—OFFSHORE RESOURCES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody: I wonder if the leader could undertake to find out for me the status of the eastern offshore dispute. I asked the question yesterday and there appears to be some new movement on one side or the other, though it is all very vague. There were some articles in the local press in St. John's a few days ago and I have noticed some articles in the local press here both yesterday and today. Did the minister have an opportunity to inquire, and, if so, has anything changed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Leader of the Government): I will check that matter out immediately.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND (NO. 2)—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Stanbury for the second reading of Bill C-135, to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, as the sponsor of the bill said in his introduction last evening, Bill C-135 essentially eliminates the interest deferral plan and substitutes a grant. I was tempted to read back to the chamber some of the answers given in the other place explaining why this could not be done. I decided not to do that because I did not want to inflict the answers on my colleagues on this side and I do not think that the honourable senators on the other side would appreciate it either. However, I say to the sponsor that once he has accepted one idea from the opposition I hope that he will feel free to accept other ideas from the opposition. We will not feel that we are being plagiarized or anything, and we would be only too pleased to help him out.

The bill itself misses several good opportunities to deal with problems affecting the housing industry, such as the cancellation of MURBs, the substitution of the Canada Rental Supply Plan, the Canadian Home Ownership Stimulation Plan and, in general, the reduction of housing starts in Canada, which is developing into a crisis situation and is being ignored by the government. As honourable senators are aware, MURBs were cancelled in the MacEachen budget of November 1981. The honourable member for Vancouver Centre, in reply to that budget pointed out certain difficulties arising as a result of its introduction and the following week temporary changes were made to the budget. In that year there were approximately 54,000 MURB starts. This year we have the Canada Rental Supply Program, which was introduced in the same budget, that originally allowed for interest-free loans of $7,500 per unit, which amount was later altered upward. The average loan is $12,000. Approximately 7,800 units have been approved under this plan.

However, honourable senators, I point out that there is a considerable difference between the 54,000 units commenced under MURB and the 7,884 units approved under the Canada Rental Supply Program. I emphasize that these units have only been approved. No one seems to be able to tell me how many of them have actually started this year. I think that the number of starts is a very important aspect, because we have dropped a considerable number of housing units at a time when rental accommodation is very scarce in a number of Canadian cities. I believe that the city of Ottawa is at about a 0.5 per cent vacancy rate. I ask the sponsor of the bill to tell us how many of the units approved under the Canada Rental Supply Program were for social housing.

On March 23, 1982, the former Minister of Housing said that up to one-third of the units could be for social housing; he did not say "would" be. I understand that a number of the projects have no provision for so-called social housing units. The Canadian Home Ownership Plan, as I said with regard to the estimates recently, is the only program that is showing some signs of success. As honourable senators are aware, this plan provides a grant of $3,000 to those who are purchasing their first home. However, because the program is meeting with a bit of success the government seems to be annoyed: "We cannot have everything else failing and have one program beginning to show some promise. We will have to alter that program." Consequently, as of January 1, 1983 that program will apply to new units only.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, before that program is altered I think we should look at it closely. To date, there have been 29,000 grants approved for new housing and 55,000 grants approved for existing housing. That is a ratio of almost two to one. There are several reasons for the fact that existing housing is more popular. First-time purchasers like to buy what are commonly called starter homes and then trade up. Existing housing is cheaper and, therefore, more attractive to first-time purchasers. Another good reason why I believe the Home Ownership Stimulation Plan should continue to apply to existing housing is that in certain centres of the country, such as Sudbury where the mining industry has closed down, a number of people are bound to have to leave town and it will be difficult for them to sell their homes, particularly if the subsidy applies to new construction but not to homes that must be vacated. There would seem to be a certain discrimination against these unfortunate people who have to sell their homes, if they have to take $3,000 off the selling price in order to compete with new construction.

[Senator Phillips.]

As I said earlier, honourable senators, housing starts have been decreasing each year. Apparently, there is a ratio between housing starts and the deficit. As the deficit increases, housing starts decrease. This year it is estimated that there will be approximately 130,000 housing starts in Canada, but the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has stated that there is a need for at least 220,000 units. That leaves a shortfall of about 90,000 units. I find nothing in this bill that would tend to stimulate construction or bring on to the market the additional 90,000 units that are required.

The bill makes no mention of co-op housing, although that form of housing is popular in certain areas of the country, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, because it is a means by which people in lower income brackets can own their own homes by participating in their construction and thus keeping the costs down. I am certain the new minister of housing, who is familiar with co-operative programs, will want to give this concept his attention in the near future.

Mobile homes are ineligible for grants, honourable senators, and I think that is unfortunate, because in areas where mega-projects take place, such as the Alsands and Cold Lake, there is an urgent need for that type of housing. The workers who go to such projects seldom go on a permanent basis. They know they will be working in such locations for perhaps three years, at the end of which time they will have to move. I should like to think the government would reconsider its position on this. I think it would be a mistake for it to remove mobile homes from the program.

Honourable senators, in the other place recently there was a suggestion of a new program of insurance against mortgage interest rate fluctuations. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill can give us some information in that regard. I do not believe this chamber has had any information on that to date. I hope that program does not meet with the fate which befell the program for mortgage reductions. In that case a blue chip committee was formed to study the proposal in the June budget and it recommended against the program. The government dropped it like a hot potato. Incidentally, I find it rather strange, honourable senators, that when parliamentary committees, or other parliamentary bodies, make recommendations to the government they are ignored, but when this blue chip committee made its recommendation the government acted upon it as if it could hardly wait to agree with it. I find that strange indeed, especially in view of the fact that throughout the summer the government spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on advertising the program, suggesting that this was the time to buy a home because the program was coming on, and then simply dropped the program. They could not even wait until the term of the TV ads had expired. There were no ads ready to replace the ones advocating the purchase of homes under this non-existent plan; the government simply had to run the old ads to term because they did not have new ads ready, they had cancelled the program so quickly.

Last evening the sponsor of the bill stated that there were approximately 10,000 applications at a cost of approximately $4 million. That gave me some concern because that averages out to a grant of $400 per application, and yet the sponsor of the bill had been speaking of $3,000 grants. Perhaps he can tell us how many of the applications actually received the full $3,000. Did anyone receive the maximum amount?

The sponsor closed in what I would call a crescendo of exaggeration. He spoke of the programs the government had in place for housing and the jobs that would be provided. Well, I can only say that I am sorry the sponsor did not tell the Minister of Finance about all these things, because the Minister of Finance in his October statement did not refer to those figures. They must really have been exaggerated, if the Minister of Finance would not use them. I think the best term I can develop for the figures used by the honourable senator last evening is that they are a crescendo of exaggeration.

Honourable senators, this year in Canada there will be approximately 700,000 mortgage renewals. Under the provisions of Bill C-135 approximately 6,000 grants have been provided. That is less than 1 per cent of the renewals—hardly an outstanding achievement, honourable senators. Nevertheless, the urgency of mailing the cheques is very real and important to the people involved. I only hope that they receive those cheques, because if the Post Office is used they probably will not receive them. Perhaps the numbers are so small that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation will call the individuals concerned so that they will be able to go to the office to pick up their cheques.

● (1500)

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Stanbury speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I will try not to give you "a crescendo of exaggerations" this afternoon. I really want to point out that my honourable colleague Senator Phillips has discussed a number of matters which might have been included in the bill. They were not, but it may well be that during the committee stage he will be given an explanation as to why they were not, and he might make suggestions then as to what should be included in the bill. However, there was no suggestion on his part that the bill should be opposed in its substance. Therefore, I feel it is appropriate that this bill be referred to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Stanbury moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 18, the debate on the motion of Senator van Roggen for second reading of Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, at the outset, I should like to congratulate the sponsor of the bill, Senator van Roggen, who made an interesting presentation of this legislation last week. Before discussing the details of the bill, I wish to recall to the Senate the basic principles and background of this legislation.

The first basic part of this legislation is to authorize an increase in the Canadian contribution to the World Bank as part of an overall doubling of its capitalization. This will assist the World Bank to continue the lending programs it has undertaken over the years in its practice of lending development funds on a commercial basis. The amendment will raise the value of the shares of the World Bank that can be purchased by Canada from over $1 billion currently in the act to a new amount of over $2 billion. The amendment will permit Canada to subscribe to some 10,000 World Bank shares valued at approximately $1 billion in current Canadian dollars. However, only 7.5 per cent of the face value of the shares, or some $120 million, must actually be paid in over a four- to five-year period.

The second part of the legislation is to provide funding to the International Development Association, which is the agency that provides loans on soft terms to the less developed countries of the world—the poorest countries—in order to help them develop and grow.

The members of the official opposition in the Senate stress the overwhelming importance of the two institutions concerned, the World Bank and the International Development Association. We admit that these are two important groups, but in the world economy in general, and especially in their work in aiding less developed nations, it has been said very often, and is still true today, that confidence in the international financial system depends on the willingness of developed countries to play a role through multilateral agencies such as the World Bank and the International Development Association.

However, we want to stress that the economic problems facing the international community cannot be solved by simply increasing financial aid. Canada and other industrialized nations must recognize that there is a limited amount of capital reserved for this purpose, and in total, generally.

Thirdly, a theme common to our participation in the debate, considering the importance placed by the government on participating in organizations such as the World Bank and the IDA, is that it places a greater emphasis on "putting our house in order". I say that because if economic conditions, both in the international community and here in Canada continue to deteriorate, it naturally follows that Canada's ability to play a leading role, or a role, at least, in these institutions will be severely affected.

Finally, we believe that this legislation is directly relevant to the need for government accountability in terms of aid efficiency. We have consistently called for an overall review of Canada's aid programs, and CIDA in particular, with an aim to providing cost-efficient aid and development programs. For if the government provides cost-efficient aid programs, and an overall aid strategy, Canadian participation in the invaluable work done by the institutions mentioned above will be ensured and strengthened.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, it is obvious that, owing to the interdependence of nations, our own development and the economic growth of Third World countries cannot be dissociated. This international aid policy has oftentimes benefited Canada with respect to higher industrial production, the creation of jobs and the opportunity for Canada to fully export its potentialities and abilities, especially its industrial technology. If we are to be successful, we must oppose national and foreign protectionist programs and liberalize our international trade.

It is a fact that Canadian citizens are now asking scores of questions about their country's international development policy. Given the high rate of unemployment, the inflation problem and all the other economic woes facing our country, it is naturally difficult for Canadians to swallow the fact that Canada does spend in excess of $1 billion a year for international development.

In light of the current world economic situation, it is essential that Canada should belong to such major organizations as the World Bank and the International Development Association with a view to helping poorer countries.

When I was with CIDA we had prepared a white paper featuring an in-depth study of our international development policies. It dealt with the role of multilateral organizations, the work done by non-governmental agencies, the consideration and use of funds, as well as the review of CIDA programs. In short, we had drafted a white paper in which we thoroughly revamped the new guidelines which were to apply to our international development policy. I believe that white paper is still lying around somewhere, but perhaps there has not been an opportunity to refer it to parliamentary committees for study.

Our party is fully aware of the significant role played by the World Bank and the International Development Association on the international financial scene. I asked CIDA officials to provide me with certain figures concerning our contribution to those international financial institutions.

Those figures reveal that, in the past five years, Canada has made generous contributions to enable the World Bank to help developing countries. Canada's contributions amounted to $141.2 million in 1977-78, $164.8 million in 1978-79, $164.8 million in 1979-80, $177.1 million in 1980-81 and $164.6 million in 1981-82.

I also asked those officials what projects CIDA had participated in with the World Bank.

CIDA's contribution to the World Bank during the last five years has been as follows: From July 1977 to 1978, projects worth $30.4 million were carried out; from July 1978 to 1979, $33.7 million; from July 1979 to 1980, $33.6 million; from July 1980 to 1981, $62.3 million, and from July 1981 to 1982, $78.4 million.

Canada's contribution to the International Development Association amounted to $11 million in 1977, $5 million in 1978, $7.5 million in 1979, $6.2 million in 1980 and $11.6 million in 1981.

We do not contribute to international development only through these two agencies, namely the World Bank and the International Development Association. We also contribute to the African Fund; we have invested $170 million in this fund since 1972. Moreover, Canada is planning to invest considerable amounts in the African Bank.

I was also interested in knowing what benefits these investments bring Canadians.

When I was the minister responsible for CIDA, I had the opportunity to visit various developing countries. I used to wonder what benefits our investments in these countries brought us because some of them have managed to upgrade their national production, and I believe that Canada should strive more to become an economic partner of these countries instead of always being a donor. I was surprised by the economic returns of the contributions made by Canada, either in cash, in equipment, in grain or other types of products.

I do not think that Canadians make full use of their opportunities to win over these international markets. I had asked for a review of the situation at the time. I realized that Canadian businessmen did not get a fair share of the return of our investment in international financial institutions.

At the time, our returns were compared to those of other countries. In some cases, our return represents only 5 per cent of our investment. On the other hand, the Japanese get 20 per cent of their investments back in economic benefits for their country. This is why we had introduced a program to encourage Canadian businessmen to take a more active part in international development.

I shall close by saying that we support this bill.

[English]

Honourable senators, I spoke with the sponsor of this bill yesterday and we agreed that it does not need to be referred to committee. Therefore, I agree that the bill now receive second reading.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that if the Honourable Senator van Roggen speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the remarks I made on moving the second reading of this bill, other than to thank Senator Asselin for his speech this afternoon and the additional information he gave honourable senators concerning this bill. I concur in what he said about the benefits that can flow back to Canada from our foreign aid programs. The spin-offs that come later can be very important to us.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

● (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator van Roggen: With leave, now—or at the next sitting.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Unless we are to have Royal Assent this evening, it should be at the next sitting.

Senator van Roggen moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

TWENTY-EIGHTH GENERAL CONFERENCE HELD AT NASSAU, BAHAMAS

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 4, 1982:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-eighth General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held at Nassau, Bahamas, from 16th to 22nd October, 1982, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to make a brief statement on the Twenty-eighth General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association held at Nassau, Bahamas, during the month of October 1982.

The Canadian delegation consisted of the following members of Parliament: Mr. Keith Penner, as leader; the Honourable Arthur Huntington, P.C.; Mr. Gordon Gilchrist; Mr. Roger Simmons; and Mr. Douglas Anguish—all three parties in Parliament being represented at the conference. The Senate was represented by the Honourable Martha Bielish and me.

In addition to this official delegation from the federal government, Canada was represented, ex officio, by the Honourable Gerald Ottenheimer, chairman of the Executive Committee of the Commonwealth Association, one of the two senior positions in that great organization. Canada was also represented by Dr. M. Foster, a member of the Executive Committee. I would also point out that all but one of the provinces had at least one representative. It is clear that Canada had a very strong representative delegation at this important plenary conference of the association.

All members of the parliamentary delegation from Canada contributed significantly and vigorously to the various debates. Since the verbatim account of the debates will be issued in the near future, I will make only brief reference to them at this time.

The opening speech on the topic of approaches to unemployment was given by Mr. Penner. Later in the conference, Mr. Penner also dealt with relationships between Parliament and the executive branch of the government. Mr. Huntington's main contribution was made in the debate on control and scrutiny of public finance by Parliament. Mr. Gilchrist dealt with security among small nations; and Messrs. Simmons and Anguish made important contributions to the panel discussions on energy and the environment, respectively.

Senator Bielish was able to draw on her vast experience of social problems, generally, and, in particular, on the rights of women. Her background in these matters enabled her to make an excellent contribution on the all-important topic of worldwide population control. My own contribution revolved around the general topic of human rights.

Exempting myself from my next observation, honourable senators, I feel duty-bound to report that members of the 46 other delegations repeatedly made formal and informal references to the quality of the Canadian delegation.

All of us from Canada were very pleased that our leader, Mr. Penner, was elected as a member of the Executive Committee. I was particularly pleased that the only standing ovation during the entire week-long conference was reserved for my fellow Newfoundlander, Mr. Ottenheimer, who, as chairman of the Executive Committee, delivered what everybody agreed was a remarkable and most eloquent closing address. For those who may not be aware of it, Mr. Ottenheimer is the Minister of Justice and Attorney General in the Peckford administration. I should add that he is a noted scholar, being a graduate of the Sorbonne and several other universities, and is well versed and fluent in seven languages.

From what I have said, it is clear that the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association conference dealt with a number of matters of world importance. If one were to listen to some media spokesmen, or read what some columnists and editors had to say about both that conference and other international parliamentary conferences, one would be left with the very strong impression that Canada's financial involvement in Commonwealth affairs should, at this time, be either reduced to a minimum or eliminated altogether. The impression would be given that, in a time of recession and restraint, it is gross extravagance for Canada to be sending delegations to parliamentary conferences such as the one I am reporting on today.

Honourable senators, in the light of the world's problems and the interdependence of all countries of the world, this attitude is well nigh incomprehensible. Not one of the 46 countries who comprise the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association is held in higher regard by the others than is Canada. Over the long haul, this feeling is bound to translate itself into benefits for Canada in one way or another. However, that is not the major justification for Canada's involvement. If that were the only consideration, Canada could, justifiably, be accused of being selfish.

Many of the 46 countries are Third World or developing countries who need Canada's sympathy and assistance. I speak personally when I say that, above all, they need our understanding. By the same token, especially at this particular time in Canadian and world history—at a time when we are confronted by so much economic and political turbulence—Canada must not lose respect. Canada cannot afford to disregard the influence she wields in international affairs. Let us make no mistake about it, honourable senators, Canada does wield influence, and is held in the highest regard by other countries. That is not a piece of wishful thinking on my part.

● (1530)

It may come as a surprise, even to some honourable senators, to hear that, of the 46 countries which comprise the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, the richest in terms of the per capita gross national product is Canada. I have before me the actual figures for 1979. In that year, Canada's per capita GNP was $9,650. I ask honourable senators to register that figure in their minds. The country nearest to Canada was Australia, with $9,100 per capita. The third country was the United Kingdom, with $6,340 per capita. At the other end of the spectrum was Kenya, with $380 per capita. I remind honourable senators that Canada has a per capita GNP of over $9,000. India, an influential and vigorous member of the Commonwealth, and the second largest country in the world in terms of population, has a per capita gross national product of $190. Bangladesh, the poorest country, has a per capita gross national product of $100.

Honourable senators, if, because of current economic conditions, we were to take the advice of some of the editors, columnists and commentators Canada would cease participating in this organization. If that were so for Canada, how much more appropriate should it be for the poorer nations of the world? If we were to give up our membership in this association because we are experiencing some financial troubles at the moment, how much more so is that true for countries like Kenya, Bangladesh or perhaps 30 other developing Third World countries? How much more necessary would it be for those countries to get out and save that bit of money?

In other words, probably without realizing it, some members of the media are actually advocating the abolition of this organization. If Canada, the wealthiest of all of the countries belonging to the organization, gets out, why should any of the other poorer nations remain part of it? I believe, perhaps without realizing what they are doing, members of the media are advocating the abolition of the Commonwealth.

Honourable senators, we could stretch that idea a little further to say that we may as well not take part in the conferences of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, which is a still bigger organization than the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. The idea could be carried yet further to its logical absurdity, which is that Canada ought to back out of the United Nations. If that were to happen, all the other nations should back out, too, and that organization would go the way of all flesh.

It is rather interesting to note, honourable senators, that the United Kingdom, which so often sets the pattern in these matters, and which I think we would all agree is going through a period of severe economic troubles, sent 10 senior members of the Thatcher administration and the Parliament at Westminster to the meeting. Five of those representatives bore the title "Right Honourable." What does that mean, honourable senators? Five of those representatives were cabinet ministers, yet they were present at that meeting. Should anyone want to confirm that information, I have with me the official list of delegates.

Incidentally, the English delegation was led by one of the senior members of the Thatcher administration, the Right Honourable Harry Neil Martin. I may be naive on this point, but, having met Mrs. Thatcher and having followed her career in recent years, I cannot see her approving such an expenditure of time and money—such an absence of senior political figures from the United Kingdom—if she did not regard this association very highly. As a matter of fact, Mrs. Thatcher was, for many years, an active member of this association. Five cabinet ministers did not travel to the Bahamas without Mrs. Thatcher's okay; I do not think anybody would kid himself on that.

I can say the same thing with respect to Australia. It is not all sunshine in Australia, in these difficult times, yet fourteen members of the Australian Senate and House of Representatives travelled four or five times the distance that Canadians had to travel to attend this meeting. I cannot see their doing so if they did not feel it was of great benefit to their country.

Honourable senators, the formation of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association has brought together a number of traditional enemies. Over the period of time that has elapsed since its formation following World War II—now some 30 years—there have been two wars, to the best of my recollection, involving members of the association as antagonists. I remind honourable senators that we are talking about an organization of 46 nations. Does anybody really think that, over that period of time when literally hundreds of wars, large and small, were fought, the existence of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association had no peacekeeping effect? Had there been no Commonwealth organization, how many of those 46-member nations would have resorted to violence, to military antagonism and hostilities, against one another?

To return for a moment to Canada's role in this organization, the fact is that, rightly or wrongly, Canada is expected to provide leadership. The views and feelings of the Canadian people, as expressed by the Canadian delegates to conferences such as the one I have been talking about, carry enormous weight and influence around the world. For Canada to opt out of its moral responsibility—and that is what it is—would be an act of cowardice, and, indeed, would be a supreme act of irresponsibility.

Honourable senators, I have often paid, and continue to pay, tribute to the dedication of many members of the media. I cannot help thinking that very often commentators and editorial writers on these subjects work from a basis which essentially is either malice or profound ignorance, or, I suspect, a combination of both. At this time of economic and political turbulence, Canada cannot afford to ignore its overseas friends. Let us not panic because we are passing through difficult times. We have had recessions before, and we shall have them again. The world did not end on previous occasions, and it will not end this time.

We have to remind ourselves that we are still one of the most fortunate countries—perhaps, in many ways, the most fortunate country—in the world, and what that really means is that our responsibility to the less fortunate areas of the world is proportionately great.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, Senator Rowe capably presented an overview of the Twenty-eighth Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Conference held at Nassau in the Bahamas in October of this year. He also mentioned that eventually a verbatim report will be available. However, perhaps I may be permitted to make a few comments and observations, since I was honoured to be part of the Canadian delegation and to have the opportunity of hearing the views of parliamentarians from other member countries of the Commonwealth, and to participate in the discussions, both formally and informally.

Senator Rowe's contribution in a plenary session on the topic "The Freedom of the Individual, Human Rights and Responsibilities, and the Authority of Government in a Parliamentary Democracy" was well received by an interested audience. In his remarks Senator Rowe referred to the patriation of the Constitution and spoke about the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In this chamber I represent the opposition party, and I will present a few of the highlights from the point of view of a member of the opposition. Some countries within the Commonwealth have a one-party system and expressed the view that an opposition was not necessary; that their system of government was operating satisfactorily.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Olson agrees.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Stand up and take a bow.

Senator Bielish: I thought that would make someone happy. The session dealing with the subject "The Role of the Opposition in a Parliamentary System" was addressed by the Honourable Ron Huntington representing Canada. There were several references to his speech being an excellent one and he received enthusiastic applause. In his usual modest manner, he commented that his remarks were the result of a number of years of first-hand experience.

What I have said may suggest to honourable senators both the serious nature and friendly atmosphere that was evident throughout the conference. The agenda included seven half-day plenary sessions and two half-day panel discussions. I will list the topics, and honourable senators will see that they ranged over topics not only of concern to the Commonwealth but also to Canada, bearing in mind Canada's place in the world. The first plenary session dealt with World Peace and Development, and then followed: The Security and Future of Small Countries of the Commonwealth; Approaches to Unemployment; The Freedom of the Individual, Human Rights and Responsibilities, and the Authority of Government in a Parliamentary Democracy; and Development of Alternative Energy Resources. The latter subject took the form of a panel. There were two panels held at the same time and the subject of the second was Parliamentary Privilege with Special Reference to Confidentiality.

Further panels dealt with Population Control and Preservation of the Environment with Special Reference to Wildlife. Other plenary sessions dealt with Parliament and the Scrutiny of Public Finance; The Role of the Opposition in a Parliamentary System; and Parliament and the Executive.

At the time of the conference the annual meeting of the General Assembly of the Association took place, and also the election of officers.

The topics discussed by parliamentarians of member nations of the Commonwealth, and the exchanging of ideas and experiences; learning of their successes and setbacks; seeking solutions to problems that beset countries both large and small, be they developed or developing, is what the CPA is all about. There are those who would heap criticism. Honourable senators may judge for themselves.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.
